of his braveſt Captains, gallantly corvetting a horſe, and galloping through ſnows and wilderneſſes not to be ſeparated from him. If we diſcourſe of baniſhment and ignominies, Sulpitia brake up doors and locks to run (maugre her mother) after her exiled husband, among the proſcripts of the Triumvirat. If impriſonments be put into the liſt of account, Eponia was nine years ſhut up with her husband in the hollow cavern of a Tomb. If you regard maladies, a daughter of Spain, daily with her tongue, licked the envenomed wound of King Edward of England her dear husband. If you look on the terrible of terribles, death; Blaunch the Italian Lady, ſcorning the flatteries of the Tyrant Actolin, who paſſionately woed her, (captive though ſhe were) eſcaping out of the hands of ſouldiers, ſhe went to breathe out her life upon the tomb of him to whom ſhe firſt of all had given her heart and affections. Yea, I much more admire thoſe, who willingly have depriued themſelves of all riches, greatneſſe, yea even of the preſence of their husbands, whom they dearly loved, to procure them liberty, wealth, and honour. Cedrenus obſerveth in his hiſtory, that Conſtantine the ninth, exerciſing tyranny, as well in matter of love, as within his Empire, cauſed the Roman Argyropylus to be ſought out, and commanded him to repudiate his wife, whom he had lawfully married, to take his daughter, on condition that he would make him Ceſar, and aſſociate him with himſelf in his dignity: but if he condeſcended not to his will, he threatned to pull out his eyes, and to make him all the dayes of his life miſerable. The Lady, who was preſent, ſeeing her husband involved in all the perplexities that might be, and ignorant what anſwer to give unto the Emperour. Ah Sir (ſaid ſhe) I ſee you are much hindered in a brave way, if it onely reſt in your wife, that you be not great and happy; I freely deprive my ſelf of all, yea, of your company (which is more precious to me then all the Empires of the world) rather then prejudice your fortune; For know, I love you better then my ſelf: And ſaying this, ſhe cut off her hair; and voluntarily entred into a Monaſtery, which the other was willing enough to ſuffer, preferring ambition before love, a matter very ordinary among great ones.

Idem lib. 6. cap. 7.

Lipſii exem. politica.

Rhod. Ganſius hiſtor. Hiſpan. p. 1. cap. 4. Seard. lib. 3. hiſt. Paravic.

Cedren. in Epirom. hiſt p. 596.

Excellent loyalty of a Lady.

Τὴν κοσμικὴν ὀνῆσιν εἰς ἀπάτην τὴν ζήλα.

Out of all this it may be inferred, that women are to be found very virtuous, and moſt conſtant in their affections. But the queſtion I propoſed in the ſecond place, if in caſe it ſo fall out, whether amities may be fixed out of marriage, between ſex and ſex, is a paſſage very dangerous, and worldlings muſt not think it ſtrange, if I look into it with much precantion. It is a pleaſant thing to hear how Pelagius the Arch-heretick talks in S. Jerome; For he makes a Rhodomantade ſuteable to a ſpirit ſwoln up with pride, and blinded within the opinion of his own worth, There are (ſaith he) who ſhut themſelves within cells, and never ſee the face of any one woman, yet ſuffer themſelves to be enflamed with love, and tormented with deſires: which may very well happen, for they are miſerable creatures, who well deſerve to be ſo handled. As for me, I freely profeſſe, I am daily environed with an hoſt of women, and feel not the leaſt ſpark of concupiſcence. S. Baſil was of another opinion, when he ſheweth, that a man, who perpetually converſeth with women, and ſaith he feeleth not any touch thereof, participateth not at all of humane nature, but rather is ſome extraordinary prodigie; For, as he learnedly diſputeth in the Book he compoſed of Virginity, the body of a woman is (as it were) a ſection, and a fragment of that, of the firſt man, which is the cauſe he naturally deſireth her, as a part taken from himſelf. The palm hath not more inclination to the palm, nor the iron to the adamant, then one ſex hath towards another. When God created the mother of the living, it is written (he built) as if the Scripture would ſay, That woman is a houſe wherein the heart of man lodgeth, but too often. Sole glances (ſaith this great man) are ſpirituall hands, which cauſe wonderfull effects; From thence the firſt battery of Concupiſcence beginneth, as ſaith Clemens Alexandrinus. Adde, that after the corruption of ſinne, we have in us an evil ſource of carnall deſire, which floweth from the bottome of our ſoul by our five ſenſes, as by ſo many conduit-pipes. Nature is extremely ſubtil and buſie, and when one hath a hundred times together by ſtrong hand chaſed it away, a hundred times it returneth; It inſinuates it ſelf, it preſſeth forward with ſweet violences, with charming ſweetneſſes, it inſenſibly ſpinneth the web, and doth what it liſt.

Rodomanto of Pelagius, Jerem. in Pelagium.

S. Baſil de Virginitate. Inclination of ſex to ſex.

τιμῆμα γὰρ ἀνδρός. Dangerous autractives in the converſation with women.

Ædificavit dominus coſtam quàm tulerat de Adam in mulierem Gen. 2. 22. ὠμμάτων βολαὶ δ' ὀυμαὶ χέρες. S. Baſil. ibid. Ἀ ὀφθαλμῶν ἀκρο-θιγὴς ὁλισθήματα. Clem. Alex. pædag. l. 3.

Moreover, it is ſeconded with a certain curioſity, to know all that which is moſt pernicious to it. It kicketh againſt the laws of honeſty and modeſty, and thinks the forbiddance of an evil is the greateſt of all torments. It will know too much, to be chaſte, and makes a ſnare to it ſelf of proper ſcience. O God of purity, how many do we now adayes ſee, who, to give entrance to a wicked curioſity, through too free converſation, receive as many wounds as they give glances, and as many deaths as beauty ſhoots arrows againſt them! Solomon, who well knew the effect of this paſſion, ſaid: Thy eyes ſhall ſee forreign women, and thy heart ſhall entertain a very evil diſcourſe within thee: Thou ſhalt be as one faſt aſleep in the midſt of the waves of the ſea, or as a lazy plot, who, oppreſſed with drowſineſſe, hath forſaken the helm. Thou wilt ſay, It is true, they ſtruck me, but I feel no pain of it: They have drawn me this way and that way, but I am not ſenſible of it, when ſhall I be awakened, to be again drunk with love, and to return to my accuſtomed pleaſures? See how a ſenſleſſe ſoul talketh, which having not well guarded its ſenſes in the firſt aſſault, delivereth the heart over as a prey, and ſinks into the bottome of Abyſſe. But to reſt within the limits of honeſt amities, it is undoubted one cannot uſe too much precaution, ſo ſubtil and penetrative are the ſtings thereof, eſpecially, when it is ſharpned by Beauty, Bounty, and Benefits. Yea, miſery therein doth ſometimes bear ſo ſenſible a part, that a beautifull and virtuous woman, being in her innocency afflicted, ſhooteth arrows of victorious love into the heart of man: And very well the Philoſopher Seneca hath obſerved, that love is great, when it grows out of commiſeration.

Prov. 23. Oculi tui videbunt extraneas, & cor tuum loquetur perverſa, &c.

Modeſt amities with women ſhould alwayes be handled with much precaution.

Magnus amor eſt, qui de miſericordia venit S. Cant. 6.

It is true which Caſſidorus ſaid in the book of Amity, that one affection degenerateth inſenſibly into another. Love, in the beginning, is wholly divine, then it becometh humane, being yet within the limits of reaſon: From humane it paſſeth to naturall, wherein it quickly feels the ſting of nature, and the firſt fervour of Concupiſcence. From naturall, it becometh officious, entertaining it ſelf with diſcourſes, complements, complacence, offices, and ſervices. From officious, it moſt times becometh carnall, and from carnall, abſolutely unchaſte.

Caſſiod. de amicitia.

Degeneration-amity.

Iamblichus, a Philoſopher, very curious, ſaith, that thoſe who profeſſed to conſult with ſpirits by this divine operation; as is pretended, ſaw in the beginning obſcurities, ſpectres, and night; but perſiſting in their ſearch they perceived the air by little and little waxed bright with a pleaſing ſerenity, and the apparitions became more lightſome. It falleth out quite otherwiſe in the matter of Amities, indiſcreetly tied with women: For at firſt, thoſe ſhews are fair and ſpecious, but the iſſues of them (if one be not heedfull) are black and hideous. A ſoul which feareth God, might ſometimes be very confident among ſuch as make profeſſion to be

Obſervation of Iamblichus applied to the amities of women.

be none of the honestest, because it is prevented by some aversion which hindereth its perdition; but virtue, consorted by sweet disposition, hath another manner of power: for it insinuateth it self into the soul with admirations and satisfactions, which attract the inclination before the consideration can be permitted to frame any further discourse. So S. Bonaventure in the Treatise he composed of the Purity of Confession, saith, The Amity of virtuous women is more to be feared, and the testimonies of mutuall affections which one sex rendereth to another, are infinitely able to enkindle love. One, who is not extremely exorbitant, beginneth not the practice of vice on the top; iniquity hath its apprentiships, none comes in an instant to the utmost of impudency. Above all, heed must be had of the beginnings, before vice take much predominance to our prejudice.

S. Bon. l. de Purit. Conf.

S. Basil de Virginitate.

A noable comparison of S. Basil. Subtilties of the passion of love.

Have you observed what a stone doth thrown into a pond? it maketh at first a small circle, which causeth another, and the other a third, the third out of that produceth a fourth, and they are still infinitely upon encrease so much, that the water onely curled with a little pebble, makes a long chain of circles, which fill up the totall superficies. This happeneth in love, it falls into our heart not perceived, nor foreseen, and in the beginning causeth some slight touch, which, according as it is entertained, distends it self, and is in such sort multiplied, that it repleniseth the whole capacity of our soul with arrows and chain-links, which we cannot but with much labour dissolve and unloose. A spirit which before rested in a generous liberty becomes captive. This imperious visage perpetually knocks at the gate of his heart. It enters into game, study, repose, repast, sleep and action. It insinuateth it self into prayer, with distractions pleasingly troublesome, it busieth the thoughts, it exerciseth the discourse, it enflameth the desire, to go, to visit, to speak; it repleniseth the memory with what is past, the imagination with the future, and the present, with disturbance. A soul finds it is not well, that it dissolves, that it consumes by the senses, and hath already dried up all its smiling beauties, and weakned that vigour, which is in devotion. It notwithstanding flattereth it self with the colour of innocency; it feigneth to it self that this is an act of charity; that it is a duty of civility; that it is an act of the soul that burns not but for virtue; but the mischief is, this soul is not an intelligence separated from matter, and that in the gueſt thereof, we passe by the veil of body, which becometh a snare to chastity.

Ὑπτιος.

Ælian. de animal. l. 6. cap. 35.

Love compared to the fire of Oxen.

How many Bulls have we seen feeding in a pasture, strong and sound, who having heedlesly swallowed a little worm called by the Grecians, The fire of Oxen, become meagre and faint, retaining nothing at all of their bodies but bones and figure? And how many great spirits have we beheld which were in excellent state, and in full vigour of the functions of intellectuall life; who, by approching over-near to this sex, have entred into affections of fire and flames: which, like little creeping serpents, have stoln into their hearts and destroyed virtue? I will not soil the purity of my Pen with the exorbitancies, which both ancient and modern histories have observed upon this subject. I passe over it, as bees over hemlock, without any stay, it seeming unto me that many Authours had done better to have covered the stains of their mother, then to have divulged them to maligne spirits, who make use of poison, and readily impute the disorders of particular, to the generall body.

The opinion of Fathers concerning the Amity of women.

All I have said hereupon hath been to suit my self to the sense of Scripture, and holy Fathers who so notably have condemned the over-much familiar conversation with women, and if they seem sometimes to speak of it with too much rigour, it is for that in great crimes the evil might be diverted by exaggeration of the peril, to the end, that since the fire is to be feared, the very smoke might be avoided.

Prov. 6. 27.

It is not to be wondered at what the Wise-man said, That the too free familiarity with women was a fire-brand in the bosome: That S. Ephraim thought it was as easie to live among burning-coals, as to converse with this sex, and not to wound the soul: That S. Bernard wrote, that to be alwayes among women without hurt, was to do more then to raise the dead: That, S. Cyprian imagined it was to erect a precipice, to be addicted to such society: That S. Jerome advised, that we should either equally love them all, or equally not know them.

Bern. ser. 64 in Cant.

Cyp. de singular. Cler. S. Heron. ad Nepotian.

Shipwracks happened by the love of women.

We see many shipwracked fools standing on promontory tops, who tell us of the ruines which these passions haue caused. Simon Magus was undone by a Hellen, being more bewitched by her love, then he enchanted others by his sorcery. Appelles was corrupted by Philumene: Montanus, by Prisca and Maximilla: Donatus, by Lucilia: Elpidius, by Agape. Women have ended among all these, what Magick and Heresie had but begun. O good God! what man would not be astonished at the Roman Macarius, who having overcome love in the world, was surprised in the wilderness by finding a womans shoe? To conclude, Heaven is most happy, said Tertullian very wittily, because, though it hath Angels, it hath not Angelicals; though it hath a God, it hath no Goddesses; and it might be feared, if there were diversity of Sex there, it would alter something of its tranquility.

Ex monodis.

In cœlo non Angelus & Angela. Tertul. adversus Val.

So many great men, who were much accomplished in sanctity, have thought of women upon the brink of the grave, and have found, we must ever fear, that we may never fall. Besides, I leave you to think with what conscience a spruce youth who hath a body full of bloud, and a spirit repleniſhed with flames, can say, He will love God in his works, and that he findeth not any one better, then a handsome woman. He knoweth how to manage his love, he will take in no more fire then he list, and this fire shall not burn, but at his discretion. This beauty shall serve to raise him towards God; he will passe from the creature to the Creatour without any difficulty: It is a ladder of gold, which God hath set for him to climb up into heaven by. But it is to be doubted lest it prove Archimedes his engine, whereon the higher they mounted, the lower they descended. Such an one by this way thinks to touch heaven with a finger, who already hath a foot in hell. But since I write this Treatise for Courtiers, and for the well-ordering of divine and humane love; I neither must, nor will, by my discourse put any prejudice upon the virtuous, and civil Amities which may be between persons of different sex, who are endowed with singular and excellent virtues, and who manage their affections with admirable discretion: which, although rarely, may be done; and if there be any who abuse it, it is not fit, by reason of blasted members, to blame sound parts, and suspect them of corruption; nor to censure the actions of many great Saints, who, being obliged by duty to converse with other sex then their own, have therein comported themselves with so much prudence and charinesse.

That there may be spirituall Amities between persons of different Sexes, endowed with great virtue and rare prudence.

Nec inferorum regnum in terra. Sap. 1.

S. Augustine, in the fourth Book of the City of God, saith, The Ancients had three Goddesses of Love; one for the irregular, another for the married, and a third for Virgins. We must not think the kingdome of hell perpetually swayeth upon the earth (to speak with the Wise-man) and that one cannot look on a woman, & not take in the fire of evil love. How many

be

be the e, who wholly are eſtranged from all tender and affectionate inclinations? Briars and thorns are as full of courteſie as their greetings, and the ice of Scythia is not more cold then their converſation. How many do we find, who, having their ſpirits wholly poſſeſſed by other paſſions; one of Ambition, another of Avatice, another of Revenge, another of Envy, another tranſported by the ſollicitude of a ſuit, and the turmoil of a family, who think very little upon love? How many other are there, from whom ſtudy, affairs, and charges (wherein they ſtrive ſupereminently to tranſcend) free their minds from all other thoughts? And how many Ladies ſee we in the world, with a countenance ever ſmiling, of a humour chearfull and converſation moſt pleaſing, who make love to wits and ſpirits, as Bees to flowers, but have with the body no commerce at all?

But, if this may ſometimes proceed from humour; by a much ſtronger reaſon we muſt think, great ſouls, that are powerfully poſſeſſed by the love of God which repleniſheth the whole latitude of their hearts, and who live in continuall exercifes of prayer and mortification, may converſe with women for the affairs of ſalvation, by a converſation ſweetly grave, and ſimply prudent, not changing the love which they bear to the virtue of chaſtity.

It is an act of a baſe or maligne ſpirit, to meaſure all by ones own ſelf, and to think that, what he would do in a ſlippery occaſion, muſt be done by all ſuch who are farre otherwiſe eminent in grace and virtue, then are the ordinary ſort of men.

The Baſiliſk cannot be enchanted.

The Author of the theatre of Nature holdeth, that the Baſiliſk alone, among ſerpents, cannot be enchanted; and, I dare affirm there are men, who have the like privilege, and have their eyes love-proof, and their hearts ſhut up againſt all the aſſaults of concupiſcence, whether it proceed from ſingular habits of virtue, or whether it be ſome very extraordinary gift from God. Democritus voluntarily made himſelf blind, by looking ſtedfaſtly on the beams of the ſun, to free himſelf from the importunities of the love of women; He (perhaps) ſhut up two gates againſt love, to open a thouſand to his imagination. Origen deprived himſelf of the diſtinction of ſex, to rebate the ſtings of ſenſuality, which bred him much miſchief. Grace, and the gift of God, doth more then all the endeavours of men, it forſaketh not thoſe, who, by obligation of their charge, and out of the neceſſity of their profeſſion, converſe with women, within all the limits and due proportions of decorum.

Tertul. Apologetico.

The extraordinary practice of S. Athanaſius.

The Eccleſiaſticall Hiſtory aſſureth us, that the glorious S. Athanaſius, ſeeing himſelf perſecuted by the Arrians with rage, thirſty of his bloud, and not knowing whom to truſt, hid himſelf in the night-time in the houſe of a devout Virgin, where he was long concealed, and protected againſt the fury of his perſecutours. Whoſoever will weigh this, ſhall find it an extraordinary act, for the hiſtory ſaith, the Virgin was a miracle of beauty; and being not fully twenty years of age, had made a vow to preſerve a perpetuall virginity to God. It much amazed her at firſt, ſeeing the great Prelate had choſen her little habitation for the place of his retreat: but he aſſuring her it was the will of God, ſhe entertained him with an open heart, and ſerved him with ſo much purity, obedience, and reverence, that ſhe ſeemed to have lodged an Angel, not a Man in her houſe.

Soz. l. 6. c. 6. Palladius.

She furniſhed him with all neceſſaries for life, ſhe waſhed his feet; yea, ſhe borrowed Books for him, with ſingular heed, that he might entertain time in this his impriſonment. Cardinall Baronius calleth this hiſtory into queſtion, and thinks it an invention of Arrius his ſide, but there is very little apparence, ſeeing the Arrians of that time never objected it to S. Athanaſius, as being a matter out of their knowledge. And although this great man, in his Apology, hath ſaid nothing of it, where he ſpeaketh of his flights and retreats, this, notwithſtanding, nothing at all leſſeneth the truth of it, ſince there are many things may very innocently be done by prudent men, which are not neceſſary to be publiſhed to all the world.

And needs muſt he have had little judgement to have vaunted this accident before his enemies, whereof they would have taken but too much occaſion to calumniate him. And as for that which Baronius ſaith, that it onely belonged to widows to waſh the feet of Saints, it is true, according to the ordinary proceedings of the Church, and the liberty of its functions; but here the queſtion is of an outrageous perſecution, and of an act, out of common practice, and there is not any reaſon which can efficaciouſly prove this hiſtory to be invented, ſeeing it is faithfully ſet down by Sozomen and Palladius, two great admirers of the virtues of S. Athanaſius; whereof the one giveth ſo evident proofs, that he witneſſeth he had ſeen the ſame Virgin when ſhe was ſeventy years old, and ſaith this relation was confirmed to him by Prieſts of Alexandria. I hold it more admirable then imitable, and that although the Hebrew Children were once preſerved in the fornace by miracle, one muſt not therfore deſperately throw himſelf, through imprudence among coles; but ever confeſſe the hand of God is able to ſafeguard thoſe in perils, who have not deſpaired in the peril, but who by neceſſity become therein engaged.

Luſiacs. Amity of S. John Chryſoſtome, with a Lady named Olympias.

What ſhall we ſay of S. John Chryſoſtome? Is there a man more auſtere in his life, and more vehement in the matters of virtuous Amities? It is a ſtrange thing to reade the letters he writes from the place of his baniſhment to his dear Olympias. He ſalueth her with openneſſe of moſt ardent affections, he calleth her his Saint, and his venerable Lady; ſometimes he inſtructs and encourageth her by ſublime, grave diſcourſes, addreſſing Epiſtles to her, to be valued with whole Books. Another while he deſcendeth into particulars, he recounts unto her his voyages, his adventures, his comforts, his diſcomforts; He omits nothing of the condition of his health, of the diſpoſition of his body, of his chamber, of his habit, of his ordinary exercifes in this ugly place, whereunto he is baniſhed. He proteſteth he is much troubled he ſees her not, he aſſures her, all his pains are nothing in compariſon of the want of ſuch an one whom he ſo tenderly loved, which he confirmed unto her by the example of S. Paul, who challenged Angels and Devils, who mocked at all perſecutions, who was ready to carry all hell on his ſhoulders (had it been poſſible) out of the deſire he had to ſuffer. And yet the ſeparation of Titus, his well-beloved Diſciple, afflicted him ſo much, that he could not give his thoughts any repoſe. He dilates much upon this affection of S. Paul, to excuſe his own, which ſhewed it ſelf at the height, when the news was brought him of the ſickneſſe of the ſame Olympias: For then it was, when the winters of Scythia, the countenances of Barbarians, the hideous roughneſſe of ſome place where it ſeemed Nature had never been, the noiſe of warre, and the incurſions of ſouldiers fleſhed in maſſacres and ſpoils, are nothing in compariſon of the affliction he feels for the indiſpoſition of this dear Virgin. He conjureth her by all things the moſt precious to tender her health, he ſendeth her to skilfull Phyſicians, he teacheth her medicinall drugs which help himſelf, he promiſeth her long letters, which ſhe infinitely loved; ſo that ſhe take care of her health, he aſſureth her, as it were in the ſpirit of prophecy, that he muſt

S. Paul tender in holy affections.

viſit

visit her again to comfort his eares, wipe away his tears, and replenish his heart with satisfaction. What can be more lovely, what more affectionate, then this whole discourse?

Great affection of S. Hierom afterward Sancta Paula. S. Hieronym. in Epitaph. Paulæ.

Saint Jerome is in the same passions for Saint Paula. All the splendour of Romes greatnesse, all the riches of the earth, are nothing with him in comparison of his little Bethleem, made resplendent by the vertues of this noble Lady. He telleth us that Pilgrims who come from the remotest confines of the world cannot see any thing, in all the affluent wealth thereof comparable to her. When he goes about to praise her, he wisheth all the members of his body were changed into tongue, and that he were nought but voyce, to be throughout, the whole Universe, the Trumpet of her praises. He describeth her life and death with extasies, he playes the Poet in his old age to make her an Epitaph and fetcheth out a pedigree for her from the ashes of old Troy, and the conquests of Agamemnon. He formerly had made himself a Secretary to her and her daughter, enditing their letters for them to invite Marcella their companion into the solitudes of Bethleem. When he thinks of her coming, all the holy land is turned topsieturvey, the hillocks leap for joy, the fields deck themselves in their best beauties, the rivers carry the news thereof to the meadows, squadrons of religious, and virgins go before; there is nothing but salutations and transportations, and rejoycings incomparable: Out of which we may conclude, Saints have very lively affections towards all they love.

The affectionate letter of my Lord Bishop of Geneva.

That blessed Prelate, the Bishop of Geneva had the same spirit for his Philothea. For behold how he speaks of her in the first letter of his second Book. When you unfolded your self to me more particularly, it was an admirable joy to my soul that I might more and more comfort yours, which made me believe that God had given me to you, not imagining any thing might be added to the affection I felt in my mind, and especially when I prayed for you: But now (my dear daughter there hath upon it succeeded a new business which to my seeming cannot be named, but the effect of it is onely a great interiour sweetnesse, which I have to wish you all the perfections of the love of God and all other spirituall benedictions. In the 16 Epistle he saith, It is a dew which moistneth his heart without blow or noise; I speak before the God of my heart, and yours; every affection hath its particular difference one from another: That which I bear you hath a certain particularity which infinitely comforteth me, and to say all, it is infinitely available for me. Account this as an irrefragable verity, and do not you doubt it at all. Then he adds, when many particular persons recommended to him, come into his mind, she is alwayes the first, or the last, who there longest abideth.

See how the wayes of the just are hidden, and leave no prints to follow them by the tracks. An ill informed Censurer would here have wrinckled the brow, he would have said with a supercilious countenance, a severe aspect, in the words of Cato: That, it must needs be a manifest snare of Satan, to have a womans face in his mind in the midst of his prayers. and yet we know this worthy man lived in most perfect purity, in imitation of immaterial Angels. This teacheth, us, there may be amity between Sex and Sex, purre and ardent as the flames which enlighten stars. But this onely belongeth to persons infinitely prudent, and absolute in vertue, who are therein more worthy of admiration then imitation: yea indefatigable circumspection must be used, to contein them within their limits: And then is the time that they produce chast and strong delights, when two spirits perpetually look one upon another, as the Cherubins of the Ark having continually the Propitiatory of the living God in the midst of them: or when they resemble the Sunne and Moon, who for these six thousand years have courted each other, and never touched.

Necessitudo Christi glutine copulata quam non utilitas rei familiaris, non subdola & palpans adulatio, sed Dei timor & divinarum scripturarum studia conciliant. S. Hierom.

§ 5. Of the entertainment of Amities.

AMity, in the world wherein we are, is a fire out of its sphear, which properly is heaven; where knowledges are without darknesse, joyes without discomforts, and love without blemish. For which cause, it stands in need of precaution to defend it self, and of strength to abide in a place, where constancy is rare, change ordinary, errours naturall, assaults violent, and resistance weak: The mind of a Lover is delicate nice, and sensible in injuries, if you handle it slightly, it withereth like a Rose; if roughly it fadeth like a Lilly. I then will briefly glance at those things which alter Amity, and shew you likewise the Antidotes that preserve it, to the end, remedies opposed; the evils may with the more lustre appear.

Mollis est animus diligentis & ad omnem tenuem doloris aruitus; si negligentius tractes cito marcet ut rosa, si durius tenueas, liveat ut lilia. Epistolarum ep. 34.

I hold, that among all the stains which Amity may contract, there is not any more blemisheth it, then Forgetfulnesse, Negligence, Scorn, Dissention, Distrust Inequality, Impatience, and Infidelity. We see so many Amities daily do dissolve by Forgetfulnesse, and want of frequentation, that it seems divers friends (especially when they be of eminent condition make their way to the Elyzian fields by the river of forgetfulnesse. They no longer remember those whom they had courted, then a nightly dream, nor know they so much as whether they be in the world or no, and whether they yet have any part among the living. Severus demanded of S. Paulinus his picture to preserve his memory, but he asked him, whether he desired the image of a terrene, or celestiall man; shewing we must rather remember friends by the figures of the mind, then the lineaments of the face.

The eight stains of Amity.

1. Forgetfulnesse of friends.

Qualem cupis ut mittamus imaginem ribi, terreni hominis an cœlestis? S. Paulinus ep 8. ad Severum.

Others want not memory, but they have a certain carelessnesse which many times proceedeth from a nature lazy, and indifferent, that cannot take a litle pains to quicken the memory of a friend; another-while it cometh from a narrow-streightned heart which vouchsafeth not to oblige it self in an occasion, wherein it hath full power.

2. Negligence.

Some are not content to scorn, but doe also make their scorn appear, by preferring men of no worth, and who were before unknown to them in ancient Amities. They think a friend who is yet to be made, is ever better then he who is already wholly endeared. This is it that causeth sharp convulsions in a generous heart which sees it self neglected, and abandoned in need, by one from whom all possible help was expected. Then arise loud out-cries, exclamations and complaints: Yea there are of them, who hide their wounds, yet fail not to love in the midst of these disvasours; which I suppose doth either proceed from a strong vertue, or from a great abjectnesse of mind. If it come from vertue, it is an action truly Christian: But, if from abjectnesse of mind; then it is a lamentable thing to see a silly soul so profuse of love (the greatest treasure in the world) as to conferre it on the ingrate, disdainfull; as if one took delight to feed, and flatter owls. And were a man able to give us the heavens, and stars; if he have not Amity and affection for us, must we make our selves slaves to a proud spirit, which is wholly employed within it self; which can never distinguish what vertue or Amity is? Disdain is a thing not hard to be learned, when he, whom we honour most, giveth us a lesson of it in his ingratitude, One may pay scorn with scorn, and set a value upon nothing but God who gives estimation to all things.

3. Contempt.

Attalus. Jucundius amicum facere, quam habere. Nec tamen Æneam quamvis male cogitet odi.

There are others who begin the breach of Amity by diversity of opinions and judgements; they build but upon one ground in the exercise of the holy virtue; their understanding inclineth to one side, their will seems to propend to another: but in the conclusion it is gained by judgement, and the continuall diversity of reasons causeth the dissention of hearts. I doe not say, one should play the Chameleon in Amity, and, without foundation, take upon him all colours which are presented; for, that would be rather to become a flatterer then a friend. The Seraphins of Ezekiel, though they clap themselves with the tips of their wings, yet faile not to make a heavenly Harmony: So, good friends, who at first somewhat differ in opinion upon subjects offered, and propose their reasons with sweetnesse and modesty, thereby alter not concord; but when this dissention is very frequent, and captious, it is an evident token, love is strucken at the heart.

4. Distrust

Chamæleontis bestiolæ vice quæ de subjectis sumit colorem. Auson. ep. 32.

Ezec. 3. 13.

3. Suspitions and distrust.

Others are easily transported with suspicions and Distrust, and open their ears very wide to tale-tellers who are the most dangerous plagues which the evil Genius can vomit forth to disturb concord. Antiquity telleth us that friends sent ear-rings to their dearest correspondents on their birth-day, to consecrate their ears to Amity, and preoccupate them against slander. We must judge (saith Seneca) before we love, but when once we have begun to love, we must beleive a friend. We must not open a heart byhalves; he is made faithfull by the power of believing him to be such; and there are not any so worthy to be deceived as those, who upon all occasions fear to be deceived. It is an act proper to a spirit stupid, and unworthy of the manage of affairs, to be ready at the first, to give credit to the venemous tongue of a calumniatour, opposed against the life and innocency of a friend; or of one in prime place, without sifting diligently all the circumstances of his accusation. And what assuredness may we hope for in humane things, if all ears should become as credulous, as tongues are licentious? Came not thence the frequent subversions of States, and calamities of Mankind?

Rabbi Solomon.

Post amicitiam, credendum; ante amicitiam, judicandum est. Sen. ep. 38.

Is it not that which irrecoverably ruined the Roman Empire, under Valentinian the third, when (as Maximus relateth who was his Capitall enemy) he with his own hand slew his chief Generall Ætius, the pillar and prop of his Empire? We must not believe any thing against an Amity long settled, unlesse the proofs thereof be written with the raies of the Sun. Alexander rather chose to put himself upon the hazard of swallowing poison, then to believe one, who made him a report against the loyalty of his Physitian. He, with one hand, took the goblet without further information, and with the other, gave the accusers Letter to the accused; the one smiling drank down an apparent death, whilest the other implored heaven and earth against the calumny, which was notably refelled by the generosity of the great Monarch.

Quintus Curtius l. 3.

Lastly, they do not long preserve Amity, who are Unequall and Impatient: and as Moses makes no mention of the air in the history of the Creation, because it is inconstant, according to S. Gregory Nyssen's conceit: So, we must let their names passe under silence in the Temple of Amity. They grow weary of all, they are displeased with a slight word spoken at randome; with some innocent freedome they enter into Labyrinths of suspicions and perplexities, whence they never come forth; and Amity (which is the most delightfull of all things) becomes their punishment.

6, 7. Inequality and Impatience

Greg. Nyss. in Hexam.

All, which hath pleased them, displeaseth: All, which hath contented them, discontenteth; one knows not into what posture to put himself, to give satisfaction: Good words vex them, services distast them, submissions torment them, contradictions make them mad: It seemeth Sauls devil possesseth them, and that they know not themselves; they hate by humour, as if they had loved without consideration of merit.

1 Reg. 18. 10.

But we must say, that of all the plagues of Amity, there is none so fatall to it, as the discovery of a secret by Treason and Infidelity: That is it which Petrus Blesensis called the blow without noise, under the shadow of Amity. It is that which Brutus gave to great Cesar, and which was the cause that the valorous Emperour (long tumbled to and fro among his murderers, and defending himself from every blow they gave him) covered his eyes with his garment, not enduring the treachery of a man whom he had loved, and obliged above all other: But saying, Ah son! art thou then one of these? He suffered himself as a victime to be butchered, ashamed to behold the day-light, which made him see so black a mischief. And what is there more to be deplored, then to behold a generous heart which dilates it self in the presence of a pretended friend, and powreth out unto him all he hath in his soul, whilst the wretch (shooting back envenomed shafts against all the raies of Amity) maketh a prey of his goodnesse, and a trophey of his sincerity; abandoning him to the discretion of such as persecute him. There are some who suffer themselves to fall into these Infidelities by the surprizall of some wicked spirits who wholly govern them, and who draw out of them all they have in their hearts, either by craft, or power, which rendreth them lesse culpable, but not innocent. Others run to it with the malignity of a Devill, and joyfully triumph when they have prospered in an Act so base and barbarous. Do not these kind of people deserve to be accounted the horrour of nature, the scorn of Ages, the execration of mankind? And shall we not believe that if Pythagoras Metempsychosis were in being, their souls would put on no other bodies but of Hyena's, Rats, or Owls, to fly in an eternall night, and never to be illustrated with one sole ray of the bright day of Amity?

8. Infidelity

Petrus Blesensis l. de amic. c. 6.

Plutarch. in Julio.

Συνήθευον

Sicut novacula acuta fecisti dolum: propterea, Deus destruet te.

Now, if you desire to know the things which are of power perpetually to uphold Amity, I must tell you, it subsisteth in honesty, good disposition communication, Bounty, Patience, and Fidelity. Assure your self, you will not long be a good friend, if you study not to be ever virtuous.

Psal. 51. 6.

Six perfections, which preserve Amity

The heart of a wicked man (saith the Prophet) is a turmoyled sea, which never rests; it hath as many changes as the waves in the Ocean, as many agitations as Tempests, which with Amity is incompatible, of its own nature peacefull, and which entertains the mind in a constant situation. What is the cause the blessed are never weary of loving, but that they perpetually find in God new beauties and perfections? The body is finite, and quickly thrusts forth all its qualities, which with time, rather fade, then flourish; but our spirit is profound as an abysse, and our soul tendeth in some sort to Infinity. Hence it comes, that two friends seriously disposing themselves to perfection daily receive some new lustre, which rendreth them lovely, so, that increasing in goodnesse by degrees, they insensibly love some better thing. Saint Hilary of Arles said of two good friends, that they sought to hide themselves in the shadow of one another, but that thence their humility was reflected, as from a solid bottome which made its lights the more resplendent.

Cor impurum quasi mare fervens. Isa. 57.

Dum unusquisque se sub umbra alterius obscurare vovebat, tanquam res percussa claritas utrumque radiabat. S. Hilar. in Honorat.

Yet would I not that your virtue should be austere and unmanaged, but seasoned with a good disposition and a certain cordiality, which is the best temper of Amity. There are some who love so coldly, that their love is as a day in winter, when the Sun is involved in grosse vapours, and shews nothing but sadnesse: which is extreamly troublesome; for it is better to receive a manifest Correction, then to endure dure a hidden Amity (to ſpeak with the Wiſeman) and you ſhall find many women who better love harſh men, then ſuch as are neither one nor other.

Humour.

Melior eſt manifeſta correptio, quàm amor abſconditus Prov. 27.

He is no good friend who rejoyceth not at the preſence of his friend, who is not ſorry for his abſence; yet not oppoſing the conformity we ſhould have with the divine Providence. S. Chryſoſtome in the letters he wrote to his dear Olympias obſerved theſe ſenſible affections in S. Paul, for he was much troubled at the abſence of his beſt friends, and deſired to ſee their faces, (as he ſaith) where this great Prelate inſiſteth upon the word face, and ſayes it is good right, that we deſire the face of our friend, becauſe it is the place where the ſoul ſheweth it ſelf in all its ſenſes. There is not any man (ſaith Tertullian) unleſſe he hath little to do, delighteth to hold long diſcourſe before a face ſhut up, a viſage ſenſible of nothing, and which to ſay truly cannot but be melancholy in this poſture. This hindreth not, but that the uſe of veils is very laudable, in time and place among religious women, who make profeſſion of penance; and the fore-alledged Authour, who ardently urgeth virgins to this obſervance, gives them an example of Arabian women, who were ſo veiled, that they had but one eye free to guide them, and to receive a half light: which cauſed a Roman Queen to ſay, that they were miſerable women who went ſo, becauſe they might take in love, but not give it out again. But contrariwiſe they were moſt happy, to be delivered from a thouſand importunities of wanton eyes, which do nothing but court beauties.

Vid. Chryſ. ep. p. 715, 716. 1 Theſs. & 3.

Tertul. de velandis. c. 12. Quis audebit oculis ſuis premere faciem clauſam, faciem non ſentientẽ, faciem ut ita dixerim triſtem.

Contentæ ſunt dimidiatâ frui luce quam totam faciem proſtituere. Idem de velandis. Virg. cap. 14.

Howſoever, true amity is neceſſarily accompanied with ſome tenderneſſe and ſenſibility, which cauſeth one to be perpetually anxious for ſuch as he loveth. Love, in the heart is an exhalation in a cloud, it cannot continue idle there; It daily formeth a thouſand imaginations, and brings forth a thouſand cares: It findeth out an infinity of inventions to advance the good of the beloved: It openeth it ſelf in his proſperities, it ſhuts it ſelf up in his adverſities, it is appalled in perils, it triumpheth in glories; If it hear ſpeech of his praiſes, it is Manna fallen from heaven; if he be blamed, it is a poyſoned arrow which tranſfixeth the heart: The eye, the tongue, the arm, all the veins and arteries bend to his defence.

Converſation, and its contentments.

Add for the third Antidote, that Amity is notably entertained by converſation and mutable communication, which ſhould be full of liberty, freedome, and confidence. There it is where one entreth into community of ſecrets, of thoughts, counſels, inventions, opinions, induſtries, affairs, and purpoſes. There it is, where hearts diſcover their nakedneſſe, and where ſpirits going out of Chriſtalline breaſts, make a ſweet mixture of fires and ſights. There it is, where (ſaith the Wiſeman) Iron ſharpeneth Iron, where one Intelligence awakens another. There it is, where the bottome of the heart becomes as a fountain of clear water, wherein ſouls behold each other by admirable reflections. One reckoneth up his life, his courſes, his voyages, his hazards, his enterprizes, his ſucceſſes, his joyes, his annoyes, his Sympathies, his Antipathies; The other receiveth all this into his boſome, and reciprocally opens himſelf to his friend. Oh what ſweetneſſe, oh what an Atome of the life of the bleſſed is this communication, when it is inviolably grounded upon virtue, and honeſty! What a contentment it is to ſee a poor man who was as a cloud ſurcharged with ſtorms and darkneſſe, to free himſelf and become bright by aſpect of the beams, which reflect from the eyes of a friend, to clear up at the words which come from his lips, to receive infuſions wholly celeſtiall, which put in order things confuſed, give vigour to the languiſhing, comfort in affliction, and hope amidſt deſpairs! Time ſtealeth away in theſe entertainments, and is not felt: hours are not numbred, moments are there pretious; the ſpace which intercurres between two Suns, ſeemeth but one. Whoſoever importunely troubles theſe converſations, are like Birds of ill preſage: and night which ſeparates them (although it be the mother of Repoſe) is not alwayes welcome, unleſſe it in ſleep reſtore thoſe beloved delights it took away.

Prov. 27. 17. Ferrum ferro acuitur, & homo exacuit faciem amici ſui, & v. 19. Quomodo in aquis reſpondent vultus proſpicientium, ſic corda hominum manifeſta ſunt prudentibus.

Converſation muſt be moderated. Prænuncia eſt tribulationis lætitia ſatietatis. Gregor. in Job c. 3.

Yet, it is good to moderate this converſation, the nature of humane things being ſuch, that pleaſure when it is arrived at the higheſt, is not far diſtant from diſtaſte. The more that Flowers breath forth their excellent odour, ſo much the ſooner they wither; and by how much the more love produceth fires and ſparklings, ſo much the more it is weakned, unleſſe it be repaired by reaſon, which is ſwallowed by ſenſe. Abſence entertained by letters full of confidence, is not alwayes without its profit; for the ſoul by the memory taſteth what it hath taken in by the underſtanding, and gives it ſelf more leaſure to recogitate its pleaſures, which are not ſo well perceived, when preſence drencheth the mind in a deluge of contentments, and gives it not leaſure to bethink it ſelf. It is a goodly thing (verily) to behold thoſe affectionate complacents, yet never is one a good friend, if he come not to the fourth point, which is, to wiſh, and to do good to thoſe he loveth. It is now-a-dayes a true teſtimony of Amity, to give liberally of ones own, in a time when ſilver is the God of the world, and intereſt the mark, whereat all intentions aim. There are ſome, who would rather give the bloud of their veins, then ought of their purſe; would ſuffer incredible toils for a friend, and would not diminiſh for him the leaſt part of their ordinary expence; yet Amity never is perfect, unleſſe it enter into a free communication of neceſſary helps, as much as ability and reaſon permit. Whoſoever invented benefits gave wings to Amity, and made arrows of gold which inſenſibly penetrate hearts the moſt unnaturall.

Abſence is ſometimes a ſtratagem of Amity.

Bounty a true note of Amity.

Benefits of Amity.

Gloriſicabit me beſtia agri, dracones, & ſtruthiones. Iſa. 34.

An Elephant, who beareth Towers and houſes on his back, cannot carry a benefit without a gratefull acknowledgement of it: It is that which quencheth the fire that ſparkleth in the eyes of Lions, which ſtayeth their paws keen as raſours, and makes them adore that which is thrown out to them as a prey to be devoured. Liberality is a hook we muſt ever hold in the water; we muſt not fear many times to loſe, to conferre once well, a good office done to a friend. That man deſerveth never to get any thing, who thinks all he giveth is loſt, and who gives not at all, but to receive double. His intentions are mercenary, and his favours are like Lime-twigs; he maketh a Market-place of the Temple of Amity, and profaneth all that is ſacred in it, to conſecrate it to his own paſſion.

A great induſtry to give well.

It is an excellent induſtry, to give well, and it requireth much ſtudy. There are ſuch as give all they cannot keep, and are never liberall but in extremity, like to the fountain of Spoleto which never appeared, but when the countrey was threatned with an approching famine. Others ſend Preſents to no purpoſe, and unſeaſonably, as if one ſhould give books to a Peaſant, and arms to a Scholar. Their gifts are many times ſo unhappy, that they may be reckoned among the miſchiefs their enemies wiſh. Others throw largeſſes by ſtarts, and diſtribute not favours, but caſt them at random; and there are oft to be found ſuch, who giving to all, for want of giving with judgement, oblige none. They haſten to thoſe who deſire nothing of them, not ſeeing it is a great torment to be obliged to one, to whom one would owe nothing. There are, who make themſelves to be adored before they open the golden gates of liberality, they are shut up within so many locks, that an age passeth before they succour the misery of a friend; they put oyl into the lamp to light it, when it is quite out, and do good to Hobgoblins, and spirits in tombs. It is too late to give to a friend, if you stay till he demand it: you give him twice, when you deliver him out of his torment. Arethæus well understood this mystery, who laid a bag of money under the pillow of his sick friend, whom he knew to be in great necessity, without telling him from whence this supply came, and rather chooſing he should have the pleasure to find it, then the pain to ask it. What good is it to do, as the officers of great ones who are stately in their distributions, and think not they ever have given ought, unlesse it were long asked? They make themselves to be waited on like Demy-gods, and magnifie what comes from their own hands, in such sort that their benefits are scorned, and we begin to hate that, which was too late resolved on, or too proudly afforded. He must give his Presents according to the common practice of men, observing circumstance of place, time, season, persons; guild his favour with the gold of graces, and not do, as they who give so sadly, that one would take them for men who deny.

Leander in Umbria.

Seneca. l. 2. de Benefic. c. 10.

Friends also who receive ought not to be troublesome, there being not any thing which more offendeth firm Amities then the too great importunities of the bold, who ever have their hand open to receive, and never have a brow soft enough to blush. There are many Amities which are by this way dissolved; when friends perswade themselves to ask boldly, and will not be denyed, but think one gives them nothing, if they give them not all.

The fifth condition of a good friend, consisteth in a strong patience to bear with the defects of the person he loveth, whether they be in the mind, the body, or in the exteriour: Yet it is not that crimes and scandals, hidden under the shadow of Amity, should be tolerated: for that were to be a traitour to the most innocent of virtues. Above all, it is expedient to observe, and in the beginning to touch the passion of one dear unto us with hands of silk, and words of sattin; not to distemper him, if he be somewhat sensible. But if light remedies make not impression, we must urge, sollicit, labour with all the liberty which confidence affordeth, and not forsake the sick, untill we see some little hope of amendment. But if the evil daily increase by the contempt of remedies, and that it be such that it involves a friend within the danger of infamy; a man ought not to think it strange if he be abandoned, since he first of all degraded himself of the character of Amity, which is virtue. Other defects of manners, which proceed not to crime, ought to be handled with singular sweetnesse and discretion, and these of nature and humane accidents cannot be taken by a good friend but as a decree from heaven, and an exercise of his goodnesse. There are some, who have their souls so generous, that they love miseries; they find deformity to be handsome, when it is dressed up in the liveries of Loves; plagues and cankered sores breed neither fear, nor aversion in them: They digest all by the heat of an immortall affection.

Patience most necessary in Amities.

Advice and correction of friends.

Nonasperè, quantum extimo, non durites, non modo imperitè vitia tollentur; sed magis docendo, quàm jubendo, magis movendo quàm minando. S. Aug. in ep. ad Aurel. Non caret scrupulo societatis occultæ, qui manifesto facinori desinit obviare. S. Achanas. in Conc. Alexand.

Then it is, when we come to perfect fidelity, which is the Basis that supporteth the whole house of Amities. It is a virtue really divine, and one of the most pretious treasures in the heart of man. It is a Bud of Fidelity, a proof of an invincible courage, a note of an inviolable goodnesse: It is an imitation of the order of the heavens, and of the elementary world, where all persevere in the observance of the laws which were written by the Divine Providence from the beginning of ages, by the help of Fidelity, which the principall parts of the universe do observe one towards another.

Fidelity and its excellency.

Ante Jovem genera. Qua fine non tellus pacem, non æquora nôrunt. Silius.

It is that, which is the cause that stars eternally circumvolve within their divisions, not usurping one upon another: That, which causeth dayes and nights yearly to restore the time they had borrowed one of another, and so well to make up their accounts that they pay even to the utmost minute. It is that, which stayeth the waves of the sea, and current of rivers; That, which maketh masters and servants, families and Provinces, States and Empires. All is quickned, all lives, all under the divine hands of this great Mistrisse. By it; Kings have subjects, Lords their officers, Commonwealths Magistrates, Communities Administratours, Fields Labourers, Civil-life Merchants and Artificers, by it, the whole world hath order, and by it, order prospers in all things. One must rather break an hundred times, then once fail in fidelity to a good friend. Were the devil capable of commerce with men, he must observe fidelity: by how much a more just title ought we to preserve love, and honour it, even with veneration in holy Amities?

If a friend, one of those who have been very acceptable to you, chance to fail; whether it be by evil life, or through manifest contempt of you, or out of other ill dispositions; yet must you on the rotten trunk honour the last characters of Love, you must rather unstitch then break, you must keep the secrets he at other times hath committed to you, and not publish his defects. Amity is so venerable, that we must honour even its shadows, and imitate the Pythagorians, who celebrated the obsequies of such as forsook their society, to bury them with honor.

These precepts being observed; Children will live with Parents in great duty and submission; Husbands with Wives will hold together, not onely by eyes, flesh, and blood, which are too feeble tyes, but by excellent conjugall virtues; Parents will live in all sweetnesse of nature; People will be fastned with the knot of indissoluble Concord; Great ones will be indulgent to inferiours; Inferiours pay obedience to the great; and intimate friends gather flowers and fruits of immortall delights, in the sacred garden of Amity.

§ 6. Of sensuall Love. Its Essence, and Source.

I Here could wish my pen were born on the wings of winds from one pole to another, and that it might fall with a strong and impetuous flight upon a passion which maketh attractives, charms, and illusions to march before it, and after it draggeth along furies, disasters, and rapines.

ὡς σπου-
μα χιμαι-ρων ἀ αι-φνης & φιλαργυ-ρία διαπ-
ὀνων.

Hippocrates in ep. ad Abderites.

The wise Hyppocrates in his time deplored the evil effects of Avarice, and said the life of man was miserable, because insupportable Avarice, like unto a spirit of storms and tempests, had poured it self upon mortals, and that it were to be wished the best Physicians might meet together from all parts to cure this disease, which is worse then folly, and which occasioneth a mischief irreparable: Because instead of seeking remedies to drive it away, false prayses are invented to flatter it.

Love is a strange malady.

I may say the like of Love, since it is the most fatall plague among all passions. It is not a simple malady, but one composed of all the evils in the world. It hath the shiverings and heats of Feavers, the Ach and prickings of the Meagrim, the rage of Teeth, the stupefaction of the Vertigo, the furies of Frenzy, the black vapours of the Hypocondry, the disturbances of the waking, the stupidities of the Lethargie, the fits of the falling sickness, the faintness of the Phthisick, the heavings of the passion of the heart, the pangs of the collick, the infections of the leprosie, the venome of ulcers, the malignity of the plague, the putrefaction of the gangrene, and all, which is horrible in nature.

the

After all this, it is made a God, to whom Elogies, Hymns, Songs, and victimes are offered: Empire over the heart is given to it; a soul, not created but for him who hath saved it, is subjected, fetters are honoured, and its Tyranny adored.

Disasters of evil love.

There are many millions of men in the world who would be most fortunate and flourishing, if they knew how to avoid the mischievous power of this passion: but having not used any consideration or endeavour; they have abandoned their bodies to dishonour, their reputation to infamy, their estates to pillage, and their lives to an infinity of disturbances and torments. Hence it is, that, virgins of noble bloud are stolen away, that families are desolated, that parents are precipitated into their Tombs by ungratefull children, that so many young widows are dishonoured in the world, that so many miserable creatures, after they have served for talk to a City, die in an Hospitall; that so many little innocents are made away by a death which preventeth their birth; that so many Infants are thrown into life as froth of the sea, exposed to poverty, and vice, by that condition which brought them forth. Hence is it, that chaste wedlocks are disturbed, that poysons are mingled, that Halters are noozed, that swords are sharpned, that Tragedies are begun under the Coverture of night, and are ended in a full daylight upon a scaffold.

O God, how happy might a soul be which would well consider all this, and take what I am about to speak, as a letter sent from heaven, for the remedy of infinite many evils, which in this passion environ our miserable life! I invite hither every age, each sex, all conditions. I entreat my Readers to peruse these lines with the same spirit wherewith I addresse them: and although it befell me to treat of this subject in my other works; notwithstanding never have I (yet) undertaken it with so much method, vigour, or force, as at this present. I will shew you the Essence, the Causes, the Symptomes, and the effects of love, as religiously as I can possibly, supposing my self not bound to follow Tertullians opinion, who though very chaste, spared not to speak of this subject a little grosly, saying for excuse, that he had rather put himself upon the hazard of losing shame then a good argument. I made you see in the beginning of this treatise, that love, considered in generall, was properly an inclination to the good of Conformity, which putteth on divers faces according to the sundry objects and wayes it pursues to arrive thither. If it go directly towards God, and reflect on a neighbour, as his Image, loving the one for himself, and the other for his Authour; this is charity: If it diffuse it self upon divers creatures sensible, and insensible, which it pursueth for its pleasure and commodity; it is an appetite, and a simple affection, as that, which is towards hunting, birds, books, pictures, pearls, and Tulips: If it be applyed to humane creatures, loving them withall integrity, by a reciprocall well-wishing; it is Amity: If it regard the body for pleasures sake; it is a love of venereall concupiscence, which being immoderate (even in the intention of marriage) fails not to be vitious; which made Tertullian say, that the same thing an Adulterer would do, the married likewise did, If it be chaste, and guided within the Limits which the Law of God prescribeth; it is conjugall love. If it overflow to sensuall pleasures; It is Luxury, S. Denis saith, It is not love, but an idoll, and a fall from true love. And Plato in his Banquet addeth, that sober love is contentment of heart, eyes, and ears; but when it will content it self by the other senses; namely, that, of touching; it is not love, but a spirit of insolency, a passion of a servile soul, a rage of a triviall lust which maketh shew to love beauty; but, through its exorbitancy, descended to the worst of deformities.

Verecundiâ periclitari malo, quàm probationẽ. l. 1. de anima, c. 17.

Tertull. in exhortatione ad castitatem.

Nec per aliud fit marita, nisi per quod & adultera.

Plato in convivio.

I know there are learned pens, which here distinguish all love into two parts, and say there is one of consideration, and another of inclination. They call it love of consideration when one is therein embarked with a full knowledge, and a setled judgement; love of inclination, when one loveth, not able to give any reason. But I find this division is not exact enough insomuch as it confoundeth the Genus and Species, and doth not clearly distinguish the members of this body; since all love is nothing else, but an inclination, and since that which is made by consideration, inclineth the loving to the thing loved. Whence it appeareth that to mention a love of inclination, is to say, love is love, without any further explication. I had rather say there are two loves, the one of Election, which resulteth from Consideration, and is formed, when, after one hath acknowledged a thing to be fair, profitable, and pleasing, he out of reason affects it: The other of humour, when without consulting with reason, one is suddenly surprized by some secret attractive in the thing loved, without giving himself leasure to judge what it is, and this properly is to love by humour, and fantasie, which is now adays the most ordinary love, but not the best. It is a kind of love which quickly beginneth, and which never ends slowly, so full it is of inconstancy. It seems to it self all its bands are silken, although they be rough chains: it will not take pains to consider them. It thinks not it cherisheth the wound, nor looks it back on the hand which gave it. It is heedlessely engaged, and signeth transactions without reading them, that it may not be ashamed to abrogate what it made, or to entertain that which kills it. There are many miserable ones, who daily marry upon the first sight, and whose amities arise but from a glance which passeth away more swiftly then a shadow: and then there must be a thousand repentances to redeem the pleasure of one moment. It is ever better to preferre Election; for, though in the beginning it had not so much sweetnesse in the search, it hath lesse sorrow in the possession.

Division of Love.

Love of humour.

But to enter farther into the knowledge of Camall love; it is good to penetrate the causes and effects thereof which will the more perspicuously enlighten us in the choice of remedies. We see many people in the world, who being tormented by this evil even unto folly, seek for pretexts to cover their passions: some saying, It is a touch from heaven, and an effect of their Horoscope, which cannot be diverted. Others complain they are bewitched, and that they feel the power of magick: Others cast all the blame upon devils, who notwithstanding think not so much of them as they may imagine; for love comes easily enough from naturall causes, without going about to seek for it in the bottome of the Abysse. I here remember what Pliny recounteth of one Cresin; who manured a peece of ground which yielded him fruit in abundance, while his neighbours lands, were extreamly poor, and barren, for which cause he was accused to have enchanted them: Otherwise, said his accuser, his inheritance could not raise such a revenue, while others stand in so wretched a Condition. But he pleading his cause, did nothing else but bring forth a lusty daughter of his, well fed, and well bred, who took pains in his garden, with strong carts, and stout oxen vvhich ploughed his land, and the vvhole equipage of his Tillage in very good order; He then cryed out aloud before the Judges, Behold the art magick, and charms of Cresin, vvilling to shew that we must not seek for hidden and extraordinary causes, where ordinary are so evident.

Causa in culpam transit. Vellejus Pater culus.

Plin. l. 18. c. 16.

Filiam validam & bene curatam.

Hæc sunt venefica mea Quiritis.

So in the like case we may say it is a thing most ridiculous, to see a body composed according to nature, sound, and very strong, which hath fire in the spirits, and bloud in the veins, which continually feeds high, lies soft, and perpetually converseth among women the most handsome, to complain of celestiall influences, or the sorceries of Venus. Totall Nature, especially since the corruption of sin, conspireth to make love. It sets Reason to sale (if it carefully take not heed) and insensibly draweth it to its side. There is not almost a stone, whereunder some scorpion lyeth not; there is not a place where concupiscence spreadeth not out some net for us. It fighteth against our selves, makes use of our members, as of the Instruments of its battels, and the Organs of its wiles. There is sedition within, and warre without, and never any repose, but by the singular grace of God. Tertullian writes, the chastity of men is the more painfull, the fervour of concupiscence being the more fiery in their sex, and one may justly say, that such as persist all their life time in great resistances and notable victories, are Martyrs of purity, who, having passed through fire and water, hasten to a place of refreshment. We have all one domestick enemy, which is our own body, that perpetually almost opposeth the dispositions of the spirit. If I go about to fetter it (saith S. John Climachus) it gets out of my hands; If I will judge it, it grows into favour with me; If I intend to punish it, it flatters me; If I will hate it, Nature commandeth me to love it; If I will fly from it, it saith it is tyed to my soul for the whole time of my life: If I will destroy it with one hand, I repair it with another; Is it too much cherished? it the more violently assaults me; Is it too much mortified? it cannot almost creep; watching withers it, sleep, on the other side fatteneth it, whips torment it, and dandlings corrupt it: By treating it ill, I endanger my life; by pampering it, I incurre death. This sheweth, how Saints fortified themselves with much precaution, diligently observing the condition of Nature, the causes of temptations, and the maladies of the soul, thereby the more successfully to practise the cure. They who are most retired (said the fore-alledged Authour) fail not to feel domestick warres, but such as indifferently expose themselves to objects, are violently both within and without assaulted.

Interiour causes of love.

Tertull. de Velandis. Continentia majoris ardoris laboratior.

Rebellion of the flesh. S. Climach. de castitate, grad. 15. in fine.

Quomodo illum vinciam, quem ut amem a natura suscepimus. Est cooperator, & hostis, adjutator atque adversarius, auxiliator simul & insidiator, &c.

The beauty, and handsomnesse of one sex, is a sweet poison to the other, which entreth in by the eyes, and maketh strange havock: And I wonder not at all that the Scripture compares it to a Panther (a savage and cruel beast) which with teeth teareth those she hath amuzed with the mirrour-like spots of her skin, & drawn to her by the sweet exhalation of her body; It is more to be feared (said an Ancient) then the horns of the Bull, the teeth of the Lion, the gall of the Aspick, yea then fire or flames: and the holy Abbot of mount Sinai saith, that had not God given woman shamefacednesse, which is the scabbard wherein this sword is kept, there would be no salvation in the world.

Beauty imperious. Nomen. ἀπὸ τοῦ παίζειν.

Alii reddunt feram, alii pulchritudinem ut sæpe magista Interpretes. Psal. 49.

Climach. de castitate.

The love of women causes Sampson's, David's, and Salomon's shipwracks. It hath besotted Sages, conquered the strong, deceived the prudent, corrupted saints, humbled the mighty. It hath walked on Sceptres, parched the lawrels of victours, thrown trouble into States, schisme into Churches, corruption among judges, fury into arms. It hath entered into places which seemed inaccessible, but to spirits, and lightnings. And if beauty be so much to be dreaded, when it hath no other companions; how dangerous think we is it, when it causeth to walk along with it, pomp of apparell, attractives, dalliances, cunning wiles, liberty of conversation, merriment, Good cheat, Courting, Idlenesse, Night, Solitude, familiarity? Need we to require any other charms then those to work the ruine of a soul?

The love of women dangerous.

Yet, besides these open causes, there are other secret ones to be found in the love of humour and fantasie, which insensibly fetter a mind, and suffer it not to find its chains.

A modern Authour hath of late written a treatise of the love of inclination, wherein he speaks very pertinently of its originall, and doth (according to his saying) seem to draw it a second time out of its Chaos. To understand his opinion, we must presuppose that which S. Thomas saith; That totall Nature loveth to present it self in the objects proposed unto it: And as they continually proceed from all things, coloured images and figures as it were wholly spirituall, which make themselves to be seen, as in looking-glasses; and are received into the eies, to contribute to the effect of sight: so every body hath its projections, and unperceivable influences, as we find in the power of Amber, and the Adamant, which attract Iron and straw by the expiration they scatter in the air, to serve as instruments and hands to their attractions.

Monsiur de la Chambre.

S. Thom. l. 4. contra gentes. c. 11.

The secret attractives of love.

This being common to other natures of plants, metals, and living creatures; we must not think but that the body of man participateth therein, by reason of its vivacity and the multitude of pores which give a more easie passage to such emissions. There then cometh forth a spirituous substance, which is (according to Marsilius Picinus) a vapour of bloud, pure, subtil, hot, and clear, more strong, or weak, according to the interiour agitation of spirits; which carrieth along with it some quality of a temperate, friendly and convenient, which insinuating it self into the heart and soul, doth (if it there find a disposition of conformity) abide, as a seed cast into the earth, or as a Leaven which swelleth up a piece of dough, and forms this love of correspondence, with an admirable promptnesse and vigour.

Marsilius Ficinus l. 1. de vita c. 2.

From thence it cometh that brothers many times feel motions and affections of tendernesse, one for another without knowing each other, as it happened to S. Justus, who knew his brother Justinian, among sundry slaves who were at the chain, by this notice, without any other fore-judgement. Thence it comes that at first we are passionate for persons we never saw, and that we wish them well, though they always have not so much grace, nor beauty: but there is some relation of humour, which weaveth the web, and tieth such affections.

Sprits.

All nature is full of such communications, which are effects of Sympathy, observed in the Corall, which sensibly changeth according to his disposition, who hath it about him; as also in the flesh of beasts, which boileth in the powdring-tub, at the time of the fury of dogs, because they have been bitten by a mad dog; And in wine, which seems to be sprinkled all over with certain white flowers, when the vines are in blossome.

So it happeneth that the spirits, which do in our bodies, what the winds do in Nature, being transpired from one body to another, and carrying in their wings, qualities consonant, do infallibly excite and awaken the inclinations. But it is not credible, or at least, ordinary, that this manner of working should be, as in things inanimate, and that it hath nothing to do with the senses; for it is principally the eyes, which are interessed therein, breathing thence the most thin spirits, and darting forth the visuall rayes, as the arrows of love, which penetrate the heart, are united, confounded, and lost one within another; then, heating the bloud, they strike the Modification of the opinion who place love only in transpiration.

Species ex me semel per oculos illigata, vix magni lustrantis manu solviter.

Hieron. in Threnos cap. 3.

Imagi-

Imagination and attract wills, which are so linked one to another, that one cannot perceive the knot which so fast tied them together.

If transpiration alone of spirit, indifferently proceeding from all the parts of the body, were able to enflame concupiscence; we must then say that a blind man set at a certain distance from a perfect beauty, would become enamoured with beholding it, hearing it, smelling it, touching it, or by any sense, understanding it: which notwithstanding happeneth not in that manner, and if nature thus proceeded, and that this passion were to be taken as a Contagion, we might extreamly fear the approch of bodies, and persist in continuall apprehensions to be infected by them. It is certain, that the senses being well guarded shut up all the gates against love, since the Imagination it self stirreth not, but upon their report; but after they yield themselves up by a too familiar conversation, and resign their defences; a terrible havock is made in the mind: for love entereth thereunto, as a Conquerour into a surprized City, and imprinteth that pleasing face in every drop of the masse of bloud, It engraveth it on the Imagination: It figureth it on every thought, and there is nothing any longer entire in the mind, which is not divided between slavery, and frenzy.

A Guard over the senses.

§ 7. The effects of Sensuall Love.

IT is a strange thing, that this fury hath a thousand hands, and a thousand attractives, a thousand ways of working, quite different, and many times opposite. It takes by the eyes, by the ears, by the imagination, by chance, of purpose, by flying, pressing forward, honouring, insulting, by complacence, and by disdain. Sometimes also it layes hold by tears, by laughing, by modesty, by audacity, by confidence, by carelessenesse, by wiles, by simplicity, by speech, and by silence. Sometimes it assaileth in company, sometimes in solitude, at windows, at grates, in Theatres, and in Cabinets, at Bals, at sports, in a feast, at a Comedy, sometimes at Church, at prayers, in acts of Penance. And who can assure us against it, without the protection of God? Eustatius the Interpreter of Homer saith, there are some who feign Love to be the sonne of the wind, and the Rainbow in Heaven; in my opinion, to signifie unto us its Inconstancy and diversified colours: and this beautifull Iris in the beginning appears all in Rubies, in Diamonds, and Emeralds over our heads, afterward to cause rain, and tempests: So, love shewing it self at first with such bright semblances to our senses, occasioneth storms and corruption in our minds.

The miserable state of one passionately in love. Insomnia, strumæ, terror, fuga stultitiaque adeò, & temeritas, in cogitando excors, & immodestia, &c. Plautus in Mercat.

Observe one transfixed with violent love, and you shall find he hath all that, in his love, which Divines have placed in Hell, darkenesse, Flames, the worm of Conscience, an ill Savour, Banishment from the sight of God. You shall see a man, whose mind is bewitched, brain dislocated, and Reason eclipsed: All he beholdeth, all he meditateth on, all he speaketh, all he dreameth, is the creature he loveth. He hath her in his head and heart, painted, graved, carved in all the most pleasing forms. For her, he sometimes entereth into quakings, sometimes into faintings, another while into fits of fire, and Ice, He flieth in the air, and instantly is drenged in the Abysse, He attendeth, he espieth, He fears, He hopes, he despairs, He groneth, he sigheth, He blusheth, he waxeth pale, He doteth in the best company, He talks to woods and fountains; He writeth, He blots out, He teareth, He lives like a spectre estranged from the conversation of men: Repast is irksome to him, and Repose, which charmeth all the cares of the world, is not made for him. Still this fair one, still this cruell one tormenteth him, and God maketh him a whip of the thing he most loveth.

Yet is this more strange in the other sex, which hath naturally more inclination to honesty. A Lady chaste, or a Virgin well-bred; who begins to wax cold in the love of God, and in the exercise of devotion, and takes too much liberty in her conversation with men, finds her self insensibly surprized by the eyes and ears, by the heart, by the Garb, the Humour, the smiles the speech, the silence, the courage, the discretion of a man, layes a plot with her passion, to betray her reason. The poison of love by little and little spreads it self throughout all the veins, the presence of the object begins to cause blushing, paleneſſe, unquietnesse, disturbance of the mind: so that she cannot tell what she desireth, nor what she would have. Absence awakeneth the Imagination, which makes an Eccho of all the discourses, of all the actions, that past in presence. This man is presented unto her in a thousand shapes, there is not a lineament, a word, a gesture, but is expressed. The understanding quickly creates to it self too many ill lights, the will too much fire, and the soul wholly propendeth to the thing beloved. Yet the fire of God awakeneth her, and suffers her to have good respites, which makes her ashamed to tell her own thoughts to her proper heart. Conscience and Honour make some resistance and glimmering flashes; and if there be found some good directour who may help them in this first battell; they, many times, get the victory. But if a soul be deprived of good counsel, abandoned to it self, and which is worse, soothed in its malady, by some soft, and complying spirit, it is an unhappinesse which cannot sufficiently be deplored. Reason is weakned, shamefacednesse flies away, passion prevaileth, there is nothing left, but wandering of the soul, a feaver, a perpetuall Frenzy, a neglect of works, of affairs, of functions, sadnesse, languour, Impatience, Confidence, and affrightment. Shall she say so? shall she do so? God forbids it, the law menaceth it, and honour cries vengeance; The pleasure of a dream, and beyond it nothing, but Abysses. Love notwithstanding urgeth, and strikes at all considerations, they impute to starres, to destiny, to Necessity, what is nothing but folly. They think businesse is done, when it is but thought on; that they must be audacious; and that there are crimes which are sanctified in the worlds opinion by the good hap of their successes. They come to that passe, that they no longer sinne by method, but through exorbitancy.

Prosperum ac felix scelus virtus vocatur. Senec.

In some Love is sharp and violent; in others dull and impetuous; in others, toyish, and wanton; in others, turbulent, and cloudy; in others, brutish and unnaturall; in others, mute and shamefac't; in others, perplexed and captious; in others, light and tradsitory; in others, fast and retentive; in others, fantastick and inconstant; in others, weak and foppish; in others, stupid & astonished; in others, distempred; in some, furious and desperate.

Diversities of Love.

Mœchia affinis Idololatriæ. Tertul. de pudicitia.

It inflameth the bloud, it weakens the body, it wanneth the colour, it halloweth the eyes, it overthrows the mind; it hath somewhat of being possessed, and witchcraft; something of Idolatry. For you behold in those who are entred farre into this passion, flouds and Ebbs of thoughts, Fits and Countenances of one possessed, and it is in all of them to deifie the creature of whom they are so passionately enamoured, and would willingly set it in the place where the Sun and starres are, yea upon Altars. All which proceeds from it, is sacred; chains and wounds are honourable with them, if they come from this beloved-hand. They would die a hundred times for it, so it throw but so much as a handfull of flowers, or distill but a poor tear on their Tombe.

It

It is to deceive, to say that love excludeth all other passions; it awaketh them, and garboileth them, and makes them all wait on it; it causeth Aversion, Hatred, Jealousie, envie, hope, sadnesse, despair, anger, mirth, tears, scorn, grief, songs, and sighs: and as it is thought that evil spirits shuffle in storms, to stirre up lightning flasks, and make the thunder-stroke the more terrible and pernicious; So is it likewise true that the angell of darknesse involveth himself in these great tempests of love, many times making use of the abominable ministery of Magicians, and acteth Treasons, furies, sierings, poysonings, murders, and ransackings. And how should it spare its enemie, since it is cruell to it self? It maketh some to sink in the twinkling of an eye, drinking their bloud, and insensibly devouring their members. It confineth others into regions of Hobgoblins, and darknesse. It kils and murdereth those who have the most constantly served it. It sharpned the sword which transfixed Amnon. It shaved and blinded Samson. It gave a Halter to Phyllis, A downfall to Timagoras. A gulph to Caleazo; and caused Hemon to kill himself on the tomb of Antigone. Volumes would not be sufficient for him who should write all the Tragedies which daily arise from this passion; all pens would be weak, words be dryed up, and wits lost therein.

Evil Angels intermeddle in the great tempests of love.

Cruelty of love on the persons of lovers.

§ 8. Remedies of evil Love by precaution.

I Leave you now (dear Reader) to argue within your self, whether one who hath never so little humane judgement for his comportment and quiet, ought not to bend all his endeavours to banish the fury, which plungeth his whole life in so great acerbities, and such horrible calamities. But if you desire to know the way, the first thing I advise you while you are yet in perfect health, is seriously to consider, that one cannot be chaste but by a most singular gift from God, (as the wise-man saith) and therefore it is necessary to have a particular recourse to the most blessed Trinity, which, according to S. Gregory Nazianzen, is the first of virgins, humbly beseeching it, by the intercession of the most pure among creatures, and by the mediation of your Angel-guardian, to deliver you from the reproches of the spirit of impurity; in such sort that you may passe your life innocently, and it may become inaccessible to the pollutions of flesh. If you feel your self free from this vice, yet enter not into any vain complacence of your self, as if it proceeded from your own forces, and not from heavens benignity. Above all, take heed of pride; for the most illuminated Fathers have observed that God oft-times permitteth arrogant spirits to fall into carnall sinnes, to abate the fierceneſſe of their courage by the sensible ignominy of the stains of luxury: and this is so proper to quail the exorbitance of humane arrogance; that God had not a better Counterpoise to make S. Paul humble, in such heighth of revelations, then the sting of the flesh. Pardon not your self any thing no not so much as the shadow of this sin; but onely excuse such as fall through some notable surprisall, or pitifull frailty. Think, if you have not experienced the like falls, you are beholding to your good hap for it, rather then to your merit: presume not at all of your strength or integrity; but resolve with your self that the presumption of ones own power maketh up the moity of Impudency.

Distrust of ones self, recourse to God.

Love is sometimes the punishment of pride. Climachus de castitate.

Ne magnitudo revelationis extollat me, datus est mihi stimulus carnis meæ Angelus Satanæ qui me colaphizet. Cor. 12.

Learn how seasonably you may know your self, by considering your own temperature, your humours, the inclinations of your mind, your judgement, your courage. Behold the part wherein you are the most sensible, and where you give most accesse to your enemy to tempt you. Endeavour to fortifie your self that way, and the more inability you therein find, use the more precaution: if you be weak, fear nothing but your infirmity: and if you be strong, fear all, yea even your own safety.

Knowledge of ones self.

Sometimes the seasons of age, which might seem more to propend to lust, are peacefull and calm enough; In our bodies there is a spring-tide in winter, to become afterward a winter in the spring-tide. Youth transported by other purposes, or withheld by a serious education, is quiet enough, and riper years fall into the most stormy part of the tempest. It hath happened to divers to converse many years with a contrary sex, and never to have felt any touch, from which, they have entered into a strong confidence that served for a bait in the perill, which had spared them in a thousand occasions, the more notable to ruine them in one sole accident.

Disposition of ages.

Flight from occasions is the most assured bulwark for chastity, and who can carry himself well in this affair, shall be much stronger by flying, then were Conquerours in the bravest battels; a retreat in this, being as honourable as victory. The world was never so beautifull, so gentile, nor so squarely disposed: Bodies, apparell, garb, civill behaviour, complement, wit, merriment, entertainments, books, songs, airs, voices, playes, bals, races, walkings, Banquets, Feasts, liberty (which at first seem innocent enough) Conversation, and great confidence; lastly, all we heard, all we see, all we smell, all we taste, all we touch in so great effeminacy of life, seems to be made to persecute purity. I am almost of Tertullians opinion, who saith, it is more easie to dy for chastity, then to live with it. Women were found in the world, who suffered themselves to be martyred under Tyrants, for the defence of chastity; who had they long continued among pleasures, Court-ships, Curiosities, and the importunities of men, I should fear, might have yielded that to a lover, which they would have denyed to an Executioner. There are a thousand, and a thousand creatures, infinitely much alienated from voluptuous pleasures; They love the dispositions to love, but hate the effects thereof; and it seems to them they may do as it is read in Romances, they will spend their time in the pleasing conversation of a friend, and talk of nothing else; but they perceive not that men seek them not, but for what they should fly, that they at length undermine them as a city besieged; and desire not to afford them any peace but by the conquest of their honour, which they ought more bravely to maintain, then life.

Fly second occasions.

Time videre, unde possis cadere, noli fieri perversâ simplicitate securus. Aug. in Psa. 30.

The attractives of the world were never so urgent. Tertul. in exhortatione ad castitatem Majus est vivere cum castitate quàm pro ea mori.

Complacence stronger then fire and sword.

We find an ancient Embleme of a Duke of Burgundy, where was to be seen a pillar, which two hands sought to overthrow; the one had wings and the other was figured with a Tortoise, the word, Utcunque, as much as to say, which way soever, I will have it. There are Amourists, who take the like course; Some strike down the pillars of chastity by the sudden and impetuous violence of great promises, offers, unexpected presents, pressing necessities. Others proceed therein with a Tortoises pace, with long patience, daily assiduity, faithfull services, and profound submissions. They are not all so sottish, as to talke at first to an honest woman of her dishonour, they onely entreat she will accept of a man, who will live or die for her, begging nought else but a remembrance. They play not the rapt lovers, by every moment declaring their fervours, their torments, and martyrdome; They serve, they soothe, they continually frequent, they spie out all occasions, they silently practise all the wayes they can, to come to the end of their designs, and often it happeneth, that as drops of water incessantly falling, do hollow Rocks, so ceaslesse complements soften the most inacinaccessible rigours. What would not a man do, who is so base, as to waste ten years of service to kisse a woman's hand, and suffer for a shamefull servitude, that, which others could not endure for an Empire?

Joannes Dux Burgundiæ in Simbolis Imperatorum.

Great cunning of men who go about to surprise chastitie.

It is evident, that the persecutions of chastity being so manifest in all objects, (as I said before) if you desire to be faithfull to God, and charitably to preserve a precious treasure, you must necessarily either live with singular modesty in the world, or die out of it, if you cannot be saved in it.

Advice to Ladies and Gentlewomen.

You Ladies who read this, it is not required of you, that for the love of chastity, you should be reduced to an affected negligence, to some ugly habits, to fashions rough and barbarous, as Roman women were when their husbands fed upon acorns, as yet unaccustomed to the use of bread. Some neatnesse, some quaint trims must of necessity be admitted in a woman, which seems to be bound with her body, and is the cause, why the wisest and most modest among them, do not (notwithstanding) renounce civil decorum; you must walk, and converse modestly within your self, remembring what the Apostle saith, That your apparel alone should make you be known for Ladies, who make profession of piety.

1 Tim. 8. Quod decet mulieres promittentes pietatem

Whom would you be thought to be in the day of judgement? Would you be there accounted Christians, when you have all the signs about you of women the most worldly, that ever lived among Infidels? To what purpose are those garments so pompous, those stuffes so costly, those guizes so sought after, those colours so fantastick, those jewels so sumptuous, that painting so shameless, those curls so extravagant, those braveries, those flies, those patches, and those robbers, unless it be to cut the throat of chastity? Is it not a reproach to Christianity to say, that an infinite quantity of Hospitals might be founded out of the superfluities which so many Ladies unprofitably waste about their bodies? Is is not a point of cruelty, that there are so many lazars, who breathe out the remnant of their dayes, laid upon straw, where they are onely covered with the putrefaction of their ulcers, whiles there are bodies, who drag at their heels the spoil of Elements, and riches of the Universe, to prank themselves so industriously, as if they were of the matter of the sunne and starres? God who hath a care every year to make garments all sprinkled over with the pearls of so many meadow-flowers, is not wise enough to inspire you with the fashion you should entertain in your attires. Heaven and earth must be turned topsie-turvie, nature forced, and all arts wearied out to invent extravagances, to serve as instruments to Luxury. I wish those gorgets might be seen at the day of judgement, which we have beheld worn in Paris, worth the revenue of an honest family, and wherein ingenious Artists had employed three years of their time: I much desire to know with what arms these miserable creatures would defend themselves, who have made so proud a monument of their vanity, to erect an eternall reproach of their punishment. A dissolute habit, saith S. Augustine, is a messenger of the adulteries of the mind; A woman, who will appear too quaint before the world, cannot have a chaste heart before God.

Tom. 10. ser. 147. de Tempore:

They are not content with all this vast preparation, but nakednesse of necks must be exposed, which is reprehended by God, shamefull to their sex, injurious to nature, and scandalous to civil decency.

Lamiæ nudaverunt mammam, lactaverunt catulos suos.

They are the breasts of Lamia's whereof the Prophet speaketh in his Lamentations, which serve not but to nourish the impurity of Gallants, and foster their Luxury. A woman who exposeth that which should be hidden, will one day be enforced to hide that which will necessarily be made publick. A Virgin who delights to shew the nakednesse of her body, maketh it enough appear, she is not a Virgin; by how much she uncovers her self on the one side, by so much on the other she clothes her self with the brand of ignominy. God by his Prophet commandeth women to take adulteries out of their bosomes: but it is in the nakednesse of the neck, where they begin, to conclude afterward in all the parts of the body. They make no scruple of it, because this vice is an immortall evill, which having so many hands wherewith to do hurt, hath no eyes at all to understand it self.

A small expression, and an odd one Hos. 2.

Auferat adulteria de medio uberum suorum.

Alas! whosoever had any (never so little) love of her Christianity, and respect towards God, would quickly within her self condemne all this exorbitancy, and make a thousand times more account of the counsel of Saints then of the customes of blinded souls. Tell me not (Ladies) you do it very innocently; for a woman dissolute in dresses (which is the cause of the sins men commit) is as a land full of thieveries, where though the Lord be no robber, yet he becomes infamous. You on your body bear Eve the penitent, who was clothed with simple skins, and you will incessantly carry her in worldly pomps. All that (saith Tertullian) is but the equipage and furniture of a woman half damned, which would be more fit for the setting forth of her funerals, then the ornament of her body.

Damnate & mortuæ mulieris impedimenta quasi ad pompam funeris constituta. Tert. de hab. mulieris.

Take pity of so much of the world that perisheth, Take pity of your selves, enter into the way of a modest life, regulated in your habits, your conversation, your recreations, that all may therein speak, preach, and breathe the odour of virtue.

Then have you a singular means to free your selves from the importunities which assail chastity; for verily none would addresse themselves to women, if they thought not they were places that will render upon composition. A face which hath a Christian aspect drives away all the loves of the world, as the flower of the vine dissipateth serpents.

§ 9. Other Remedies, which nearer hand oppose this passion.

Advices & remedies against this Passion in its fall.

THese in my opinion are remedies which, at distance oppose this passion, and not onely suffer it, not to come near us, but if it happen that we must grapple with it, and joyn battle with it in some urgent temptation; I advise you never to begin the combate, untill you have well weighed the end of it. Love, at first, comes to us with the visage of a Virgin, and returneth from us with the body of a Serpent. He, who will know the utmost limits of it, should never make triall of its entrance.

The medal of love hath two faces.

The Antients heretofore delighted to make medals, the faces whereof were quite different and contrary: so as, if upon one side of the medal they graved an Achilles, on the other they figured a Thersites; if upon one side an Absolon, on the other an Esop; if on the one an Hecuba, on the other an Helena; and if upon one side a Rose, on the other an Onion. This is observed in the medall of Carnall Love, if you look upon it on one side, you shall see a figure infinitely sweet and charming, on the other a most hideous fury. A thousand and a thousand Artists have set their hand, one to the pen, another to the graving-chizzel, another to the pencil, to write, insculp, and paint the form of evil Love: but I think that Solomon, as he more sensibly felt the effects of it, gave us also more light, how to make a draught in detestation of this unhappy passion.

An excellent conceit of Solomon concerning Love.

I have noted in the Book of Proverbs, where it describeth the detestable loves of a poor young man deceived by a cunning Courtesant, that it gives four or five five properties to Carnall Love, which very notably discover the misery and imposture thereof. First, That its bed is woven with cords in the form of a little labyrinth, with many intricate windings. Secondly, That its chamber is perfumed with myrrh and aloes, very bitter drugs. Thirdly, That it in the beginning promiseth a sacrifice, and performs a slaughter. Fourthly, That the Lover who suffers himself to be deceived, is first an ox, then a sheep: and lastly, A bird taken in a snare, and wounded with a mortall arrow. Fifthly, That the house thereof is in the suburbs of hell.

Prov. 7. 1. Interni familiæ lectum nectunt.
2. Myrrh cubile meum myrrha & aloe.
3. Victimas pro salute devovi.
4. Bos ductus ad victimam, agnus lasciviens, avis ad laqueum.
5. Viæ inferni domus ejus.

All this is spoken with great sense; the beds woven with cords and hampered with so many Gordian knots, signifieth unto us the gins and attractives of evil Love. False opinion is ever at the gates of its house, which deceiveth and bewitcheth all such as come near it. It cares not in the beginning of the gain to discover to them the dreadfull events and tragedies of this passion; but it shews them a chamber wherein beauty is presented, which under a little white skin, hideth grosse ordures: with it are smiles, glances, flatteries, courtships, overflow of words, kisses, laucinesse, immodesty, good chear, idlenesse; this seems a goodly thing to sottish youth, which hath nothing so certain as ruine. These are the snares wherewith it surprizeth, and the knots which many times indissolubly fettereth its liberty. After that comes the chamber perfumed with myrrh and aloes, wherein the slight expected pleasures are drenched in great acerbities. There, folly, temerity, liberty meet, mixed with care, terrour, distrust, tears, sighs, falshood, perjury, dolours, jealousies, execrations, rage; which caused an Antient to say, That the heart of a Lover was a city, in which, upon one and the same day were seen sports and banquets, battels and funerals. In the third place, a slaughter-house is opened, where we clearly behold that false love which insinuateth it self with so many fair resemblances, is nothing but massacres both of body and soul; and that it is not without cause, that a foolish Lover saith in the best of Comick Poets, that the first Executioner that ever was on earth, was Love, which he saith, taught men all cruelties and tortures: adding that to Love fondly, and to be racked on the wheel, was in a manner all one. In this place of slaughter, there are likewise seen Pictures of Samson, with his eyes pulled out, pouring forth tears and bloud through the same channel. Of Amon, who transfixed with a deadly and dreadfull wound, yields up the ghost at a feast at the foot of his brother Absoloms table, for having violated Thamar. On the other side, two armies of Gods people, who cruelly kill one another for a luxurious act committed on the person of a married wife; so that of one part, eighteen thousand men were massacred, and of the other, more then twenty and five thousand. And round about, there is nothing but halters, poison, swords, bloud, racks, gibbets, and precipices. See here the goodly Sacrifices of Lust. In the fourth chamber are beheld the transfigurations of sottish Love, where he who is strucken with it, becomes first stupid as an Ox; dull and benummed in his wits, as having a paralytick soul; and brutish, like Nebuchadonozor, who forsook his Regall throne, to eat hay with beasts. Then he is shorn as a sheep, by taking away his fleeces, and despoiling him of the goods of soul, body, wealth, and reputation, and of all that, to which a reasonable creature may pretend unto. Lastly, to cut off all hope of recovery, he is unfeathered like a bird caught in a gin, yea, his wings are taken away, which are the desires of futurely doing well, that he may perpetually have the evil in object, and an inability towards good. The first chamber is very near to hell; there is to be seen darknesse, smoke, flames, and from whence are heard gnashings of teeth, despairs, and enraged complaints of unfortunate Lovers, who vomit out their souls in sinne, having made no expiation by a long penance. Oh God! what is he, who beholding this picture, would ever betray his soul, heaven, and his God, to yield obedience to loathsome lust?

Plutarch. in Sympos.

Plautus in Cystellaria.

Jud. 16.

2 Sam. 13.

Judg. 20.

All this well considered, give your self a little leasure to rally your thoughts together, and to behold the disasters which wait on the experience of miserable sinne. If you be a Virgin, stain not the honour of your body; vilifie not, in your flesh on earth, a virtue to which Angels afford such glory in heaven. Above all, beware of a damnable curiosity, which cannot be known, but by becoming criminall. If you understand the sinne, profit by your experience, and betray not an eternity of blessing, for a pleasure so short and wretched. If you be a master of a Family, and a man of quality, note what S. Gregory Nazianzene saith, That a man by his sinne wholly ruineth body, soul, estate, and reputation. He is terrible in his house, shamefull abroad, he serves for an executioner to a chaste wife, he is a tyrant to his children, a reproch to his friends, a scourge to his domesticks, a dishonour to his allies, a blemish to his renown, a shipwrack to his means, and a fable to all the world. If you be a maid, ever fear to become a woman, and cast not the garland of your virginity under the feet of hogs. Give not a hair of your head to them who promise you golden mountains, and when they desire you in the quest of marriage, then is the time you must least be for marriage. All you grant to their importunity, will be the subject of your disgrace; and when they shall have wedded you, should you live as chaste as Susanna, they will continually imagine, you will be liberall to others, of that, whereof you were prodigall to them. If you desire to marry by fancy, rather pursuing your own wanton humours, then the reasonable commands of those to whom you owe your being, hold it as a crime, the most capitall you may undertake, and confidently believe, if so you do, you will open a floud-gate to a deluge of miseries and cares, which will flow upon you through all the parts of your life. Account the resolutions you make to this purpose, as treasons, and think whosoever shall to you suggest the execution of them, will poison you by the ear to murder your chastity.

Disasters of love in every age and condition.

Advice to all sorts of persons.

Greg. Naz. homil. de Fornic.

If you be a married woman, and peradventure innocent enough, and of good reputation, what colour is there for you to engage your self in a crime for which husbands have furies, laws, thunders, threats; Judges for Sentence, punishments of gibbets and bloudy scaffolds; and for which, a thousand poor creatures have ended their miserable lives, surprised in the heat of sin, to passe from a temporall fire, to that which never is quenched. If you be a man of the sword, know it is given you to defend honour, not to violate it, and that a man who suffers himself to be lead by women, what Rhodomontado's soever he make in words, he is ever a coward.

If you be a Judge or an Officer, raised up into an eminent place, degrade not your self of the honours which God hath imprinted on your fore-head, and never mount you up to the throne of Judicature, to condemn your own act, and still think the purple, which will not be died but by virginall hands, ought not to be worn but on a chaste body.

If you be an Ecclesiastick, and which is more, engaged to Religion or Prelacy; will you be so unnaturall as ever to consent to a sinne, which cannot in your person but be a sacrileage? What a madnesse is it, that for to satisfie an infamous act of lust, you must be either either an excommunicate, or a persecutour of Jesus Christ? Excommunicate (I say) if you forsake altars, and a persecutour of Jesus Christ, if you come to them in this horrible sinne, where you strike a nail into his hand, a lance into his side, you devour his flock, and kill his brethren by your ill example.

Carnall love, in what person soever, is still ill situate (said Epictetus) In a maid it is a shame, in a woman it is a fury, in a man a lewdnesse, in youth it is a rage, in mans estate a blemish, in old-age a disgrace worthy of scorn.

You will say, all these considerations are very effectuall, but that they cure not passion already enflamed, and almost desperate of remedy.

Remedies for affections which come against our will.

To that I answer, we must proceed with more efficacy and addresse among such as are surprised with vehement affection of which they would be free, but they find all possible repugnancies.

I approve not the course of certain directours, who think all maladies are healed by words, as if they had ears. To what purpose is it to hold long discourses, and to appoint many meditations to a sharp feaver, which is full of ravings and furious symptomes?

Diversity of the maladies of love, and their cures.

All the maladies of Love are not cured in one and the same manner: There are some who are engaged in the sense of the passion, but not in the consent to the sinne; which is expresly sent by God to persons very innocent, but not entirely perfect, to punish some negligencies or some slight liberties of conversation, whereinto they have suffered themselves to slide by surprisall; that they may feel the danger of sinne by the torment they suffer, and may correct themselvs by the scent of the smoke before they be involved in the flame. And this many times lasteth long, being ordained as under a sentence of the divine Providence, as a punishment to become afterward a bridle to negligence, and a precaution against peril.

Some also are permitted by heaven, and imposed upon certain souls who had a little too much rigour towards such as were tempted, to the end, they might learn by their experience more mildly to handle suffering hearts, and not exasperate their wounds by the sharpnesse of the remedy. Witnesse that old man of whom Cassian speaketh; who having roughly entertained a young religious man, that discovered his passion to him, was tempted so violently, that he thereby became frantick, and understood from the venerable Abbat Apollon, this had befaln him by reason of his great harshnesse; and that although he hitherto had not felt any rebellion against chastity, it was because the devill either knew him not, or contemned him.

Cas. Col. 2. de discret. Intellige te, vel ignotarum hastenus a diabolo vel despectum.

There are some which like tertian and quartan agues, have their accesses and recesses measured; and what diligence soever be used therein (well, the pain may be mitigated, but) the root is not taken away till it arrive to a certain period of time, wherein the sick man is insensibly cured. There are some driven away by hunger, and others overthrown by a reasonable usage, as it happeneth to melancholy Lovers, whose bodies are dry, and brains hollow; if you appoint them fasts and austerities ill ordered, you kill them. Some advise them recreation, wine, bathes, honest and pleasing company, necessary eare of the body.

Some, sweet and active entertainment, which gives not leasure to the wild fancies of the mind; but this must be taken with much moderation. There are some who expect a good sickness, and many bloud-lettings, which may evacuate all the bloud imprinted with Images of the thing beloved, to make a new body; others are cured by a suit, a quarrell, ambition, an ill businesse, great successe, a new state of life, a voyage, a marriage, an office, a wife. There are now very few fools of Love to be found, who neglect worth and honour to serve their passion.

There are nice and suspicious Loves, which have more of vanity then concupiscence; when one troubleth and hinders them from honestly seeing that which they love, they are distempered, and if one resist them not, they vanish away as if they had not had so much intention to love, as to vanish. It were almost necessary for many, if it may be done without sinne or scandall, to converse continually; for being somewhat of their own nature, coy, they still observe some defect in the thing beloved, which weakneth their passion, and find that the presence is much inferiour to their Idea, which is the cause they easily desist from their enterprise, having more shame to have begun it, then purpose to continue it.

Some are enflamed by deniall, others become totally cool by contempt, as proud and predominate loves, who have not learn'd to suffer the imperious carriage of a woman; a disdain of their mistresse, a cunning trick, a coldnesse, a frown, makes them quickly break their chains. One would not believe how many humane industries there are to cure the pain of Love, but ever it is better to owe ones health to the fear of God, to Penance, to Deuotion, then to all other inventions.

Solid remedies.

For which cause, you must consider the glorious battails which so many heroick souls have waged to crush this serpent, and to walk with noble steps in the liberty of the children of God.

Admirable examples of the combats of Saints against Love.

Some have fought with it on thorns, as S. Bennet; others on flowers, as the Martyr Nicetas, who being bound on a bed of roses with silken cords, to resign himself to the love of a courtesan, spit out his tongue in her face. Others have thrust sharp pointed reeds under their nails, as S. John the Good: others have quenched it in snows, as S. Francis: others in flames, as S. Martinian, who, being by an unchaste woman sollicited to sinne, burnt his face and hands to overthrow the strongest passion, by the most violent pain. There are many of them in the new Christianity of Japonia, who pursue the same wayes, and run to their chimney-hearths to vanquish the temptations of the flesh, thinking there is not a better remedy against this fire, then fire it self. Others have overcome this bruitishnesse by a savage life, as S. Theoclista, who being taken by Arabians, stole from them, and was thirty years hidden in the forrests, living on grasse, and clothing her self with leaves. To say truly, there is not any virtue hath cost mankind so much, as invincible Chastity.

But since these manners of conquests are more admirable then imitable; at least mortifie your body by some ordinary devotion. Make use of the memory of death, make use of assiduity of prayer, of labour, of care over the eyes, ears, heart, and all the senses.

Ubi furoris insederit virus, libidinis quoque incendium necesse est penet. Cas. de spiritu fornic. c. 23.

Humble your spirit, and submit to obedience, that your flesh may obey you. Be not transported with extravagancies, animosity, and revenge: since Anger and Love (according to the Ancients) work upon one subject, and that the same fervours of bloud which make men revengefull, will make them unchaste; fail not to heal your self by the practise of retirement, of penance, of hair-cloth, and fasting. A holy maid of Alexandria was twelve years in a sepulchre to free her self from the importunities of concupiscence; & cannot you be there one hour, so much as in thought?

Raderus

Another had this stratagem to elude love; for, she seeing a young man to be very much touched with her love, who ceased not to importune her with all the violent pursuits which passion could suggest; told him, she had made a vow to fast forty dayes with bread and water:

Speculum Anonymi.

of

of which she would discharge her self before she would think of any thing else, and asked whether he pleased not to be a Party for the triall of his love? which he accepted: but in few dayes he was so weakned, that he then more thought upon death then love. Have not you courage to resist your enemy by the like arms? your heart faileth you in all that is generous, and you can better tell how to commit a sin then to do penance. Then chuse out that which is most necessary and reasonable, separation, from that body so beloved which by its presence is the nourishment of your flames. Consider you not, that comets which (as it is said) are fed by vapours of the earth, are maintained whilst their mother furnisheth them with food? so, love, which shineth, and burns like a false star in the bottome of your heart continually taketh its substance and sustenance from the face which you behold with so much admiration, from the conversation which entertains you in an enchanted palace full of chains and charms. Believe me, unlose this charm, stoutly take your selfe off, dispute not any longer with your concupiscence; fly away, cut the cable, weigh anchor, spread sails, set forward, go, fly: Oh, how a little care will quickly be passed over! Oh, how a thousand times will you blesse the hour of this resolution! Look for no more letters, regard not pictures; no longer preserve favours; let all be to preserve your reason. Ah! why argue you still with your own thoughts? Take me then some Angel, some Director, who is an able, intelligent, industrious, couragious man; resign your self wholly up to his advice, he will draw you out from these fires of Gomorrha, to place you in repose and safety on the mountain of the living God.

Separation, the first remedy.

The counsel and assiduity of a good director, is an excellent antidote.

I adde also one advice (which I think very essentiall) which is, infinitely to fear relapses after health, and to avoid all that may re-enkindle the flame. For, Love oft-times resembleth a snake enchanted, cast asleep and smothered; which, upon the first occasions, awaketh, and becomes more stronger and more outragious then ever. You must not onely fortifie your body against it, but your heart; for, to what purpose is it to be chast in your members, and be in thought an adulterer! Many stick not to entertain love in their imagination, with frequent desires, without putting them in execution: but they should consider, that Love, though imaginary, makes not an imaginary hell; and that for a transitory smoke, they purchase an eternall fire.

§ 10. Of Celestiall Amities.

But, it is time we leave the giddy fancies of love, to behold the beauties and lights of divine Charity, which causeth peace in battails, conquest in victories, life in death, admiration on earth, and paradise in heaven it self. It is a strange thing that this subject (the most amiable of all) proves somewhat dreadfull to me, by the confluence of so many excellent Writers, antient and modern, who have handled it so worthily, since thier riches hath impoverished their successions, and their plenty maketh me in some sort to fear sterility. They had much furtherance in their design; they took as much stuffe as they thought good, referring all that to the love of God, which is in nature, and above nature, in grace, and beyond grace. They have enlarged themselves in great volumes, the sight whereof alone seems to have much majesty: and to please their own appetites, they have said all they might possible. But here, forasmuch as concerneth my purpose, I have reduced my self into contractions of great figures, which will not prove troublesome, if measures and proportions be therein observed, and nothing forgotten of all that, which is most essentiall to the matter we treat. I find my self very often enforced to confine giants to the compasse of a ring, and to cover ships under the wing of a fly, drawing propositions out of a huge masse of thoughts and discourses, to conclude them in a little Treatise, not suffering sublimity to take ought away of their facility, nativenesse of their majesty, shadows of their lustre, nor superficies of their dimensions.

Myrmecidia opera apud Ælianum.

Besides, that which renders this my discourse the lesse pleasing, is, that speaking to men of the world, I cannot disguise the matter in unknown habits, splendid and pompous words, conceptions extatick; I cannot perswade them that a Seraphin hath penetrated the heart of one with a dart of fire, and that another hath had his sides broken by the strength of the love of God. I must pursue ordinary wayes, and teach practises more nearly approching to our humanity.

I am then resolved to shew there are celestiall Amities, which great souls contract with God, that their condition is very excellent and most happy, and that the practice of them must begin in this world, to have a full fruition of them in the other.

Carnall spirits, which onely follow animall wayes, have much a-doe to conceive how a man can become passionate in the love of God, and think there is no affection but for temporall and visible things: It is a Love too high (say they) to transferre their affections into heaven: It is a countrey wherein we have no commerce; There comes neither letter nor message thence; No ships arrive on that coast; It is a world separated from ours by a great Chaos wholly impenetrable, How would you I love God, since he is all spirit, and I a body? He is Infinite, I finite. He so High, and I so low. It is a kind of insolency to go about to think of it. Behold, how spirits, ignorant of heavens mysteries, do talk. But I maintain upon good grounds, that we are made to place our love in the heart of God, and that if we do not seasonably take this way; well we may go on, but never shall we arrive at repose,

That there may be a celestiall amity by the commerce of man with God.

First the Philosopher Plato hath worthily observed, that the love we have here below, is, a remembrance of the first, fair sovereign and most pure of all beauties, which is the Divinity. Our soul, which is the blast of his mouth, the image of his bounty, the representation of his power, as it beareth so lively characters of his Majesty, hath (as it were) also, not heeding it, a generous passion towards him: unlesse it be infected by the breath of the serpent, and obstructed by vapours of sensualty; it seeks for him; it speaks to him in all creatures: It beholdeth him through so many veils which nature hath spread before it in so divers objects. But it often falleth out, that, charmed with present pleasures, it is so much delighted with beautifull workmanships, that it forgetteth the work-man: It embraceth momentary beauties for eternall verities: It takes the shadow for the body: It creates to it self an Empire in banishment, and a haven in shipwrack. This carnall piece, which is ravished with the contemplation of this goodly face, will not stay upon flesh: It feeleth there is some invisible hand which shoots arrows at it, amidst the vermilion of roses, and the whitenesse of lillies: it well knoweth not what transports it, what entranceth it, what worketh these transanimations in it: It is not the body which must rot, but it is the shadow of the first-fair upholds it self in the frailty of dying things, and incessantly causeth returns to the first origen, in souls which know how to profit by their wounds.

An excellent conceit of Plato. Plato in Sympos. & Marsil. Ficinus. Amor memoria primi, ac summi, & purissimi pulchri. Appetitor artis, desertor artificis amplectitur speciem, cujus non miratur authorem. S. Eucherius ep. Paræn.

O how

O how attractive is the Beautie! O ſhould it on a ſudden take away the veil from all mortall eyes who court it; the world in an inſtant would diſſolve under its much to be adored rayes, ſouls would fly out of bodies, and totall nature would impetuouſly affect its delights.

It is ſo naturally imprinted on the heart of man, that Hell it ſelf cannot forget it, ſince the evil rich man laid on the coals of ſo unfortunate a lodging, did for his firſt act, liſt up his eyes to heaven, as deſirous to look for the lovely face which he had eternally loſt.

Aug. l. 2. conf. c 6. An excellent reaſon of S. Auguſtine, to ſhew the inclination we have to love God.

Secondly, I will deliver an excellent reaſon, which I draw out of S. Auguſtine, to convince us that there is ſome very forcible inclination which inſenſibly moveth us to the love of God: which is the cauſe that even our vices and exorbitancies (not reflecting thereon) love ſome perfection of the Divinity, although not regulated, nor limited in the bounds wherewith it ought to be beloved. Pride contends for heighth; and what is higher then God, who ſits upon Thrones, predominateth over Dominations, who governeth Principalities, and makes Heaven bow even to the Abyſſe, under the ſhadow of his Majeſty?

Ambition paſſionately ſeeketh after honours; and who hath more honour then God, who ſeeth glory to be hatched in his own boſome, for whome ſo many Altars ſmoke, for whom ſo many ſacrifices burn, under whom ſo many Diadems bow, to whow ſo many Sceptres obey, before whom ſo many States, Kingdomes, and Empires, are but a drop of dew? Power will make it ſelf great; and who is more formidable then this great Judge, for whom Thunders roar, Lightnings fly, Thunder-ſtones ſhiver lofty rocks, for whom elements fight, and nature dreſſeth up its ſcaffolds, to proſecute offenders even in hell; there being neither Place, Time, Heighth, or Power which hath ability to deliver it ſelf out of his hands? Flattery, and Complacence will make it ſelf to be beloved; and what is more lovely then the ſweetneſſe of the charity of this good Father, which diſtilleth like unto a celeſtiall Manna upon all the creatures of the Univerſe? Curioſity affecteth the ſtudy of wiſdome; And what is wiſer then God, who ſeeth all within himſelf, who hath Abyſſes of knowledges in his heart, riches of eternall ſapience in his boſome, for whom Time hath no preſcription, nature no veil, Heighth no heighth, and abyſſes no depth: Who is the Father of Sciences, Creatour of thoughts, Treaſure of Eloquence; who dazeleth all humane Ability, who taketh his Sages from among Ideots, and out of the dumb, raiſeth his Oratours. Lazyneſſe ſeeks out a life ſoft and peaceſull, continually fixed upon its repoſe, and the contentments of the fleſh and ſpirit; and where ſhall we find the repoſe out of God, ſince it is he who is perpetually ingulphed in the delights of a pure tranquillity? Luxury ardently deſireth pleaſures, and will ſatisfie all the deſires of its heart; And God is he not the plenitude of joy, an abundance which never fails, a ſweetneſſe incorruptible, a feaſt which conſumeth not, a perpetuall Theatre of comforts a Flood of moſt pure contentments, which floweth over all Paradiſe? Avarice will poſſeſſe much, it ſtretcheth out the hands of a Harpy over the goods of another; It garboileth the world, it diſquieteth the earth; It would willingly delve into hell, it pleadeth, it wrangleth, it aſſails, it defendeth to ſatiate its covetouſneſſe, yet ſtill is hungry: For what is he that poſſeſſeth all but the prime of the rich, who is the beauty of fields, the luſtre of flowers, the fecundity of fruits, the wealth of minerals, and the fertility of totall nature? Envie is troubled about ſupereminency, and will have the higheſt place, accounting him an enemy, who precedeth; And is it not the eternall Father, who is King of Glory, who ſeeth all to be much lower then himſelf, and ſeeth nothing beyond what he is? Choler will revenge for it, it ſtinketh at heaven, it troubleth the earth, it cauſeth lightning and tempeſts, which raiſe ſo many Tragedies in the world; And who better knowes how to avenge ſins then the ſoveraign Monarch of the Univerſe, for whom exterminating Angels carry the ſword of Juſtice, for whom hell reſerveth treaſures of flaimes eternall?

Now, I demand of you, if it be true, that even our vices are in love with ſome perfections which are in God, how can our virtues but bear a ſingular affection towards him? why ſhould they not be enamoured of his beauties? why not ſigh after his attractives; ſince they are his reall daughters?

Some one will ſay, it were but reaſonable, if God, to make himſelf beloved, would become viſible to men; but he is a ſecret ſo hidden, that our poor ſpirit ſeeking for him, finds more confuſion, then light. Verily, I like Mercury Triſmegiſtus; for he ſtopping his mouth, who complained of the inviſibility of God: Hold thy peace (thou profane fellow) ſaith he, and if thou haſt eyes, confeſſe God is viſible, and that he ſheweth himſelf in as many mirrours as there are creatures in this great Univerſe.

A man needs to be a Philoſopher but a little to learn to love; let him ſee, know and ſtudy nature in all its works; let him hear the harmonies of Gods conſort, to underſtand in ſome meaſure, the perfections of the workman. Thoſe little golden, and azure ſhels, which make a lodging for certain fiſhes, more magnificent then Solomons Palace; Thoſe cob-web-lawns, and thoſe tiffanies, which compoſe the body of flowers with an exquiſite delicacy; Thoſe waves, which curle on the current of rivers; thoſe gentle weſtern blaſts which bear comfort and health on their wings; thoſe huge theatres of ſeas; that vaſt extent of plains; thoſe meteors ſo artificially varied; thoſe little eyes of heaven, which ſhew themſelves ſo ſoon as night ſpreads its mantle on the inferiour regions of the world; all that is ſeen, all that is heard, all that is touched, all that is handled; ceaſe not to recount unto us the love of our Father.

One muſt never have ſeen the ſun, not to have love for God; he muſt have lived like a hog, with his head in the mire, and his eyes in a trough, to ſay he knoweth not what the Divinity is. To ſpeak truly, this great ſtarre is the viſible ſonne of the firſt Bright; the Image of the ſovereign King; the eye of the world; the heart of nature; it daily ſpeaketh to us out of the gates of the Eaſt, with as many tongues as it hath raies. This great ſuperviſor of the fornaces of the univerſe travelleth throughout totall nature. He lighteth up the ſtars; in heaven he createth crowns, and rain-bowes in the air; on earth, flowers and fruits; in the ſea, pearls; and in the boſome of rocks, ſaphires and diamonds: he throws fire and vigour into all living creatures; his preſence cauſeth alacrity, and his abſence (inſenſibly) horrour and melancholy in all nature. His motion ſo rapid, his circumvolution ſo even, that, ſo regular harmony of nights and dayes, thoſe reflections, which are as fathers of ſo many Eſſences, ſet the whole Divinity before our eyes. O what a goodly thing it is to talk face to face with thoſe great forreſts, which are born with the world to diſcourſe with the murmur of waters, the warbling of birds in the ſweetneſſe of ſolitude and of ſo many creatures, which (according to S. Denis) are the veils and Tapiſtries of the great Temple! There it is, where God accoaſteth on all ſides, where our ſoul is ſtirred up with its own thoughts, diſchargeth it ſelf of matter, and entreth into a great commerce with Intelligencies. When I behold all the perquiſites of Organs, Tantus eſt ille, ut, qui non amant eum, inſaſtà quidem, non niſi quadam ejus amare poſſint. S. Eucherius. Objection about the inviſibility of God. Mercur. Triſm. Πάντα ἰσχυρὸν ἐστὶ θεῷ πανδύναστος ἐλάτης. That God renders himſelf infinitely amiable in totall nature. Syneſius Hymn. 4. Naturam universam lyram accepti Patris vocat diverſis fidibus intentam. Διὰ σοῦ φύσις ὑπέτεινε μεσότονα πάντα θεοῦ ἀπήλαυσε πατρός. Ubi alludit ad chordas cytharæ hypatem meſen neten. The ſun the image of God. Ὅμμα δὲ κοσμοτύρου κατανύσσει ζωὸς φάος. Orpheo. Boni conſpicuus filius, conſpicuum in templo mundi Dei ſimulachrum Platonicis, Proclus thronum juſtitiæ in medio ſole collocat.

Ποικιλία τῶν ἱερῶν πλασμάτων. S. Dyonifius c. 1 Hierar. celeſtis.

where Musick is in perfection; I stay not on the Iron, Lead, Wood, the Piper nor on the bellows; my spirit flyeth to that hidden spirit which distributeth it self with so melodious proportionable divisions throughout the whole Instrument. So, when I contemplate the world, I stick not on the body of the Sun, the stars, the elements, the stones, the metals, the plants, nor the living creatures; I penetrate into that secret spirit which insinuateth it self thereunto, with such admirable power, such ravishing sweetnesse, and incomparable Harmony. I infinitely love him, because he is fair, since he made all the beauties which are presented before mine eyes; Because he is good; because he is wise, since he communicateth himself with so much profusion: since he so well tempered the consonancies of the whole world; I love him, because I know he is mine, and I am wholly his. Were I not touched with his beauty, his wisdome, his goodnesse, perpetually his benefits would soften my heart, Me thinks I meet him every where, with a hundred arms, and as many hands to do me good. I neither see place, room, time, or moment, which is not figured with his liberalities.

Ψυχὴ σωματικὴ. Synesius. Quod colimus non Deus unus est, qui totam molem illa cum instrumento elementorum, corporum, spirituum expressit in ornamentum majestatis suæ. Tertul. Apol. c. 17.

I am clothed with his wooll, fed with his Granary, warm'd with his wood, served by his Officers; I live in him, I breathe by him. I have nothing which is not his Inheritance. It is neither Father nor Mother, great one, Lord, or King, which gave me wealth, honour, and estate. Well they may be instruments of my happinesse but they are not the cause. They were nothing for so many years; They came into the world as poor, as I; they daily return from it, into dust; I feel my necessities and dependences; and I know they cannot be supplyed, but by a necessary, and independent Essence.

The commerce of man with God. S. Maximus Cent. 5 ex variis. Deum extra se effici creaturis omnibus providendo Meliora sunt ubera tua vino. Cant. Quia vinum exprimitur cum labore in torcular, ubera sponte fluunt.

We must not say, we have not commerce enough with him; great things are for the little, and the rich for the necessitous. See we not that heaven is all for the earth? doth it cause one sprig of an herb to grow, in it self? produceth it one sole flower among its stars? It giveth all it hath, and is perpetually content with what it is. So God is all for us, as if man were his God, saith S. Thomas. If we be miserable, he is not therefore disdainfull; if he be high, he is not therefore far distant from our inferiour condition. He is all, in all things; ever present; continually doing somewhat; He hath dugs of bounty which put him to pain, if he stream not upon us. We see him to come from all parts, and his approch is not mute; for, the best part of us is spirituall, which maketh commerce easie unto us, with a God, who is all spirit. How often find we our soul to be raised above it self, and to be transported with thoughts, knowledges, lights, joyes, pleasures, consolations, hopes, confidences, courages, and antipasts of glory, which we acknowledge to be above our strength! It is God then, who worketh by them in us, who enters into our soul, as a Master into his house, who becomes our guest, our friend, our Doctour, and our Protectour. We need not seek for him in heaven, he is in our heart (saith the Emperour Antonine) and there he uttereth his oracles. There it is, where he entertaineth us, and teacheth us, we are his children, and reserveth for us an admirable inheritance.

Glossa in Danielem.

When it was said to little Nabuchodonozor, who was exposed in his infancy and bred up in the house of a Peasant, whose son he took himself to be; Courage (child) you are not made to drive Oxen, and till the ground; there is another profession expecteth you: you are the son of a great Prince, who keeps the prime kingdome of the world for you: These raggs must be changed into robes of cloth of gold; this ugly Hat into a Diadem; this Spade into a Sceptre; This Cottage into a Palace, this servitude into an Empire: For whom shall treasures, officers, services, arms, greatnesse, pleasures, joyes, and feasts, be but for you, who art the heir of the Assyrian throne? Do not we think that upon the recitall of these words, this young man felt a flame which spread it self over his heart, that he was touched to the quick, with his extraction, and ravished with love towards a Father, by whom he was born so great? And have we not the like apprehensions, when faith dictateth unto us; Thou art not created to live perpetually among mire and dirt, and to be tyed to a wretched, frail, and perishable body, to walk upon thorns, and to embroil thy self in the toils and cares of a mortall life; there are above palaces of stars, of Intelligencies, of incomprehensible lights, of ineffable beauties which expect thee, of crowns prepared for thee, of sceptres made to fill thy hands: All times are for thee, and all which Nature endeavoureth here below, is but to contribute to thy contentment. Thou art the son of a noble Father, who makes men happy at his pleasure. He loves thee as his heart, and would have thee near him, to accomplish thee with all his dearest delights and the highth of his glories. And what can a soul do, which learns all this from faith; but raise it self above all concupiscences of flesh; but love, but dilate it self, but readily mix with this most pure spirit, which inviteth it in all creatures?

The conversation of God with man by the mystery of the incarnation in the consummation of love. Leo serm. 3. de Passione Venit in hunc mundum dives, atque misericors negotiator cœli & commutatione mirabili invitivit commercium salutare nostra accipiens, sua tribuens.

Have we yet the heart to say, we have not familiarity enough with God; and that he is of too high a strain to love him, when we think upon Jesus, who for us descended from the highest part of heaven to the slime of Adam. who made himself our brother, who sucked the dugs of our Mother, who spake our tongue who took upon him our semblance, who charged himself with our burdens, who on himself laid our miseries, to turn them into felicities? He is that Merchant who is come out of a happy and rich countrey full of treasures, glory, and greatnesse, which were to him more naturall, then rayes to the Sun; and yet, being lodged (as it were) with us, in a silly Cottage, hath dispoiled himself for us, wholly inebriated with the extasies of love; hath made himself poor to make us rich, weak to strengthen us, contemptible to render us glorious, full of sufferings to beautifie us, and a man, that we might be Gods. This is the man who hath been able to contract all Gods extent under a little clay, who went not a step which was not worthy to produce a star, who carried the Divinity upon the ends of his fingers, whose life was a flash of lightning, his word a thunder, his virtues lessons and actions, prodigies. Hath he not loved the ungratefull, when he heaped on his own body the paines and sufferings of all ages, making himself of a King of glory, a man of dolours, to purchase pleasures for us with as many wounds as he had members, as many crosses as we have sins!

The Eucharist the last degree of love.

After all this, he gives himself to us in the Sacrament, which he hath instituted as an abridgement of his miracles, wherein he is incorporated within our heart, in our soul, as one piece of wax melted within another. I readily here remember what an antient lover said, that love made a Butt of his heart, where, so soon as it had shot all its arrows, it threw it self as an enflamed dart into the bottome of his breast, to set him all on fire, What arrows, and what shafts, flying on every side, in Nature, in Grace, what benefits, what favours, what Amities, what forward affections, for which man still continued obdurate, till Jesus wholly gaining him, did descend into his entrails fully repleniſhed with love and flames, and heavenly ardours? Is it not time to pronounce Anathema with S. Paul, against him who loveth him not after his coming in this manner, to captivate us by his bounty?

Anacreon. Ὡς δ' ἂν ἐτόξευσε τοὺς ἅπαντας ἡ χαλεπὸς ἑαυτὸν ἔρωτα ἐς τὸ βέλεμνον. Ita applicat Johannes Eusebius l. 4. arte voluntatis.

To speak sincerely, he must needs be amiable, since (according to the Canticles) he is wholly composed of desires,

Love of Saints towards Jesus.

deſires, and ſatisfactions, and that all the juſt ſigh after him. We have heard talk through ſo many Ages of the moſt accompliſhed beauties of certain creatures who have drawn many Amoriſts after them: but never have we ſeen one ſole woman to gain the affection of an entire City, Province or Kingdome. From whence cometh it, that there is not any beauty, but that of Jeſus Chriſt, which enchaineth Cities, Empires, and Monarchies? From whence cometh it, that ſo many Kings and Queens have followed him through Forreſts, Thorns, and among Rocks, even to the abandoning of themſelves? From whence cometh it, that ſo many millions of ſouls, the wiſeſt, moſt purified, and moſt courageous on the earth, have loved him even to the ſuffering of flames and wheels, in the diſlocation of bones, and the diſmembring of their whole bodies? From whence cometh it, that all, which is moſt pure, and moſt eminent in the world, daily diſſolveth for him, and that ſo many hearts melt for his ſervice in honourable flames which purifie them, without conſuming them? Verily, we may ſay, there is nothing which equalleth the excellency of celeſtiall Amities: and that, well to place your love; you muſt fix it in the heart of God.

§ 11. Of the Nature of Divine Love. Of its Eſſence, Qualities, Effects, and Degrees.

Blanquerna in l. de amico & amato.

THe great Anachoret Raymond went very high when he ſaid. The love of God was an influence of Eternity: For it is true that we, coming from an eternall God, have an infinité deſire to make our Being perpetuall. And for this purpoſe, we tie our ſelves by love to ſo many things, to live again in them, and by them: but they being tranſitory and frail, we there find no ſupport, untill God hath poured his holy love into our heart, which is the true influence of Eternity, that alone can purifie our life, and eternize our ſouls.

Concilium Arauſicanum. Donum Dei eſt diligere Deum, ipſe ut diligeretur dedit, qui non diligentes diligit, diſplicentes, amatí fumusque eſſet in nobis unde placeremus.

We then muſt not feign to our ſelves, that the love of God proceeds meerly from our own ſtrength, but we muſt hearken to the deciſion of the Councell of Orange which ſaith, that to love God, is a gift from God: It is he who inſpireth the love with which he will be loved, and who hath loved us even in diſfavour, to tranſport us to favour: Whereby it appeareth, that this fair love is nought elſe but a celeſtiall quality infuſed into the ſoul, by which we love God above all, and all for God.

The growth of love like unto pearls.

Now, I imagine with my ſelf, that he is born in our hearts, in ſuch a manner, as pearls grow in their ſhells. The mother of pearl is firſt pierced by a celeſtiall influenee, as with an arrow, fiery, and ſharp, which ſollicits and importuneth it, to diſpoſe it ſelf to this excellent production. Which is the cauſe, that it ſpreads, openeth, and dilates it ſelf, to receive the dew diſtilled into it from the air, and having moiſtned it, it digeſteth, concocteth, and transfigureth it into this little miracle of nature, which is with ſo much curioſity ſought after. Behold what paſſeth in a ſoul; when it bringeth forth this precious love, it is prevented by a ſpeciall grace from the Divine Goodneſſe, which at firſt gives it a diſtaſte of all things in the world, and fixeth a generous ſpur in the heart, to excite, awaken, and enflame it to the queſt of ſo great a good. Then it extendeth, dilates, and opens all its gates to the Holy Ghoſt, who deſcendeth into it, as the dew of Hermon by qualities, and effects admirable, which through free-will it embraceth; and ties, and habituateth it ſelf therein, conceiving and forming Jeſus Chriſt (as ſaith S. Paul:) Then is the time, when this divine love is conceived, which is no ſooner born, but it cauſeth a rejoycing in the heart of man, like unto that which happened in the houſe of Abraham at Iſaacs nativity. It is a celeſtiall laughter, an extraordinary jubilation, an expanſion of all the faculties and functions of the ſpirit, and will. This little Monarch is no ſooner born, but it begins to command, and ſits on the heart as in its Throne: All powers do it homage; all paſſions render it ſervice. All the virtues applaud at its coronation, and confeſſe they hold of it, and are all in it. He who is once well inſtructed in charity aboundeth with all riches, and hath the full plenitude of the ſpirit, (according to the Apoſtles) and is a Tree grafted with ſiens of all perfection, and which fail not to bring forth their fruits.

Donec Chriſtus formetur in vobis. Gal. 4. 19.

The Empire and eminencies of Divine love.

Inſtructi in charitate in omnes divitias plenitudinis intellectus. Col. 2. 3. Ailredus tom. 13. Bibliorum in ſpeculo charitatis. Excellent conceit of charity.

Sciences, and virtues are, that, to us, which oars to veſſels, what the viaticum to travellers, what light to blear-eyes, what arms to ſouldiers: but charity alone is the repoſe of the wearied, the Countrey of Pilgrims, the light of the blind, the Crown of the victorious, Faith, and the knowledge of God carry us to our countrey; Hope maintaineth us the other virtues defend us: but where charity is perfect, as it is in glory, one no longer believes any thing, becauſe it ſeeth all, one hopes for nought, becauſe he poſſeſſeth all.

Temperance combateth againſt Concupiſcence, Prudence againſt errour, Fortitude againſt adverſity, Juſtice againſt inequality: But in perfect charity, there is a perfect chaſtity, which ſtandeth not in need of the arms of temperance, having no blemiſh of impurity; A perfect knowledge, which expecteth not any help from ordinary Prudence, ſince it hath no errours; a perfect Beatitude, which needeth not Fortitude to conquer adverſities, ſince to it nothing is uneaſie; a Sovereign peace which imploreth not the aid of Juſtice againſt inequality, ſince all therein is equall.

For in a word, what is charity but a temperate love without luſt, A prudent love without errour, a ſtrong love without impatience, a juſt love without inequality? Faith is the firſt day of our Creation, which driveth away darkneſſe; Hope is the ſecond, which makes a firmament for us, and which divideth waters from waters, things tranſitory from eternall. Temperance is the third, which harraungeth the waters, and ſtorms of paſſions in their proper element, and cauſeth the land of our heart to appear, which ſendeth up vapours to God, that are its ſighs.

Prudence, is the fourth, which lighteth up in us the ſun of underſtanding, and the lights of knowledge, Fortitude is the fifth, which ſuſtains us in the Ocean of adverſities (not ſuffering us to corrupt as fiſhes in ſalt-waters, and as birds) above the Tempeſt. Juſtice the ſixth, for it gives us to command over our paſſions, as Adam who on the ſame day he was created, obtained it over all living creatures. But charity is the ſeventh day The Symbole of Glory, which contracteth all delights in the circle of its Septenary. And how can it but abbridge all Theology, ſince it abbridgeth God himſelf, and that we have cauſe to ſpeak to him in ſuch terms, as Saint Zeno did. O love what haſt thou done? Thou haſt changed God into Man, Thou haſt contracted him, drawing him out of the luſtre of his Majeſty, to make him a pilgrime on earth; Thou haſt ſhut him in the priſon of a virginall womb the ſpace of nine moneths: Thou haſt annihilated the empire of death, when thou taught teſt God to dy.

S. Zeno ſer. de fide, ſpe, & charit. Tu Deum in hominem demutatum voluiſti, tu Deum abbreviatum pauliſper à majeſtatis ſuæ immenſitate peregrinari feciſti, tu virginali carcere novem menſibus religaſti, tu mortem, Deum mori docendo, evacuaſti.

Love thus acknowledged by all the virtues, mounteth as on a chariot of Glory, maketh it ſelf conſpicuous with heroick, and noble qualities: It is pious, ſince it employeth all its thoughts on God: It is generous, and magnanimous, ſince it is ever diſpoſed to great deſigns: It is liberall, as that which ſpareth nothing: It is ſtrong, not yielding to any of all thoſe obſtacles, which preſent themſelves to divert the courſe of its intentions: It is juſt, equally diſtributing rewards to merit: It is temperate admitting no exceſſes but of love: It is prudent, having eyes alwayes upon its deportments: It is witty, to find out a thouſand inventions: It is violent without eagerneſſe, active without participation, ſage without coldneſſe, good without remiſſneſſe, and calm without idleneſſe.

Qualities of divine love by which we may know whether it inhabit a ſoul.

But I muſt tell you, though its perfections be without number, you ſhall chiefly know it by three qualities, which will make it appear unto you, plyant, obliging, and patient.

Three principall marks of love.

I ſay plyant; for there is nothing but fires, deſires, ſweetneſſe, affections, joyes, admirations, extaſies, pleaſures, tranſportments for its well-beloved. This is the State, which the great Origen figureth unto us of S. Mary Magdalen, when he ſaith, that by the ſtrength of love ſhe was dead to all the objects of the world. She had her thoughts ſo employed upon her Jeſus, that ſhe was almoſt inſenſible; ſhe had eyes and ſaw not, ears and heard not, ſenſes and felt not; ſhe was not where ſhe was: for ſhe was wholly where her Maſter was, although ſhe knew not where he was. She knew no other art but that of love, ſhe had unlearnt to fear, to hope, to rejoyce, to be ſad; all in her turned to love, by reaſon of him whom ſhe loved above all: The Angels who deſcended from heaven to comfort her, were to her troubleſome, nor could ſhe endure them ſhe ſtood upright near the ſepulchre, where in the place of death ſhe found her heaven.

Plyantneſs.

Orig. Hom. de Magdal.

Now as in efficacious plyantneſſes are flowers of love which never bring forth any fruit; ſo, it takes a ſecond quality, which is, to be liberall, and much obliging: For this cauſe the hands of the bridegroome (according to the Canticles (are all of gold, and round; to ſhew there is not any thing crooked, or rough to ſtay his gifts: beſides, they are all filled with pretious ſtones, to figure his benefits unto us; Jacinths, and Diamonds which he ſcattereth, and beſtoweth as liberally, as the ſand of the ſea. The Hebrew ſaith, that the ſame hands are veſſels of gold repleniſhed with the ſea becauſe love is an Ocean of liberalities, which is never exhauſted.

Liberality.

Cant. 5. 14 Manus ejus tornatiles, aureæ, plenæ Hyacinthis, (alia verſio) Globi aurei pleni mari.

There remains nothing but to be patient, which it doth with ſo much grace, that one may ſay, its yoke hath wings, not weight. The heart of it, oft-times is invironed with thorns, and it ſweareth they are roſes. It ſwims in a ſea of worm-wood and ſaith it is ſweet water: It is covered all over with wounds, and proteſteth they are Pearls, and Rubies; It is overwhelmed with affairs, and maintains they are recreations; It is ſurcharged with maladies, and they are ſports; with calumnies, and they are bleſſings; with death, and that is life,

Patience. Pennas habet, non pondus. Ailredus

Theſe three qualities cauſe twelve very notable effects in love, which are, To love God above all, and, in compariſon of him to deſpiſe all. To account ones ſelf unhappy, if but a very moment diverted from his ſweet Ideas. To do all that may be, and to endure all things impoſſible to come near him. To embelliſh, and adorn our ſoul to pleaſe him. To be alwayes corporally preſent with him, as in the Sacrament; or ſpiritually, as in prayer. To love all which is for him, and to hate all which is not for him. To deſire that he may be declared, confeſſed, praiſed and adored by all the world. To entertein all the moſt ſublime thoughts (that is poſſible) of his dear perſon. To paſſe over with ſweetneſſe all the acerbities ſuffered in his ſervice. To accommodate ones ſelf to all his motions, and to receive both ſad and joyfull things with his countenance. To languiſh perpetually with the deſires to behold him face to face; and laſtly, To ſerve him without anxiety, or expectation of reward.

Twelve effects of love

Theſe things being ſo ſublime; we muſt not preſume to arrive thither at the firſt daſh. It is very fit to file, and continually to poliſh our ſoul by long ſervices and goodly actions, to arrive in the end at the happy accompliſhment of love. For this cauſe there are reckoned certain degrees by which the ſoul is led to the pallace of this triumphant Monarch.

There is a love, as yet but young, which doth onely begin, and hath five degrees, within the compaſſe whereof, it dilates it ſelf to paſſe to a much greater perfection. It beginneth firſt by the taſte of the word of God, and the ſweetneſſe it feels by the reading of good books, which is a ſign that a ſoul already hath an arrow of true love in the heart. This taſte maketh a man take good reſolutions for the amendment of his manners, and order of his life: this reſolution is followed by a happy penance which bewaileth all the imperfections of the life paſt with a bitter diſtaſte, and a fit ſatisfaction. By this way, we proceed to the love of a neighbour, and a beginning is made by a tender compaſſion of his afflictions, and a rejoycing at his proſperities: Laſtly, or addicts himſelf much, to many very laudable good works, and to the holy exerciſes of mercy. Behold here a moſt ſincere condition, and to be wiſhed in many men of honour, who may therein perſiſt with great conſtancy.

The ſecond order comprehendeth thoſe which are yet more ſtrong, and it conteineth five other degrees. Firſt, they are very aſſiduous in prayer, wherein they are much enlightned with the knowledge of verities, and celeſtiall maximes. Secondly, they obtain an excellent purity of conſcience, which they cleanſe and poliſh by an enquiry into their interiour; holily curious, and perfectly diſpoſed. Thirdly, they feel the exteriour man much weakned by a generous mortification, wherewith concupiſcence is quailed. Fourthly, followeth the vigour of the inward man, who finds him ſelf happily enabled to all the functions of the ſpirit, with a certain facility which becometh as it were naturall to him. Fifthly, appeareth a great obſervance of the law of God, which maketh him apprehend the leaſt atomes of ſin, through a notable fidelity with which he deſires to ſerve his maſter. In this rank are many good religious who lead a life moſt accompliſhed in devotion, and in the continuall mortification of ſenſes.

Three orders of true lovers of the World.

Laſtly, in the third order of perfect lovers, are the great effects of perfect charity, as is, not to have any humane and naturall conſiderations in all ones actions; but to tread under foot all reſpect of fleſh and bloud, to defend truth: Not to ſtick to earth by any root; but to account all things worſe then a dunghill, to gain Jeſus Chriſt: to run before the Croſſe, and to bear the greateſt adverſities with a generous patience: to love ones enemies: to do good to perſecutours; and in concluſion, freely to expoſe ones life for the ſalvation of a neighbour. To ſay truly, they had need to be perſons moſt heroick, to go ſo far; and there is no doubt, but this is the full accompliſhment of love.

Notwithſtanding, nine degrees alſo are added of Seraphick love, which concern Contemplatives; which are, The ſolitude of a heart throughly purified from all the forms of Creatures: Silence in a ſublime tranquillity of paſſions: Suſpenſion, which is a mean degree between Angell and man: Inſeparability, which adhereth to its welbeloved for an eternity, not admitting the leaſt diſunion: Inſatiability, which never is ſatiated with love: Indefatigability, which endureth all labours without wearineſſe: Languour, which cauſeth the ſoul to diſſolve and melt on the heart of its beloved: Extaſie, which cauſeth a deſtitution of the vegetative and ſenſitive ſoul, totally to actuate the intellectuall. Deiformity, which is a degree approching ting near to beatifick love. Then is there made in the soul a deluge of mysterious and adorable love, which drowneth all humane thoughts, which swalloweth all earthly affections, which flieth to the superiour region of man, which hideth all that is eminent in sciences, transcendent in virtue, great in imagination, and which causeth the spirit to forget it self, and to look on nothing but heaven.

Nine degrees of Seraphicall love for the contemplative.

§. 12. The Practise of Divine Love.

THE love of God is a science inspired, not studied, nowhere the infusion of the Holy Ghost is more eloquent then all Tongues, and more learned then all Pens. That which comes to us by art, oft-times begins very late, and quickly endeth. That which is given us by the favour of heaven, comes very readily, and never is lost. Those who think to learn the love of God by precepts onely, croak like Ravens, and have nothing solid: such as have it by grace are Angels, who are raised into the highest region, and poize themselves on their wings. Grave discourses, and good books fail not to contribute much to this purpose, as we lately may have tried by the treatise which the R. F. Stephen Binet hath published, fully replenished with the holy ardours of extraordinary devotion, and which seem to have been dictated by love it self, and conceived in that fire, which Jesus came to enkindle on earth, to enflame the whole world.

Τὰ θεῖα σὺν θεῷ δεῖ μανθάνειν παρὰ θεοῦ. &c. Pindarus.

The means to acquire the love of God.

If then you desire to profit in this love, let your endeavour be continually to beg it of God with the most fervent prayers which the holy Ghost shall suggest, to esteem it above all worldly things, and to apply all your actions to this happy conquest.

Be ye very carefull to cut off from your heart all impediments which may give it any obstacle; for if you should imagine to entertain it in a soul sullied with terrestriall affections; it were to ask a most precious Balm, to put it in an unclean vessel. We have as many Idolls in our heart, as passions, opposite to the law of God.

Quot vitia habemus, tot recentes habemus Deos, Hieron.

Be not satisfied with taking away vices, but stifle the remembrance of worldly things, which may in you occasion any exorbitancy. Withdraw your mind as much as you can from a thousand imaginations, which fly as aiery spirits about your heart when it begins to take wings to its repose. Perplex not your self likewise, more then is reason, with affairs both spirituall and temporall, which cause a thousand cares to arise, and onely serve to quench the vigour of devotion, and to draw out the juice of piety. Fly acerbities of heart, apprehensions, and servitudes, accustoming your self to do all with a spirit of sweetnesse, and holy liberty.

The practise of the love of God.

Consequently make a practise of the love of God, undertaking it with a resolute purpose, a great application of mind, and employing all possible industries to profit therein, as one would in affecting some great bargain, some very considerable office, or affair, most important. For it is a very unworthy thing to behold all despicable Trades full of artisans, who kill themselves to find out inventions that may set forth the profession, and that onely the occupation of the love of God, should have workmen so lazy, and unnaturall.

How we may learn to love God, above the love of the world.

After all, following the counsel of S. Augustine, consider what the children of darknesse often do to prosper in worldly loves and amities. They strive to insinuate themselves by some good office; they consider on every side the person of him of whom they would be beloved, they study his nature, his inclinations, his desires, his affairs, and they oblige him, ere he is aware, in what he desireth most. Are they entred into his amity? they persist in the practise of great assiduities; they have entertainments and admirable correspondencies; they delight, they serve, they mingle the recreative with the serious; They apply all they see, all they think upon, all they invent, all they hope, all they possesse, all they say, all they write, to the contentment of this creature. They draw tribute out of all for it, and, if it be possible, will give it its hearts-wish in all things: They transform themselves into its humours and likings: They espouse its loves, enmities, quarrels, and revenges: They publish its virtues, with discretion conceal its favours: they have tricks to pacifie its anger, to stir up its languours, to open its heart, to hold their possession, and if it be needfull, will passe through ten purgatories of fire, ice, tears, bloud, torrents, seas, enflamed serpents, gnawing vultures, to arrive at one of its pretentions. O reproch, that all this is done for a frivolous worldly love, which oftentimes is the Hangman of life, the gulf of Reason, the Hell of souls; and that there is none but Jesus, for whom they will not so much ss stir a finger!

Jahonestos amatores ostendite, si quis amore furenti lasciviens vestit se aliter quàm amatus, placet. Augustin. To. de verbis Apost.

Make a resolution to insinuate your self into his friendship by some notable Act, which you know to be acceptable to him, and which he already hath required of you by so many inspirations. Enter into his house, and into his bosome: render him assiduity in your prayers, your meditations, your communions, and in all your exercises of devotion. Learn to speak to him every hour by jaculatory prayers, as one would to some friend tenderly loved, and vehemently affected. Referre all creatures to his love, and love nothing but him, but in him, but for him: publish his greatnesse every where, make a thousand instruments of his glory: but conceal his favours by a profound humility. Behold men your like, as his images; Engrave all his words, all his actions, all his wounds in the bottome of your heart; make your selves like him, as much as you may; bear him on your flesh, suffering for him, not onely with patience, but alacrity, through a desire of conformity. Behold the principall means by which one may come to the love of God, and to the unitive way.

Observe there withall the three Conditions which S. Bernard prescribeth, to wit to love sweetly, prudently, strongly: sweetly without violence; prudently without illusion; strongly without separation.

That we learn to love God himself, and by the character of his substance which is Jesus.

But there being nothing which more forcibly moveth the soul, then Example; I advise you, often to present unto your self the love of God and Jesus Christ, which should be the source of ours; and. to make a sacred posy to your self of all the lovers who were most vehement in Divine Love.

In medio animalium splendor ignis, & de igne fulgur egrediens. Ezekiel 1.

Reflect (O Christian soul) upon the chariot of Cherubins in Ezechiel, and thou shalt learn what God would have of thee. I see (saith the Prophet) a clear and bright fire in the midst of these living Creatures, and from this fire I see lightning flashes to issue forth. This is the fire of the love of God, and these lightnings are the eruptions he made, by communicating himself to man. Consider (O soul redeemed with the bloud of the sonne of God) that thou canst not live without love; on what side soever thou turnest, thou necessarily must love; and God, foreseeing this necessity, would that thou loves like him, that thou take the object of his love for the object of thine own, his manner of loving, for thine, his scope and contentment, for thine. And where thinkest thou hath God the heavenly Father placed his love from all eternity, but in himself? Because he alone is worthy to be originally beloved as the source and fountain-head of all beauties, and bounties, which are the two baits of affections, excessively; as he who hath neither end nor beginning; He loves himself by his holy Spirit, which is his own substance, and he loves himself necessarily, because love is his Essence. O soul! if thou couldest a little lift up thine eyes surcharged with so many terrestriall humours, and behold in the bosome of the heavenly Father the eternall Fire-brand which he gives for a rule of thy love; what secrets, and what mysteries of love wouldst thou learn? there mightest thou observe the four conditions which constitute all the excellency of love, to wit, Purity, Simplicity, Fervour, and Communication.

First, thou must learn to purifie thy love, this love being most pure and excellent, for it is God himself, produced in the bosome of God: it is the first of Sanctities, holy by origin, by object, by example, and by form; It is the holy Ghost burning in the heart of the eternall Father. S. Thomas teacheth us a very singular piece of Theology in the Treatise he wrote of charity, where he saith, every thing placed in another is measured and adapted to that which receiveth it, as water, which is round, in a round vessell, and square, in a square vessell. For, if the thing received be lesser then that which received it; it by this reception gets a state of excellency, and a Title of worth above its Nature: so, (saith he) the visible species are ennobled in our eyes, and the Intelligible, in our understanding. This admitted; I say, that if we onely consider the love of God, in that manner as we do in men, as drawn from exteriour objects; yet would it be a matter of a marvellous value to be received into the heart of God, and to be conform to the Divinity: but when Divinity telleth us, that this love produced of God, is the substance of God received in God himself, and inseparable from his essence; what greatnesse, and, what purity must we conceive in this love of God? and if he will that this same love (which is all his) should be not onely the object, but the efficient cause of ours by the infusions he worketh in our hearts; O how much shame ought we to have, so to defile our love with contaminations and impurities of the earth?

Secondly, you must know, this love is most simple, and totally as well in this unity as in the Essence of God, and althongh he love creatures, as the tokens and footsteps of his bounty, which are in kinds so manifold, in multitude so innumerable; yet is he not devided, nor severed, because he gathers all those creatures together in his bosome, where their beginning and end is and therein uniteth them, as rayes of his benignity contracted and drawn together into one Centre in a burning-glasse: Thereupon thou shouldst be sorry to see thy heart torn, and divided by so many objects which divert thy affections, and hinder thee from simply giving them to God, for whom they are made.

Thirdly, thou must understand, this love is most ardent, since the bosome of the eternall father is as a great Fornace which with its flames enkindleth all the chaste loves that burn, whether they be in heaven, in the heart of Angels, or whether on earth, in the souls of the elect. Ah! how much oughtst thou to blush, and to be ashamed, considering, how, in stead of enkindling thy love with the sacred fires of this eternall fornace, thou hast sought to beg a profane fire from the eyes of a wretched woman, which hath burnt thee to the bones, thou hast gone (door after door) to all sorts of creatures, opening thy heart to forraign flames, whereby thou hast gone about to burn even the sacrifice of the living God? Ah? Thou insensible creature, knowest thou not that Nadab and Abihu, for putting ordinary fire into their Incensories, when they came to the Altar of the Synagogue, were devoured, as unfortunate victimes, with the proper coles of their own sacrifices? and dost thou think it will be lawfull for thee to approach the Altar of the eternall Testament with this forraign love which thou lodgest in thy heart? Art not thou afraid to hear those thundring words, This Sacrifice shall be a punishment to thee, since thou hast made a fume of thy propitiation!

Lastly, (faithfull soul) thou shouldst know the love of God is most communicative, for it is streamed forth in his eternall productions by two emanations, of understanding, and will; as by two Conduit-pipes of Glories, and beauties. And not content with this, this eternall communication being involved in a profound obscurity unknown to all creatures; he hath cleft the cloud in five places, and is come to communicate himself to the world by five admirable wayes of his magnificence, which are Creation, Conservation, the Incarnation of the word, Justification, and Exaltation of the soul to beatitude. O! how thou shouldest be confounded hereupon to see thy heart so narrow, and streightned in the exercise of good works?

Look back again upon thy second modell, and attentively consider; how Jesus the pattern of all chaste amities loved his eternall Father; and on earth rendered him that honourable tribute of love, which could not well have been payed to a God so justly loved, but by a loving God, and who did, with so much perfection, love. Jesus alone passed with an incomparable eminency those nine degrees, whereof we spake before, which are as nine spheres of love. This most blessed soul, which had an exact knowledge of all the excellencies of increated beauty, loved him according to its science, equalling his fervours to its lights. It first of all entred into the solitude of love, which made a little fortunate Island of the heart, wherein there was nothing but God, and It: God, who was in it with eternall contentments: It, which was in God, with reciprocall and wholly ineffable affections. This heart of Jesus resembled the Halcions nest, which cannot hold one silly fly more then the bird it self: So he knew not how to lodge one creature in himself to the prejudice of the Creatour, but could tell how to lodge them altogether, to unite them to their Head. O it was properly his businesse to give us this lesson, which he afterward dictated by one of his Oracles. He loveth thee not enough, whosoever loveth any thing with thee which he loveth not for thee. From solitude he entred into the silence which Synesius calleth Beatifick Silence, and which S. John placeth in heaven in the peacefull condition of the Blessed: It was properly the calm, and repose, which the holy soul of Jesus took with his heavenly Father in his divine Orisons which he many times continued the space of whole nights, watching, and weeping for us, and dwelling as it were in the fire of love. It is that silence which the Canticle calleth the Bed of Solomon, encompassed with threescore valiant ones, but of that great Host of Angels. From silence he passed to the suspension whereof Job speaketh, where his soul felt it self totally pulled up by the root from earth, but not (as yet) placed in heaven, because he was corporally in this transitory life. We, (verily) find three admirable suspensions in Nature; That, of water in the clouds; of Heaven, above the clouds; and of earth, under the clouds: and two ineffable suspensions in the Humanity of Jesus: The first is that of his blessed soul, which was alwaies hanging at the heart of God, and the second of his body on the Crosse, to purifie by his death all the regions of the world, both above, and beneath: above, by the exhalation of his spirit; beneath, by the effusion of his bloud. After suspension, he mounted to insatiability, which caused him, that, drinking those eternall sources by long draughts in the delights of Contemplation which streams upon him from heaven, he slaked his thirst in his own bosome, not quite quenching it, therein retaining the condition of those who see God: of whom it is said, That they are still replenished,

yet

Ezechiel. serm. 26. Sumes de sacrificio pœnam, quia fecisti de propitiatione peccatum.

S. Thom. opusc. 61. De Dilectione, omne receptum est in recipiente per modum recipientis.

The love of Jesus towards his heavenly Father.

Charitas Dei diffusa est in cordibus nostris per spiritum sanctum. Rom. 5. 8.

Augustin. Soliloq. Minus te amat qui tecum aliquid amat quod propter te non amat. Apoc. 8.

Mentis genuit mentem, & in se suum reflexit amorem. ita explicat S. Thom. 1. part. q. 27.

Fornacem custodiens in operibus ardoris. Eccl. 43. 5.

Cantic. 5.

Job. 7. 15. Elegit suspendium anima mea.

Levit 10.

Damian. Cardi. in Hymno de Paradiso. Avidi, & semper pleni quod habent, desiderant.

yet still greedy, incessantly desiring what they possesse.

From insatiability he came to the degree of Indefatigability, which caused him perpetually to spend himself in most glorious labours for the redemption of the world: measuring, and running over the earth, as the sun doth Heaven, and sowing vertues and benefits every where, to reap nought but Ingratitude. From thence he proceeded to that Inseparability which tied him for the love of his heavenly Father, not onely to the punishment of the Crosse, but to so many scorns and miseries as he embraced for us; and he made so much account of this mortall flesh which he took of us, that he associated it unto himself with an eternall band, and hath transmitted it into the bosome of Immortality, placing his wounds (which were the characters of his love, and of our inhumanity) even in the sanctuary of the most blessed Trinity. From this Inseparability, he suffered himself to slide into languours, extasies, and transanimations, which make up a Deified love, such as was that of Jesus. Languour dried him up with the zeal he had for our salvation exhausting all the strength of his body, and (to speak with Philo) he seemed as if he would have transformed his flesh into the nature of his spirit, causing it to melt and dissolve under the ardours of ineffable affection, as we see a Myrrhe-Tree which distilleth the first fruits of its liquour under the lustre of the sun-beams. Extasie, which bare this great soul with a vigorous violence to the heart of God, made a truce in all the actions of sensitive nature: and as it happeneth that the Ocean extraordinarily swelling up upon one shore, forsaketh the other: So the spirit of our Saviour already divinized, amassing together the whole multitude of his forces, to serve his love and satisfie the passion he had towards his celestiall Father, overflowed in the heart of the Divinity, with so immeasurable a profusion, that all his inferiour Nature seemed to be forsaken, and despoiled of the presence, and government of his soul.

Mark 3.21.

In the end he entred into that transanimation which so powerfully united him to God, that onely retaining the property of two natures, Divine and Humane; he made an incomparable commixtion of heart, of love, of affections, and conformities; which made Origen say, This soul, like unto Iron which is on burning Coles, was alwayes in the word, alwayes in wisdome, ever in God, and took an immutable constancy from the ardour wherewith it is enkindled in the union of God.

Orig. 2. περὶ ἀρχῶν Anima illa quasi ferrum in igne, semper in verbo, semper in sapientia, semper in Deo, in convertibilitatem ex verbi Dei unitate indesinenter ignita possidebat.

If you find this love too sublime for you; behold it as it were tempered, and reflected, in so many saints, as were S. Paul, S. Augustine, S. Bernard and so many other.

§. 13. A notable Example of worldly love changed into divine Charity.

I Will give you a very familiar one, in a man of the world, a man of the Court, and one who is at this present a treasure hidden from many, who was hated by the envious, persecuted by the proud, condemned by the Ignorant, and yet a great servant of God. It is the learned, and pious Raymundus Lullus, as it appeareth by his life faithfully written in the Tome of the lives of the Western Fathers. This man flourished above three hundred years ago, and was born in the Island of Majorica of a notable extraction, which gave him passage into worldly honours, and caused him to be bread in the Court of his King, by whom he afterward was made one of his prime Officers. Never was there a man more inclining to love, for he loved transportedly, and spent all his youth in this vanity, having no employment more acceptable then to write amourous verses, to expresse his passion. In the end he fell into the snare of a violent affection that long turmoiled him, which was the love of an honourable Lady endowed with an invincible chastity. Here ordinarily, love which delights to pursue what it cannot arrive unto, finds most admiration for the eyes, and food for its flame.

Vita Patrum Occid. l. 6. Ex Carolo Bovillo.

He was so on fire in this quest, that he thought he should lose his wits, suffering himself to fall into unbeseeming and extraordinary actions, so farre as being one day on horse-back, and seeing this his well-beloved to go into a Church to do her devotions, he spurred hard, and in such manner entred into the holy place, not minding Church, Priest, Altars, or Sacraments; He had no eyes but for this creature, before whom he delighted to manage his horse with his usuall grace: But instantly a lowd clamour was raised by the people, who thrust him out of the Church, and handled him like a mad-man.

The Lady was so much displeased, and ashamed at his exorbitant importunities, that she resolved to cure his love by a stratagem, which she could not vanquish by flight. She called this passionate amorist to her (by her husbands permission) and having shewed him the wrong he did to her reputation so to resign himself over to such a grosse indiscretion, as also the disasters he might draw on his own person; she bared her neck, and discovered her bosome all eaten by a maligne Cancer, which at first caused some aversion in him: but, the more to fortifie the act, the Lady thereunto added prevalent words, reproching him with simplicity to imploy so many hours to seek after an unhappy lothsomenesse, and take away his love from God, to conferre it on a Creature, who so little deserved it.

Poor Raymond was astonished at this speech, dividing his soul between the horrour of this ulcer, and the admiration of the wisdome of the virtuous woman, when instantly this cancer of the body cured that of the mind. He in a moment found himself to be changed, as if all his passion had expected this period of sinne, and as if on a sudden his soul had been freed from a charm: He could not wonder enough at his frenzy passed. He deplored the losse of so much time, he put forward for the future, to consecrate the remainder of his dayes to penance. It seemed to him he perpetually heard the voyce of the Crucifix, which said unto him, Raymond follow me: and his heart burnt with a generous flame to augment the number of so many good servants of so worthy a Master. He would not by halves perform so important a businesse: he disposed of his whole estate for the benefit of the poor, and threw himself all naked between the arms of the Crosse. Behold how it importeth to begin the great work of the love of God by some remarkable Act, and to give ones self freely to him, who hath not for us spared his own sonne! Thence he retired into a little Hermitage, where attending to prayer, fasts, and contemplations, he was so illuminated, that being before unlearned in any science, but in that of worldly love, he became as knowing as the greatest Doctours; yet still austere as the most rigorous Hermits.

All this is observed in Blaquerna's book.

His love towards God began, first by great tenderness, and continuall familiarity, adoring this most pure spirit throughout the great Theatre of nature. If he looked on the rising sun; he out of Extasie sung, and said, From the chaste bosome of the morning went forth the desire of eternall mountains, wherein there are no more blemishes then there is darkness in the Sun: If he considered the sea, he took occasion to enter into the secret abysses of the judgements of God, wherein he remained wholly absorpt. If he cast his eye on the fields, so many flowers as he there observed, were many little eyes of his well-beloved: If he heard a bird sing; in his conceit it spake to him of the love of his incomparable lover, and he used to say, there was a certain language of love which he understood in all creatures: If he saw a butterfly flying, and a little child running after it; he thereon frames sublime meditations of the Philosophy of love. His solitude seemed to him all environed with Intelligencies, and when any one came to interrupt him and blamed him for being alone; Nothing lesse (answered he:) I was in good company, but found my self alone after your coming.

He was so transported, that he walked throughout the streets chanting the praises of his Jesus, and when some who knew him, while he was in high place, demanded of him, whether he had lost his wits? verily you are in the right (replyed he) my well-beloved hath taken away my will, and I have given him my understanding; there is nothing left me but memory to remember him. He many times caused his eyes and memory to dispute touching the possession of his Divine love, to see who might vaunt the most right; His eyes said, sight surpassed all: but memory answered, remembrance was much stronger, because it made water mount into the eyes, and fire into the heart. One while he caused his understanding and will to run after this his dear spouse; and he found the understanding was the more able, but the will better held what it embraced. He was many times seen to be in such a manner, that being ready to sleep, he bitterly with scalding tears wailed that he in sleep had forgotten his Creatour, having then no power over his dreams, nor thoughts. His passion became so violent, when he to himself presented the state of this world, wherein we are separated from the sight of God, that he thereby fell into fainting fits, and was sick of it almost to the death. A Physician, on a time visiting him in these fits, and throughly understanding his grief, held much troublesome and tedious discourse with him, after which he said, this man had cured him, for that he had made him suffer throughly, and that taking this punishment patiently for Gods sake he thereby was infinitely comforted. He commonly said love was a Tree, the fruit whereof was To love, and that tribulations, and languours were the flowers, and leaves of it? the proof whereof daily appeared in the motions of his soul, wherein he felt most sensible afflictions, when he within himself reflected on the contempt was done to his crucified love.

One day he had a revelation, that of a thousand there were not a hundred who had any fear, or but an indifferent affection for their Saviour; and that of those hundred, ninety feared him out of their apprehension of the torments of Hell; and that of those ninety, there were not two who loved him for the hope of heaven; and that of a thousand, scarcely could one be found who loved him for his goodness his nobleness, and his worth: whereat he powred forth so many tears, that he was not to be comforted. He was often heard to groan, and sigh in the open fields, as if he had lyen in an irksome prison, and had sought to break his setters; when, being in these agitations, he came to a fountain-side, where lay an Hermit asleep, whom he awakned and asked if he could tell how one might get out of prison? The other, who was a man of God, understood him, and replyed, he was in the same prison that he was, as well sleeping, as waking; but it was a prison of love, where his desires, his thoughts, his hopes, his joyes were chains: upon which, he fell into an extasie of holy comfort, to have found a man so conform to his humour; and both of them wept so much out of love, over this fountain, that they seemed to go about to raise those streams by their tears. If he wrote a letter, he imagined love gave him the pen, and that he dipped it in his tears, and that the paper was all over filled with instruments of the passion, and that he sent his thoughts and sighs, as Courriers, to seek out the well-beloved of his heart. When he saw an Epistle, or a letter wherein the name of Jesus was not practised; it sensibly tormented him, saying, Sarazins had more devotion for Mahomet a man of sin, setting his name in the front of all their letters, then Christians had for their Redeemer.

A holy occasion one day drew him to a Church to hear excellent musick: but he perceiving the words were of God, and the tune according to the world; he could not forbear to cry out aloud, Cease profane men. Cease to cast pearls into mire. Impure airs are not fit for the King of virgins. Some took delight to ask him many questions, and he answered them nothing, but the word, love; which he had perpetually in his mouth. To whom belongest thou? To love: whence comest thou? from love: whither goest thou? To love: who begat thee? Love: Of what dost thou live? upon love: where dwellest thou? In love. He accounted them unworthy to live, who died of any other death, then of love: and beholding a sick-man in an agony, who shewed no feeling of joy to go unto God, but onely complained of his pain; he lamented him as a man most miserable. At his entrance into a great Citie, he asked who were the friends of God, and a poor man being shewed him, who continually wept for the love of heaven, and heavenly things; he instantly ranne to him, and embracing him, they mingled their tears together with unspeakable joy.

God often visited him by many lights, and most sweet consolations, as it happened at that time when he thought he saw a huge cloud between his Beloved and him, which hindred and much troubled him; but presently it seemed to him, that love put it self between them both, and gilded the cloud with great and admirable splendours, in such sort that through this radiant beauty he saw a ray of the face of his well-beloved, and for a long space spake to him with profusions of heart, and admirations not to be expressed.

From this obsequious love, he passed to obliging love, and made a strong resolution to become profitable to all the world.

For which purpose, feeling every moment to be replenished with sublime and divine thoughts which God had communicated to him, and that he had no insight in Grammer, nor other slight school-notions; he resolved to learn the Latine tongue, being now full fourty years old. He hit upon a teacher one Master Thomas who taught him words, conjugations, and concords; but he rendred him back again elate conceptions, unheard of discourses, and harmonies wholly celestiall; so much honouring his Master, that he dedicated the most part of his books to him, wherein for the dead letter, he offered unto him the spirit of life. Not satisfied with this, he added the Arabick tongue, of purpose to convert the Mahumetans: and for this end he bought a slave, for whom having no other employment but to teach him it, and he having therein already well profited, and endeavouring to convert this wretched servant, who had been his teacher; the other found him so knowing and eloquent, that he had an apprehension that through this industry he was able to confound the Mahumetan-law, which was the cause that the Traitour, espying his opportunity, took a knife, and sought to kill his Master; but he stopt the blow, and onely received a wound which proved not mortall. All the house ran at the noise, and there was not any one, who would not have knocked down the ungratefull creature: but he hindered it with all his might, and heartily pardoned him in the greatest sharpnesse of his dolours. Instantly the officers seized on this compassion, and put him into prison, where he was strangled, repenting himself of nothing but that he had not finished his mischief; which caused extreme sorrow in Raymond, who bewailed him with many tender tears of compassion.

the

After this, he undertook divers journies into France, Spain, Italy, Greece, and Africk, wandring continually over the world, and not ceasing to preach, write, and teach, to advance the salvation of his neighbours. Paris many times received him with all courtesie in such sort, that the Chancellour Bertand, who was infinitely affected to knowledges, permitted him to reade them publickly in his hall.

The reverend Charter-house Monks, whose houses have so often been sanctuaries for Learning and Devotion, were his hosts, and so much he confided in their integrity and sincerity, that he with them deposed all which he had most precious. The love of God, which is as lightning in a cloud still striving to break forth, suffered him not to rest, but disposed him to undertake somewhat for the glory of God.

It is true, he had first of all that purpose which afterwards our father S. Ignatius so gloriously accomplished: for he was desirous to make Seminaries of learned and courageous spirits who should spread themselves throughout the world to preach the Gospel, and to sacrifice themselves for the propagation of Faith.

For this cause, he multiplied his voyages to Rome, to Lions, to Paris, to Avignon, incessantly solliciting Popes and Kings to so excellent a work, without successe. He used fervour and zeal therein, but our father thereunto contributed more order and prudence: The one undertook it in a crosse time, during the passage of the holy See from Rome to Avignon, where the Popes more thought upon their own preservation then tha conquests of Christianity: The other knew how to take occasion by the fore-lock, and he interessed Rome, and the Popes thereof, in his design. The one made his first triall under Pope Boniface the Eighth, who having dispossessed a Hermite of S. Peters Chair, held those for suspected who were of the same profession, fearing they a second time might make a head of the Church. The other happened upon Paul the Third, who was a benign Pope, and he gained his good opinion by his ready services and submissions, which tended to nothing but the humility of Jesus Christ. The one embroiled himself too much in Sciences, even unto curiosity, and made them walk like Ladies and Mistresses: the other held them as faithfull servants of the Crosse, subjected to holy Humility.

The one stood too much upon his own wit, and needs would beat out wayes not hitherto printed with any foot-steps, nor conferred enough with the Doctours of his times in matters of Opinion and Concord: the other passed through the surges of Universities, and followed an ordinary trackt in the progression of his studies. The one was of a humour very haughty, the other of a spirit facil and sweet. The one took the golden branch with violence, the other gathered it gently, as if the Providence of God had put it into his hands. Now Raymond, not satisfied with seminaries of students, embraced the conquest of the Holy Land, and stirred up many cities of Italy in this matter, exhorting them to make contributions; wherein he was so perswasive, that the city of Pisa alone, which is none of the greatest, furnished him with devotists, who made of one sole free gift twenty five thousand crowns, which he would by no means handle, leaving it to the dispose of the Pope, who would not give ear to the erection of new Colledges; so much were the affairs of the Papacy embroiled. He more easily obtained one thing, which was one of his three wishes, to wit, the suppression of the books of Averroes (an enemy to Christianity), which many with too much curiosity read in the Schools of Philosophy. God many times grants good dispositions to his servants, whereof he will not they have the accomplishment, making them appear more eminent in sufferings then actions. This great man was of the number of those; for he made himself most remarkable in the love of suffering, wandring over the world in extreme poverty, great incommodities of heat, cold, nakednesse, hunger, scorns, contempts, dolours, banishments, dangers, both by sea and land, shipwracks, treasons, chains, prisons, and a thousand images of death.

One day, travelling alone through a huge forrest, he met two lions, which caused some little fear of death in him, as he witnesseth in his writings, desirous to live, that he might yet on earth serve his well-beloved: but in this great surprisall he had a thought, that love would put it self into the midst of this passage, and make him endure death with the more contentment: herewith he comforted himself, and the lions drew near and licked his face bathed in tears of Devotion, and kissed his feet and hands, doing him no harm. Men were more sharp and discourteous to him, who ceased not to drag him before Tribunals, to charge him with calumnies for his extraordinary wayes, to give sentence against him; but in all he appealed to his well-beloved who never forlook him.

Seeing himself destitute of all succour for the conversion of Sarazens, he passed alone into the kingdome of Thunes, where he freely disputed with the chief of the Mahometans, concerning the greatnesse and excellency of our Faith, against the impostures of Mahomet; which was the cause that he was immediately cast into prison, and condemned by the King himself to have his head cut off: to which he disposed himself with an incomparable fervour of love. At which time, one of the prime men of State in the countrey, who had conceived well of him, out of the admiration of his wit, perswaded the King to be satisfied with banishing him out of his kingdome, and that by this way, he should do all he was obliged unto for the preservation of his own law, and should get the reputation of a mild Prince among Christians, abstaining from the bloud of such a man; which he did: but he was thrust out of Thunes with so many blows and ignominies, that he therein gained a noble participation in the Crosse of Jesus Christ. The fervour which incessantly boiled in his veins suffered him not to be long at rest. He went into the kingdome of Bugia, as Jonas into Nineveh, crying out aloud through the streets, that there was in the world but one Religion, and that was ours; and that the law of Mahomet was a meer imposture and a fantasie. He was instantly laid hands on, as a madman, and lead to the high Priest named Alguassin, who asked him, whether he knew not the Laws of the countrey, which forbad him upon pain of death to speak against Mahometisme. To which he answered, he could not be ignorant of it, but that a man who knew the truth of Christian Religion, as he did, could do no other but seal it with his blood. This Alguassin proud of science, perceiving him to be a man of a good wit, entred farther into discourse with him, where he found himself shamefully gravelled; which made him forsake the Syllogismes of the School, to have recourse to the arguments of tyrants, which are arms and violence: for he caused him to be presently taken as an Emissary Goat, there being not any Mahometan hand so little which delighted not to hale and leade him with blows, untill they brought him into the most hideous prison, which was rather a retreat then a gaol, where he endured a thousand miseries with an unshaken constancy. The Genowayes, his good friends, who traffick in these parts, moved with his affliction, got with good round summes of money, a more reasonable prison for him, where he began again to dispute with the most learned of the sect, and made himself to be so much admired by those his adversaries, that they endeavoured to gain him to their Religion, promising him wife, family, honours, and riches, as much as he could wish: but he mocked at all their machinations, and seeing them fervent to dispute, he persisted therein with great strength of reason and courage. They said, words were lost in the air, but they must take the pen in hand and write on both sides, with which he was infinitely pleased; and spent nights and dayes in prison to compose a great volumn for defence of our Religion. But the King of Bugea coming into his capitall city, dissipated all these counsels, much fearing the touch of his Law, which was gold of a base allay, and caused him the second time to come out of prison. From thence he sought to get something in Greece, passing over into Cyprus, where he disputed against the Nestorians and Jacobites, who rendred him poison for the honey of his discourses, whereof he was like to die, had he not been preserved by divine Providence, and the assistance of a good Angel. The blessed man had already passed forty years in a thousand toils and crosses, and spared not to suffer, by reason of the flames of love which burnt his heart; but he knew not whether he suffered or no, so much he took to heart the cup which God had mingled for him. Verily, our Lord appearing one day unto him, and asking him if he well knew what love was, of which he so many years had made profession? he very excellently answered, If I do not well know what Love is, I at least well understand what Patience is: meaning, that it was to suffer, since nothing troubled him for the satisfaction he had in Gods causes. And another time being asked whether he had Patience? he said, All pleased him, and that he had no cause of impatience, which onely belongs to them who keep the possession of their own will. Lastly, being about fourscore years of age, he considered within himself what he said afterwards, that love was a sea full tempests and storms, where a port was not to be hoped for, but with the losse of himself, and that its depth was his exaltation. He went back again into the kingdome of Sarazens in Africk, where being known, he was suddenly stoned to death in a popular commotion, and buried under a great heap of stones, in which place his body long remained unknown to all the world: but it pleased God, that certain merchants, his countrey-men, sailing into that countrey, saw in the night a Pyramis of fire to rise up over his tomb, which caused a curiosity in them to see what it was, and coming to dig into it, they found this venerable old man who was so gloriously buried in his own triumph; they brought him back into his own countrey, where he is all this time reverenced out of an antient Devotion of the people, which the holy See permitteth rather by way of toleration, then expresse Canonization.

hideous

The second Treatise, Of HATRED.

§ 1. Its Essence, Degrees, and Differences.

Hatred a hideous Comet.

WHat a Comet is among stars, Hatred is among virtues. It is a passion maligne, cold, pernicious, deadly, which ever broodeth some egge of the serpent, out of which it produceth infinite disastres. It is not content to vent its poison in certain places and times, but it hateth to the worlds end, yea, as farre as eternity. To set before your eyes the havock it maketh in a soul; it is necessary to understand it in all the degrees and dimensions thereof. For which purpose you shall observe, that Hatred being properly an hostility of the appetite against those things which it apprehendeth to be contrary to its contentment; It hath some similitude with Choler, but there is much difference, as between pieces engraven, and painted, which may easily be defaced. Choler is more sudden, more particular, more ardent, and more easie to be cured: Hatred, more radicall; more generall, more extended, more sad, and more remediesse. It hath two notable properties, whereof, the one consisteth in aversion and flight, the other in persecution and dammage. There is a Hatred of aversion, which is satisfied to flie from all that is contrary to it. There is another Enmity, which pursueth and avengeth, and tends to the destruction of all whatsoever. The first property hateth the evill; the second, wisheth it to the authour of the evill, and when it hath once possessed a black soul, it maketh terrible progressions, and is especially augmented by four very considerable degrees.

Its nature.

Its properties.

Its degrees.

First, it beginneth in certain subjects by a simple aversion, and a hatred of humour, which is the cause we have an horrour at all those things that oppose naturall harmony, which appears as well in the good constitution of body, as in the correspondencies of senses, and the faculties of the soul with their objects. And although this contrariety be not alwayes evident enough unto us; yet there is some feeling which in the beginning maketh us many times to have an aversion from some person whom we never saw, and from whom we have never received the least suspicion of affront or dammage: Be it out of some disproportion of body, of speech, of behaviour, or whether it be there is some secret disaccord; we often hate, not well knowing the cause thereof, which very easily happeneth to the femall sex. For, women being full of imaginations; the vivacity of fancy furnisheth them with infinite many species of conveniences and inconveniences that cause a diversity of humours which very seldome make a good harmony; but if they do, it is ever easie enough to be disturbed.

There are loves and hatreds which cannot be put on and put off, as easily as a man would do a shirt; which teacheth us it is very hard to make one to love by command, as if we went about to introduce love by cannon-shots. The first degree of Hatred is properly called Antipathy, and is so generall in nature that it passeth into things inanimate, and into bruit beasts, which are no sooner born, but they exercise their enmities and warre in the world. A little chicken, which yet drags her shell after her, hath no horrour at a horse, nor at an elephant, which would seem so terrible creatures to those that know not their qualities; but it already feareth the kite, and doth no sooner espy him, but it hasteneth to be hidden under the wings of the hen. Drums made of sheep-skins crack (as it is said) if another ther be strucken near them, made of a wolfs hide; and such as are made of the skin of a camel scare horses. The lion is troubled at the crowing of a cock; Cabbages and herb-grace cannot endure each others neighbour-hood, such enmity they have; and a thousand other such like things are observed in nature, wherein there are such expresse and irreconciliable hatreds.

The natural antipathies.

Jo. B. Por. in Chiro.

If man, who should moderate his passions by reason, suffers himself to run into Antipathies and naturall aversions, and doth not represse them by virtue; it falleth out they increase, and are enflamed out of interest, contempt, slander, ill manners, outrages, offences, or out of simple imaginations of offence, which then causeth a second degree of hatred, which is a humane hatred, consented to with deliberation; which putteth it self into the field to exercise its hostilities: here, by injuries; there, by wrangling; here, by forgery; there, by violence, and by all the wayes which passion inventeth to do hurt by. Abject courages hate with a cold and cloudy hatred which they long hatch in their hearts through impotency of vindicative strength. The haughty and proud do it with noise, accompanied with disdains, affronts, and insolency. All they who love themselves tenderly perpetually swarm in hatreds and aversions, seeing themselves countre-buffed and crossed in a thousand objects which they passionately affect. All the most violent hatreds come out of love; and namely, when lovers, the most passionate, see themselves to be despised; despair of amity transporteth them to a outrageous hatred, finding they have afforded love the most precious thing that is in our dispose, to receive scorn.

Humane hatred.

Its differences.

Hatred of love.

There are likewise who, without receiving any injury, begin to hate out of weariesomnesse in love, and coming to know the defects of such as they had the most ardently loved; they take revenge upon the abuse of their own judgement, by the evill disposition of their own will, and do as those people who burnt the Gods they had adored. Whether hatred arises out of a weary love, or whether it proceeds from an irritated love; it is ever to be feared: and there are not any worse aversions in the world, then those which come from the sources of amity. Quintillian also hath observed, That the Hatreds of neighbours are enmities irrecoverable, and wounds which never are cured, because bands woven by flesh, blood and bowels, cannot be untied, but by making a rupture remediless.

Quintil. decl. 17. Non habent proximorum odia regressum: quæcunque nexus accepere naturæ & quæ sanguine viscéribúsque constructa sunt, non laxantur ducta, sed pereunt.

Out of this second degree, oft-times a melancholick Hatred sprouteth, which the Grecians call manhating, which is an Hatred bred in feeble, black, ugly, and ulcerated souls in the world, who, to be revenged of their mishaps, extend (as it were) their aversions over Totall Nature. You see men pale, meagre, hidrous, who being unable to endure a reasonable yoke which God hath put about their necks, or finding themselves to be disfavoured in their ambitions, endeavours, and pretentions; steal out of all amities, out of all companies, hiding themselves, not in those glorious Hermitages of Religion, where heavenly souls are; but in shamefull solitudes, where they busie themselves to feed on gall, and gnaw some heart in imagination, since they have not been able to transfix it with iron. Others grow up like poisons with the tongue of a serpent, which is ever in action; They have a Phthisick of spirit that gnaws, burns, and consumeth them; so that they have no other profession in their life, but to blame all which is done, becoming like unto those ill presaging night-birds which cast forth boading scrietches in the dead time of night, as if they envied us darknesse and the sweetnesse of repose. Such was the disease of Diocletian and Tyberius, when they retired from the Court to hide themselves in solitary places, as serpents among thorns. Lastly, this Hatred ever fomented, if it fall upon men powerfull and factious; it maketh tyrants of them who passe to the degree of brutishnesse and execrable Barbarisme, which causeth some to eat hearts stark raw, others to disentomb the dead, and to exercise cruelty on those who have nothing common with the living: Others, to invent torments never seen, heard, nor imagined; others, to make themselves goblets of the heads of their enemies, therein, still to drink revenge, as often as they do wine, as did Alboinus a monster worthy of the horrour and execration of all men. See here somewhat near the essence, qualities, division, causes, and effects of hatred.

Melancholy hatred.

Man hatred

Plin. l. 18. cap. 1. Homines quidam ut venena nascuntur: aiunt ceu serpentium lingua vibrat: tabésq; animi contracta adurit, culpantium omnia, ac dirarum alitum modo tenebris quoque suis & ipsarum noctium quieti invidentium.

§ 2. That the consideration of the goodnesse of the heart of God should dry up the root of the Hatred of a neighbour.

LEt us now dazle the eyes of this fury by the contemplation of the goodnesse of our celestiall Father, who is the prime model whereon we ought to reform the exorbitancy of our passions.

Let us learn from him to hate nothing, or, if we must hate at all; let us enter into the participation of a hatred fit to rest in the heart of God. The sovereign Creatour hates not any thing in the world; for, he made in all the world, and as his wisdome is free from errour, so his works are void of repentance. Whence is it (think you) that Antipathies are to be found in Creatures? But that, their essence being limitted to certain conditions and particular qualities, they commonly meet with other objects of natures quite contrary to that wherewith themselves are endowed; which causeth countre-buffs and resistance in encounters. But if a creature might be found which eminently had all the qualities and perfections that are observed throughout the whole latitude of essences, and which had thereof made a good temperature within it self; it would not hate any body, but rather within it self accord all contrarieties.

Diligis enim omnia quæ sunt, & nihil odisti eorum quæ fecisti, nec enim odiens aliquid quod constituisti aut fecisti. Sap. 11. 25.

Now, that which we cannot give to creatures piecemeal, no not in our * imagination, God possesseth in grosse from all eternity. For within a most simple essence, and one sole form of Divinity, he involveth all essences, all forms and perfections of creatures, which in him are exalted and deified: which is the cause he hated nothing that he made, he despiseth nothing, he accounts nothing unworthy the care of his Providence, even to the least worm of the earth. He is not like those nice and curious men who are distasted with all that is not for them. As he is all, he loveth all, and communicateth himself to all creatures according to their disposition.

*Simplicity of Divine Essence exempt from Antipathy.

O God! what say we, when we speak of the † Essence of God? All things are in God, the same form of the Divinity which makes him great; maketh him by the same means, good, wise, just, and all he is by his proper Essence. The great Divine S. Gregory, surnamed the Divine, saith, It is onely in him to comprehend in his bosome all the Essences whereof he is the source of Origin. And S. Zeno addeth, That he alone is before all things, because all things are contained in his hands; he of himself is what he is, and there is none but he who knoweth himself in all the dimensions of the perfection which science may have. All the Attributes of God make in him but one perfection; all creatures which are in the heavens, the air, on the earth, and in the sea, are but one Essence. He united all in himself and for this he loveth all, and regardeth all things created, as rayes of his light, and tokens of his bounty. Hemlock, aconite, and aſpicks, and ſo many other miſchiefs in nature, are evils but in appearance, and benefits in ſubſtance, as S. Auguſtine very pertinently diſcourſeth. There is not ſo much as poiſon in the ſcorpion which is not good; although it be not good for us, it is ſo much a good for the ſcorpion, that take away his poiſon, you take away his life. It is the diſproportion of our nature, it is ſinne, which hath in us changed ſo many excellent bleſſings into great miſchiefs, and which daily maketh us to hate and curſe them: but God hateth nothing, nor curſeth any thing, but what he is not, and he is all, except ſinne: It is that alone which he eſteemeth worthy of the hatred of his heart, which he chaſtiſeth, and which he with an armed hand purſueth to the gates of hell, and beyond the gates of hell. He preſſeth continually upon ſin, he convinceth it, he fights againſt it, with no other arms then his Juſtice and Sanctity, which is an eternal rule that looketh round about on every ſide, condemneth and cenſureth the works of darkneſſe. For as in things artificiall, all the perfection of works conſiſt in the conformity they have with the rule of the art which made them, and all their imperfection proceedeth from their receſſe from the ſame rule, which without ſpeech or motion declareth the defects of manufactures that depart from its direction: ſo all the good, and all the beauty of moral actions is, in the correſpondence they hold with Reaſon, and the eternall Law: As all their deformity and miſhap, comes from their departure from this ſame law, which is, the Juſtice, the Holineſſe, and Eſſence of God himſelf, who perpetually ſtands in oppoſition againſt iniquity. It is it, which he drenched in the waters of the deluge, which he burnt in the aſhes of Sodom, which he ſwallowed in the gulf of Core, Dathan, and Abiram, which he tormented by the plagues of Pharaoh, which he gnawed by worms in the perſon of Herod, which he conſumed by ordure and ſtenches in Antiochus, which he puniſhed with gibbets and tormenting wheels in ſo many offenders, which he ſtill tortureth to all eternity, ſunk down into the abyſſe of the damned; and it is out of which he produceth his glory, whence he raiſeth his trophies, and makes his triumphs to be by Eſſence, and Nature, a perpetuall enemy, and a deſtroyer of ſinne. O magnificent hatred! O glorious enemy! O triumphant perſecution!

† Omnia unum sunt in Deo, & cum Deo, nec enim aliunde justus aut sapiens quam unde magnus & bonus, nec aliunde deniq; simul hæc omnia est, quam unde Deus. Bern. ser. 8. in Cant. ὅλον γὰρ ἐν ἑαυτῷ συλλαβὼν ὧν ἐχρῆν τὸ εἶναι. S. Greg. Orat Natal. S. Zeno ser. 1 de gener. verbi. Solus ante omnia, quoniam in ejus manu inclusa sunt omnia, ex se est, quod est solus sui conscius.

and

Auguſt. de moribus Manich.

Onely ſinne hated by God.

Let us enter with God into this community of glory, let us hate ſinne (as he doth) by him, and for him; let us deſtroy it in our ſelves by penance, let us deſtroy it out of our ſelves by our good examples, let us deſtroy it by a good reſolution, ſince Jeſus hath deſtroyed it with ſo much pain and bloud. How can we love ſuch a monſter, but by hating God? And how can we hate God, but by making our ſelves worſe then devils? For if they hate him, they hate an avenging God, a puniſhing God. And we will hate a God that ſeeks us, a loving God, and hate him after ſo many execrable puniſhments of ſinne which we nave before our eyes; and hate him after he hath offered himſelf up for us in the great ſacrifice of love and patience. Is not this intollerable? We will employ ſome part of our life to revenge an injury, and to hate a man as if we had too much of it to hate ſinne: we make a ſhew to honour the Maſter, and wee kill his ſervants; we make profeſſion to adore the Creatour, and we tear his images aſunder. Where are we, and what do we; when we make a divorce between our likes to diſunite our ſelves from the firſt Unity, which draweth all to it ſelf by union?

§ 3. That Jeſus grounded all the greateſt Myſteries of our Religion upon Union, to cure Hatred.

LEt us alſo contemplate our ſecond model, let us behold our Jeſus, and we ſhall learn, that all the greateſt myſteries of his life and death, are myſteries of Union, to unite us to him, to unite us to his Father, to unite us to our ſelves with ſacred and indiſſoluble bands.

First, all creatures of this great Univerſe were made by the Word, in the Unity of Beginning. He ſpake to us by his Sonne, whom he hath eſtabliſhed the heir of the whole univerſe, by whom likewiſe he created the worlds. Secondly, all the parts of this great All were ſo ſtreightly tyed one to the other, that they never have ſuffered the leaſt diſunion, and although many ſeem to have antipathy, and reciprocally to purſue each other; yet they will not be ſeparated, but joyn together in a manner ſo adherent, that he who ſhould go about to diſunite one Element from another, all theſe great pieces of the world would infinitely ſtrive beyond their quality to repleniſh its place worthily, and to leave nothing void.

Heb. 1. 2. Locutus eſt nobis in Filio, quem conſtituit hæredem univerſorum, per quem fecit & ſecula.

And it is a wonder, that from the beginning of the world, all things are held together by this Divine Tie. Concord, which in its union cauſeth the happineſſe of the world, and thoſe ſacred influences of love, hath woven eternall chains to tie indiſſolubly all the parts of the univerſe. All this great body reſembleth the ſtone Scyrus, which floateth on the water while it is whole, and ſinks into the bottome ſo ſoon as it is broken. This is the cauſe why all creatures have from all times conſpired, and do ſtill daily conſpire with inviolable inclinations in the maintenance of this concord, that the celeſtiall and elementary world may ſubſiſt in a ſtate unchangeable. There is none but Angel, and Man in the intellectuall world, who have made falſe accords, and have begun to ſow diviſion, the one in Heaven, the other in the terreſtriall Paradiſe. He who placed it in heaven, is baniſhed into the abyſſe without recovery; the other is ſuccoured by a Redeemer, who came to reſtore the loſt world, and he in Saint John profeſſeth, he aimed at nothing but Unity to make this reparation.

Æterno complectitur omnia nexu. Tot rerum miſtique ſalus concordia mundi. Lucan l. 4. Plin. l. 36. cap. 17.

Joh. 17. 21. Ut omnes unum ſint, ſicut tu Pater in me, & ego in te.

For this cauſe (ſaith S. Maximus) he united himſelf to humane Nature, not by a ſimple union of will, of love, and of correſpondence, but by the ineffable knot of Hypoſtaticall union, conjoyning two Natures in one ſole Perſon, and by making a communication of all he is, to his humane Nature, tranſplanted into the Divine. For this, he likewiſe doth daily unite himſelf to us in the Sacrament of the Altar, a true Sacrament of Love, where, if we will ſpeak with S. Cyril, we ſay, that God is diſſolved into us, as one piece of wax melted and poured together with another, and if we will reaſon with S. John Chryſoſtome, we ſay, He giveth us his virginall fleſh, as a moſt ſacred Leaven to ſeaſon the whole maſſe of Humane nature: It is that, which in us ſhould work that virtue, which the great Areopagite calleth a Conformity of affections and manners, drawing near to Divinity: It is that which giveth the name of peace to the holy Euchariſt, with S. Cyprian, and that which ſo united the Chriſtians in the Primitive Church, that they went from this myſterious Table, as from a banquet of Love, after which they breathed nothing but moſt pure flames of perfect amity, whereat the Pagans who ſaw them, cryed out, See how they love one another! Behold, how ready they are to die one for another! as we have ſaid.

S. Max. ſecunda cent. 146. 147.

Κατὰ πάντα ἑαυτῷ κατὰ τῷ σῶμα. Cyril. in Johan.

Chryſ. hom. 46. in Johan Ἀναλύει τὸ σῶμα ἐκεῖνο ἐφ' ἡμᾶς ἑαυτὸ καὶ ὁμοίους ἡμᾶς ἑαυτῷ ποιεῖ.

Cyp. ep 10. 29. 30. Dare pacem lapſis.

Vide ut invicem ſe diligant, vide ut pro alterutro mori ſint parati. Tertul. in Apol.

And yet thou (O man) wilt play the hobgobling, hate a man, and hate him in cold bloud, yea, hate him deterdeterminately, and hate him irreconcileably. Seeſt thou not that, remaining in this diſpoſition of a divel, thou doſt thruſt as much as thou canſt the knife of diviſion into the boſome of God banding againſt unity in contempt of the firſt of unities? Seeſt thou not, thou ſinneſt againſt the Incarnation of the word, the chief Sacrament of union which thou profaneſt; Againſt the ſacrament of the Euchariſt dreadfull to Angels, which our Saviour inſtituted to unite us as grains of Corn are united in the Hoaſt which ſerveth as a baſis to this Myſtery, and thou wilt fruſtrate the counſels of Jeſus, deſpiſe the bloud wherewith thou wert regenerated, ſeparate thy ſelf from the body, from whence thou canſt not be divided, but by making thy ſelf a companion for devils? Senſleſſe man! by what God, by what Sacrament wilt thou ſwear, after thou haſt profaned (not out of ſudden choler, but by premeditated hatred) the God of peace, and the Father of unions? What a life of an Owl is it to reſolve to live perpetually without ſeeing ſuch a perſon, and to be reconciled unto him, and to be ſatisfied with onely ſaying he wiſhed him no ill, becauſe he will not tear his heart out of his belly? Noble and illuſtrious ſouls, who bear the character of the living God; will you not riſe up againſt this life of a Tyger and a Leopard, to enter into the ſweetneſſes, and communications of Jeſus, who ſhut up his tranſitory life by ſealing with his bloud the pardon he gave to his enemies?

§ 4. Of three notable ſources of hatred, and of politick remedies proper for its cure.

WE peradventure take too high a flight in Theologicall proofs, I will deſcend lower, and touch remedies more ſecular for ſuch as are in the practiſe of humane life. You ſhal obſerve, that it is moſt expedient to know the ſources of Hatred, to apply fit remedies; and ſince thoſe moſt ordinarily bear ſway, proceed from Humour, Reaſon, and Intereſt; it is good to adapt to every paſſion, that, which is moſt proper to the cure thereof.

Hatreds of humour, and how they are to be handled.

Hatreds of Humour and naturall Antipathy are very hard to be cured in thoſe who guide themſelves by the ſenſes: the beſt remedy is to adviſe them to ſeparation who hate in this manner, ſo much as affairs, occaſions, and civill reaſons may permit: For, as there be certain natures which cannot endure the preſence of ſome creatures but that they feel ſome notable alteration (witneſſe thoſe who are affrighted being ſhut up in a chamber with a Cat which they are ſenſible of before they ſee her, by inſtantly changing hue and countenance; and others who are terrified at a ſpider, or ſome other venemous creature: ſo, there are ſpirits ſo contrary that mutuall preſence cauſeth diſturbances in them, which are not abſolutely in their power to repreſſe.

Suidas. Attila fears Zercon.

Attila, the ſcourge of the world, who made the whole earth to tremble under the lightning of his arms, feared not any thing in all nature, but the ſole countenance of Zercon, wherewith he was ſo moved, that he thereby became ungrateful. We muſt ſometimes in theſe matters give way to naturall inclinations, when they riſe to ſo great a violence. And I cannot approve of thoſe, who for worldly wealths ſake marry ſuch together as have as much correſpondence as the ape & the tortoiſe, who naturally hate one another. And although they perſwade themſelves that theſe averſions of humour wil waſte with time; yet this happeneth but to thoſe who are infinitely virtuous. But, if vice and profit become parties in the buſineſſe; then do we ſee hatreds irreconciliably ariſe between man and wife. S. Bernardine, in his fourth Tome, ſix and thirtieth Sermon, ſpeaketh of a marriage made by ſurpriſall, for the accommodation of a family, without any diſpoſition of the parties; which was the cauſe, that a very handſome young-man was made to marry a maid with many deformities of body, palliated with many impoſtures; ſo that ſhe appeared as thoſe birds who having no body, make themſelves a pompous dreſſe of their plumage. But above all, they had given her chopins, which might of a dwarf have made a Coloſſus. But at night ſhe laying off all thoſe her trims, and artificiall leaves, the husband took ſuch an averſion, that he flew out of the nuptiall bed, and could never endure her; becauſe he was a young-man, and did not reſolve to love ſo much out of charity, but that he would call his eyes to councell. Here divorce began as ſoon as marriage; wherein it was more happy, then in thoſe, who after many years of miſeries, madneſſe, tragedies, and ſins, come in the end to ſeparation. That which is obſerved in ill-ordered marriages, is likewiſe ſeen among many brothers and ſiſters, who are full of contrarieties, which begin almoſt with their birth; and when theſe cannot eaſily be overcome, parents do not amiſſe to ſeparate them, and breed them in ſundry houſes, that continuall preſence may not encreaſe enmity.

Porra Imaginatur. S. Bernard. tom. 4. ſer. 6 An obſervation of S. Bernardin concerning bad marriage.

Do we not ſee it is an induſtry in nature to interpoſe great rivers, ſeas, and mountains, almoſt inacceſſible between people, who are of humour, manners, and cuſtomes extremely different? Following which principle, I do not think we ſhould continually urge with eagerneſſe a ſick man to ſee thoſe againſt whom he hath (as it were) an invincible antipathy, but rather to be contented with other teſtimonies, by which he declares, he entertaineth no deliberate hatred. I ſay this with regard to neceſſity, and humane infirmities. For it is moſt certain, that a ſoul truly Chriſtian ſhould advance its actions to the higheſt top of Generoſity.

Inhabitable lupus cum agno, & decubabit infans ubi vbere ſuper foramine aſpidis.

And although, (to ſpeak humanely) we ſeldome find Orpheuſes who with their Harp do accord creatures very different; yet is the grace of the Goſpel able to make wolves to cohabit with lambs, and children to ſport in the cavern of an Aſpick.

Reaſonable Hatred and its illuſion.

As for Hatred upon reaſon, which cauſeth one to hate evil and the wicked, out of zeal or indignation; It is much more nice; and ſometimes there are ſpirituall perſons who infinitely flatter themſelves therein, thinking they have reaſon to hate, although they have no other ground but a falſe report, and a lye, whereof they will not be cured, thinking to do that through zeal, which they act out of meer revenge. There is no doubt but one may, and ought to hate vice and the vitious; yet muſt he ever in them love the image of God, and the reſembrance of humane nature, which is that perfect Hatred whereof the Kingly Prophet ſpake, according to S. Auguſtine. But we meeting not with vices, which, like Platoes Ideas, are not tyed to perſons; it is dangerous, leſt, ſeeking to pull them away, we be more paſſionate againſt the party who hath them, then againſt all the moſt abominable iniquities. We muſt not believe our ſelves, when there is queſtion of ſome important puniſhment, nor ſuch as are born to flatter our likings with too much ſervitude; but thoſe Angels for our counſellours, if it be poſſible, who are diſintangled from the matter of Intereſts. There are ſome who uſe to fortifie themſelves in their reſolutions by the deportments of thoſe who are held for Saints in the Church, and do readily alledge the examples of David, who being upon his death-bed, recommended to his ſon Solomon the puniſhment of Joab and Shimei. But, we muſt here conſider that David is not a man impeceable to ſerve as a pattern for all our actions, and that it is ever better to conſecrate our dying lips with the words our Saviour ſpake a thouſand years after, on the croſſe, then with thoſe he left in this inſtant, as a Teſtament to his ſon. The Jews had naturally great inclinations to revenge, and many sought to perswade themselves, it was by their laws permitted: which is the cause this great King was not so perfectly free from all the seeds of Hatred in the whole course of his life. But, forasmuch as concerneth this last will of his, one may excuse him for divers reasons, nor can it be denyed an act of justice to put Joab to death, who had defiled his hands with the bloud of two innocent Princes; but it is strange, that David reserved this so rough a punishment for him after fourty years of great and singular services, when he was about threescore and ten years old. Yet Theodoret brings a reason of state for it, wherein he sheweth, that Joab, being in himself a great Captain, was withall, daring in his manners, and tyrannicall in his undertakings, and had already made it but too much appear, that he meant to embroil the state after the death of his Master, and to set Adonijah upon the throne, to the prejudice of Salomon: which was the cause that David, who sought fixedly to establish the Kingdome upon his lawfull successour, councelled him to take him away by a just punishment of other crimes which he had committed. And as for Shimei, who had surcharged him with injuries and curses, when, after ward he returned victorious into Hierusalem, he came before him, and craving pardon of his fault with lowly submission which stayed David, and made him swear he should not dye for it, which seemeth to convince him of perjury, when he commanded his son Solomon to kill him. I cannot approve Tostatus his distinction, who saith, When persons, very different in the qualities of their rights treat together, that he who hath justice on his side, may promise things with an intention not to perform them, as the other meaneth them. For verily the permission of this manner of captious proceedings, would throw a distrust upon all treaties. But it is easie to see that David, in this occasion, beholding himself to be accomplished with joy and glory, when Shimei came to cast himself at his feet, and that Abishai counselled him instantly to put him to death, he swore he should not dy, and that the alacrity of a day so pleasing should not be purpled with humane bloud: so that he had no further purpose, but to assure Shimei for the time present, and to promise him impunity in this conjunction of Kingdome and affairs: but when he saw this spirit was insolent, and like also to occasion trouble in the young King, he did not absolutely command (as Cajetan observeth) to put him to death for what was past, which had been pardoned; but not to spare him in new occasions of commotion: as actually Solomon (following the intentions of the King his father) troubled him not upon his slanders; but upon another occurrent. Now although one may always give colour to the Hatred which is undertaken upon consideration, and that it be sometimes necessary for the exturpation of the wicked; yet must we more incline to clemency, then justice, in all which concerneth our selves.

Perfecto odio oderam illos. Pſal. 138.

Queſtion upon the act of David.

Theodoret. in c. 2. l. 3. Regum citatus in Glossa.

Hatred of intereſt,

For Hatreds of Interest, which concern estates and honour, they many times in these dayes are incurable, if they be not accompanied with some reasonable satisfaction. It is a thing very remarkable, that our Saviour who accordeth elements, and pacifieth totall Nature, would not undertake the agreement of two brothers upon the partition of their patrimony. Nay, there are some now-a-dayes so greedy and fleshed in prey, that for a fingers breadth of land they would oppose Jesus Christ, if he should visibly come to mediate their reconciliation: After a thousand reasons which may be alledged for peace, and good correspondence, they derive but one conclusion out of it, which is, to have their will. For which cause, God chastiseth them, and very often permitteth dissipation of goods, ruine of families, and many other accidents which stain their consciences, and tarnish their reputation. As on the contraty; he blesseth the children of peace, who forgo somewhat of their interest to acquire this inestimable treasure. It is almost as hard to preserve charity in a great suit, as to maintain fire in the water, or under earth to keep inextinguible lamps. He who will persist with a conscience indifferently Christian, must never descend into suits but with a leaden pace, and come out of them with the wings of an Eagle. Suits are as the sons of Chaos and night, there is nothing in them but confusion and darknesse. It is a mixture of all evils, which hath the heat of fire, the threats, the roaring thunders, and tempests of the air, the rocks of the sea, the talons of birds of rapine, and ravenous throat of fishes, the gall of serpents, the fury of salvage beasts, and the malignity of poysons. Before it, ever walketh the desire of anothers goods; by its side, deceit, revenge, injustice, falshood, and treachery: after it, repentance, poverty, shame, and infamy. As war is made for peace, so we sometimes undertake suits for justice; and those are honest men, who desire it: but they who at this present do it with all sincerity, are the greatest Saints of this age, who seem to be given by God to mortifie civil hatreds, and to establish minds in concord.

Luc. 12. 14.

Suits, their nature and description.

After suits, Hatred brings forth another mischief, which is Duel, a true Sacrifice of Moloch, which hath cost France so much bloud, mothers and wives so many tears, which filleth families with sorrow, friends with grief, ages with horrour, and hearts the most reasonable, with the detestation of such a Crime.

Duell.

The edicts of our most Christian King (which have had more force then all other) have served instead of a Jasper-stone to stanch bloud: But never would a remedy absolutely efficacious be had therein, were it not that the King (who is the true Arbiter of honour, and distributer of glories) did not pour a strong influence of his spirit upon the Marshals of France, those great Captains, and all the brave men who wield a sword: by which, he lively and powerfully perswadeth the whole nobility, that this opinion conceived of the valour of those who fight Duels is a mere illusion, since it may be common to lackies, and to the most abject conditions. Besides, there is need of a strong and speedy military justice to accord differences of men of war, and to chastise so many petty insolencies which seem to arise from nought, but to put affronts on men of honour: Otherwise it is hard to perswade a sword-man to forbear revenge, seeing himself provoked by outrages, which would make him to live dishonoured (according to the world) in his profession. and as for these slight souldiers of Cadmus, whose fingers itch, and who ground Duels upon the wind of a word, to let the world know they are tyed to a sword; It were very good to send them into armies, and to recommend them to some prudent Captain who may put them into some good occasion to make triall of their courage, and to give information of them, that either their cowardise may be punished, or their valour approved. It seems to me that these proceedings being well observed, might be of power to stifle this fatall plague which hath caused so many mischiefs. For we must not wholly take away point of honour from the nobility, no more then from women. Now, as virtuous women account it not a point of honour to be faithfull to an Amorist, but to a husband: so it is not fit that reall gentlemen should think themselves valiant by the practise of a crime, but by the exercise of a virtue. As the first invention of Duels grew out of an opinion of point of honour: so must it dye by a true judgement of honour, which proceedeth not so much from Doctours, as Captaines. When the Gladiatours were in vogue, and that it was accounted a glorious thing to descend into the Amphitheatre to fight against men and beasts; all the world was inflamed therewith as with fury, and not so much as women but would be partakers.

Means to use an efficacious remedy in Duell.

and

This manner of massacres also hard away sometimes in the times of Christianity, untill the Emperour Honorius who buried them, after so many eloquent tongues had, to Princes and Magistrates, represented the horrour of those so barbarous actions: so we ought to hope, that the King, to whom God hath given the plenitude of so many and so admirable blessings, will cultivate the Palm which he already hath planted by his victory over Duels, and will cover under earth and forgetfulnesse this infamy of mankind. I satisfie my self with giving this advice; having treated on this subject in the second Tome of the Holy Court.

§ 5. Naturall, and Morall Remedies against this Passion.

IF you require remedies and instructions both Naturall and Morall against Hatred; Know that the Philosophers, who consider all according to the course of Nature, teach us that some have rebated and blunted the points of this cold and maligne Passion, one while by living with hot and moist viands, another while, by consideration of the joyes and prosperities which God hath given them in divers negotiations and accidents of affairs, thinking it not teasonable to employ the time in hatred, which was too short to enjoy the benignities of heaven. Others have cured themselves by conversation with good company, which is one of the sweeteſt charms of life: Others, by hope, and the desire they had to derive favour from the self-same party who had offended them; another while also, by a courteous interpretation of words and actions which had raised the same hatred: Lastly, by the change of those whom they hated before, seeing them rather to be raised in great innocency, or fallen into deep miseries, which made them derive from mercy that satisfaction they could not expect from revenge: But if they from nature have begged some comfort for their passion, and have not been frustrated of their attempt in the practise of the means; How much better helps have we, then they ever had, since that besides those naturall remedies, which are not alwayes certain, we have the grace and example of Jesus Christ.

Who loves himself overmuch hath no friend.

Will you efficaciously remedy Hatred? Learn not to love your self so passionately as you do: For that is the cause that you make of your self a little Idoll, and that the least word which seems to be let slip against you, many times, not of purpose, nor with intention, grieveth you, as if by displeasing your Chymeras, a Divinity were offended: That is the cause that you have burning and enraged desires towards money, and the frivolous honour of the world, so that one cannot touch you on this side, but he strikes the apple of your eye.

Agg. 1. Festinatis unusquisque in domum suam, propterea prohibiti sunt cœli ne darent rorem.

Learn, as a wholesome instruction, those words of the Prophet Aggeus. You have hastned to go into your own house with contempt of mine, for which cause I have stayed the clouds in the heavens from distilling down their dew upon the earth. So long as you love your self so much, you shall never have love nor friends. So long as you think upon nothing but to raise your house and fortune, on the ruines of the houses and fortunes of others, you shall be deprived of the dew of heaven, which is that Consolation of the just, which they find in charity.

Exercise of patience.

Secondly make account, to compose your self to a noble exercise of patience, which is to tolerate the defects and imperfections of your like; beholding them, not on the side where they do you wrong, but on that where they have connexion with God: and upon every offence you receive, say, This man is troublesome, but he is the image of God; He is violent, but it is he must crown my patience; He is vicious, but he is my flesh and bloud: Let us hate his vice, but love the man, although he deserve it not: Let us love him in the heart of God, since we cannot love him out of his own merit. S. John kissed the hand of an Apostate, and a Thief, covered all over with bloud, to oblige him, by whom he was traitorously disobliged; and I cannot shew the least token of amity towards one, who hath spoken one cold word to me. S. Katharine sucked away the matter and filth of the ulcer of an infamous slanderer, who had detracted her with all manner of virulence, after infinite many benefits; and I cannot endure so much as to see one who hath displeased me, as if I were created to live free from all worldly contrarieties. I, who commit so many sins; on the other part, will to slay do an act of virtue in honour of my Master, and in despite of passion. Let us go to heaven by love, since we cannot go thither by sufferings. This is the true gate by which we enter into the sanctuary eternally to enjoy the sight of the inaccessible beauties of the holy and regall Trinity.

Hæc est porta per quam quis ingreditur in Sanctum sanctorum, & inaccessæ pulchritudinis spectator dignus constituitur S. Max. de concent. l. 38.

Hear you not the God of peace who saith to us, If thou (O unhappy soul) wilt still persist in Hatred; I pronounce unto thee the six punishments of Cain, Banishment from the sight of God, fear, stupidity of mind, the life of a beast, the malediction of the earth, and (as Procopius addeth) persecuting Angels armed with swords of fire who shall pursue thee like spectres and spirits in all places, and shall make themselves visible, and dreadfull to thee at the last day of thy life? Behold here deservedly thy inheritance, since being mortall, thou makest thy enemies immortall, and dost still persecute the afflicted widow and her children, who are become orphans after the death of a husband and a father, whom thou hatest. The strongest enmities oft-times are appeased at the sight of a dead body and a tomb, which we find exemplified in Josephus: for, Alexander was extremely hated by the Jews as having reigned over them with a rod of Iron: But when death had closed up his eyes, and that the Queen his wife most sorrowfully presented her self, accompanied by two young children, and exposed the body of her husband, saying aloud (Sirs) I am not ignorant that my husband hath most unworthily used you; but see to what death hath brought him: if you be not satisfied; tear his body in pieces, and satisfie your own revenge: but, pardon a deplorable widow and her little innocent orphans who implore your mercy. The most salvage spirits were so softned by this act, that all their hatred turned into pity; yet you (Barbarian) still persist to hate a man after his death, to persecute him in a part of himself, to tear him in pieces in his living members. O good God, if you renounce not this revenge, you will be used like Cain, as an enemy of mankind, and a hang-man of Nature! O flame! O love! O God! As thou art dispersed throughout us by love; so banish all these cursed Hatreds of Hell, and make us love all in thy goodnesse, to possesse all in thy fruition.

Joseph. l. 3. c. 13. A notable example to appease hatred.

§ 6. Of the profit may be drawn from Hatred, and the course we must hold to be freed from the Danger of being Hated.

THere now remains to consider here, what profit may be derived from hatred, and with what Oeconomy it may be husbanded, to render it in some sort profitable: and in case it be hurtfull; to prevent its assaults, and sweeten its acerbities. If the industry of men found out the way to make preservatives out of the most dangerous poysons; why should it be impossible for us to make some notable utilities to arise out of a passion, which seems not to be created, but for the dammage and ruine of all things? yet it is certain, that Nature (which never is idle in its productions) hath given it us for a great good. For it may serve love well rectified in its pretentions, it furnisheth it with centinels, and light-horse, to hinder that which opposeth its inclination, and to ruine all contrarieties banded against its contentments. How often would Nature throw it self out of stupidity into uncertain dangers and most certain mischiefs, were it not that naturall averſion did awaken it, did avert it from its misery, and insensibly shew it the place of repose? Is it not a wholesome Hatred to hate Pride, Ryot, Ambition, and all ill Habits? Is it not a reasonable Hatred discreetly to fly from maladies, crosses, incommodities which hurt the body and nothing advantage the mind? This passion which in the beginning seemed so hideous teacheth us all this; When it is well managed it conspireth against others by an according Discord, to the lovely Harmony of totall Nature.

Utility of hatred.

One may say there is happinesse, and advantage to hate many things; but what profit can one find in passive Hatred, which makes a man many times to be hated, and ill wished without cause or any demerit?

That it is good to be honestly loved.

To that I answer with Saint Ambrose, that it is good to avoid such a kind of Hatred, that it is fit to make ones self to be beloved with all honour by good men, and to gain (as much as possible) the good opinion of all the world, thereby to render glory to God, as Rivers carry their tribute to the Ocean. A publick person who is in the employments, and commerce of the great world, may have all the treasures of the Indies, and all the dignities of old Rome, but if he have not the love and good-will of men, I account him most indigent and poor: Thence it is that confidence taketh beginning, without which there is no fortune maketh any notable progression, nor affair which can have such succesſe as might be expected.

Bonum est testimonium habere de multorum dilectione, hinc, nascitur fides, ut committere se tuo affectui non vereatur alienus, quem charum advertit pluribus. Ambr. l. 2. offic. c. 7.

Means to gain the good will of the publick.

It is infinitely profitable for great men, that they may divert the Hatred of the people, to have innocency of life, greatnesse without contempt of inferiours, revenues without injustice, riches without avarice, pleasures without ryot, liberty without tyranny, and splendour without rapine. All the rich who live in the society of men, as Pikes (called the tyrants of rivers) in the company of other fishes; to ruine, devour, and fatten themselves with the bloud of the commons, are ordinarily most odious: but as there is a certain fish, which Elians History calleth the Adonis of the Sea, because it liveth so innocently that it toucheth no living thing, strictly preserving peace with all the off-spring of the sea, which is the cause it is beloved, and courted as the true darling of waters: so we find in the world men of honour and estate, who came to eminent fortunes by pure and innocent wayes, wherein they demeaned themselves with much maturity, sweetnesse, and affability, which put them into the possession of the good opinion of all the world. But those who are hated ought diligently and carefully to consider from whence this hatred proceedeth, and by what wayes it is fomented; that fit remedies may thereunto be applyed.

Adonis an admirable fish. Ælian. l. 9. c. 16. de animal.

How hatred is to be diverted.

There is a hatred which cometh from equals, another from inferiours, a third from great ones, and sometimes from powerfull and subtile women, which is little to be feared. That which proceedeth from equals, lasteth long, by the counterpoise of power evenly balanced, and wasteth wretched hearts in the search after a cursed revenge, which drowneth pleasure in great acerbities, and many times, life, in bloud. We must instantly labour for reconciliation, by a just satisfaction of the offended party, or stand upon our guard, that the enemy may not prevail. The hatred of inferiours towards great ones, whilst it is spread amongst the confusions of the multitude, oft-times long remaineth under silence shut up, as the impetuous current of a River kept in by a trench; but so soon as it hath liberty, it with so much fury overfloweth, that it turneth men into Tygers and Leopards. So we see in Histories, many miserable Princes overwhelmed with the hatred of the people, with a thousand inventions of cruelties, which force compassion from the most obdurate.

All books are filled with these disastrous events: but I do not think, we can behold a more tragicall spectacle of popular hatred, then that which is represented by Nicetas in the person of Andronicus Emperour of Constantinople. He entred into the Empire like a Fox, by tyrannicall usurpation, and covered his crimes with a dumb shew of a sophisticate devotion, at which time (God the avenger of iniquities,) was pleased to chastise him with an iron rod, and to make him as an example of his justice to all posterity. He fell (alive) into the hands of his enemy, who having loaden him with injuries and contumelies, abandoned him to the people for the punishment of his perfidiousnesse. From that time he was entertained with all the despites which Hatred, and the liberty of doing all, permitted his enemies: For he had buffets redoubled one upon another given him with implacable violence, his hair was torn off, his beard was pulled away, his teeth were knocked out, and not so much as women but ran upon his wretched body to torture and torment it, whilest he replyed not a word. Some dayes after, his eyes being digged out, and his face disfigured with blows, they set him on an old botchy Cammel, without ought else to cover him then an old shirt, to lead him through publick places in the manner of a triumph. This spectacle so full of horrour nothing at all mollified the peoples hearts, but desperate men were to be seen to rush upon him on every side as thick, as in Autumne swarms of flies fleshed with some carrion; some covered him all over with dirt and filth, others squeezed spunges filled with ordure on his face, others gave him blows with clubs upon the head, others pricked him with Auls and Bodkins, and divers threw stones at him, calling him at every stroke Mad Dog. And there was a wicked woman of the dregs of the vulgar, who threw a pail of scalding hot water upon his head that his skin pild off. Lastly, they hastned to hang him on a gibbet by the feet, exposing him to a shamefull nakednesse in sight of all the world, and they tormented him to the last instant of death, at which time he received the favourable blow from a hand which thrust a sword through his mouth into his bowels, without other complaint then to beseech God to have mercy on him. Behold the most bloudy effects of this cruell Passion. But we may say, if this, of the people resemble torrents; that of great and powerfull ones is not unlike thunders and lightnings.

Horrible example of the hatred of the multitude.

Many Monarchs may be compared to the mountain Vesuvius near Naples which (as it is written) is so fertill, that it yieldeth unto those who manure it a million of gold in revenue; but when it comes to cast forth its all-enflamed entrails, it oft-times makes as much a havock in one day alone, as it brings profit in a whole Age. How many persons meet we in ancient and modern History, raised to flourishing estate, and enriched with the spoils of the Universe, who in a moment of misfortune have lost the honours and wealth, which in so many years of favours, they had with full hand amassed together in their houses?

Mountain of Vesuvius. Julius Recupitus.

But most especially, imperious women are ardent and exorbitant in their revenges, when a great power com-

Hatred of women.

combineth with Paſſion to repleniſh all with diſaſters. Hatred ſhewed it ſelf fierce and inſolent in Eudoxia againſt S. John Chryſoſtome, furious in Juſtina againſt S. Ambroſe, bitter in Theodora againſt Narſes, bloudy in Fredegonda againſt Pretextatus Archbiſhop of Roan, whom ſhe cauſed to be murthered at the Altar. And when this Hatred is enkindled with the flame of love it ſelf, and that they in their diſpoſe have the arms of their Amoriſts, and ſervants for execution of their purpoſes; they cauſe cruelties, which would make the Hiſtory of Man-haters, and Leſtrygons to bluſh.

Means to eſchue, and prevent the Hatred of powerfull men.

It is good, for prevention of this kind of Hatred, to have little occaſion to entermeddle with ſuch kind of people, nor too eagerly to purſue the favour of great ones, nor the pompous glories of worldly fortunes, ſince its felicities (like as if they were crimes) never ſcape ſcot-free. You muſt not enter too farre into the intrication of affairs and perſons: keep your ſelf from ſlanders, and miſchievous ſtrokes of the Tongue, ill offices and treaſons of ſuch as have no ſoul; to make your ſelf recommendable by Piety, Juſtice, Liberality, Moderation, Sweetneſſe, and ſo many other virtues; which having adorned you in proſperity, raiſe a luſtre and conſolation in the bottome of adverſity. To this alſo you muſt adde powerfull friends, who enlighten, with the ray of truth, that darkneſſe, which envie ceaſeth not to ſpread over lives the moſt innocent, and which permit not virtue to be ever oppreſſed by Iniquity.

As for ſuch as are in charges, offices, dignities, and commands, wherein in reaſon alteration may be expected, if they ſee themſelves to be perſecuted by publick hatred, it is beſt for them to change their condition to find repoſe: and eſpecially, when there are powers which will hate out of humour, or levity; and who ſhutting up all paſſages to Reaſon, do onely open an ear to ſlander. I ask whether, in ſuch a caſe, God hath not conſecrated a ſanctuary for evil fortune in the pitty of a neighbour? The Divine Providence never permitted, that one ſole man ſhould be King of the whole world. He who is perſecuted in one Province paſſeth to another, and often finds friends who wipe away his tears, and gild his fetters: Whileſt Hatred ſwayeth in the Conſiſtory of Cruelty, to draw down lightnings, and dart thunders on his head. Joſeph ſold by his brethren, found innumerable favours in Egypt. David purſued on all ſides by the envy of Saul, like a wild Beaſt, met with refuge, and employment under Abimelech. S. Athanaſius ſanctified the places of his baniſhment by the ſanctity of his virtues. S. Hillary pulled out of his Biſhoprick, lighted in Phrygia upon a ſilent repoſe, which gave him leave to write his learned books of the Trinity. S. Thomas of Canterbury reſted between the arms of France, whileſt Henry of England thundered ſentences, and proſcriptions of death againſt him. If one countrey become a ſtep-mother, another proves a Mother, and the Divine Providence (the worlds great Harbinger) ever findeth ſome petty work to entertain its elected.

But if there be no means to eſcape, and that ſervitudes muſt be undergone, priſons, and chains, and that ſcaffolds muſt be bloudied to ſatisfie the revenge of an enemy: Then is the time, when a ſpirit well habituated in the continuall exerciſes of virtue entreth into the centre of the ſoul; and beholdeth as from a high fortreſſe, the viciſſitude of humane things, which here below have in them nothing immovable, but their proper unſtedfaſtneſſe. Then it is, when deſpiſing theſe veils of body compoſed of our inferiour elements, it now entereth in thought into the region of Intelligencies; then it is, when it accoſteth the legions of ſo many Martyrs, who on their bodies have received as many wounds as they had members, and have moiſtned the ſacred palms of their victories in the effuſion of their bloud. All which is humane, yieldeth to the Tyranny of perſecutours, but the immortall ſpirit makes it ſelf a large way all bordered with lawrels in the Temple of glory, and reputation; and like to the dove of the Prophet (whoſe wings were of ſilver,) taketh a high, and exalted flight to declare to all ages the innocency of a great courage, and to make its relicks ſurvive in Cabinets, and in the memory of all good men.

How many have we ſeen die on Scaffolds, who with the ſweetneſſe of their countenances, terrified the moſt terrible aſpects of executioners? They ſpake, they did, they ſuffered, they ordered their deaths as matter of Triumph, they comforted others in their ſuffering at a time when they had much to do not to complain themſelves. They acted together all the parts of wiſdome, and came off ſo well in every one, as if they onely had undertaken this one. It was a great thing for them to do; but to do it ſo exactly, is that which for ever makes them the more admirable; and it was a matter incredible, that ſpeaking ſo well, they yet ſuffered better in an occaſion, where words have no credit, works no time, violence no relaxation, nor enmity Compaſſion.

The third Treatiſe, Of DESIRE.

§ 1. Whether we ſhould deſire any thing in the world? The Nature, the Diverſity, and deſcription of Deſire.

Whether it be good to have no deſire.

THe Sages make a queſtion, whether it be a thing to be wiſhed to have no Deſire? And there are of them who think that to live happy and contented, we muſt baniſh all deſires. For they are amuſements which perpetually entertain us with the time to come, which put us on the Rack, and burn us by our proper thoughts. Deſires are the Echoes of our loves, which mock us, and counterfeit certain voices, eſſences, and perſonages, which ordinarily are made of nought elſe but wind.

But now (ſay others) to have no deſires, is to have no ſoul, no ſenſe, no reaſon: it is to be a fly, not a man. The Seraphins in Iſaiah ſtand by Gods ſide, yet ceaſe not to clap their wings, to ſignifie unto us there is no ſoul ſo perfect and contented, which hath not the heart ſtill excited with ſome generous deſire. Trees are purified by the winds agitation, rivers are cleanſed, and purged in their perpetuall currents, and the heart by deſires. If we would have no deſires, we muſt not talk any more of eating and drinking; we muſt no longer have this young lover ſigh after his beloved; we muſt not then admit learned men to make love to wiſdome. That wraſtlers burn with affection of prizes due to their valour; and that the ſouldier covers himſelf with his wounds to embelliſh his garlands, all ought to be indifferent to us; and that is the way quickly to runne into the nature of rocks and ſtones.

We must here make a notable distinction of desires, insomuch, some are naturall, given by God to man for the preservation of himself: Others are artificiall, which arising out of an exorbitant will, are nothing but floud and ebb, but agitations and tempests. Desires are like number, one cannot name any so great, but that it is capable of addition.

The world repleniſhed with deſiring ſouls. Pſal. 80 v. 12. Tabeſcere feciſti animam meam (alia verſio) liqueſcere feciſti, ut timeam deſiderium ejus. Eos felicitas ingrata ſubterfluit ut ſemper pleni ſpei, vacui commodorum, præſentibus careant dum futura proſpectant. In Pſal. 92. Richardus de S. Victore in Pſal. 80.

Hence it proceedeth, that the world is repleniſhed with deſiring, and ſuffering ſouls, and that there is not almoſt any one who is not in expectation, and breathes not the air of the Region of deſires. The moſt part of men reſemble the moth which gnaws a garment, and in gnawing eateth its own houſe: For by the eagerneſſe of deſiring the future, they loſe all the pleaſure of the preſent, and demoliſh their fortune by their greedineſſe to raiſe it. That is it which the Panegyrick wittily expreſſed, pronounced before Conſtantine the ſonne. Felicity glideth by us, as the water which ſtreameth along under bridges, when ſtill, full of hope, we reſt unfurniſhed of contentments.

Deſiring hearts (ſaith S, Auguſtine) are as thoſe great-bellied women to whom the eternall word hath denounced a Curſe in the Goſpel. All the world would be but a morſell in the mouth of mans heart (ſaith Richardus de ſancto Victore) ſince its wiſhes are infinite and that it is evident that in Infinity what part ſoever you aſſigne, you are ſtill at the beginning.

An excellent picture of deſire.

If you deſire that I make you a picture of the nature and perquiſits of Deſire, I will tell you it is a ſtrange countrey whereunto the prodigall Child ſailed, when he forſook his fathers houſe to undertake a baniſhment: a Country where corn is ſtill in graſſe, vines in the bud, trees perpetually in bloſſome, and birds alwayes in the ſhell. You neither ſee corn, fruit, nor any thing fully ſhaped; all is there onely in expectation. It is a Countrey full of figures, phantaſmes, illuſions, and hopes which are dreames without ſleep: a Countrey where the inhabitants are never without feavers, one is no ſooner gone, but another cometh into its place. There, dwelleth Covetouſneſſe a great woman, meagre, lean, ſtarven, having round about her a huge ſwarm of winged boyes, of which ſome are altogether languiſhing, others caſt her a thouſand ſmiles as ſhe paſſeth along; upon her ſelf ſhe hath an infinite number of horſleeches, which ſuck upon her to the marrow. Time looketh on her afarre off, and never cometh near her, ſhewing her an enchanted looking-glaſſe, wherein ſhe ſeeth a thouſand, and a thouſand falſe colours, which amuſe her; and when ſhe hath ſported enough, ſhe hath nothing to dinner, but ſmoke.

The explication of the picture. Deſiderium eſt motus appetitus in amabili, & inchoatio amoris. S. Thom. 2. ſent. diſt. 26. q. 1. art 3.

Behold the table of Covetouſneſſe grounded upon Theology and the Philoſophy of S. Thomas. I ſay, to explicate my ſelf, that the countrey thereof is the countrey of the prodigall child, and that famine is perpetually there, Deſire being nothing elſe but a hunger of the good it wiſheth: or indeed, a motion of the appetite towards the thing it loveth, and the firſt degree of love. All is in bloſſome in this countrey, and never in fruit, inſomuch, as he who deſires, poſſeſſeth nothing, as yet, but in imagination: and ſuch is the nature of Deſire, that coming to the end of its carreer, it ſinks; ſince where the good is preſent that is affected, there is no further deſire. The Inhabitants there, are continually in feavers, ſince wiſhes are but feaveriſh ſervours. All there, is full of phantaſmes, becauſe all thoſe bleſſings are merely imaginary. Covetouſneſs is neceſſarily hungry, being perpetually in purſuit, never overtaking nor eating: but if it do overtake and eat, and gluts its heart, it ceaſeth to be Covetouſneſs. Verily it hath round about it litle laughing boyes; thoſe are gaudy, and ſparkling deſires: ſome ſad, they are fruſtrated deſires: Many bloud-ſuckers, which ſuck it, they are troubleſome, and turbulent Deſires. I adde, that time (ever diſtant from it (entertaineth it with an enchanted mirrour: for it ſeeth nothing but in the future, and ſees many Chymeras and illuſions, after which it is tormented. As Tygers who beholding the looking-glaſſe which hunters have ſet in Forreſts, imagine it to be a creature of their own kind ſhut up in a priſon of glaſſe, and ſo long they ſcratch it, till they break it and deface their deſire. Laſtly, I conclude, that they are ſerved at dinner with ſmoke, all worldly deſires being nought elſe but wind, and ſmoke.

§. 2. The Diſorders which ſpring from inordinate Deſires, and namely from curioſity, and Inconſtancy.

Oſe 13. 3. Erunt quaſi nubes matutina, & ſicut ros matutinus præteriens, ſicut pulvis turbine raptus ex area, & ſicut fumus de fumario. Three diſorders of deſire.

O God! ſhould one imagine the miſery of thoſe who dwell in this Countrey of Covetouſneſſe, and who live in worldly deſires, and perpetuall diſturbances; he could not have any thing more efficacious to give him a diſtaſte of it.

I obſerve, ill-rectified deſire cauſeth three Diſorders in the ſoul, which are ſterility, ardour, and unquietneſſe: Sterility; for, perſwade your ſelf, all the inhabitants of this countrey, which are now adayes many, are empty, hollow ſoules, void of the ſolid and eternall good for which they were created, and are filled with imaginary windings, and labyrinths: Ardour; ſince they are hearts enflamed like Fornaces, which dart forth deſires, as Coles do ſparks; Hearts, which as the Eagle-ſtone are ſtill big, but produce nothing: Unquietneſſe; for that they live like Hedghogs all environed with ſharp quils; There is onely this difference, that ſharp quils ſerve the Hedghog for a defence, and ſharp-pointed deſires kill, and conſume thoſe who have them.

You ſee men who all their life-time lie at anchor: and expect a wind, never ſailing; Men, who are continually in fetters like priſoners; Men, perpetually like to languiſhing Amoriſts, or to truantly ſchollers who vehemently deſire play-dayes. ſome, the moſt ſpirituall thirſt after books, and libraries: others pleaſe themſelves with Ideas of dogges, of birds, of apes, and of horſes: Others, in imagination, handle pieces of chryſtall, pictures, Diamonds, and piſtolls: Others cut out garments at their pleaſure, of the richeſt ſtuffes which fancy can furniſh them with; ſome are eager after hunting, and traffick; others, after Courtſhip, and Game: Some, go to the temple of Honour; others mind nothing but money. It were a very hard thing to reckon up all the feavers, purgatories, and pains of thoſe paſſionate ſouls; For indeed, naturall Deſires are not limitted by nature which made them; but thoſe which conſiſt in opinion have no limits, as Imagination which produceth them, hath no meaſure; but although men be very different in deſires, they agree all in one point, which is, never to be contented, alwayes to deſire ſome change, and noveltie, and ſo ardently to deſire it that there are ſuch to be found, who for a ruff-band, or a ſhoe, would gladly haſten the courſe of the ſun, as they ſet forward the hand of the diall.

The paſſion of Curioſity a kind of Deſire.

But among theſe Symptomes, which are frequent with perſons infected with ſuch like diſeaſes, I diſcover two other paſſions of Curioſity, and Inconſtancy, the companions of deſire. Note; that Truth ſitteth in a Throne all repleniſhed with lights, and is of very difficult acceſſe, if one have not wiſdome for direction. For ordinarily Curioſity way-layeth ſuch as go about to approch to it, and involveth them in vaſt labyrinths of errours. This curioſity (if you deſire to know the nature of it) is nought elſe but irregular appetite to know things either vain, unprofitable, or evil. It dwelleth in a Countrey fertile in apparance, but very barren in effect, fect, it hath in its dominion many spirits (to speak truly) neither dull not stupid; for they all have smartnesse and vivacity; but the most part have a great want of judgement and discretion to serve as a Counterpoise to their levity. They will know all, and in an instant ask more questions then the seven Sages of Greece could resolve in ten years; so likewise they are of the nature of those Starres which raise tempests and cannot calm them, since they frame a thousand casualties, a thousand difficulties in affairs, and never derive a good conclusion: you may say, if you well weigh them, that they have a worm in their wits which gnaws them; that they are men sick in health, and living dead-men who neither know what they would, what they do, nor what they are. Curiosity, seeing they have so much disposition to receive its impressions, entertaineth them in the winding wayes of Truth, like a Mountebank, who puts a multitude upon a gaze, by letting them see infinite many dainty colours in a Triangular-glasse, and in the conclusion sends them away dinnerlesse, with hunger in their teeth, and illusion in their eyes.

Curiositas motus animæ mortuus. S. August. Confess. l. 13.

After these slight amusements, this evil Mistresse turns them over to anxiety, anxiety delivers them to new desires, and new desires to servitude, servitude to ignorance, ignorance to presumption, and presumption to unquietnesse of mind. From thence they, who are deeper plunged into this poison of false wisdome, take the way of impiety, others of misery and poverty; some of choler, of envy, of slander, and despair; the best provided are like the Danaides, who do nought but fill and empty their tub, but to no purpose. All are not sick of one same disease; For some have a Curiosity, black and faulty, as those who seek for a Master in matter of Religion, and would gladly talk with a devil to learn news from Paradise: or such as those who strain curious Sciences so hard, that they squeeze black and maligne vices out of them, as Magick, or the trick of coining false money: or as those who are mad to hear, to see, to know the vices, or mischiefs of others. Others have a more innocent Curiosity, one of medals, another of Tulipaes, some of voyages, others of companies; and indeed, of all things which may serve for incentives to Concupiscence.

Omnis anima curiosa indocta est. August. de agone Christiano. c. 14. Nullâ curiositate videant quæ sunt in sanctuario. Num. 4.

There are of them who are much disquieted with matters which little concern them, they are curious to know all that passeth in the world in the Indies, in Japonia: how many elephants the great Mogull keeps; who is to succeed the King of China in his Empire; whether the great Turk armeth; whether the Persian stirreth; and what forces Prester John hath for the preservation of his State. They think within themselves, what a face they would set upon it if they were Kings or Popes: They in their heads dispose of Kingdomes: They raise Republicks, they rig forth ships, they pitch battels; and after they have doated, they find nought but nothing in their hands. Others advance not their aims so high, but rest satisfied with inferiour thoughts and petty cares; as how to trot up and down the streets, to visit houses, and to ask of all they meet, what news do you hear? As also to observe post-dayes, and to visit their friends round, by a list-roll indifferently, to heap together the bruits of the City, to vent them again without any consideration. There are some who make vows of pilgrimages, not out of Devotion towards Saints, but from a purpose to content their Curiosity. They know all the Indulgencies which are throughout all the Churches of the Province, and beyond, all the houses that are built, all the christnings every day, all the weddings celebrated, all the child-births of male or female, all the merchandizes newly brought in, all the strangers who arrive, all the suits determinated, all the charges given, all the offices sold, all the pamphlets cryed up and down the streets: Their heads are wonderfull Fairs, whither merchants come from all sides, there is not a moment of repose, and solitude with such is accounted a petty Hell.

This multiplicity of Desires is waited on by another Malady of Inconstancy, which is properly a levity, and an irresolution of mind which sheweth it self in his manners, actions, and words, who is touched with it. To say truth, this passion is a Devil who inhabiteth in a land of Quicksilver, where Earthquakes are almost perpetuall, winds blow on each side; and blowing, make many weather-cocks to turn to and fro, and every moment change posture; In this place, an admirable Creature is to be seen, who is not what she is, and is that she is not; so many faces and figures she hath: She likewise is still upon transformations, and seems to do nothing at all, but to make, and unmake her self. One while she is great, another while little, one while grosse, another while slender, one while affable, another while harsh, one while serious, another while gamesome, but ever slippery; and if you lay hold of her, you catch nothing. She goes forth of her lodging to appear in publick, as if she came into a Theatre, clothed, one while in changeable Taffaty, another while with different pieces set together out of a singular Fantastick addleness of wit. She alone representeth all personages, talks with all kind of voyces, and in all manner of languages. After her we behold a million of petty phantasmes, imperfect in shape, and which seem to be but pieces roughly begun, which we may say are her works.

Inconstancy followeth the multitude of Desires.

The kingdome of Inconstancy.

If you a little observe the men which inhabit this kingdome of Inconstancy, you shall find they are people whose humours consist much of air and water; for they are alwayes supple and pliant to all manner of objects, they have a spirit which brooketh not businesses with a strong and solid penetration, to see the bottome of it; but onely scratch them with a little bodkin which is blunted and broken presently. If you could see their heart and brain, you should behold in the one huge squadrons of thoughts which scuffle together like Cadmus his souldiers: in the other, a mighty masse of desires and indigested purposes, which renders them very unable to receive the impressions of the Divinity. as S. Basil hath observed upon that Prophet Isaiah. It seemeth all this kind of people have a will of wax, and that any man may work it which way he list. Their passions are sharp, and ardent in the beginning, so that they transport judgement, which is either notably weak, or much benummed; but they last not: for they instantly are troubled at things present, and ever turn their face away from the future, never (as it were) being where they are, and still being where they neither are nor can be. You shall see they every day begin to live, yea, when they should make an end; and if they do any good, they do it but by halves, never allowing themselves leisure to lick their Bear (as they say) nor to finish their work; so precipitate they are by contrariety of different desires which draw them this way and that way, and destroy all the abilities of their wits. You shall note in them a great greedinesse after novelties, and continuall changes of manners, study, apparel, of wearing their hair, of their manner of living, gate, of voyce, of conversation, of sports, exercises, counsels, loves, of amities, words, and of mouths which at once breathe forth hot and cold. To conclude, their life is nought else but the floud and ebbe of a continuall Euripus, it is repleniſhed with shadows, giddinesse, and illusions, which in effect make it miserable; For commonly it is waited on by disesteem, grief, shame, anxiety, and great shipwracks of wit and renown.

Τὸ ἀνόμαλον τῆς βίου οἰκονομίας καὶ ψυχῆς ἐπιχειρήσεως ἀνεμπόδιστα δοκεῖ. S. Basil. Hom. 1. in Isaiam.

§ 3. The

§ 3. The four sources out of which ill-rectified desires proceed.

Four sources of Desires which toil us.

YOu must know, that those restlesse desires which toil us, proceed from four sources: the first and principall whereof is, a Heart void of things Divine; there being not (saith S. Augustine) a more manifest signe, that a soul is not well with God, then, when it entertaineth a multiplicity of desires. Moses pulled off his shoes before the burning bush, where he saw his eyes cleared by the rayes of the Divine Majesty, (in my opinion) to teach us, that his heart was at an end of its journey, since he had found the Centre of eternall Rest. Whilst the soul of man is out of the limits which God assigned it, well it may find Innes to lodge in, but it never finds a home; But he who knows the way how to accommodate himself, in all things, to the will of God, hath found the industry of an Infinite good, in the accomplishment of his desires.

It is to live like Cain in the region of Instability, and to walk upon a quagmire, daily to entertain so many fresh appetites. Their multiplication witnesseth enough the barrennesse of their purchase; but when one well tasteth God, and finds him to comprehend all relishes; he forsaketh all to follow him, and the Heart hath no more to do, but to please him who is the source of its Contentment.

The second cause of desires, is a promptitude, and a vivacity of the Mind, which bends much to levity, and is not at all balasted by solidity of judgement, whereby the soul is set at liberty to flie after all manner of objects, as bees do after flowers. I will deliver unto you an excellent doctrine, which will teach us, that between a ship and the heart of a man (if we consider them well) there is much resemblance. The ship is a house of the sea, and the heart is the habitation of the soul, whilst it is in the ocean of this mortall life. The ship goes on the waters, and the heart upon abysses: The ship hath its sails, and the heart its aims: The ship is guided by the rudder, and the heart by prudence: The ship expecteth winds, and the heart the divers motions of its thoughts: The ship feeleth tempests, and the heart passions: the ship feareth rocks, and the heart obstacles: The ship suffers shipwrack under water, and the heart under the gulf of iniquity: The ship in the haven, and the heart in tranquillity.

A comparison of a ship and the heart of man.

Now as in the Scripture there are three sorts of ships specified; so there likewise are three manner of hearts. Some compared to ships which carry fruit, are such as are repleniſhed with affections and desires; with pleasures and contentments of the world; which are enemies of the present, and perpetually sigh after the future. Others, are ships of traffick, which are continually full of affairs, disturbances, great and little cares, that steal the repose of life from them. The rest are the ships of Tharsus in the Mediterranean sea, which carry great designs, great earthly ambitions, and are very often tossed by most impetuous winds.

Naves poma portantes. Job. 9.

Navis institoris. Prov. 31.

Naves Tharsis. Psal. 47.

The third source of our Appetites is a hot and sanguine Complexion, which in our heart enkindleth many desires like unto a fire made with straw, violent enough in the beginning, but of no lasting: as on the contrary, cold people have fewer desires, but are more pertinacious in the pursuit of them.

It is said we must beware of a man, who hath but one thing to do, because his thoughts being perpetually bent upon one and the same object, he becomes extremely troublesome to those from whom he desireth the accomplishment of his designe: so must we defend our selves from a man who hath but one desire: especially when it is inordinate; For we may easily escape from such as have many cares. Time wasteth them as fast as he produceth them; it is needlesse to oppose, or much to contradict them: let their minds rest, and you shall find the purpose they had in the morning, to be quite gone by the evening, like the Ephemery, which lives but one day. Now as for those, who have amassed together all the strength of their soul, upon one desire they are immeasurably urgent, and cease not to persecute you untill they have put their wish in execution.

The fourth is a certain crooked winding of a Heart, which is (as it were spungy and insatiable, joyned to a debility of spirit which apprehendeth want and necessity, and this makes it to fasten upon any thing to help it self.

Tertullium saith, that all these wandring souls have no other profession in this life, but to be in wish, where they cannot be personally in presence. The end of one desire provoketh them to begin another. Their desires resemble fruits that passe away, which in their latter season retain some beauty of their first vigour. There are many who esteem it a bitter businesse to expect, and who had rather see their hopes cut off, then to find out the way how to prolong them: but such are born to desire, they are not pleased with a victory already gotten; you do greatly wrong them, instantly, to give what they ask, they love even things unlawfull, because they are such, and so soon as they are permitted them, they lose that place which they had before in their heart.

Interpellat ad desiderandum finis ipse desiderandi. Tertul. lib. de pœnit:n.

§ 4. That the tranquillity of Divine Essence, for which we are created, ought to rule the unquietnesse of our desires.

AGainst this passion, I have two remedies to propose in two Reasons; the first whereof is drawn from the first model, which is the heavenly Father; and the second from the second, which is the Incarnate Word, since in them are the most efficacious wayes for reformation of the table of the Soul. As for the first, I say, that our soul being made to the Image of God, and for the possession and fruition of God, it will never rest but in the conformity of its understanding and will, with the understanding and will of its Creatour. Now, what think you would God desire, if he were capable of desire; what would he wish to see, to know, and to have? nothing but himself: and insomuch as he is eternally and inseparably with himself he is not capable of any impression of desires whatsoever. We cannot be like unto God without desires, whilst we are in the world; but we may, and ought to have but one main desire, which is God himself.

Reason against vain desires drawn from the Divine tranquillity.

Imagine your heavenly Father to be a great sea of Essences, of perfections, and of contentments, a sea which hath neither bottome nor shore; a sea wherein all the vessels of curious souls suffer shipwrack. Imagine with your self an Exemplary world, a vast world of wisdome, of sanctity, of intelligencies, of lives, of reasons, and of forms. There God inhabiteth within himself, being to himself, (as saith Tertullian) place, palace, world; there he is absorpt as in a huge abysse of delights, not to be imagined. He from all eternity hath his felicity purely perfect, and concentred in his own bosome, seeing he from all eternity hath his Sonne, his great and onely Conception, which emptieth him without his emptinesse, which issueth from him without issuing forth, which abideth in him without distinction of Essence, or confusion of Persons.

Nazian. in Natalitia. Πέλαγος ἀπεράντου οὐσίας καὶ θεότητος.

Tertul. in Praxeum, cap. 5.

He hath all his loves within himself, since he hath his holy Spirit, a substantiall flame of love, enkindled in his heart by his proper will, which is the eternall and unquenchable fornace of all chaste affections. He hath all his desires limited and repleniſhed, since, as he sees nothing nothing out of himself; so he cannot desire any thing out of himself. If you imagine the sea (saith S. Augustine) it is not God: If you imagine the earth with so many rivers which moisten it, so many herbs and flowers which enamel it, so many trees which cover it, so many living creatures which furnish it, so many men which inhabite and cultivate it, it is not God. If you in your thoughts figure the air, with all its birds so different in shape, so various in plumage, so diversified in their notes, it is not God. If you go up to those Chrystaline and Azure vaults, where the Sunne and Moon and so many Starres perform their career with such measure, it is not God. If you behold in heaven innumerable legions of Angels, Spirits of fire and light, resplendent before the face of God, as lamps of balsamum lighted before the propitiatory, it is not God: but God is he who comprehendeth all that, who bounds it, and incomparably surpasseth it.

Nec intelligentiam admittit solitudinis, nec diversitatem divinitatis. Magist Sent: lib. 1. d. 2.

Mare cogitas non est hoc Deus, omnia quæ sunt in terra homines & animalia, non est hoc Deus. Aug. in Psal. 85.

All things (say Divines) are in God by way of eminency, as in the Exemplar Cause which mouldeth them, as in the Efficient Cause which produceth them, as in the Finall Cause which determines them: but they are in a manner so elate and exalted, that those same which in themselves are inanimate, in God, are spirit and life.

All the Creatures we have seen produced in the revolution of so many Ages, are as Actours, which God (who is the great Master of the Comedy which is acted in this world) kept hidden behinde the hangings in his Idea's, more lively and more lustrous then they be on the stage. The World strikes the hour of their Entrances, and Exits of their life and death; but the great Clock of God in his Eternity, hath at one instant strucken all their hours. Nothing to him is unexpected, nothing unknown, nothing new: All that which tieth the desires of the most curious, all that which suspendeth the admiration of the sagest: all, which enflameth the hearts of the most passionate, Lands and Seas, Magazines of Nature, Thrones, Theatres, Arms, and Empires; all are but a silly drop of dew before the face of God.

Quod factum est, in ipso vita erat. Joh. 1.

Then how can God but live contented within himself, since the smalleſt streams of the fountain which springs from his bosome, may suffice a million of worlds. O ungratefull and faithlesse soul! the same Paradise which God hath for himself, he hath prepared for thee; he will, thou beholdest thy self, that thou contemplatest thy self, that thou reposest thy self in his heart; yet thou fluttereſt up and down like a silly butterfly among so many creatures, so many objects, so many desires; perpetually hungry, ever distant from thy good, ever a traitour to thy repose and glory. Beggarly soul, which beggest every where: Miserable soul which in every place findest want in abundance: Ignominious soul, upon whose front all loves have stamped dishonour; when wilt thou rally together all thy desires into one period? When wilt thou begin to live the life of God, to be satisfied with Gods contentment, and to be happy with Gods felicity?

Ecce gentes quasi stilla situlæ & quasi momentum stateræ reputatæ sunt; ecce insulæ quasi pulvis exiguus, & Libanus non sufficiet ac ad succedendum. Isa. 4. 16.

§ 5. That we should desire by the imitation of Jesus Christ.

2. Reason of the onely desire which Jesus had in seeking the glory of his heavenly Father.

THe second Reason that I draw from the second Model, which is, the Word Incarnate, the Rule and Example of all our actions, is, that Jesus Christ had no other desire on earth, but to suffer, to be dissolved, and to annihilate himself for the glory of his heavenly Father, by subjecting rebellious powers to his Sceptre, and by gaining souls, of which he infinitely was desirous, even to the last moment of his life. The Philosopher Plato in the Book of the order of the Universe, writeth, that all the Elements naturally desired to evaporate themselves in the Celestiall Region, as it were therein to obtain a more noble, and more eminent state of consistence. Now the deaf and dumb desire, which things inanimate have, to be transformed into a nature more delicate; is most apparent in the sacred Humanity of the Son of God, which, although it alwayes remained within the limits of its Essence, it notwithstanding had an ineffable sympathy with the Divinity, being totally plunged therein, as iron in burning coals. It in all, and through all, followed its motions, will, and ordinances, as true dials wait on the Sun; nor had it any desire more ordinary, then to make a profusion of it self, in all it had created.

Plato lib. de ordine universi apud Viennam.

Theology teacheth us, that albeit, the will of God were necessitated in certain actions, as in the production of the love which sprang from the sight of God; notwithstanding in others, it was altogether free, able to do, and not to do such, or such a thing according to his good pleasure; as at such or such a time to go, or not to go into Jury. Able, of two good things which were presented, to chuse the one or leave the other; as, to do miracles, rather in Jury then in Sidon. Able also to do the things ordained him by his heavenly Father out of motives and reasons such as his wisdome thought best to chuse: In all those liberties, never pretended he ought but the Glory and Service of his Father. Good God, what sublimate is made in the limbeck of Love, what evaporations, and what separations of things, even indivisible, are made in the five great annihilations which Theology contemplateth in the person of Jesus Christ!

Nonvolebat in Judæam ambulare Joh. 7. 1.

First, the inseparable Word of God seemeth to make a divorce, but a divorce of obedience, and to separate it self; but with a separation alwayes adherent by the condition of a forreign nature transplanted into the Divinity. Secondly, he, by a new miracle permitteth, that this Humane nature tied to the Divine nature, be separated from its subsistence, its last determination and substantiall accomplishments. Thirdly, that Glory be separated from the estate and condition of Glory, yielding his glorious soul up as a prey to sadnesse. Fourthly, he separateth himself not onely from the signs and conditions of a Messias, but almost from the resemblance of a man, being become ns a worm.

Radius ex sole, portio de summa, de spiritu spiritus, & de Deo Deus. Tertul Apol 2. Greg. l. 28 mor. cap. 2.

Lastly, he draws himself into the interiour of his soul of his own accord, and wholly melts himself as Incense in the fire: in such sort, that S. Gregory very well saith, That he is the Amber of the Prophet Ezekiel, enrobed with the heat of flames. But better saith Origen, who calleth him the Perfume which is annihilated for us; comparing the will of the Son of God to a viol filled with an aromatick liquor, which one hath turned up-side down to empty it to the last drop; so the desires and affections of Jesus are pouted forth in the bosome of his heavenly Father. But most especially on the day of his Passion, for then was the time when the Prophecy of Habakuk was accomplished; It is thou who mountest upon the light-horses, and who beareſt salvation in thy mysterious chariot.

Quasi ignis effulgens, & thus ardens in igne.

Origen. in Cant. unguentum exinanitum.

Hab. 3. Qui ascendis super equos tuos, & quadrigæ tuæ salvatio

I now leave those who interpret this passage of the chariot of God triumphing in those ugly darknesses of Egypt. I leave those who refere it to the second coming. I follow the Interpretation which S. Ambrose presenteth unto me, who calleth the Crosse a gibbet of Triumph, and others who term it the true chariot of the glory of the God of hostes. I consequently say, that the light-horses of our Saviour are his winged and flaming desires, which bare him more gloriously then Elias unto the throne of Honour, where he hath made a full consummation of himself, by the separation of his his bloud and soul in that great Sacrifice, which put Heaven to mourning, the Sunne into eclipse, the Earth into quakings, and men the most stupid into affrightment. O with what obedience, with what resignation did that dying Swan then appear, when all the starres (as Didimus relateth) about three of the clock afternoon were seen in the heavens to enlighten his death! O, with what union of his will to Gods will, he spake these words, O my God, O my Father, behold me on the Pile to be sacrificed to thy Divine Majesty: My God, I have desired it from the first moment of my conception, I have had the law of Obedience engraven in my heart with a chizzel of fire and an eternall character, and at this time (O my celestiall Father) I wish it, I would it, and will protest it whilst my soul shall be on my lip, to have but one onely desire in the world, which is to annihilate my self in accomplishing thy will!

Ambros. in Luc. Patibulum triumphale

Deus meus volvi & legem tuam in medio cordis mei.

§. 6. The condemnation of the evil Desires of the world, and the means how to divert them.

Against evil desires.

AND yet thou (O disloyall soul) wilt in thy heart entertain a masse of Desires, thou wilt rather live among feavers and burning coals, then tie thy self to the will of God! Rebel, thou hast prostituted thy self on high and below, upon the mountains and under trees, under cedars and on the hysop; so many great and little Desires have possessed thy heart. Thou miserable man, to have affection in store for a deceiving creature, who hath put the sword of division into thy marriage, to cut asunder a knot tied before the face of Angels and men! Thou unfortunate maid, unlucky victime, to fill all the sails of thy Desires for a man more light then the wind, and more faithlesse then ice; whose words are but promises, promises but perjuries, perjuries but forsakings, and forsakings but disastres; and to have neither heart nor thought for God, a Father so benigne, a Saviour so affectionate, a Lover so loyall! Thou, to burn alive with black and shamefull flames of ravenous avarice; and to have no feeling for him, who hath the beauty of fields, the enamel of meadows, the extent of seas, the riches of metals, and all the magazines of the Universe in his bosome! Thou, to run at randome after transitory honour, which glisters like a worm in a piece of rotten wood, and which pricketh like a thorn; and not to hold sympathy with him who crowneth the heads of his Elect with eternall garlands! Thou, to live daily in fits of fire and ice for a slight toy, for a gorget, for a chopino, for a little dog, a parichito, for all that which I neither can nor dare to expresse! O what a shame is it, that all creatures serve for snares and prisons to hearts moistned with the bloud of Jesus; and they not to be softned by this venerable shower, able to break rocks asunder, and dissolve anvils!

In omni colle sublimi, & in omni ligno frondoso tu prosternebaris meretrix. Jer. 2. 21.

You will ask me what you should do to be delivered from this tyranny? First, accustome your self to cut away all superfluities, whether of apparel, diet, vain company, or other delights which fight against the law of God. Reduce your appetites to a small cost, and take more care how to end them, then to cherish them. Resolve with your self to lop off all your superfluities, and to be contented with little, holding it for a thing most assured, that by how much the lesse you shall depend on your greedy desires (which are most forward mistresses, to whom you have prostituted your Christian liberty) so much shall you be the more near to God.

Desideria tua parvo redime: hoc enim tantum quisque debet as desinant. Senec.

Secondly, if you feel in your heart some seeds of desires to sprout and disquiet you, seasonably prevent them, one while diverting them by some laudable employment, another while by pulling them up with main strength in their first tendernesse, and never to let them get strength to your prejudice. It is much more easie to defend ones self in the beginning from a passion, then to moderate the violence of the exorbitancy when it is lodged in your heart.

Non obtinebis ut desinat, si incipere permiseris. Sen. ep. 116.

Thirdly, follow Aristotle's counsel, and look on all the objects of pleasure, not such as they are, when they at first soothe Sensuality, but such as they be when they turn their backs to forsake us. Lastly, exercise your self continually in the desire of joyes eternall.

Voluptates abeuntes, spectа fessas, & pœnitentiâ plenas, quò minus cupidè repetantur.

Behold all those things which environ you, all those honours, those riches, those pomps, as deceitfull and momentary things; Behold them as a flitting company; Each day undo a knot of your slavery; Put your self into the liberty of Gods Children; Place your self in such a nakednesse of spirit that you may say, One, and no more. Blind soul, how canst thou live one sole moment with so many desires, which are as so many daughters to marry? what a care must be had well to bestow them? what a fear to bestow them ill? what a grief that they are ill bestowed? Stupid soul, canst thou rest with so many bloud-suckers fastned to the marrow of thy bones, which draw thence all thy vitall humour, and make thee have a life which hath nothing lesse then life in it? Temerarious soul, who hast dared to think, that forsaking thy Creatour, thou elsewhere shouldst find a better match! Go, and see the obstacles which daily meet with those who hunt after honours, savours, and worldly wealth. Go, go, behold, and thou shalt see a thousand fishes swim in a pond after a rotten worm. How many battails must thou wage, how many sweats of death must thou sweat, how many iron-gates must thou break through, to content one onely of thy desires? O how often will the Heavens and the Elements conspire against thy affections, which thou so unworthily, so disastrously hast placed?

O what bloudy sorrows at thy death, when God shall draw aside the curtain of the city of peace, and shall shew thee an infinite number of souls in the bosome of Beatitude, for having well disposed their Desires; and on the other side, burning coals to expiate affections ill managed!

O what horrour, what terrour, and what despair, if the Angels come and say with a voyce of thunder, Foris Canes, and that we must wander up and down in affection with a hunger everlastingly enraged after a good we so many times have despised! O Jesus, the desire of Eternall mountains, draw to thee all my desires, since thou art the Adamant. Jesus, the love of all faithfull souls, take all my affections, since thou art the Centre of all hearts. Jesus, the Joy and Crown of all the Elect, stay my floating hopes: since thou art the haven of hearts, stretch out an assisting hand to so many errours, and set me in a place where I may desire nothing: but let it be such a place, wherein I may love that which is infinitely amiable.

Apoc. 22. 15

The fourth Treatise, OF AVERSION.

§ 1. The Nature and Qualities thereof.

The essence and nature of Aversion.

AVersion is a passion apprehensive, disdainfull of distastes, which is shut up as a snail in its shell, and hath no inclination to any thing in the world. Covetousnesse presenteth it many objects, to see if it can snare it with a bait; but it doth nothing but fly away, and turn the face to the other side: and albeit, it seems not to desire ought of all is offered unto it; it nevertheless coveteth good, but goes towards it by by-paths, and flight from all that which seems opposite to its felicity.

How Aversion is formed.

Well, to understand the nature of this Passion, we must know, that as in motions of affections, there is first made in the soul a love wholly simple, which is an inclination and a complacence towards some object; from thence Desire is created, by which we consider the same object, not onely as good and convenient, but as a thing absent, and out of us, which we must endeavour to have, and to bring within our power: But if we have the good hap to possesse it, from thence joy ariseth, which is a perfect complacence, raised upon the possession of the thing desired. Likewise in passions which resist and oppose our heart; first, a simple hatred is created, which onely importeth an Antipathy, and a certain dissenting from the object, which the understanding proposeth to the will, as disagreeable or hurtfull: Thence we come to consider this object, either as farre distant, and hard to be avoided; and then Fear laies hold of our heart, or we behold it more near at hand, and very easie to be repelled, being wholly unable to make any great or strong impressions upon us, as Fear doth, and then it is properly called Aversion: but if the evil happen to be present, it is a vexation and a trouble; and when it is past, there remains a horrour, which we call Detestation.

The character and true image of a spirit subject to Aversion.

We may say, this passion which is disgusted with all, hath nothing so distastefull as it self. There you behold a soul oppressed, still apprehensive, still retired, and ever harsh; and as nothing pleaseth it, so easily it displeaseth all the world. If there be cause to name one, he will never call him by his name; but will say, of whom speak you? of that wretch? of that sluggard? of that miser? of that ignorant fellow? Or, if he hath some deformity of body; of that crooked piece? that crump-shoulder? of that unfortunate caitiffe, who is much duller then a winters-day, or the snows of Scythia? If a Book be to be censured; there is nothing worth ought in it, they are discourses and words ill placed. If merchandize be to be bought; the shop and store-houses of a merchant shall be turned over and over, and nothing found that gives contentment. If he be in his own house; he makes himself insupportable to his domesticks: this garment is ill made, this chamber ill furnished, this bed too hard, these dishes unsavoury; the wind at a door, the creaking of a casement, the crying of a child, the barking of a dog, all is troublesome to him. If a man of this condition be to be married; there is not a maid in the world worthy of him, he must have one framed out of his own rib, as God did for the first Man: or suffer him to raise his love in imitation of Endymion and Caligula, up to the sphere of the Moon. But most especially, women of this humour are extremely troublesome; They have no small businesse to do, who are to find them out maid-servants and nurses; this is too rusticall, she hath nothing amiable in her eye, she speaks too big, her body is not slender enough; the other is a piece of flesh not worth ought: needs must she be perpetually upon change; and out of too much curiosity to meet with a good service, be the worst served of any woman in the world. Behold one distasted with professions, conditions, and offices, all displeaseth him; Shall he become a Church-man? that seems a slavery to him: Shall he betake him to a sword? It is hazardous: To an office? It costs too much: To traffick? Little is to be gotten: To a Trade? He cannot find a good one: Lastly, it troubleth him to be a man, and would gladly entertain the invention of Ovids Metamorphosis, to be transformed into some other kind of Creature. There are young wenches, who have much a-do with themselves: Shall they marry? There is not any match likes them; this man is unhandsome; that other is but simple; this man too way-ward; that, too melancholly; one, too wild; another hath not living enough; nor that other, good alliance; an Angel must be fetched out of heaven to marry them. In the mean time, some amorist learneth to dance his cinque-pace, and to powder and frizzle himself to please this coy piece, whom nothing contenteth but her own distastes. If, on the other side, this creature looks towards Religion; she will multiply her paces and visits, and will run over all the Monasteries, and find none to content her; one is too indulgent, and another too austere; the habit of this pleaseth, but the manner of living is distastefull; the flesh draweth upon one side, and the discipline drives away on the other, and her wavering mind can resolve on nothing, nor irresolve on nothing, but irresolution.

Humour of coy women

That admitted and established in this manner; I say there are two sorts of Aversion, the one whereof is tied to things, the other to persons, and both of them are of power much to disturb us, if we seasonably seek not to give remedy thereto in our most tender years before these dispositions wax old in us, and strengthen themselves to our prejudice. Now, I observe we may find very good remedies out of the consideration of the Divine proceedings of God, as I intend to let you see in the sequele of this discourse.

§ 2. The sweetnesses and harmonies of the heart of God shew us the way to cure our Aversions.

The consideration of the love which God bears to his creatures, is a powerfull remedy to cure Aversion.

FIrst, we see that God loves all things except sinne, and hates nothing he hath made. Essence, Goodnesse, and truth, follow one another by necessity of consequence; and God hath put nothing into Being, which is not in the state of some Goodnesse; yea, the devils will burn in hell having something good, having somewhat of God. They have being, and substance, understanding, and will; all which, considered within the limits of Nature, cannot but be good. There is nothing but sinne which altereth and depraveth it by the ill usage of it. S. Cyprian hath well noted it, when he saith of devils, That they were * spirits impure and sophisticate, who having lost their sincerity and heavenly vigour by the contagion of the vices of the earth, and, who being once lost, cease not to ruine men. From thence we behold, that as in adulterated merchandize Diligis omnia quæ sunt & nihil odisti eorum quæ fecisti. Sap. 11. 25.

Sin corrupteth the goodness of essence in intellectuall creatures. Cypr. de Idol vanit. & à vigore

* Spiritus insinceri, & vagi qui posteaquam terrenis immersi vitiis sunt, cœlesti terreno contagio recesserunt, non desinunt perditi perdere.

and

and false money, there is alwayes some good mixed with the bad; so in these unclean spirits, there is an Intellectuall nature of it self very good, which hath been corrupted by sinne. God cannot but love in them all that is his, as much as he detesteth all which proceedeth from their rebellion: But if there be any thing lovely in creatures so miserable and forsaken, which is worthy to entertain the heart of God; how can we have an Aversion against so many other things which rest (as yet) in innocency?

God in his Essence accordeth the diversity of all Essences.

It is an admirable thing, that the heart of God is as the Father of Harmonies, and doth within it self accord things the most opposite. For, we know all the world in this sovereign being, is more beautifull, better coloured, and more flourishing then it is in it self; yet there is no contrariety. Water resisteth not fire; heat, cold; drought, moisture; because it is a Sanctuary of Peace, where all diversities conclude in Unity. Greek Histories make mention of certain Temples, as was that of Adonis, wherein lions were tractable; that might come to passe from the industry of men, and not out of the virtue of the place, as Elian the Historian supposeth: but here we must say, The bosome of God is a true temple of Peace, which makes lions familiar with lambs, and which uniteth all to it self.

Marvellous Temples, where lions were tractable.

Ælian. de animal. l. 12. cap. 25.

The sympathies and antipathies which God hath wisely impressed on Essences, end in union.

But to witnesse unto us, beside, the intention which God hath to dispose us to sympathy, hence is it, that not satisfied to have united all the parts of the world, as those of an Egge, he giveth even to creatures insensible, certain Bands and dumb Amities, which causeth them to seek one after another, and to link themselves together by complacence, as we see to happen in the load-stone and iron, in the amber and the straw, whether it be done by a substantiall form which is hidden from us, or whether it be by transpiration and effluxion of their substances, as the Philopher Empedocles thought; and which is more, if this sovereign Workman permit Antipathy among creatures, he hath reduced all to the good of community, since it serves for the conservation of Species which compose the beauty of his Universe. So the contrariety between the Lamb and the Wolf is a perfect incitement to the conservation of this creature, necessary for humane life.

How we ought to govern our Aversions. Nature necessarily brings with it its sympathies and antipathies. Fracast de sympath. & antipath. l. c. 13. a

Some one may here say, that by perswading too much, I perswade nothing: for, if we admit sympathy for all which God hath created, we then must love serpents and poisons; we must miserably satisfie our hunger with all impure viands, which cannot be done without destroying the principles of nature which necessarily hath its Appetites to good, and its Aversions from many things contrary unto it. To that I answer, we cannot wholly live without Sympathy and Antipathy: For we well know that the knowledges of the Senses, of the Imagination, of the Understanding come to us by the help of Species which represent unto us, the quantity, figure, form, habit, motion, and rest of things; but above all, the accord, and dissonance from whence commonly arise in our soul two affections, the one of Dilatation, and the other of Restriction: For as the soul dilates and spreadeth it self to things which are delightfull to it; So it draws back, and foldeth it self up at the sight of all is unpleasing to it, very well witnessed even in the members of the body, which extend or contract themselves, according as matters are agreeable or disagreeable to the heart. We do not here intend to stifle all the first motions which are not in our power, insomuch as they are invincible and inevitable. It were to no purpose to make long discourses to a man to exhort him, not to have some small quaking in his body, when on a sudden cold water is thrown upon him, or not to wink with his eyes when a glittering sword is presented, as it were to strike him, or not to have some dizzinesse in the head, by beholding a precipice from a place on high: For all that is naturall, and may happen to men the most moderate.

The first motions are for the most part inevitable. Senec. l. 2. de Ira. cap. 2.

We do not likewise say, that we must not flie, not onely by the first Motives of Nature, but also out of Election and Reason, all that which is hurtful to the body and health. No man (saith the Apostle) hateth his own flesh, but cherisheth and entertaineth it as long as he can, therein imitating the tenderness of affection which Jesus Christ hath for his Church. I adde, that it is not also my intention to perswade, that one should not seek, in the care of his life, things the most commodious, so much as Justice and Reason will permit. We must bear with servitude (saith this foresalledged Oracle) if we be engaged in this condition, but if one can become free, I advise him rather to make choice of liberty. Yet we are not ignorant, but that there are many good men who by the power of virtue afflict their bodies, and preferre contempt above all which the world esteemeth, that they may conform themselves to the suffering of our Saviour.

One may reasonably fly that which is in any wise hurtfull.

Nemo enim unquam carnem suam odio habuit, sed nutrit & fovet eam, sicut & Christus Ecclesiam. Ephes. 5. 29.

To seek by lawfull wayes ones petty accommodations, is not a thing of it self to be alwayes condemned. Servus vocatus es? non sit tibi curæ, sed & potes fieri liber, magis utere. 1 Cor. 7. 21.

But to rest within the limits of * Civil life, I say, that although we may innocently use the blessings of God, and put nature to its small pittances; yet we must take heed of becoming too suspicious, too nice, and too apprehensive of those things which are not according to our appetites; for otherwise there happen great disturbances, and irksome confusions of mind which thrust the health of our soul into uncertainty.

* One must take heed of being too curious.

It is a hard thing not to feel some incommodities, life being so full of them.

First, when a spirit is too much tied to its skin, and too much bent to flie all the contrarieties of nature; it is very beggarly and suppliant towards its body, which is not done without much care: For life being replenished with great and little incommodities, from which Kings themselves cannot be wholly exempt: If one apprehend them too much, he must live like a man who would perpetually shut his eyes for fear of flies, and imploy (almost) all his time which is so precious in the service of the flesh.

God himself permitteth it also. Timor quem timebam evenit mihi, & quod verebar accidit. Job 3. 25.

Secondly, God for punishment of this niceness, will suffer that all we most fear shall happen to us: a man many times falleth into mischiefs even by fearing them. Death seems to be onely for cowards, and when one seeks for liberty by unworthy wayes, then he is involved in the greatest servitude.

One puts himself upon the hazard to live alwayes in insupportable anxiety. Debitores sumus non carni, ut secundum carnem vivamus. Rom. 8. Hier. in epist. ad Agiat. Non est dolenda in Deum, & secura confessio quotidie credentis in Christum, tollit Crucem suam, & negat se ipsum. Bern. ser. 85. in Cant. Fuge ad illum qui adversatur, per quem talis fias, cui jam non adversatur.

Thirdly, one is in danger to fall into much discouragement and into sad despair, when he sees himself slipped into matters troublesome and very vexing, since he sought to avoid the lightest. For which cause the Sages counsel us, willingly to accustome our selves a little to evill, and of our own accord to harden our selves, to the end, that when it shall come, necessity may make that more supportable, which we have already assayed by prudence. We owe nothing to flesh to live according to flesh, saith S. Paul: and S. Hierome in the Epistle he wrote to Aglasius, clearly giveth him to understand, That the Profession of Christianity is not a Profession nice and lazy; a true Christian every day beareth the Crosse, and renounceth himself. S. Bernard said as much in one of his Sermons upon the Canticles: Fly (saith he) to your beloved persecutour, that you may find the end of your persecutions in the accomplishment of his will. It is a determination from heaven that we should see before our eyes so many great religious men and women most austere, whom the divine Providence seems to propose unto us, to extend, and glorifie the Crosse of Jesus Christ, and shew, that all is possible to the love of God.

§ 3. The

§ 3. The Consideration of the indulgent favours of Jesus Christ towards Humane Nature a powerfull remedy against the Humour of Disdain.

The example of our Saviour serves for another strong remedy to sweeten our Aversions.

IF we be not yet throughly perswaded by these reasons; the example of our Saviour ought to make us ashamed: For when we more nearly consider his life, we find that he onely did not shew an Aversion from things despicable, but chose the most abject, and contrary to Nature.

Ask of you, what attractive was there in humane nature, to draw him from the highest parts of the heavens to its love? What saw he in it but a brutish body, a soul in the most inferiour order of Intelligencies, all covered over with crimes, wholly drenched in remediless miseries? and yet laying aside those beautiful Angels who did shine as Aromatick lamps in his eternall Temple; he came upon earth to seek for this lost creature, prodigall of his substance, a foe to his honour, injurious to his glory: and not content to reconcile it to his father, he espoused it, and united it to himself with a band indissoluble, putting it into the possession of all his greatnesse, to surcharge himself with its miseries. This is it, which is so notably described by the Prophet Ezechiel, when he sets before our eyes a miserable ungracious wretch, cast forth upon the face of the earth, wallowing in ordures, abandoned to all sorts of injuries, and scorns, whom the Prince of glory looketh on with his eyes of mercy, taketh him, washeth, clotheth, adorneth, and tyeth him to himself by the band of marriage.

Eras nuda, & confusione plena; & transivi per te, vidi te, & expandi amictum meum super te, & operui ignominiam tuam. Ezech. 16.

Displicentes amati sumus, ut gereret in nobis unde placeremus. Concil. Arausican.

We naturally have so much Aversion from persons misshapen, nasty, and infected, that we cannot look upon them; but if with these defects, we also there find a soul wicked, ungratefull, an enemy to God and men; we then conceive such horrour, that one had need to be more then a man, to endure them. Now, we were in this estate, which I speak of; for besides the misfortunes and calamities which encompassed us on all sides, we were enemies to God, by having been too much a friend to our selves; and which is more, we could not have one silly spark of love for him, if it were not inspired into us by himself: mean while he accepteth us, and appropriateth us to himself among all these contrarieties. He out of his goodnesse will not lose him, who through his own malice delighteth to lose himself; he then stretcheth forth his hand unto him, when the other turns his back, the one flyeth, and the other pursueth this fugitive with the pace of his charity, even into the shadow of death. He calleth him, he flatters him: he courteth him, and not content to pardon him a crime; he promiseth him a Kingdome. What may one say of so profuse a Bounty!

Nec peremptum perire patitur, nec abavertitur; sed fugientem pacatâ charitate insequitur, revocat, blanditur, & exprobrationem ingratitudinis non sibi sed ipsum homini imputat, sed & regnum promittit. Fulgent. Abbas l. 3. de gratia.

The humours of the world are quite contrary to the designs of God.

How can we in the world so greedily seek for all the contentments of nature, seeing the God of nature so roughly handled in the world, which he built with his own hands? we cannot abide the singing of a fly, a noise, a smoke, the sight of a thing which is in any sort displeasing: a world must be made of gold and silk to satisfie our desires. Jesus is the sign of a Contradiction, reverenced in appearance, and in effect used as a thing of nought. O how divinely hath Saint Augustine expressed the humour of a worldly man, an enemy to the life of God, in the book he wrote of the Christian Combat! Jesus was not wise enough, according to the opinion of the world; He hath indifferently taken upon himself all that which his heavenly Father would, not shewing any Aversion, from things the most distastefull.

Displicet avaris quòd non corpus aurcum habuit; displicet impudicis, quia ex virgine natus est; displicet superbis quòd contumelias sapienter pertulit, displicet delicatis quòd crucianus est displicet timidis quòd mortuus est. Et unum vitia sua videntur defendere unum in hoc dicunt sibi hoc displicere sed in filio Dei. August. de agone Christiano.

This is it which is hard to digest; It displeaseth the covetous, that he coming into the world hath not brought with him a body of gold and pearl. It displeaseth the luxurious that he was born of a Virgin. It displeaseth the proud, that he so patiently suffered injuries: It displeaseth the nice, that he endured so many afflictions and torments: Lastly, It pleaseth not the humorous, that he dyed. Prophane spirits cease not to say, but how can that be done in the person of God? and in stead of correcting their vices (which are very great) they find cavills at the perfections of Jesus Christ, which are most innocent.

§ 4. The Conclusion, against Disdain.

It is a shame to have an Aversion against one for some defect of body, or some other deformity of nature, when we are bound to love him.

WIll we still out of humour love things pleasing to sensuality, and have a perpetuall distaste against all which may maintain virtue?

A Father and a Mother, to have an aversion against their own children, under colour that they have some defect in nature; and in stead of regarding them with an eye full of pity and compassion to comfort their infirmities, wipe away their tears, and provide for the necessities of their life, to leave them at randome in the storm: and if out of necessity we must do them some good, to throw them out bread in an anger, as if they had committed a great crime to come into the world, in that rank which the providence of God had prepared for them; what a shame is it to entertein amities and petty loves onely to please flesh and bloud; that if the eyes find not contentment, the heart will no longer observe fidelity!

This creature, which hath heretofore been so much beloved, is now forsaken, rejected, and used like an excommunicate, having no other crime but some deformity of body, some infirmity or other accident, nothing at all in its power to remedy.

A husband, traiterous to Altars, and to the Sacrament of Marriage, barbarously useth a wife who brought with her the wealth of her parents, and her own heart and body, in lawfull wedlock: but now this carnall man taken in the snare of his lust by a wretch and a prostitute, rejecteth a lawfull wife, as if she were a serpent or the froth of an enraged Sea, elsewhere to satiate his brutishnesse, to the prejudice of his reputation, and the death of his soul. Must I here produce the actions of Infidels, to confound ours?

Luciamus in Toxaride. A generous act of a Pagan, who teacheth us powerfully to command over our Aversions.

One Menippus relateth in Lucian, How that he one day seeing a man, comely, and of eminent condition passing along in a Coach with a woman extreamly unhandsome, he was much amazed, and said, he could not understand why a man of prime quality and of so brave a presence should be seen to stir abroad in the company of a monster. Hereupon one that followed the Coach overhearing him said (Sir) you seem to wonder at what you now see; but if I tell you the cause and circumstances thereof, you will much more admire. Know, this Gentleman whom you see in the coach, is called Zenothemis, and born in the City of Marseilles, where he heretofore contracted a firm amity with a neighbour-citizen of his, named Menecrates, who was at that time one of the chief men of the City as well in wealth as dignities: But as all things in the world are exposed to the inconstancy of fortune, it happened that having (as it is thought) given a false sentence, he was degraded of honour, and all his goods were confiscated. Every one avoided him as a Monster, in this change of fortune; but Zenothemis his good friend as if he had loved miseries, not then, more esteemed him in his adversity, then he had done in prosperity, and bringing him to his house, shewed him huge treasures, conjured him to share them with him, since such was the laws of amity: the other weeping for joy to see himself so entertained in such sharp necessities; said, he was not so apprehensive of the want of worldly wealth, as of the burthen he had in a daughter, ripe for marriage, and willing enough, but blemished with many deformities. She was (saith the history) but half a woman, a body misshapen, and limping, an eye bleared, a face disfigured, and besides, she had the falling sickness with horrible convulsions. Nevertheless this noble heart said unto him. Trouble not your self about the marriage of your daughter, for I will be her husband. The other astonished at such goodness, God forbid (saith he) I lay such a burthen upon you. No, no, replyeth the other, she shall be mine, and instantly he married her, making great feasts, whilst the poor Father was rapt out of himself with admiration.

Having married this miserable Creature, he honoured her with much regard, and made it his glory to shew her in the best company, as a trophey of his friendship. In the end she brought him a goodly son, who restored his grand-father to his estate, and was the honour of his family.

O good God! A man of the world, to speak, and do all this for worldly vanity, to command over himself in all the great aversions of nature, to content a friend! To act all these admirable prodigies, in sight of all the world for the satisfaction of a morall virtue; And can it become us to play the nicelings, and so much to give way to our aversions; to forsake the law of God, Nature, and our own salvation! Will we never understand the saying of Saint Justine; That to live according to the propensions of Nature, is not to live like a Christian?

The fifth Treatise, Of DELECTATION.

§ 1. That Delectation is the scope of all Nature: Its Essence, Objects, and Differences.

God hath made all creatures to have Delectation.

GOd seemed to have made all things for Delectation, since even Creatures which have no soul nor reason have a dead Delectation applyed to the place, and end for which they were made. Had fire sense; it would triumph for joy to see it self in an eminent place: and a stone would receive contentment to be below: the Iron would smile to feel it self enchained by the charms of the Adamant, and a straw, to behold it self caught by the Amber.

Now for as much as these things are without judgement; all their joy consisteth onely in the cessation of their motion, which is done when they are arrived at their proper elements. Creatures the most eminent have a sensitive knowledge of things agreeable to them, and do infinitely rejoyce in their possession and fruition; But, man, who worketh by more powerfull and exalted engines of reason, is created to participate in Joy, not by a dead Action, but by an understanding, and a reasonable fruition. And that you may the better conceive, wherein the joy of a reall Man consisteth; you must know, it is composed of four things, the first whereof, is, that to receive; one must have an object pleasing and delightfull, wch is as the basis of rejoycing: and secondly, a facultie capable to conceive, and know this object which in it self naturally disposeth to Delectation; from whence it cometh to passe, that a Beast will hear the bravest and best Lutenist in France without any pleasure; because, it hath not ears to judge of it: thence we must go to a third degree which is an affection toward this object, otherwise, had it all the perfections in the world, there is no contentment taken therein; from whence it cometh that devils, albeit they have a certain presence of the sovereign of all objects, which is God, and have a certain knowledge of him; they cannot find any repose therein, because they love him not. To conclude; the accomplishment of pleasure is the presence, possession, and fruition of the good which is known to us, and which we love: For from thence proceedeth a sweetness, vitall, lively, and delicious, which poureth it self forth into the bottome of our souls, and diffuseth it self upon our senses, as a gentle dew falling on plants. See what joy doth, if you have never well tryed it; which is indeed nought else but a satisfaction of the soul in the enjoying what it loves.

Four things compose the solid delectation of man.

Why devils love not God, whom they know to be so amiable.

But now at this present, to expresse all the objects, and particular causes thereof, is a discourse which rather extendeth in length, then establisheth any solid verity; Yet, I think one may undertake to affirm there are three sorts of joy: some are wholly divine and inspired, as those of holy Confessours, Virgins, and Martyrs, who rejoyce in the practice of virtues, in austerities, and torments; others are indifferent, partly humane and civill, as are the pleasures we take in the beauty, and diversitie of naturall things, honest amities, and sciences, in honour and estimation, in the successe and prosperity of affairs, and in the exercise of great charges: Others come from the Base Court, and from animall nature, as are the pleasures of eating and drinking, of feasts, of banquets, of love, of dancing, of sports, of playes, and of jesting.

Three sorts of joy.

Every one measureth his likings by his own nature and condition, and one may truly say, that pleasure is not properly in things exteriour, but in the interiour of our wills and appetites. See we not, that all colours have no lustre in the night-time, and that necessarily light must awaken, and put them in possession of being coloured? so, all objects in the world are of the same nature; they are dumb, dead, and insensible, unlesse the ray of our will reflects on them to actuate them, to set them a-work, and of them to make matter of our delight.

Contentments rather in the will, then in pleasing objects.

If pleasure sprang from the quality of creatures, it would be alike in all hearts, and never would any thing, which is pleasing to one, be irksome or distastfull to another: but sith we see so many diversities in the contentments of particulars and that one self-same man is sometimes displeased with that he hath most affected; we may well say, there is some secret in joy which is not derived from any thing else, then it self. Chiron could not endure to be a feigned God, because he daily saw the same things. Polycrates was impatient to have Felicity fixed upon him, and sought, of his own accord, to become unfortunate, as one glutted with his own happinesse.

There are a thousand fantasticall tricks in a spirit over-much contented with worldly blessings, needs must our appetite in the same tone meet with objects, to accomplish our felicity: Wherefore it much importeth to habituate it in delight, which ariseth from things good, and laudable, to purchase its joyes at a low rate, to have them continually within ones self, without begging them from elsewhere, which will never happen

but

but by flight from unlawfull lusts, and by the application of our minds to things divine, For which purpose I will here represent unto you the reproach of evil pleasure, that you may adapt your selves to the sources of the delights of God.

§ 2. The Baseneſſe and Giddineſſe of ſenſuall Voluptuouſneſſe.

The essence of this Passion.

VVIcked pleasure is an inordinate delight in ſenſuall things, proceeding from a ſoft, nice, and effeminate ſoul which adhereth to its fleſh, and exceſſively loveth it, and which alſo oft proceedeth from a ſpirit become cold in the love of God, and darkned in the knowldge of the bleſſings of the other life, from bad education, and from many vitious habits contracted in youth: ſtrange is the dominion of fleſh, and admirable the ſway of pleaſures.

Delubrum voluptatis Iſa. 13, 21.

Figure unto ynur ſelf that you in a Table ſee that Edifice. which the Prophet Eſay calleth, The temple of pleaſure. It is a houſe of delight, where one entrethin by five gates which are all crowned with Roſes, and carry the badge of youth, and proſperity. The five gates are the five ſenſes, by which all the paſſages are made into carnall pleaſure, and which according to their nature are perpetually put upon ſenſuall pleaſures, and vain delights of the world: when one entreth into this houſe, he inſtantly feels the ſmoke of meats, he heareth a great noiſe in the Kitchin, and mixed with it a conſort of diſſolute people who chaunt, that, whch thoſe miſerable ſouls ſung in the booke of Wiſdome. Come, let us enjoy preſent bleſſings, and let us not torment our minds with the time to come; let us make much of creatures while they are in our power; let us take proſperity by the wing, Whilſt youth ſmileth on us. Let us ſpare neither rich wines nor perfume: the flower of time flyeth away, lay hold of it who can: Let us make coronets of roſes before they wither, and let there not be a meadow wherein our ſenſuality wantonly ſporteth not.

Venite fruamur bonis quæ ſunt, & utamur creaturâ tanquam in juventute celeriter, vino pretioſo, & unguento nos implea mus: & non prætereat nos flos temporis; coronemus nos roſis, antequam marceſcant, nullum pratum ſit quod non pertranſeat luxuria noſtra.

Then we behold a great number of thoſe drunkards, of whom the Prophet Eſay ſpeaketh, who are upon the ſide of a river, called the Forgetfulneſſe of God: ſome of them are frizeled, powdered, muſquefied; others ſmoke-dried, high-coloured, and Fiery-faced; others pale, meager, and out of countenance: ſome drink, eat, and make good chear ſo prodigiouſly, that Nature doth even burſt for anger: ſome toy, ſport, and triſle among women of their own humour: others fumble upon a Lute, ſing airs and prattle to pleaſe themſelves: others ſhuffle Cards, ſhake dice, and pitch battel at the ſound of money: others deſign ſtrange new dances in their fantaſies: and to conclude; all of them have no other aim, but the ſatisfaction of ſenſe, and the ſlavery of the fleſh.

The image of nice ones.

You ſee likewiſe among theſe heapes very many of ſuſpicious nicelings, who have as great a care of their health, as if the Species of men were to fail in themſelves. There are many people, who never by experience knew of what colour the Criſping of day was, and who aſwell alſo may vaunt, as the Sybarite, that they never ſaw the ſun either riſing or ſetting. Alchymiſts labour to turn copper into gold; but theſe men commonly turn day into night, and ſeek for elements apart to diſtinguiſh themſelves from other men, as being not made of the ſame matter with the reſt. They perpetually pick quarrels at the air, the winds, the ſeaſons; and there is ſcarcely a day clear enough for them: they muſt keep their chambers, learn the trick of dining in their beds, to beware of Planets, and Moons (as great enemies) and to fear the Serene as if it were ſome flying ſerpent, which came to rob them of their life: heat, cold moiſture, drought, travell, the way, are hoſtilities with them, againſt which they proclaim an everlaſting war. All theſe kinds of people would willingly make Epicurus his vow, which is, never to have any trouble, nor ever would they be diſpenced within it. If there be the leaſt ſhadow of ſome ſickneſſe; Phyſitians upon Phyſitians muſt be conſulted with, all the world muſt be enterteined with an imaginary evil, remedies muſt be ſought for, on all ſides; Druggs every hour, and of all kinds ſent for, ſo long, untill they have made an Apothecaries ſhop of thier bodies. But if really they be ſick; Hippocrates and Galen muſt be raiſed again, to feel their pulſe, ſo few Phyſitians they find to their liking, and then battels muſt be waged to take a medicine, or to receive a prick of the lancet, if peradventure the apprehenſion of it be lodged in the giddineſſe of their brains. When Death comes to look on them, he muſt have a gilded Maſk on, and be clothed with a garment of white ſattin, embrodered with pearles, and a little ſithe of Chryſtall put into his hands, or a ſilver dart, for they extreamely fear the ſtroke.

Laſtly, to be ſhort, you in this lodging obſerve infinite many who never make uſe of their feet, and as little of their head, but to trouble all the world: ſuch as cannot eat one morſell but with ſilver forks, nor cannot ſpit but upon the ſame metall; ſuch, whoſe viands muſt be more choiſe then were uſed in thoſe antient feaſts of falſe gods; There is not a Cook, a Groom, nor a maid-ſervant can content them; ſo many faſhions, ſingularities, and ſervices there are about them: you would ſay their life is a continuall ſacrifice repleniſhed with ceremonies. Every day they muſt be upon change of officers, and he who accommodateth not himſelf to their humour, is their open enemy. Were it not better for one to dy a thouſand times, or to live all the dayes of his life attending the moſt skittiſh Mule that is, then do ſuch ſervice to his body?

§ 3. The Sublimity, Beauty, and Sweetneſſe of Heavenly delights.

Remedies, True contentment is in God.

VVRetched Soul! if thou yet art not grieved to lead a life, an enemy to the Croſſe, odious to Reaſon, inſupportable to men: and if thou ſeekeſt joy and contentment, for which, it ſeemes to thee, we are born; lift up thine eye, and behold, delight in its ſource, which thou wilt never find but in the houſe of God. The wine of Palmes makes all other wine unſavoury, and men to be temperate; So the contentment which commeth from things divine, blotteth out the memory of all ſenſuall delectations.

Melior eſt racemus Ephraim vindemiis Abiezer. Judic. 8. 2.

One grape alone of Ephraim is better worth, then all the vineyards of Abiezer. One ſole pleaſure taken in heavenly objects, is a thouſand times more to be eſteemed then all the contentments in the world, whoſe deſire is nothing but fire; fruition, but diſturbance; and loſſe, but repentance. All the pleaſure of God is in God himſelf. He hath his Halls, his orchard, his delights, his Cabbinet, and his Paradiſe in his own boſome: he alone is an infinite good to himſelf, and ſuſtinent in all the latitudes of his beatitude: he enjoyeth it from all eternity, having no need of any creature, to augment the pleaſure of it, and to accompliſh the glory of it: and, if of neceſſity he muſt have company, and amity to make up an accompliſhed good; he never needed more then the moſt ſweet and lovely ſociety which he fouud before all Ages in the Trinity of perſons, amongſt whom there is a ſovereign Communication of bleſſings, joy, counſels, and nature. Now, it is an admirable thing that the ſame good which God out of neceſſity hath for himſelf, he hath prepared for us through Charity; and will we have any other Paradiſe, then himſelf! Maſters will not have any thing common with their ſervants, and if they could, they would not breathe the air wch ordinary people daily draw in without any difference; but would create another more pure and delicate, for their own uſe. God, all good, and all bounteous, doth quite contrary: For, all that, which is greateſt, moſt rare, and moſt to be wiſhed, is beatitude which boundeth the deſires of all the world; and he hath ſhared it with us, not dividing it, ſith he will, that every one of us poſſeſſe it without diviſion, as he enjoyeth himſelf without diſtinction of felicity between perſons. O what a ſhame is it, that a ſoul created for the delight of God, beggeth its contentment from an ape, from a parrot, from ſome ſauce, from a dance, or other thing more contemptible!

God poſſeſſing himſelf enjoyeth his contentment.

Three conſiderable qualities in the bleſſings of God.

The bleſſing of God hath three things, obſerved by S. Thomas, which marvelouſly recommend it, to wit, that it is moſt generall, moſt intimate, and moſt durable. If we found the like qualities in the pleaſures of the fleſh; I ſhould think they were wiſe, who provided themſelves of them: but if there be nothing leſſe in them, then all that which a well-rectified ſoul may deſire; why purſue we them, to enflame our thirſt and provoke our appetites? as for what concerneth Generality; the benefits of ſenſe have this want; they never generally delight, ſith the train of the Peacock, which pleaſeth the eye with its diverſified paintings, contents not the taſte at all; and that which pleaſeth the taſte doth not neceſſarily pleaſe either the touching, or ſmelling. Otherwiſe doth gold recreate, and otherwiſe delight; every creature hath its property and nature which limitteth the virtue thereof within a certain circumference: God is the object which gathereth together all delights, as he uniteth all bleſſings. O man, thou calleſt here under the little of Contentment, all that pleaſeth thee: Thy gold is thy contentment, and thy Farm thy contentment, and thy life thy contentment; but God is a contentment which includeth all other pleaſures: among theſe objects which charm thy ſenſes, that which is ſilver cannot be gold, and that which is wine cannot become bread, and that which is light cannot ſerve thee for drink: but thy God is that alone which conteineth the models of all pleaſures to be imagined.

Aurum tuum pax eſt, prædia tua pax, Deus tuus pax, quicquid hic deſideras, pax tibi erit, quia hoc aurum quod tibi eſt, non poteſt eſſe argentum: quod vinum eſt, non poteſt eſſe panis: quod tibi lux eſt, non poteſt eſſe potus; Deus tuus totum erit tibi. Aug. in Pſal. 36. ſerm. 1.

Secondly, if we regard the manner of delighting; all pleaſures of ſenſe paſſe but to the outward skin: and if they come to penetrate farther; they beat down our ſenſes which are not long able to bear an object ſo violent, although it be guſtfull and pleaſing. Our ſoul alone, as it is in its nature, is not mingled with that matter which tyeth things corporall: It hath a capacity almoſt infinite of not being weary of its object; and God who is a ſpirit-Creatour pierceth in into the bottome, and overfloweth it with eternall felicities. For, as for the third conſideration, we ſee all ſenſuall delectations paſſe along like a torrent which runs through a vally: but the bleſſings of God ever flow with an affluence which never dryeth, and therefore Hugh of S. Victor very well compared the favours of heaven to a miraculous oyl, which the Prophet Elizeus obtained by his prayer for the good widow: for as ordinarily oyl daily decreaſed in the veſſels wherein it was put; this, quite contrary, ſo multiplyed through the bleſſing of the Saint, that the woman was enforced to ſay, ſhe had no more veſſels to put it in. And how many ſee we in the world, who keep a wicked ſlight pleaſure as a drop of corrupt oyl which comes to nothing, and fadeth away as if it be not ſpent; whereas the conſolations of heaven do ſometimes ſo fruitfully overflow upon faithfull ſouls, that they confeſſe they have not a heart large enough ro contein them! O ſoul really penurious, worthy of all the poverties on earth; whom the riches of heaven cannot ſuffice! what haſt thou to do with thoſe ſtanding puddles of Egypt which do onely enflame thirſt in thy veins? wilt thou never ſeek for thy refreſhment in the Ciſterns of Bethleheem?

Hugo. l. 1. Miſcellaneorum. tit. 3. Ad oleum mundi vaſa deficiunt, oleum mundi in vaſis deficit.

§ 4. The Paradiſe, and joyes of our Lord, when he was on earth.

Our Lord paſſed all his life in contentments which were neceſſarily due to him, to give us an example to wean our ſelves from them. Hic eſt filius meus dileſtus in quo mihi bene complacui. Mat. 17.5.

LEt us, in the ſecond inſtance, behold what joyes and what pleaſures the incarnate word made choiſe of in this life; ſince it muſt ſerve us for a modell. Verily, were there a man in the world worthy to live in perpetuall delight; it was he, in whom the heavenly Father had choſen to place his heart, his joyes, and contentments: It is he, who is called by Saint Auguſtine the ſummary of all power, the Treaſury of virtues, the flower and quinteſſence of contentments, the ſweetneſſe of delights, and the perpetuall banquet of Angels. As ſupremely potent; he might afford himſelf all the pleaſures of Monarchs: as correſpondently virtuous; he might ſanctifie them in his own perſon: As being in poſſeſſion of the moſt pure delight (in ſuch ſort that the onely aſpect of his face ſerved for a delicious feaſt to all the bleſſed ſouls;) he ſeemed to be inſeparable from joy: He notwithſtanding would take ſo poor a part in the comforts of the world that he, who will conſider and behold the whole Table of his life from the time of his birth to his death, ſhall find he choſe the life of a Halcyon who liveth among thorns, whereof her neſt is made, and on the trembling agitation of waters, which ſerve it for a moving chariot. The life of Jeſus Chriſt was a thorny life among a thouſand difficulties which invironed it on all ſides, a life toſſed with a thouſand afflictions, which afforded him no reſt, a life like unto a piece of Tapeſtry wrought with threads of gold, wherein there was nothing but thickets of bryers and brambles. Good God! if we be threatned by ſome evil; we try all manner of helps, we offer vows to all the ſaints, and make heaven and earth to conſpire (if we can) to free us from it: we beſeech God to do miracles in our behalf, that we may ſuffer nothing; and he doth a perpetuall one in himſelf, to endure all which a ſupreme cruelty could invent, and an equall patience ſuffer. He permitted ſadneſſe to ſettle on him even in the boſome of Beatitude, as if a King ſhould give a ſergeant leave to bring him a ſummons in the midſt of the pleaſures of his Table. The two moſt triumphant daies of his mortall life ſeem to be, that, of his Tranſfiguration, and that, whereon he made his magnificent entranee into Jeruſalem; And yet on this; he wept, as moiſtning his triumph with tears from his eyes: and on the other, Moſes and Elias, who appeared by his ſides, to ſerve as Oratours in his praiſes, ſpake of that he was to fulfill in Jeruſalem (to wit) of his exceſſive ſufferings, as if one had proclaimed to Ceſar the ſentence of his death, at the inſtant when he entred into his Ivory chariot; to be drawn by four white horſes. Jeſus Chriſt was at that time in a body all reſplendent with lights, which was as a chariot to his ſoul, and he would, to be enterteined with his paſſion, mingle the Cypreſſe with the lawrell. I do not wonder the Fathers have applyed to him the paſſage of Geneſis; I will put my Bowein the clouds:

Totius poteſtatis ſumma, theſaurus virtutum, flos delectationum amœnitas deliciarum, convivium Angelorum. Aug. hom in Exurgens Maria.

This, verily was the Rainbowe of the Celeſtiall Father, which ſhone, and ſhowred both at one time; For we ſee, this goodly Meteor, all compoſed of clouds of glory which ſerve as a Mirrour for the ſun, ceaſeth not to pour down it ſelf in rain upon our heads; ſo, the Saviour of the world in the pavillion of the Beatitude of his ſoul all covered over with fires and lights, had eyes weeping over the ſins, and miſeries of men. Where think you were his joyes? S. Auguſtine will tell you, the ſoul of Jeſus Chriſt was perpetually content, becauſe it was drenched in God his father, as a drop of dew dew in the Ocean: It was ever in the place of pleaſures which were born with it. All it thought, all it did, all it aimed at, was nothing but God: and from this ſo perfect union, waited on by immortall ardours of his love, it derived its Immutability.

Arcum meum ponam in nubibus. Gen. 9.

Aug. lde Incarnatione Verbi-

The ſoul (beſides theſe delicious Torrents of beatifick viſion which overflowed it) drew its conſolations from the very ſufferings it endured for the glory of the Divine Majeſty. It drew them from the deſtruction of Idols, and from the confuſion of devils which yelled being now deſpoiled under its feet, from the exaltation of the Church in ſufferings and perſecutions, from the glory of ſo many ſouls who ſailed from the red ſea of their bloud to eternall rewards, from ſo many holy Virgins who were to follow the ſtandard of the purity which his Mother did firſt of all place on his Altars, from ſo many Doctours who ſhould be born to beat down hereſie in ſo many battels which were to be waged throughout the revolution of Ages, from ſo many Confeſſours who ſhould bedew themſelves with tears of penance, and burn themſelves in a Holocauſt of ſweetneſſe. All was preſented unto it, as in a burning-glaſſe; the rayes whereof reflected in diametre upon its heart to ſet it all on fire, in ſuch ſort, that it was then like to the great Angell of whom the Prophet Zachary ſpeaketh, who ſat upon a red horſe among gardens of Myrrhe, which are the Hieroglyphes of love; his red horſe was the ardour of his celeſtiall affection, and the branches of Myrrhe ſo many elect ſouls, which were even then in the Book of Preſcience, wherein he took unſpeakable delight. Zach. 1. 8.

§ 5. Againſt the Stupidity and Cruelty of worldly pleaſures.

AND now, (O diſloyall ſoul) to be called to the ſociety of the joyes of the celeſtiall Father, and of the ſonne of God; and to deſpiſe them for a miſerable fanſie of pleaſure! Ah, illuſion! Ah witchcraft! What ſenſe is there to feaſt perpetually, and to live in the profuſe exceſſe of Taſte and gourmandize, which you ſhall one day have more cauſe to curſe, then cheriſh; whilſt ſo many poor Widows, ſo many little Orphans, and people heretofore fortunate, now neceſſitous, even to the extremity of penury, have not dry bread to moiſten it with their tears, before they eat it? When have you enquired after their Calamities? When have you opened an eye to behold them? When have you ſo much as made a ray of mercy to reflect on ſo preſſing and deplorable miſeries? Go (O thou ungrateſull to God) traitour to thy own ſalvation, enemy of the poore, ſcorn of the rich, and priſon of humane Nature, who keepeſt it ſhut up in thy bowels of braſſe, not ſuffering it ſo much as to behold its like. What wilt thou anſwer to the voice of the bloud of ſo many poor who will plead againſt thee at the day of judgement, if thou from this time reſolveſt not to cut off thy ſuperfluities, to comfort their afflictions? where wilt thou find any to receive thee into thoſe celeſtiall manſions, if thou doſt not viſit the poor in their Hoſpitals, and Cabbins, abandoned by all the world? Where wilt thou find rewards from heaven, if thou ſoweſt not liberalities on earth? O thou nice wanton who wiltſt perpetually be obſerved according to the giddy fancies of the exorbitant ſpirit; and the many ſufferings which have covered, and ſwallowed up the third part of man-kind never to enter into thy thoughts! Of what fleſh, of what bloud, of what bones doſt thou think thou art made; to deſire here to be ſerved like a demy-God, and to walk on the heads of men? Ignorant of thy ſelf, nay Hangman of thy ſelf, who canſt not live without ſo much prodigality, ſuperfluities, and ſervices; not knowing that the firſt imitation of God is to depend little in the world on ought which concerneth the ſervice of the body. O thou old raven of the Deluge, who ſtill art tied with a long chain of ſervitude, to a wretched piece of Carrion which hath exhauſted the wealth of thy purſe, and brain! Is it then infamous pleaſure for which thou haſt renounced the delights of heaven, for which thou haſt betrayed thy ſalvation, and trampled under foot the bloud of the Teſtament; and thou not yet ſo vouchſafe to open thy eyes, to ſee the headlong ruine which threatneth thee? Unhappy Bacchanalians, who make Temples to be conſecrated among Chriſtians to Idolatrize you; where will you find any place to lodge you in, unleſſe you mean to leap, and skip upon the bloud of the lamb? Hence with riot, curioſity, ſports, feaſts, and diſſolute delights; I pronounce it, I publiſh it aloud, They are the Apoſtacies of Chriſtianity, if you daily go about to countenance their libertiſmes.

Ingrate Deo, tibi ne quam, hoſtis pauperum, divitum nota, carcer naturæ. Chryſol. ſerm. 104.

Traiterous pleaſures, pleaſures enemies of the Croſſe; ſee, ſee at the door of the houſe of theſe Syrens the ſepulchres of Concupiſcence which ſtink, and ſmoke ſtill with the diſaſtrous carrions of thoſe unſatiable bellies which made warre againſt heaven, to have dainties which they no ſooner received into their throats, but the anger of God fell on their criminall heads: and do you think that following their ſteps, you ſhall have better ſucceſſe? See, ſee Lots wife turned into a ſtatue of ſalt, who ſtill cryeth out with an eternall voice over the burning ruines of Sodome, and ſaith, For having looked back on a voluptuous City, yea on the flames of my puniſhment, behold me changed into a pillar of ſalt, that all poſterity may know, that Bodily Luſts are like unto ſalt water, which well may irritate thirſt, but never can quench it. See, ſee likewiſe thoſe Princes glutted with delights, crucified right againſt the ſunne, which at their death reprocbeth them with their crimes. O voluptuous! O carnall creature! the time will come, when thoſe members which thou wouldeſt not crucifie by a holy mortification on the Croſſe of Jeſus Chriſt, ſhall be crucified on the Croſſe of the bad thief, by the pains and torments which the Juſtice of God ſhall ſend thee, and it ſhall be ſaid; Crucifie, Crucifie him againſt the ſunne, that he dying may ſee him whom he hath deſpiſed; that he may ſee the ſun of Juſtice, againſt which he hath ſpit; that he in Idea may ſee the ſplendour of eternall delights which he hath left, to ty himſelf to a dunghill; that dying, Jeſus may reproch him with his ſenſualities, his diſſolutions, and ingratitudes. O God, rather hair-ſhirts, ſackcloth, aſhes, ſacks, thorns, faſts, auſterities, and ſharp raſours, then to fall into ſuch ignominy. Num. 11. 34. Gen. 19. 26. Num. 25. 4. Tolle cunctos Principes populi, & ſuſpende eos contra ſolem in patibulis: quia exſorticati cum Moabitibus comederunt ſacrificia Beelphegor. Hic ure, hic ſeca, modò in æternum parcas.

§ 6. The Art of Joy, and the means how to live contented in the world.

ONe of the beſt arts in the world is how well to rejoyce, and the man who finds out the myſtery of it, doth more then if he had diſcovered the fountain-head of Nilus, or the countreys which produce gold and diamonds. I will give you a brief method of it, to conclude the treatiſe of Delight; and place your ſoul (if you will take ſo much pains as to obey reaſon) in the ſtate of a moſt ſincere tranquillity. The art of Joy.

You muſt firſt of all imagine with your ſelf, that the earth whereon we live, is not the region of joyes, and what induſtry ſoever we may uſe, we ſhall not any long time of our life be impenetrable to cares, and Sadneſſe, which commonly grow from our condition.

It was a fanſie in King Abenner to be deſirous to breed up his ſonne in continuall pleaſure, never ſuffering him to be touched with the leaſt impreſſion of ſo Damaſcen.

many discontents, which occurre in the course of mans life. For which purpose he caused him to be educated in a pallace, which seemed to be consecrated to merriments, and delights: all, which Art and nature could do to make a man contented, was shut within this circuit, and the Father permitted not any thing to be presented before his sons eyes, which might have the power any way to displease him. In the end, this happy creature was troubled at his golden Cage, and delicious prison. He had a desire to behold the world: and having before never seen about him but flourishing troups of youth endowed with strength, garb, and health, enjoying full prosperity; he at his going out of the pallace met first a begger, then a leaper; lastly a man all worn with age; which sight instantly moved his heart, touched with much compassion of the miseries of mans life.

Cares enter into us by the gates of the senses, let them be never so well guarded: and if we have not wherewithall to be contristated; our own felicities displease us. Upon which Symmachus hath very well observed, that We are born in the world much rather for sorrows then joyes: pleasures which accost us stay not long with us, they have wings to forsake us, but to say truely, sweetest things in the world are given us for a use as short, as the sence thereof is feeble. And that which the more is to be lamented, is, that wits the most subtile are ordinarily the least satisfied; they are more greedy of the time to come, more distasted with the present, lesse forgetfull of evil past: They burn themselves with their proper light, and many times, to avoid an honest captivity, they frame themselves a thousand fetters. It is no disgrace, but, the desire of many; to be a beast a little, to live the more in repose; and to leave the tree of Knowledge to gather the fruit of life. Now albeit we cannot arrive in the state of this present world to a fulnesse of felicity; yet there are means somewhat to manage our life, and to lead it in innocent contentments. To reach this happinesse, it is necessary first of all to have a conscience very clean, and free from remorses, from crimes, and from sins, never well expiated; For that is it which lighteth up Torches, and which causeth furies, and Tormentours in the midst of a heart troubled with spectres of its own wickednesse. What joy hath a man who hath God his enemy, and who feels the Divine Justice to shoot lightnings, and shake thunder over his criminal head? nay, may we not say, there's not a moment of his life which is not steeped in the bitternesse of his thoughts? There is not a Thunderclap which seemeth not to roar for him; There is neither an anger in the heavens, nor a menace on the Earth, which seems not to conspire to his ruine. If you have passed your life very innocently; give thanks to God who is the Father of innocency, and the source of Sanctity.

But if by mishap you are fallen into some very grievous sinne; (following the Counsell of Cardinall Petrus Damianus) Mount up to the Tribunall of your understanding, lead your soul to judgement, let your thoughts accuse you, let your reason judge you, let your conscience lift up the sword, let it strike home, let the bloud of teares be seen to stream from the wound, and be you a Martyr of penance, to become a witnesse of the mercies of God.

It is to mount very high, to come to this first degree, but we must yet passe to the second, which is mortification of passions, because a soul perpetually mastered by its appetites cannot freely breathe the air of the children of God. It was in the confusion of stirres, that the Prophet Nahum accomplished his Prophecy. The voice of the whip, the voice of the impetuosity of wheels, of the neighing horse, and the flaming chariot, of the corvetting horseman, of the glittering sword, and of the lightning lance, where we see nothing but death and ruine. There is nothing but warres in a passionate spirit, the whip of Gods Justice scourgeth, the wheel of inconstancy there circumvolveth continually, their concupiscence neigheth. Pride walks in Triumph, anger shooteth its invenomed shafts, there virtues are ruined, and vices walk in pomp. And what pleasure can you have in these tumults, and in these nights, drawing so near to Hell!

It is held that pearls have a thick film which darkneth all their lustre; but when they have passed through the entrails of a pigeon which concocteth them by its heat, this skin falleth off, and they get a radiance infinitely beautious. The like happeneth in the matter of a soul troubled with some evil passion; it loseth the lustre which is imprinted thereon by the finger of God, and fadeth in the obscurity of its concupiscence; but if it throw it self into the heart of God, which is the holy Ghost it self, it tempereth the unruinesse of passions by his divine ardours, and is clothed with the most pleasing lights of the Empyreall Heaven, which are the sources of the most innocent delights. What a spectacle is it to see a man master over himself, who walketh according to the levells of God, as the hours by the degrees of the sunne, who preferres conscience before riches, virtue above honour, who will not be knowing but to understand his own ignorance, who desireth not to be potent but to do good, who of his words maketh decrees of wisdome, and of his life, a continuall harmony! Must we not confesse that he entereth into a fortresse, where envy no longer hath a tooth to hurt, calumny no serpentine tongue to sting him, nor fortune darts to strike him? It is not a simple word, but an Oracle of the seventy interpreters, when they said that a man who hath well mastered his passions, is the Physician of his own heart.

Adde to this victory over passions, a good choice of professions and vocations, which are to be exercised in humane life, wherein we necessarily must play some part, and have some reasonable employment to entertain our selves, otherwise Idlenesse oftentimes becomes the seminary of unquietnesse. There are men, who be in the world as dislocated bones in the body, They have hit ill by the mishap of their choice, they are not in the place, where the Divine Providence would have them. A storm of passion hath peradventure thrust one into a Cloister; an infirmity of flesh hath bound another too basely to some poor wedlock: those are bands which wisdome cannot break, although Imprudence hath many times tied them with its hands, we must sweeten them by reason, since they vex us by their necessity. A heart galled by some ill chance, which it knoweth to be incorrigible, hath much ado to find any joy, it must be created by art, seeing we cannot attain it by good luck, It will not be so genuine, but perhaps generous enough. It is a great mystery in matter of contentment, prudently to order the course of ones life, and not to put ones self upon bad businesses; to be guided rather by Counsel, then by passion, to dispose his persons, and family within limits civilly well rectified, neither to make matter for a Comedy of his name, nor for a Tragedy of his manners, to settle his little fortune in a pure tranquillity; not to be offensive, nor to have any enemies but such as have proclaimed enmity against Reason. Great estates are much more uncapable of contentment then mean; they have too great a Train, and in the great extent of their appertenances, they fall the more often upon all kind of hazards; their felicity is a body composed of a million of members, multitude burdeneth them, and the want but of one afflicteth them. We have seen Kings and Princes, who could not be merry, but by stealing themselves from themselves, and by forsaking Symmach. ep. l. 1. Sic nati sumus ut sæpius adversis fungamur, & bonæ uniuscujusque rei tam brevis usus, quam levis sensus est.

Salmeron in Parab. Evang.

Πεφύκασι ἀνθρωποι ἀργὸν μὴ εἶναι. Eccl. 30. 23. ubi vulgata Exultatio viri est longævitas.

Damian. serm. 30. Ascende tribunal mentis, & temetipsum pertrahe ad judicium quæstionis, cogitatio accuset, animus judicet, pœnitens conscientia velut Carnifex, feriat, lachrymarum rivu vulnus erumpat: Sic per Martyrii similitudinem ad veram pervenies Martyrii dignitatem. Nahum. 3. 2.

forsaking the ensignes of their dignity, to descend to the conversation of more inferiour conditions.

There are many in the world, who are incited by great worldly ambitions, but who having met the golden mean, habituate themselves in their condition, and there to adapt them, as Halcyons to their nest: They have the dew of Heaven, and the fat of the Earth, wealth, children, inheritances, houses, money, health, and friends; they manure the gifts of God, in an assured repose, it seemeth contentments are onely made for such men. Such is the felicity described by the Poet Martial. Wealth which comes by succession not by pains-taking, land which affords a good revenew; a perpetuall fire, no suit, no servitude, a mind contented, a body sound and conveniently strong; a prudent simplicity: friends suitable, domesticks obsequious, a Table without art, night free from cares, and not burthened with wine, a bed not sad, but chaste; sleep which makes the night seem short; to desire to be what one is, and not reach at no more; neither to fear the last day of our life, nor to wish it. Behold the bounds of humane happinesse, which are well enough expressed according to the opinion of the world; and such as walk these wayes, readily sequester themselves from all disturbances of care, and would not in any sort approve the ceremonious customes of the Jews, who commonly carryed panniers and Hay along with them in a journey, to put them in mind that their ancestours had carried earth and morter in Egypt. But yet we must tell you, it were to make life too beggerly, and too much depending on fortune; to think felicity is included within so narrow bounds. There needeth but a moment to pull down a nest, which a bird hath built with time and pains; nor needeth there also but one misfortune to dissipate all the little Oeconomy of humane prudence.

Martial. Epig. l. 10.

Cunæus l. 1 de Rep. Hebr.

Learn a good lesson of contentment, which shall be, not to rejoyce much at vain and mutable things: to unloose your self, what you may, from sense, and to fly into the region of Angels, therein to find your contentment. There is ordinarily much satisfaction in the commerce one hath with God, in great and worthy actions, in good conversations and pure amities, in the estimation which proceedeth from virtue, in the contemplation of totall Nature therein to find the God of Nature, in the last of the maximes, and verities of our Religion, and (if you be of capacity) in Eloquence, Poetry, Painting Musick, the Mathematicks, in Games which are most spirituall, Histories, Books, meetings of good wits, woods and solitudes. Discharge your delights (as much as you can) from matter, to approch unto those of Paradise. Fix them not on things which are hard to atchieve, and easie to be lost; practise your spirit, to find them in your heart, as a good father of a family, who ever hath wherewith to live, and to feast his guests in his own house. Forget not in the time of fair weather to prevent the storm of humane accidents, and dayly think how you may put your self under covert within your self; but, which is more, into the bosome of God. When Gyges his ring was turned towards the world, it made him visible to all there present; but when he drew it back towards himself, he became invisible and impregnable against such as wished him ill. If your quality cause you to look towards the world, and pompously to propose you to the eyes of beholders; remember you must have a Retreat, and innocent invisibilities to vindicate your self from the throng of importunacies.

When you shall have well-grounded the matter of your contentments, then neglect not the form and fashion of them. Imitate not those, who on a sudden drench and drown themselves in pleasure, with a voluntary drunkennesse, which presently deprives them of all pleasure; Distill your joyes, like unto a heavenly dew; moisten your heart, but overflow it not; otherwise it is to be feared in such as are of a very soft temper, lest the approch of excessive joy may cause a great evaporation of spirit, and leave the heart destitute of heat and vigour: which caused Zeuxes the painter to die laughing, as he beheld the rough draught of an old woman, which he was a finishing; and the Poet Philemon, by seeing an Asse that came to eat figs on his Table.

Howsoever it be, distaste sticks to the extremes of the greatest pleasures, as Canthurides on the fairest Roses. Resemble not those who overflow in their favours, who publish their own prosperities, and tell them to all the world; which raiseth them many envious and maligne spirits who stirre up tempests in their imaginary tranquillity: Rejoyce (said an antient) in your bosome; do all the good you practise from morning till night with pleasure; and when any misadventure befalleth you, ever think it is a great favour from God it went no further, and that the divine providence is satisfied with a little hurt. Call sometimes to your memory the ill daies and dangers you have escaped by the goodnesse of God, that you with the more gust may taste your repose. If you be fortunate, hold you there, and be not like the dog in the Fable, who let go his piece of flesh to catch a shadow. The foolish Idolaters of Egypt, after they had Courted their god Apis in so many studied fashions, after they had found him with so much satisfaction, after they had received him with so much applause, killed him to put another in his place. That is it which all senselesse worldly spirits do; they disturb their own pleasures, and themselves, to live to become the conquest of a Chymera of honour, or of some pleasing thing, which keeps them in a perpetuall famine. You are permitted to love the gifts of God, to derive a little tribute of contentment out of all creatures, to restore it to the Authour, to avoid discontented humour, spirits troublesome and complaining, to please your self with good Company: But if you desire to know the mystery of mysteries in pleasure; understand, you shall never find it but when you shall learn to rejoyce in tribulations, out of a desire you have to conform your self to Jesus Christ. That is the joy which all the Saints have studied with pain, have found with delight, and have tasted with glory. That is it which Saint Peter calleth, The ineffable, and the glorified; That which S. Irmes said contained the consummation of all comforts: That which Saint Paul found in Caverns, S. Laurence on the Gridiron, S. Katharine on the wheel, S. Apolonia in flames; Lastly, That which cometh from the throne of the Lamb, and which with its eternall streams watereth all the plants of Paradise.

Exultabitis lætitiâ inenarrabili & glorificatâ. 1. Pet. 1, 8 Omne gaudium. Jac. 1, 2.

The

The sixth Treatise, Of SADNESSE.

§ 1. Its Description, Qualities, and the Diversity of those who are turmoiled with this Passion.

The Essence and Image of Sadnesse. Cujus initium excitas obtinet, progressum labor, dolor exitum, error omnia. Petrarch. de remediis.

A Wise man said that man entreth into life, as into a Career, where in the beginning, blindnesse putteth a scarf over his eyes, then delivers him over to labour which giveth him a heavie stone to roll all the length of the life, labour placeth him in the hands of sorrow and Sadnesse; sorrow (which properly is a dislike had against objects contrary to its inclination) exerciseth him principally in the body: Sadnesse, which is a passion of the reasonable Appetite, that filleth the heart with acerbity by the privation of amiable objects, and by the representation of things grievous and opposite to Nature, works upon the soul, which it incessantly afflicteth. Some are slowly wasted by perpetuall languours, others are many times seised on with so much violence that they suddenly dye of it, as it happened to a son of Gilbert Duke of Montpensier, who yielded up the ghost on the Tomb of his father.

This passion hath for nurse, softnesse of spirit, seeing a soft soul is ordinarily eaten by anxiety, and gnawn by perplexity, as iron is consumed by Rust: It is seated in Melancholy, for the Melancholick are they who most feel the burdens of life, the spirit being deprived of alacrity, which useth to season things the most bitter. Faintnesse and discouragement are ever by its sides to torment it: because they are the two passions which dry up the Humidum radicale, quench the heate, drain the source of spirits, and constitute the whole state of its mischief. Round about it fly cares, discontentments, and annoyes; since these are its companions, and most ordinary enterteinments. The heart of it is filled with an infinite number of desires, being our discontentments do multiply according to the measure of our desires; and that he who desireth nothing, quarrels at no body, nor is impatient at the burdens which the providence of God layeth on his shoulders. It liveth on gall, as being nourished by continuall acerbities: It looketh back farre off after contentment, which flieth from it, insomuch as its onely torments consisteth in desiring and not enjoying: It beholdeth it self in a pond of standing water, because such are the objects of sadnesse, which the impatient set before their eyes, to stirre up in them many troubled and uncollected fantasies. Lastly, it is one while, little, crouching, and loutish, with a countenance of lead, and weeping eyes; another while also it is furious, enflamed, and fretfull; to signifie unto us two sorts of impatient men, whereof the one silently bites the bridle, having no means to come to the end of their pretentions: and the other breaks out into extraordinary fury, with intention to tear asunder the obstacles which oppose their designs. Behold the picture of sadneste drawn out of Philosophy and reason. Now, I may well adde, following the conceits of the wise, that I see infinite many in this picture who have not all the same liveries; For the Kingdome of this Passion, is an admirable Purgatory, where punishments are divers, and every one participates of them according to the quality of his apprehension, and the diversity of objects. Such (saith S. Ambrose) is the condition of our life, Roses, which before sin grew without thorns, are afterward on all sides armed with sharp-pointed prickles, to teach us that the most smiling fortunes take part in the cares, and miseries of the condition of mortals.

Spina gratiam floris, humanæ speculum præferens vitæ, quæ suavitatem perfunctionis suæ finitimis curarū stimulis sæpe compungit. S. Ambr. l. 3. Hexameron.

I observe nice impatient ones, who have been bred as it were between silk and cotton, and who never beheld the miseries of the world, but through shadows and clouds, and therefore the use they have taken to be served from their childhood according to their humour, causeth patience to be a matter very extraordinary with them. So you see that upon the least occasion presented of suffering, their weak spirit shrinks within it self, and their tender flesh makes resistanee. These are they of whom the Prophet Baruch spake, My nice ones have walked through hard and rough wayes. And of whom Seneca hath aptly said; They are ulcers which are irritated when they are lightly touched, or that you make but a shew to do it. I on the other side observe suspicious Impatient ones, who skirmish with flies, and are tormented upon shadows of affronts which never were, continually ruminating on some slight cold countenance not purposely shewed them, or some word spoken, meerly out of freedome of speech: on the other side, I see of them that are prompt, and sharp, whose bloud quickly comes into their faces, whose eyes sparkle, voice is shrill, fashion turbulent, and veins wholly bent upon revenge, so that they do not long dispute with a yoke, but break it, and runne at randome, where they oftentimes commit as many errours as they go steps. I observe others, who are more bitter then sharp in their Impatience, and in this number I behold many wayward, and prying old men; who still have some accusations to make against the actions of youth. I see many Courtiers discountenanced, many entranced lovers, many officers, servants male and female dismissed, many suitours rejected in their pursuits, many envious, who repine at the prosperity of their Neighbour: on the other part I behold many persons afflicted in the world, one with sickneste, another for the death of a friend, one with contempt, another with slander, one with poverty, another with deformity of body; some with indispositions of mind, and other temporall mishaps. It is of this Sadnesse whereof the Wise-man speaketh, when he saith, that Even as the moth marreth a garment, and a little worm gnaweth wood, so Sadnesse insensibly eateth the heart of man.

Impatient of divers qualities.

Delicati mei ambulaverunt viæ difficiles. Baruch. 1. 26.

Prov. 25. Sicut tineæ vestimento, & vermis ligno, ita tristitia viri nocet cordi.

Lastly, I see many miserable creatures, who cease not to find fault with their vocation, and to complain of those who govern them, to accuse the Age, and seasons; and oft-times to call God in question. Some tell their evil to all the world, like unto those sick persons who sought for remedies from all who passed by the gates of their Temples: others hatch their discontent in the bottome of their heart, and have much to doe, that it be not seen in their faces; others publickly drag their Crosse through Currents of water, with murmures and imprecations; of which the Scripture saith: That the clamour and noise of their exclamations openly brake forth. Others cannot rest in any place, being weary of all manner of sports, recreation and company: others are vexed at themselves, are dotish, melancholick, frightfull, as if they had some evil spirit in their heart, so much oppression of mind they feel: they neglect all the offices of civill life; yea, and the functions of naturall life, loth any longer to eat or drink, as if they already were in their graves: from thence proceed black fansies, illusions, despair, and a thousand agitations of mind, which cannot be sufficiently expressed. It is Sadnesse which in Scripture is called a generall Plague. Verily it is a lamentable thing to see, how we are here handled by the unhappinesse of our passions. I am not ignorant, there are dolours so great, and Sadnesses so ſo deep, that an extraordinary grace of God is neceſſary to free a ſoul from it which is touched with it, and to ſet it at liberty; but we muſt likewiſe ſay, that we often betray our Repoſe and Conſcience, by ſuffering ſo many bad ſeeds to grow up in our hearts, which we might kill with ſome reſiſtance of virtue, and ſome ordinary help of the grace of God.

Tumultus murmurationum non absconde-atur. Sap. 1.

Omnis plaga. Eccl. 25. 17.

§ 2. Humane Remedies of Sadneſſe, and how that is to be cured which proceedeth from melancholy and puſillanimity.

WHilſt the great Genius of Phyſick, Hyppocrates, drave away maladies by his precepts and almoſt ſnatched bodies out of the hands of death, one Antiphon aroſe in Greece, who envious of his glory, promiſed to do upon ſouls what the other did on mortall members, and propoſed this ſublime invention which Plutarch calleth the art of curing of all Sadneſſes: where we may truly ſay, he uſed more vanity, promiſes, and oſtent of words, then he wrought good effects. Certainly it were to be wiſhed, that our age (which is ſo abundant in miſeries) ſhould likewiſe ariſe great comforts to ſweeten the acerbities of the times, to pour oil on the peoples yoke (as the Scripture ſpeaketh) to enter into the interiour of ſo many poor ſouls beaten down with Sadneſſe, and waſted with cares, to draw them out of the ſhadow of death with the firſt raies of ſome felicity. Another Helena were needfull to mingle the divine Drug of Nepenthe in the meats of ſo many afflicted perſons, who moiſten their bread with their tears before they eat it.

Τέχνῃλυπῶν ἀκεσαι, Plutarch. in vita Io. Rhetorum.

Iſa. 10. 27.

For my part, I think, that to apply a remedy to Sadneſſe, there muſt a diligent conſideration be had of its nature, kind, and quality, for fear that going about to give it comfort, the evil be not exaſperated, or that a medicine be unprofitably applyed.

Four kinds of Sadneſſes

There are Sadneſſes which come from humour, there are which proceed from puſillanimity, others are cauſed by ſcruples, others by an infinite many of irkſome objects which happen in the chances of humane life.

As for thoſe which grow from Melancholick humour, they are deep rooted, as being the inheritances of Nature, and the effects of Temperature. They may notwithſtanding be greatly moderated by prudence, diſcretion, and ſtudy, which one may uſe in overcoming them. It were not to be deſired to cut off all manner of Melancholy at once, when it is born with us, and proportioned to the functions of our mind and motions of our body. It is a land which ſeemeth ſomewhat dry, but it hideth great treaſures. What would become of ſubtilty of wit, weight of judgement in conceits, invention in ſciences, indefatigable labour in affairs, conſtancy in reſolutions, a corrective for light humours, beſeemlineſſe in modeſty, perſeverance in devotion; ſtrength in meditation, conſtancy in ſerious life, patience in contempt exerciſe of humility; if the Melancholick temperature, and Saturnian influence did not thereto contribute ſolidity? It's that which maketh great Captains, ſage Counſellours of State, divine Philoſophers, and the moſt famous Religious: From whence it cometh, that the Antiens called it the paſſion of Demy-gods. Onely heed muſt be taken it run not into ſome exceſſe, and render not nature ſharp, criticall, preſumptuous, inflexible, and odious; For by that means, certain ſpirits too much do ſooth their own humour, uſing therein not any correction, make themſelves among company, that which Aconite is among plants. They are inſupportable in converſation, and oft-times mingling vanity with ſharpneſſe, there is not any thing wherein they will not find ſomewhat to reprehend in words, in ſciences, in affairs, in ſport, in recreation, in voyce, in garb, in habits: and becauſe nothing pleaſeth them, they many times diſpleaſe all the world. It is a great prudence in ſuch as feel themſelves naturally diſpoſed to Melancholy, to cultivate their mind, and to take from it all which may make it harſh by a perpetuall countrepoiſe of ſweetneſſe and mildneſſe. The wicked Rutilius thought all the Anachorets and Religious were ſick of Bellerophon's diſeaſe, which is a furious ſadneſſe; but he is groſly deceived. For it is undoubted, there are great Religious perſons, who drawing nought out of Melancholy, but ſolidity and conſtancy, do aſſociate unto it, out of virtue, a ſingular ſerenity of life, ſo that it is a hard matter to find any of a humour more pliant and pleaſing. Palladius in his Lauſiac Hiſtory, maketh mention of a famous Abbot named Apolon, who was the father and maſter of about five hundred Monks, whom he maintained in ſo perfect alacrity, that their countenances ſeemed to bear the characters of Celeſtiall tranquillity. There were none ſad, and if any one ſeemed to be touched with heavineſſe, the good Abbot drove it away by his diſcourſe, as ſwiftly as the Northern wind diſpelleth the clouds, ſaying unto them, It was for Jews, for Gentiles, and for ſinners to be contriſtated; but good religious men ought to entertain an eternall commerce with Joy.

Rutilius in Itinerar.

Pallad. in hiſt. Lauſia.

S. Athanaſius ſaith of S. Anthony, that his face was a looking-glaſſe, wherein God cauſed the ſanctity of his mind to be reſplendent, and that he alwayes ſeemed chearfull, as if the bloomings of his heart had put his venerable face all into bloſſome. So much ſaith Denis (ſurnamed the little.) S. Pachomius (a man very eminent, who, in body altogether diſſolved with auſterities and maladies) did in converſation retain the vigour of holy alacrity. It is an imitation of the Saviour of the world, who, according to the Prophet Eſay, was to be neither ſad nor tempeſtuous. And as pious Anna of whom is ſpoken in the firſt book of Kings, forſook all the countenances and crabbed looks which ſadneſſe cauſed in her ſo ſoon as ſhe had conceived the little Samuel: ſo we muſt inferre, that a ſoul which is honoured with the ſpirituall conception of Jeſus formed in his heart, is able to drive away all the diſturbances of dolour. Otherwiſe, if this evill humour of Sadneſſe be cheriſhed, without breaking it upon all occaſions by convenient diverſions and the direction of reaſon, it encreaſeth with age, and being aided by evil diſpoſitions of body, it often degenerateth into ſhamefull follies and hideous frenzies. From thence are come thoſe Melancholicks of whom Gallen ſpeaketh, whereof one thought himſelf to be an earthen-pot, the other imagined he was a cock, and ceaſed not to crow and clap his wings; the other feared that Atlas would let the heavens fall. And Trallianus aſſureth, there was a woman who continually kept her hand very cloſely ſhut, fearing leſt the world, which in her opinion was held between her fingers, might eſcape her. Such Melancholies (ſaith S. Jerome) ſtand more in need of Hippocrates his remedies, then the diſcourſes of Philoſophers.

S. Athan. c. 40. in vita S. Anton.

Dionyſius exiguus in vita S. Pachomii.

Non erit triſtis neque turbulentus. Iſa. 42. 4. 1 Regum. Vultus ejus non ſunt amplius in diverſa mutati.

Utility of melancholy

Saturnus ſi fuerit optimè conſtitutus, largitur ſcientiæ profunditatem.

Gal. c. 6. l. 3 de locis affectis.

Trallian. l. 1 cap. 16.

But laying aſide theſe Sadneſſes of naturall Melancholy, it is fit to know, that which proceedeth from a tedious anxiety of heart, is very hurtfull to the practice of virtue, and may be cured by the reſolution and courage of a well-diſpoſed will. It is the malady which the Grecian calls Acedia, againſt which Caſſian wrote a whole book, ſhewing, it faſteneth very eaſily upon perſons who make profeſſion of Devotion, if they uſe not labour and ſtudy to divert it.

Abditas. Ἡροΐκὸν νόσος. Gellius l. 18 cap. 9.

Caſſian. lib. de ſpiritu Acediæ.

Sad ſpirits.

And verily, there are people in no ſort fit for Religion, nor the exerciſes of Meditation, who, neverthe-

leſſe

leſſe are therein embarked through levity or ignorance, never having well weighed the greatneſſe of that vocation. But if they meet ſome ſpirituall Directours, either indiſcreetly Zealous, or little experienced, they will raiſe them from earth, and inſtantly apply them to the higheſt contemplations, drawing them from handy labours and employments of civill life. I would willingly ask what can they elſe do but fall into the paſſion of ſlothfulneſſe, into anxieties and languors, which make life unprofitable to them; In the mean time, they who have undertaken the charge to guide them in their Labyrinth, make them many times believe theſe dryneſſe, and diſreliſhes are the viſitations of God, who will try them; and that they muſt go on and not faint, nor ſuffer the honour of their crown to wither. And there are, who living as beaſts in a meer lazineſſe of ſpirit, imagine it is an Inaction which cauſeth a ceſſation from all the functions of their ſoul, to let the Spirit of God to work in them. Hereupon, we ſee ſome Devoters ſo well practiſed in this myſtery, that they abandon all the correſpondencies due to a huſband, all the care of their children, all the providence they ought to have for their family and houſhold affairs, to ſatisfie the fancies of their mind. It is not Devotion which teacheth them this, nor is it fit that Libertines hereby take occaſion to condemn the exerciſe of piety. It is an errour muſt be corrected, and ſpeedily, ſuch ſpirits muſt be reduced to labour and care for affairs, to cure their ſadneſſe. It is the counſel which the Apoſtle gave to the Theſſalonians: We entreat you (my brethren) to profit more and more, and to endeavour to be peacefull, and that attending your affairs, you take pains with your hands, as we have appointed you, that you by your converſation may edifie thoſe who are none of ours, and that you may need nothing. The fore-alledged Authour notably deduceth this Text of Saint Paul, with many other which he citeth, ſhewing, that a ſingular remedy for Sadneſſe, cauſed by Idleneſſe, is, the occupation of the mind and body.

1 Theſ. 4.

The ſcrupulous.

For my part, I am perſwaded, that by this means many ſcruples might be cured, wherewith divers minds are now-adayes miſerably turmoiled. For they no ſooner enter into the great repreſentations of Gods judgement, of ſinnes, and of the torments of the damned, but they preſently bear all Hell on their ſhoulders. The thunders of the divine Juſtice roars not, but for them, and for them the lightning-flaſhes; they build ſcaffolds in their heart, whereon their imaginations walk; they nail themſelves on voluntary Croſſes, and bind themſelves on racks, making an executioner of their mind, and a continuall puniſhment of their life. All they think (in their opinion) is ſin; all they do, nought but diſorder; and all they expect, meer malediction. They never have made a good Confeſſion, they have ever forgotten ſome circumſtance, they have not well ſummed up the number of their ſinnes, the Confeſſour hath not well compriſed what they would ſay; they muſt eternally begin again, and for trifles of no value: they muſt run and weary all the tribunals of Confeſſion, and employ more time then would be needfull for a man who ſhould manage all the great affairs of France. It is a pittifull thing, and verily tyrants never invented ſo rigorous torments, which ſuperſtition (witty in the fruitfulneſſe of its own tortures) ſurpaſſeth not. It ſo toileth the mind, that the body is extremely weakned, which is ſeen in a face diſcoloured and wan, a brow heavy, an eye troubled, a heart ſobbing, a countenance ghaſtly, a loſſe of ſleep and appetite, a forbearance of all recreations and pleaſures of life.

To ſpeak truly, theſe poor ſouls are worthy of compaſſion: for they are perpetually in moſt painfull Purgatories. Efficaciouſly to comfort them, they muſt be put into the hands of ſome prudent, charitable, and reſolute man, who may enter into their heart, and may be (as it were) the ſoul of their ſoul. They muſt be drawn from this indigeſted and too frequent devotion, from all thoſe generall confeſſions ſo often reiterated; they muſt not be permitted to accuſe themſelves of all the vain imaginations of their interiour, but of the tranſgreſſions which paſſe to their exteriour. They muſt be made to account their doubtfull ſinnes for not ſinnes. ſince ordinarily the ſcrupulous have a mind wakefull and adverſe enough to themſelves, not to doubt of any grievous ſinne; great conceits muſt be put into them of the goodneſſe and mercy of God; their courage muſt be raiſed; and they, inſtead of ſinnes, cauſed to ſet down in writing, or otherwiſe, their good works, and the favours they have received from God. It is ſometimes fit to change meditations into good broths, to excite them with ſome generous thought, to ſtirre them up ſome difference or ſuit if it be needfull, to hold them in buſineſſe interlaced with honeſt repoſe, and convenient recreation; to handle them ſometimes a little ſeverely, to teach them to believe, and to ſuffer themſelves to be directed, and to accuſtome them to brave this ſcrupulous conſcience and to vaunt to have deſpiſed whatſoever it dictateth. Laſtly, to perſwade them there one is who hath anſwered for their ſoul before God, and that if there be any ill in his direction, he ſhall be damned for them and no hurt come to them thereby. To commend them for their docibleneſſe when they obey, to let them ſee the fruit of their obedience in the conſolation of their ſoul, to exhilerate them, to heighten them, to take them from themſelves, and to turn them into other perſonages. Many have been abſolutely cured by theſe kinds of proceedings, many much ſweetned. For there are of them who ſuffer all their life time, their thoughts being as devils ſettled in ſome poſſeſſion which never fully forſake them; but they muſt be let to underſtand, the croſſes ordained them in this life, and that undertaking a good reſolution for patience, they ſhall multiply their merits.

Remedies for ſcrupulous minds.

§ 3. The remedy of Sadneſſes which proceed from divers accidents of humane life.

HEnce I diſcover very long dilation of pleaſures daily framed in ſo many divers occaſions, which makes it ſufficiently appear unto us, that as of all living creatures, there is not any, more delicate, more ſenſible, and which is waited on with ſuch a train, as man; ſo there is none more expoſed as a Butt for all accidents, which are of power to occaſion trouble, then he. Alas! what is man who maketh a crime of his birth, a ſlavery of his life, and an horrour of his death? To ſalute day-light with his teares, to come into the world to be inſtantly crucified, his mouth open to cryes and hunger, to bring a barren mind, a frail body, enraged concupiſcences, to be a beaſt ſo many years, then an infant to feel his miſery; to ſee his poor liberty fettered, to live under the fear of rods, in a perpetuall reſtraint of will; then to enter into adoleſcency, followed by youth, which cauſeth loud ſtorms of paſſions to beare along with them the ſeeds of all his miſeries. After that, a ſervitude of marriage, an evill encounter of wives and husbands, of affairs, of cares, of poverty, of children, of ſlanders, of quarrels, affronts, of contumelies, of bodily pains, of faintneſſe of ſpirit, of ruines of families, of poiſon, of puniſhments, of privation of all one loveth, of vexations by all one hateth, an old age contemptible, ſick, and languiſhing. Death a hundred times invoked, to fly from the miſerable, and to lay

Miſeries of Humane condition.

lay hold of the fortunate. With all this, to see abysses of fire, and torments prepared for sins, ordinary in worldly life. Who is it that trembleth not, thinking upon all these objects? and who saith not, that one must be either well fortified with prudence to divert his evils, or have patience to bear them?

The subjects of our afflictions.

Note, that all which may afflict us, is reduced to the losse of goods, of credit, of friends, of incommodities of body or mind; and that our miseries, which we think to be infinite, are confined within three small limits. For all the Sadnesses which may arise from these five sources, God hath given us five remedies: Sense, Reason Time, Necessity, and Grace. There are many dolours which grow from the senses, and are likewise cured by the senses. We must not think all Sadnesses have ears patiently to hear the discourses of Philosophers. There is question how to help the soul by the body. hundred shillings are of more worth then a hundred reasons to a poor wretch who hath need of sustenance and refreshment to solace his pains. A little good usage, meat, apparel, a Crosse upon gold or silver, remedieth many Crosses of needy people. If they to whom God hath given worldly wealth, took the pain to imitate so many honourable personages, and to accustome themselves to visit the shamefaced poor, they would dayly do miracles, they would drive away the devils of Melancholy, bad humors, spectres, despairs, and maladies, they would pull millions of souls out of the hands of their evil fortunes. and would be more to men then were the demy-Gods of Antiquity,

Five remedies for all Sadnesses.

How many herbs, simples, compositions of physick; how many lenitives; what powerfull effects of Chyrurgery, being well ordered, do cure strange infirmities, and do pluck one from out of the gates of death? But as the cure and easing of the senses is neither present nor efficacious with all the world: what should a man do who hath never so little heart, but try to cure himself by reason? It is it which God hath given unto man instead of so many offensive and defensive armes, born with other creatures; why should we not use its help? It is it which teacheth us, that grief is nothing else but an apprehension of division, and that as we are out of excesse tyed to all pleasing things in the world, so the want of them becomes very sensible, in such sort, that our Sadnesses ordinarily proceed from our love; Experience sufficiently shewing, that all such spirits as most are in love with themselves, are the most tormented: but if we come to lessen those geat affections which straightly tie us to conceits, and account as lost all which may be lost; there is no doubt, but we shall begin to find a wholesome medicine for all the afflictions of life. A mother, greeved for the death of her sonne, said in Quintilian, That all her evil came from loving too much what she might lose, and that our passions are insensibly most ardent for things which must quickly be taken from us, as if our grief were to take revenge upon the exorbitancy of our love. It is reason that weakneth the opinion of evils, which many times torment us more then their effect. It, which giveth light to things obscure, order to confused, vigour to languishing, and resolution to despair: there is nothing for which it finds not a lenitive; if poverty make you sad, why complain you? Ignorant of thy self, (saith it unto us) it is not poverty, it is thy fancy which tormenteth thee. No man is ever so poor as he is born. Hast thou brought gold in thy veins, and pearls in thy entrails, that thou complainest of the change of thy condition; why dost thou set thy self upon the rack for a thing, whereof Jesus made boast, and so many wise-men make vows? Expect a little, Death will make thee as rich as Crœsus. If thou thinkest thou art poor, for that thou hast not what thy covetousnesse desireth, it is an Illusion. If thou wantest necessaries for life after thou hast lived commodiously and happily, it is somewhat painfull, but make thy self a good poor man since God will have thee such; suffer a while without murmuring, and the divine Providence will not fail to raise for thee the mercy of some rich man to become thy steward. Pray, be patient, endeavour, take paines, live meanly, thou shalt become rich by learning to live contented. If a suit be lost, what cares, what apprehensions, what pains, what toils are in the same instant lost? If it be according to Justice, endure it; if angainst Justice, those who have lost their conscience in making thee lose thy cause, have more cause to be sorry then thou. If thou hast lost much in game, it is a lesson of wisdome to cure a folly; If thou hast lost all, give thanks to God that thou shalt never lose any more so basely, and that thou hast meanes to purchase a little in this occasion. If fire and water, winds and tempests, harpies and theeves take away thy goods; what wilt thou do against chance, violence, and iniquity, but preserve submission and innocency? The whole masse of worldly wealth is a torrent, which swelleth now upon one side, and then upon another: let that go with patience which thou canst not hold by force. If slander assail thy renown, and condemne thee, perhaps it doth that thou oughtest to do hadst thou more virtues. Many by despising themselves have prevented all contempts. Tongues cannot hurt thy conscience; we stand before God such as we are, and all the teeth of calumny, take not from us one sole atome of perfection. Others have but one tongue to say, and thou hast two hands to do. Perfect thy life since it hath censures: verity will force light through those vapours of waligne spirits, derive glory out of thy proper confusion. If thou beest discountenanced by great ones, put thy self into the good favour of God, who is above all greatnesse, and after thou hast made thy self a slave to men, live a while a master over thy self. Thou shalt find envy will have consecrated thee, and that thy punishments will make a part of thy felicities, If thou entrest into sadnesse for being frustrated of some expected good, wherefore art thou so earnest in thy desires, and so credulous in thy hopes? and wherefore makest thou crosses to thy self out of thy own thoughts? If it be for the absence of a beloved friend, thinkest thou he must continually be tied to thee, as if he were a second body? It is in absence where our imaginations oftentimes render all that we affect most present; we enter into the bottome of our soul, and there find the images of our friends despoiled of matter and body: we practise the best amities in mind, where the envious watch us not, the jealous observe us not, and the troublesome interrupt not our discourses. If this good friend be goue into the other world, we every moment run after him, and each hour draw near to him. Let us be satisfied that his death is the cause that death hath nothing terrible for us, and that for him we begin to desire what we most fear.

A suit.

Losse of money.

Slander.

Disgrace.

Absence of friends.

Death.

If we in body must suffer chains, imprisonment, maladies, sharp pains, hunger, thirst, the sword, fire, and all the hostility of nature, we must needs say, all which toucheth the skin, toucheth us very near, and that there are few charming words that can well cast these serpents asleep which devour us; but we must likewise confesse, that if our griefs be short, they deserve not so great complaints; and if they be long, their lasting fashioneth us to patience. All is formidable to a body full of long health, but the accustoming to things unpleasing causeth the contempt of them.

Bodily pains.

Nature

The comfort derived from reason.

Aug. l. 3. de liber. arbitr. cap 23. Quid est enim aliud dolor nisi quidam sensus divisionis, vel corruptionis impatiens.

Amabam misera periturum. We most ardently love the things we most lose.

How it remedieth all humane accidents.

Poverty.

Nature hath determined the most nice and tender to great dolours, as women to that of child-bearing; to teach us, that what we fear most, is not alwayes to be most feared. When our courage faileth, all torments insult over us, but if it makes some resistance, we much the lesse feel our pain. There are who fight even to bloud, out of bravery, others receive wounds for a very little money, others run to the burning chaps of cannons, for a small salary; there are others to be found who have jested at a gaith, and others who have played on a lute, whilst their members have been slashed with keen rasors, to shew that if there be an evil in nature, there is much more in our opinion.

The Philosopher Zeno sought out torments to taste pleasures, and said they were nothing if they were not thus seasoned. Pain and pleasure interchangeably sway in us, as do day and night in our Hemisphere. If we must die, it is but a moment of adversity to enter into a perpetuall repose. Evill taketh up all the parts of our life, but death hath onely one instant of time. It is so conformed to the most part of the world oppressed with so many afflictions, that as Zaleucus the Law-maker said, an Edict should fitly have been made, to die, if God had not imposed a necessity upon it. To be born, maketh us tributaries to all miseries: but death alone freeth us from all imposts. Socrates saw his death coming whilst he was philosophising: Anaxagoras in pleading: Calanus braved it, out of temerity, and Canius jested at it, out of merriment.

Notable speech of Zaleucus.

The evils of the mind.

If your evil be in the mind, is it chiefly sin or folly which tormenteth you? Why forbear you to chastise the one by penance, and the other by the credit you will give to the judgement of the wise? By this meanes you shall find, that Reason will remedy almost all evils without much violence.

Comforts which proceed from time.

Where Reason is surprised and darkned by the violence of torments, Time quits the medicine. There is no evil immortall: for the mortall; let us make our selves tractable by not thinking on our evils, and they cease to be evils, according as time stealeth them away from us. Think not to dry up the eyes of a mother who hath lost her son, or of a wife, from whom death hath taken her husband; on the day of the burialls suffer them to weep, let the wound bleed, and think how to cure it, rather by prayers then by discourses: The most pertinacious dolours disband with time, and we are all amazed that we find our selves above our afflictions, as if we had climbed up thither from out of the bottome of abysses. He who should see the mount Aetna big with flames and thunders, would not think there were any meanes to approach it, but its furies passe away with time, and we pursue little tracks, which insensibly lead us to the top, where we find verdant grasse and blooming flowers. The like happeneth to us, when we in the beginning consider our evil fortune, it seemes our mind can never associate with its disasters: but in the end, the divine Providence discovereth wayes unto us, which (ere we think on't) bring us to the top of patience, where we gather the fruit of our travels.

Insensible comforts.

Who would not admire the goodnesse of God, to say, That time doth our businesse without our trouble, and if we must be sad, we find (I know not what) in our sadnesse that pleaseth us? so that we preferre solitude and silence before the most eloquent consolations. The friends of Job seeing these his deep miseries were seven dayes without speaking to him; they let him discourse with his own thoughts, and gather some ease from his own dolour, as we draw remedies out of scorpions.

Julianus Imperator in consolat. Anicii ep. 37.

I (to this purpose) observe an excellent invention in the Emperour Julian of the Philosopher Democritus, where it is said, That Darius King of Persia had lost the Queen his wife, and that excessive melancholy made him disconsolate. The wisest men of Greece were called to him to mitigate his torments; but it was to play on a lute to the ears of Tygres and Panthers, to go about to cure by words fitly applied, a grief, which had had more of fury then mediocrity in it. The Philosopher let all these great comforters to passe on, and put himself upon time to expect some disposition in the heart of this Monarch; and seeing his mind tired out with his teares, began to relent, he promised to raise the Queen again if he he would furnish him with things necessary for his purpose: the other extremely rapt with this proposition, said, he therein would employ all the riches of the world, which were at his dispose; but the Philosopher onely demanded of him three names of such as had never felt any grief or sadnesse, to engrave them on the Queens Monument, which could not in any sort be found, after a long search throughout the whole kingdome of Persia. Then Democritus taking his opportunity: Alas! Sir, we may well say, the rubies and diamonds of this diadem resplendent on your head, dazle your eyes, and hinder you from seeing the miseries of your poor subjects, not to be able in so great and vast an Empire, to meet with three happy men; and yet you wonder, though born under the condition of mortals, that death is entred into your palace. He added many grave sayings, which the Emperour for his consolation liked very well. Whereby we are taught, that we must sometimes make use of time to remedy sadnesse.

An excellent observation of Julian.

Tela demittere telis.

If time doth nothing and that it be an evil necessary which we cannot remedy, (as it happeneth in death and in other accidents, which those Ancients called the blows of Destiny) why do we resist against heaven, and censure the divine Decrees? It is a goodly thing indeed to see a man to afflict himself with a fatall necessity, which indifferently involveth Monarches and peasants. Must God revoke his laws? and must he create a world apart to content a simple creature, and serve it to its liking? But is it not much better to go along with the streame of this water, and follow the great current of the divine Providence which maketh all the harmony in the world?

Necessity forceth patience.

§ 4. That the Contemplation of the divine Patience and Tranquillity serves for Remedies for our temptations.

Lastly, let us behold the assistances of Grace, which is incomparably above Nature, and let us from the example of the Divinity, take instruction how to demean our selves.

Remedies and helps of grace by the contemplation of things Divine.

Let us look on our first model, and consider a strange thing able to make our impatiencies wax red, not with anger but with shame, to say, that God all impassible (as he is) of his own nature not obnoxious to the sword, fire, sicknesse, or any other exteriour violence, would in all times suffer men more violent then the sword, more ardent then fire, more irksome then sicknesse, and many times more cruel then salvage beasts.

It is said, there were heretofore made very goodly mirrours of saphyr, which were for Princes and Monarchs; let us not covet those which cannot much avail us; but let us contemplate the admirable saphyr enchased in the Throne of the living God, in the Prophet Ezekiel, and let us therein see and compare our impatiencies, with the mildnesse of the Creatour. It seemes that by how much the more a dignity is soverein, by so much the lesse ought it to be exposed to injuries, because the fear which is had of its power should stamp in in hearts that respect which love (weak) cannot imprint: yet God a (sovereign Majesty, a supream Greatnesse, an absolute Justice) hath endured, and doth daily endure so many contradictions of men, that it seems, that to give credit to his mercy, he occasioneth some prejudice to the terrour of his Divinity. Many men (saith Tertullian) believe not in God, because they cannot perswade themselves he is angry with the world, since they see it in so peacefull a state.

Ezek. 1 26. Quasi aspectus lapidis sapphiri similitudo Throni.

Plures idcirco Dominum non credunt, quia seculo iratum tam diu nescisunt. Tert. de patient. c. 2.

What is there more important for God, and men, then the knowledge of his Divine nature, then the fear of his Justice, then the much to be adored reverence of his sovereignty? Notwithstanding, as if he preferred the glory of his patience before his own Being; he rather chose patiently to suffer so many faithlesse, so many wicked ones, so many sinners, and that the lips of Blasphemers might dare to say there is no God; then that, taking revenge, in the heat of crimes, by punishing every sin, it should be said of him, Verily there is a God, but he is perpetually armed with lightning and terrours, ever inaccessible to the prayers of men, as those mountains which throw forth their enflamed bowels. Nay, much otherwise; he would be stiled the God of mercy, and the Father of goodnesse: whereupon Saint Gregory hath judiciously said, that his patience walks still hand in hand with his charity. Wherefore, as the love of God towards men is incomparable: so his patience, to indure the faults and infirmities of sinners, admits no comparison. How many Pirates are there daily for whom God openeth seas? How many Idolaters, for whom he causeth stars to shine, fountains to stream, plants to sprout, harvests to wax yealow, and vines to ripen; as well as for the faithfull? How many ungratefull and rebellious children are there, who every day receiving so many benefits from him, take them as Hogs do Acorns, still grunting towards the ground, and never casting an eye towards heaven? How many spirits (enemies of truth, and light disturbers of publick repose, transgressours of laws both Divine and Humane) do daily frame obstacles against the will of their sovereign Master, and yet he suffers them, as if he had no other businesse in the world but patiently to bare, and vanquish by benefits, the malice, and ingratitude of men? Hierusalem is the stone of burthen (said the Prophet) which layeth a burthen upon God himself. What will this Oracle of God say, but the same conceits which Saint Hieron suggesteth unto us upon this passage, when he writes, that there were seen, in places where the Antient wrastlers did exercise, huge stones or certain bowls of Iron or Copper, with which they made tryall of their strength: and he witnesseth that he in a list saw one of those bowls which was so heavie, that he could not lift it up from the ground, although others robustuous of body, and eminent in those exercises, could easily carry it. Now mark my conceit, and say, that as those champions of antiquity had for object of their strength those weighty bulks, on which they daily exercised themselves: So likewise, God, that strong Gyant, and great Wrastler, as if he stood in need of exercise, takes the sphere of this great Universe which he beareth, & lifteth it up with all facility. He takes the Masse of so many mortals whom heaven covers, and the earth beareth, and there he findeth much resistance: he takes his people which he hath chosen and sanctified above all the nations of the world, and hence oft-times very many sensible displeasures come. A true stone of burden is that Christian, that Ecclesiastick, that Priest, that Religious, who belyes his profession, who throws disorder and scandall among the people by his ill example; yet God tolerateth him, God protecteth him, God continually obligeth him: and, if needs he must draw the sword of Justice out of the scabbard; it is with delayes, consideration, and excessive Clemency. O infinite Goodnesse! And who is that man, now, that will not bear with a man? and who is he that seeing God of nature impassible, busie in the world as about his stone of burden from the beginning of Ages; cannot bear a small burden, whereto he finds himself tyed by duty, by condition, and by nature!

Pater misericordiarum Dominator, Dominus, Deus misericors, & clemens & patiens, & multæ misericordiæ, &c. Deut. 5. Quantum lata manus fuerit per amorem, tantum erit & patiens longanimitatem. Totius genituræ tributa dignis & indignis pariter simul occurrere. Tertul. de patient. c. 2

Hierusalem lapis oneris. Zachar. 12.

God is buried about the world, as his stone of burden.

§ 5. That the great temper of our Saviours soul in most horrible sufferings, is a powerfull lenitive against our Dolours.

AS for the second Modell, which is the Word Incarnate the true mirrour of Patience, and onely reward of the Patient; It is a very strange thing, that all nature being so bent upon its conservation as to suffer nothing, Jesus Christ did miracles incomprehensible to the spirit of Angels, onely of purpose to suffer for man! For, how could dolour have laid hold on a God, of his own nature impassible, if it had not passed through all the heavens to take the divine word in the sanctuary of the Trinity, which otherwise was meerly impossible! but, the son of God, considering this Impossibility, and being fixed in the desire to sustein for us, took the body of man to suffer all that which the most cruell could invent, and all whatsoever the most miserable might undergo. Verily it is an effect of so prodigious a love that it found no belief in senses, perswasion in minds, example in manners, nor resemblance in Nature. We have heretofore heard of a Prince, who, desirous to offer himself to death for the preservation of his subjects, took the habit of a Peasant to steal himself from his greatnesse, and facilitate his death. All histories say he laid down his purple, and crown, and all the ensigns of Royalty, retaining none but those of love, which caused him to go into his enemies army, where he left life to purchase an immortall trophey for his reputation. But I must tell you, he had a mortall life, and in giving it, he gave that tribute to nature, which he owed to nature from the day of his birth, and which of necessity he was to pay; yea, he gave it to buy the memory of posterity, and to beg honour, which is more esteemed by generous spirits, then life. But in what history have we read, that, a man glorious by birth, immortall by condition, necessarily happy, hath espoused humility which all the world despiseth, mortality which the most advised apprehend, misery which the bravest detest; for no other occasion, but to have the opportunity to dy for a friend! And this is it which Jesus Christ did. He was by nature immortall, impassible, impregnable against all exteriour violencies: he took not the habit of a peasant, as Codrus, nor a body of air, as the Angell-conductour of Tobias; but a true body, a flesh, tender and virginall, personally united to the word of God; to quail it with toils, to consume it with travails: and lastly, to resign it as a prey to a most dolourous death; he casts tottered rags over his royall purple, and takes pains to stoop down to pull me out of the mire where I lay, and to take my miseries upon him, not sullying himself in my sins.

Abscondit purpuram sub miseriæ vestimento, ad limum ubi jacebam, inclinavit, non mergitur.

My God! what a prodigie is this? All ages have observed a thousand and a thousand industries of men which they found out to avoid the pains and torments of life; but never have we seen a man who sought to invent means, and to offer violence to his own condition; to become suffering, and miserable, according to the estimation of the world, since there are day and night so many gates open to this path: yet thou (Oh God of Glory! O mild Saviour!) hast done it. Thou haſt found a way how to accord infirmity with ſovereign power, honour with ignominy, time with eternity, and death with life. It was not poſſible that ſole God ſhould endure death; or that ſole Man could vanquiſh it; but man hath abided it, and God hath overcome it.

Abbas Guericus.

Mortem nec solus Deus sentire, nec solus homo vincere poterat, homo suscepit, & Deus vicit. Faustus l. 1. de lib. arbitr.

The quality of the ſufferings of our Saviour.

As for the quality of pains; it ſufficeth to ſay, that if men judged of the greatneſſe of Gyants by one of their footſteps impreſſed on the ſand: and if we likewiſe meaſure the courſe of the ſun by a ſmall thread of ſhadow; one may have ſome groſſe knowledge of ſo great a myſtery, by the figures which forewent it. Now, all the ſacrifices of the Moſaick law, and ſo many travails and ſufferings of the antient Patriarchs were but a rough draught of the paſſion of Jeſus Chriſt: from whence we may imagine what the originall was, ſith the Copies thereof were ſo numerous and different throughout the courſe of all Ages.

3 Reg. 8 63. 22000 bullocks, and 120000 sheep sacrificed for the dedication of Solomon his Temple.

The perpetuall ſacrifice which was evening and morning made in the Temple, the twenty two thouſand oxen, and the hundred and twenty thouſand ſheep which were ſacrificed by Solomon at one feaſt of the dedication of the Temple (ſo much blood ſhed, that it ſeemed a red ſea to thoſe who beheld it) was to no other end but to figure the blood of the immaculate Lamb, and of all its members which have ſuffered after it. But if ſo much preparation and profuſion were needfull to expreſſe one ſole ſhadow of his paſſion; what may we conjecture of the body, and the thing figured! Beſides, if all the antient Patriarchs, who were ſo perſecuted in times paſt, and all the Martyrs (who ſince the death of our Saviour have endured torments almoſt infinite in number, and prodigious in kinds) made but an aſſay or tryall of the dolours of this King of the afflicted; what an account ſhall we make of his pains, which ever ought to be as much adored by our wills as they are incomprehenſible to our underſtanding! The Lamb was ſacrificed from the beginning of the world (ſaith Saint John); He was maſſacred in Abel (ſaith S. Paulinus;) toſſed upon ſo many waves in the perſon of Noah; wandring, in that of Abraham; offered up, in Iſaac; perſecuted, in Jacob; betraied, in Joſeph; ſtoned, in Moſes; bruiſed, on a dunghill, in the patience of Job; blinded, in Samſon; ſawn, in Eſay; flayed afterward, in the perſon of S. Bartholmew; roaſted, in that of Saint Laureuce; thrown out to Lions, in that of Saint Ignatius; burned, in that of Saint Polycarp; pulled in pieces by four horſes, and caſt headlong into a ditch full of Serpents, in that of Saint Teela; drowned, in that of S. Clement; expoſed to waſps, in that of many other Martyrs. From whence it commeth that the paſſion of Jeſus is called a ſhort Conſummation by the Prophet Eſay, and that Saint Paul hath ſaid to the Hebrews, That by one ſole Sacrifice he hath conſummated thoſe which were to be ſanctified for all eternity. And S. Hilary clearly confeſſeth, That Jeſus Chriſt the onely Son of God deſirous to fulfill this great and myſterious Sacrament of his pretious death, did paſſe through all imaginable dolours which were (as it were) melted and diſtilled together; to make of it a prodigious accompliſhment.

Apoc. 13. 8. Agnus occiſus eſt ab origine mundi.

Our Saviour hath ſuffered in the perſon of all the juſt and the martyrs

Conſummatio abbreviata. Ila. 10 12.

Una oblatione conſummavit in ſempiternum ſatisfactos.

Heb 10 14.

Unigenitus Dei ad peragendum mortis ſuæ ſacramentum, conſummavit humanarum omne genus paſſionum. Hilar. l. 10. de trinit.

Jeſus is the ſtone with ſeven eyes, whereof the Prophet Zachary ſpeaketh, which the heavenly Father ſayes he hath cut and engraven with his own hand, thereon figuring all the moſt glorious characters of patience. He is an Abyſſe of love, of mercy, of dolours, of ignominies, of blood, of lowlineſſe and greatneſſe, of exceſſe, of admiration and amazement, which ſwalloweth all thoughts, dryeth up all mouths, ſtayeth all pens, and drencheth all conceptions; Who now then, will dare to complain that he ſuffereth too much, that he doth too much, that he is treated with leſſe tenderneſſe then he deſerveth? O our coldneſſe, and remiſſeneſſe! whence can it proceed but from not ſtudying enough on this incomparable Book which comprehends all ſecrets? we at leaſt ſhould conſider the divine Providence in the matter of the burdens of all the world; to diminiſh our niceneſſe, to gain opinion and underſtanding which may alter our judgement.

Zach. 3 9.

A ſage Roman ſhewing to an impatient man the whole world ſurrounded in a great deluge of miſeries, ſaid unto him, I aſſure my ſelf, you would not ſo much play the milk-ſop, nor have a ſoul ſo effeminate, if you would think that the whole world ſwimmeth in a dreadfull ſea of calamities. All things conform themſelves to the nature of their originall; and we have elſewhere ſaid, that Bees bred in the dead body of a Bull carry the reſemblance of their Progenitour, pourtrayed by certain little lineaments in their proper body. The world hath produced us, and Jeſus Chriſt hath regenerated us by his Death and moſt precious Bloud; never ſhould we reſt untill we carry upon us ſome token of nature wailing, and of a God ſuffering: according to S. Pauls precept, Glorifie and bear the Image of God in your body,

Senec. l. 3. nat. quæſt. Præferri ſcies quid deceat ſi cogitaveris orbem terrarum notare.

Bees bear the figure of a bull on their bodies

Glorificate & portate Deum in corpore veſtro. 1 Cor. 6.

§ 6. Advice to impatient Souls.

IMpatient Souls, to you I ſpeak; I ask you, Is it a ſmall motive to you to ſuffer that have the Univerſe for a Companion, God for an Example, and God for the Guerdon of your Patience? All creatures (ſaith S. Paul) ſigh, groan, and are, as it were in labour, expecting that day wherein all things ſhall be glorified in the reſurrection of bodies; and will you be of ſo abject a courage as to be like unprofitable burdens, with arms acroſſe in the midſt of a ſuffering world, and before the eyes of the God of ſuffering? Is it not a ſcandall to the Religion we profeſſe, often to afflict our ſelves with great and heavy ſadneſſes, for cauſes moſt light? To ſee too, you would make one think the Law, the Sacraments, and Jeſus Chriſt himſelf, were caſt away: Where is the Conſolation of holy Scriptures, the fruit of Preachings, the ſweetneſſe of Prayers? Where is that huge cloud of Examples of ſo many Patient ones, whoſe courages you ſo often have admired? where are good purpoſes, good thoughts? where are ſo many reſolutions ſo well taken in the time of proſperity? muſt the leaſt adverſity make you to ſhrink back? Verily, Ideots and ſilly women who have neither the wit nor knowledge which you have, do many times bear no ſlight burdens with much courage; and you, after ſo many good inſtructions, lay down arms, and make it appear, that ſtupidity hath more force with them, then all the precepts of wiſdome have power over your weakneſſe. People who live according to nature find remedies for their ſadneſſe in nature it ſelf; Bathings, Wine, Playes, Balls, Hunting, open Air, and ſo many other recreations make them paſſe away their evil. Is it poſſible, but that the conſideration of the firſt verity, and the divine Providence ſhould mitigate yours? What is it can have ſuch power over you? It is ſtrange that things the moſt frivolous torment you. Call back into your thoughts what I have ſaid to you concerning the matter of your pleaſures. It greives you, you have not thrived in this affair, nor have had the ſucceſſe of reputation which you exſpected! what a folly is this? as if I ſhould be troubled that the air and winds were not at my diſpoſe. Will you never ceaſe from uſurping that which appertaineth not to you? will you never order your own houſe, without taking care for things out of it? You afflict your ſelf for a word ſpoken of you! wretched (that you are) to tie your felicity to the condition of tongues. There would almoſt be no ſlander, if it were not made ſlander by thinking thereon

Rom. 8. 22.

Ad communem hanc Rempublicam, quiſque pro modulo exſolvimus quod debemus; & quaſi canonem paſſionum inferimus. S. Auguſt. in Pſal.

Very true!

You

you torment your self for the losse of health, or of some other good which was very pretious with you: Impute your crosse to your affection; so excessively to have loved a blessing which you might lose, and to have coveted all good things without you, to have an ill guest within your own house. You put your self upon the rack with the fear of the future: why do you set your foot into the possession of another? why do you not leave the future to the divine Providence? why do you reap dolours in a field, where you are not permitted to sowe? you incessantly complain of poverty, of sickness, and other inconveniences of life; if you think to live here free from pain, you must build a world a-part, and not be contented with the elements which served your ancestours turns. God here distributeth burdens, as the father of a family doth offices to all his domesticks: every one must bear that which is allotted him, otherwise, if he do not, he is a bastard, and not a legitimate child: and if having one, he bear it with a perpetuall vexation, he deprives himself of the crown of patience, the value whereof is as inestimable as the force thereof hath in all times been judged invincible. Have you forgot what S. Paul said? If you be (saith he) out of the number of those who live in a regular discipline, and who daily have their petty charge in God's family, wherein they are subjects, I assure you you are not used like children of the house, but as very bastards left to live at randome. Believe me, our burdens are like the stone of the Sybils, which to some weighed like lead, and to others as a feather: oft-times the weight or lightnesse of your evils proceeds from nought but your own disposition: Imagination hath made you believe it, nice breeding (which hath been bestowed on you) and evil habits wherein you have been perpetually nousled, fail not to accomplish your misery. Accustome your self a little to do that work well, for which you came into the world. Learn, that you must bear the miseries of mans condition, since you participate of humane nature, and that (thanks be to God) you are not a monster. When you have learnt to suffer something, you will begin to enter into the possession of your soul, in which alone you shall find all felicities, if so you be united to your beginning. Courage poor impatient one, raise your self a little above your self by the grace which is given you from on high, and so many good assistances, which you can never want. The God of patience and Consolation will confirm you, will fortifie you, and will give you the reward of your fidelity.

Dio. Chrys. orat. 13. Marvelous stone of Sybils.

Quod si extra disciplinam cujus participes facti sunt omnes, ergo adulterini, & non filii. Heb. 12. 8.

The seventh Treatise, Of HOPE.

§ 1. The Description, Essence, and appertenances thereof.

The Image and nature of Hope.

HOpe is the gate of a great Pallace replenished with riches. It is in my opinion the place which Tertullian termeth, when he calls it, the portresse of Nature. It looketh on, and considers upon one side pearls, which are (as yet) in the shell, and on the other upon Roses in the midst of thorns, which it thinks it may enjoy with some labour. Such is the nature of Hope according to S. Thomas; It is a motion of the appetite, which followeth the knowledge one hath of a good future, possible, and somewhat difficult. It hath two arms with which it endeavoureth to pursue, and embrace objects, whereof the one is called Desire, and the other Beleif; to be able to obtain what one desireth. Thus doth learned Occham define it. It is not sufficient to say that a thing is beautifull, pleasing, and profitable to create Hope, unlesse it be shewed it is possible, and that one may arrive thereunto by certain wayes, which are not out of his power, who hopeth. So Hope, if it be reasonable, hath ordinarily wisdome, strength, eloquence, amity and money for it: for these are the things which raise its courage. At the gates of this passion we see huge heaps of people of all manner of dispositons, who flatter it, and behold it; of one side lovers, who seek for a mate; For Philo said, it was the virtue of lovers: on the other side, Courtiers who run after favour; on the other, aspirers, who canvas for offices, and dignities, on the other, Laborours and Merchants: but above all there are many young-men bold and resolute, who therein have a great share; because, (as saith Aristotle) they have little of the past and much of the future. Or (as S. Gregory Nazianzen affirmeth) for that nothing is hard to a fervent spirit. Moreover it sitteth upon a Peacock, and its face is encompassed with a Rainbowe, by reason it infinitely charmeth, and recreateth the minds of such as follow it by very pleasing semblances: and (as King Mithridates saith) it hath, I know not what kind of sweetnesse, which pleaseth even then, when it deceiveth, but if you observe it, you shall find, it holdeth an Anchor in the right hand to fix the desire of the wise: as on the contrary, it carryeth in the left hand an enchanted mirrour, wherein it letteth fools see a thousand slight trifles, all which turn into smoke. Pleasure waiteth on it, whilst we hope; for it is that which sweeteneth all the labours of life; and which serves for a spur to all great and generous actions. But if it falls out that things happen not as they were figured in the imagination; then are all these Courtiers delivered over to a furious Monster called Despair, which drags them down to the foot of a mountain, and oft-times drencheth them in gulphs and precipices. Behold in few words the nature, definition, difference, composition, object, subject, the causes and the effects of hope. Let us now see, how we may govern this Motion.

Naturæ janitricem.

S. Thom. 1. 2 q. 40. art. 2.

Occham. quodlibeto 3. q. 9.

Philo lib. Quod deterius, &c.

Arist. l. 2. Rhet. c. 13.

Nazian. de vita sua. Δέους τὸ μέτρον τῷ ζέοντι τῆς ψυχῆς.

Mithrid. in epist. Græcis.

§ 2. That one cannot live in the world without Hope, and what course is to be held for the well ordering of it.

THey are of too haughty a strain who never friendly entertein Hope, and think there is no life for them, if Felicity be not alwayes at their gate. The condition of creatures is such that all their blessings never come to them all at once. It were to go about to expresse a word without letters, to compose a happinesse without joyes and contentments succeeding one another. How can hope be banished from earth, sith Heaven, which is so well content, hath not renounced it! The blessed souls, after the vision of God, do yet hope something, which is, the Resurrection of their bodies, to which they most ardently wish to be reunited: those which are represented under the Altar in the Apocalypse, who ask vengeance of their blood at the tribunall of the Divine Justice, are instantly clothed with white garments, in token of this most bright flesh which is to be joyned to their immortall spirits. Heaven, which expecteth nothing for the perfection of its beauties, ceaseth not to revolve each moment of the day and night, to diversifie them. But we must confesse, that earth is the place of Hopes, which are as seeds of our Felicities, from whence it cometh, that what the Grecians call to ſowe, we name it to hope. Our ſoul here reſembleth the First Matter, which is perpetually enamoured of new forms: and as the underſtanding of Angels (according to the ſaying of a great Philoſopher) is all, that, which it ought to be from the beginning, and becometh not new at all; Contrariwiſe, Humane underſtanding is nothing in the beginning, and becomes all in proceſſe of time. So our will is like unto white Writing-tables wherein we eaſily write, or blot out all we will. The eſtate of perfection muſt be expected to imprint it with a laſting Character. So many young plants, ſo many little living creatures, ſo many children, ſo many imperfections, ſo many wiſhes warn us that we may live here with hope: we have ſo little of time preſent, that we are enforced to dilate our ſelves upon the future. This inſenſibly delighteth us, and ſtirs us, as Trees which ſeem to take pleaſure to be rocked by the winds. It being reſolved that we neceſſarily muſt expect and hope whilſt we are in the world. It remaineth to conſider, how we may well employ this paſſion in hoping good things, and hoping them by wayes very direct, and in an orderly manner.

Apoc. 6.

Sperare ενελπιστι.

Carolus Bovilus de, intellectu humano & Angelico.

The good husbanding of hopes.

Firſt, It is a ſhamefull thing to ſay there are ſuch who hope all that, which is to be feared. One promiſeth himſelf the death of a Kinſman; the other, the confuſion of a family; another, to ſeduce ſome ſilly maid; another, to debauch a married wife; another, to ſatisfie his revenge; another, to ſcrape together as much as his avarice can wiſh; and ſo many other things which are moſt unhappy Hopes, the ſucceſſe whereof God ſometimes permitteth, when he will chaſtiſe wicked men. What a horrour is it to hope for crimes, and to feed ones ſelf with anothers evils, as if one ſought nouriſhment from coals and ſerpents! If our thoughts be not alwayes ſo high as the glory of heaven; at leaſt, let us not abaſe them ſo low as Hell. If they cannot be divine; let them not be inhumane; let them ty themſelves to bleſſings permitted, and not to objects ſo unworthy. One may expect wealth, children, health, knowledge, honour, an office, a marriage, and ſo many other things which are commodious for humane life; without deſiring diſaſters: notwithſtanding, it is not enough to will good, unleſſe one therein obſerve circumſtances and meaſures requiſite for its accompliſhment. One of the beſt rules for the paſſion of which we treat, is, to adapt ones ſelf to his hopes, to ſee what comports with his birth, his breeding, his capacity, his genius, his knowledge, his power, his credit, and his pains; and not raſhly to be ſtirred up with the deſire of things above his ſtrength, unleſſe he will diſturb his life, and haſten his death.

To adapt our ſelves to our hopes.

Spes impii tanquam lanugo eſt, quæ à vento tollitur, & tanquam ſpuma gracilis quæ à procella diſpergitur, & tanquam fumus qui à vento diffuſus eſt, & tanquam memoria hoſpitis unius diei prætereuntis. Sap. 5. 15.

The world is a great Sepulchre of ſo many little Phaetons, who will guide the ſun and hours, although their life be but a continuall deviation; they have no other honour but to be fallen from on high, and to have uſed more temerity in affairs then ability: ſuch hopes alſo are very well compared by the Wiſeman, To thoſe little downs of flowers ſcattered in the air, to the froth which floateth on the water, and is inſtantly diſſipated by a tempeſt, to ſmoke which vaniſheth under the blaſt of winds, and to the memory of a traveller, who paſſeth by an Inne.

By the ſight of a bird we judge of her flight, by the genius of men we make conjectures of their fortunes; needs muſt there be much extravagancy, when a man in all kinds little, propoſeth to himſelf nothing but great things. I well know, the divine Providence, the worker of wonders, delighteth ſometimes to ſtrike a ſtroke with its own hand, drawing out men of moſt baſe extraction, to bear them to the higheſt tops of worldly greatneſſe. It is that, which forged a Diademe for Pupienus upon the ſame anvil whereof his father hammered Iron: That, which changed Martianus his ſpade into a Sceptre: That, which taught Valentinian to make crowns by twiſting ropes: That, which ſhewed Juſtine in a Carpenters-ſhop how to build a Throne for himſelf: That, which drew Petrus Damianus from the midſt of ſheep, to be made a Cardinall; and Gregory the ſeventh out of a Joyners houſe, to give him a Popes Mytre. But, one Swallow makes not a ſummer, nor one accident, from an extraordinary hand, which happeneth ſcarcely in an age, makes not all fortunes. S. John ſaith, that the meaſure of an Angel is the meaſure of a man; but this is not, but in the celeſtiall city of Hieruſalem, where we ſhall be as the Angel of God. Here our thoughts are high, our aims great, but the limit of our power, little. He who doth well underſtand what he can; wills, but what is reaſonable, and ſhall find that the modeſty of wiſhes makes life more commodious, and happineſſe more undoubted.

Fulgosius l. 3. c. 4.

Idem l. 6. c. 10.

Apoc. 21. 17

To this firſt rule of the moderation of hopes, we muſt add a ſecond, which is, to give them good foundations, to the end we be not conſtrained to ſee the indiſcretion of our deſires puniſhed, by the ſmall ſucceſſe of our pretentions. There are ſome who infinitely confide in the words of Aſtrologers, and to ſpeak plainly, it is a prodigious thing to hear the predictions they make upon the life and fortunes of men, which cauſe amazement among the wiſe, and love in the curious: as at the time when they anſwered to the Edict of the Emperour Vitellius, who commanded them to leave the city, that they would obey on ſuch condition, that he inſtantly ſhould leave life; which ſo fell out. Yet we muſt ſay that although God ſhould write down in the book of ſtars the ſucceſſes of our life, which cannot be eaſily agreed unto; yet ever would they be extremely encumbred, nor ever happen out of a fatall neceſſity. That is the cauſe why for ſome preſages which hit right, there are many other notably falſe; which makes it ſufficiently appear that God hath reſerved to himſelf the full knowledge of what ſhall befall us. Among other qualities, which the holy Canticle gives him, it forgeteth not to ſay, He had hair as black as the feather of a Crow. Where you ſhall obſerve the hairs myſtically ſignifie the Thoughts, and when the Scripture termeth them black, it will declare the obſcurity aud depth of Gods councels over the wiſdome of men. Tertullian ſaid, man was the care of the underſtanding of God, who provideth for all, and who cannot be a prevaricatour of his own providence. Can we think men are permitted to enter into thoſe great abyſſes of knowledg, and to take the rains of nature into their hands? think we, that a man who doth not alwayes very plainly ſee what lies before his feet; can aſſuredly behold that which is infinitely exalted above his head? Where have not Aſtrologers ſowed lyes? where is it that great ones who hearkened unto them as to their Goſpel, were not filled with diſaſtrous ſucceſſes? By their ſaying, all which is born at Rome comes into the world like unto little Zara, already marked with red, There are ſome who conſume themſelves with anxieties and cares of their life-time, to verifie the words of an Aſtrologer, and who inſtead of ſcarlet find (perhaps) in the other world a Robe of flames. It is a wretched ſupport to tye ones hopes to ſo great an uncertainty. I find the favour of great and powerfull friends is much more certain; for God eſtabliſheth them on earth as his images, to be the treaſurers of felicity, and diſtributers of good hap. When they be juſt, upright, and gratefull; men of merit have ſome cauſe to hope of their good affections; and an Antient ſaid, that we muſt approach near to the Deſtinies, and the Gods, and honour the happy. But how many are there, who, adhering too much unto men, make to them-

Theodorus Merechiſta hiſt. Rom. fol. 86.

To ground them well.

Coma ejus nigra, quaſi Corvus. Cant. 5. 11.

Tertul. Homo divini cura ingenii. Deus in omnia ſufficit, nec poteſt eſſe ſuæ perſpicaciæ prævaricator.

Gen. 38. 27.

Powerfull friends may ſerve for a ſupport for Hope.

Facit accede Diiſq; & cole fœlices.

Lucan. Maledictus homo qui ponit carnem brachium ſuum. Jer. 17. 3.

themselves an arm of flesh without bones, and a fortune as frail as Reeds? Others make themselves brave fellows with their sword, and expect all from their valour. Others from their wit and eloquence. Others from their gold. Others from dexterity in businesses. All this may do well, when a great integrity of long services puts these good qualities into action: but if it happen you have some ray of hope grounded upon some good title; do as Job, and keep it hidden (as long as is fit) in your bosome, for fear that discovering it you lose the pretended effects thereof. There are, who tell all their designs to the whole world, if they see themselves either contraried in the pursuit, or contemned in the small successe of them. The Scripture observeth how that a Saul seeking for Asses found a Kingdome, when he met Samuel who foretold him, he was to be the first King of Gods people. A meer peasant though he were he was so prudent, that an uncle of his examining him curiously of the particularities of his journey, he gave him account of the Asses, and other such mean things; but never did he open his mouth to declare the hidden mystery. This is the third precept which is to be kept in the ordering of this passion. To which we will gladly add a fourth, which is, not too soon to reject, not over slowly to presse forward in the pursuit of your hopes; by reason that there are some who are extremely impatient, and presently despair, if all happen not to their wish: Where, they well shew, they are never to make a great fortune, sith this search after good luck is a warre, wherein Time is of more use then Arms. There are dayes which be step-mothers others, be mothers; there be years which are spent with much pain, and little harvest: But there cometh a good one, which recompenseth all sterilities, and with a full hand casteth fruits into our bosome. A good Fisher catcheth some fish, or still keeps the hook in the water; so, vigilant Courtiers either get favour, or incessantly watch the hour of their good hap, to cast themselves into the fish-pool, when the Angel hath stirred the water. Fortune was at Galba's Gate with a diadem, complaining she was weary of attendance, and would be gone to another, if he took not heed thereto. Felicity hath wings of an Eagle for some, and towards others, she comes with a leaden pace. There are times and ages, when one may reasonably expect her: but it is likewise a lamentable thing to be tormented all ones life, to run after a fancy of honour and wealth which flouteth us; and never to account that, as lost, which for us is but a nothing. There are who have lost all their discretion, opinioatively to pursue a hope, and have profited nothing by their labour, but to give a solemne testimony of their unhappinesse.

To hope without vanity.

Prudence of Saul.

De sermone autem regni non indicavit ei. 1 Reg. 10. 16.

Not too soon to reject, nor too late to put forward.

Stare se ante fores sensum, & nisi ocyus reciperetur, cuique obvio prædæ futurum. Sueton in Galb. c 4

It is here most expedient to make use of the precepts which the Nightingale gave to the Fowler in the Fable of S. John Damascen. For he wittily feigneth that this poor bird being taken in the snare would redeem her self by three good words she spake in his ear who had captivated her pretious liberty. The first was, Not to be light of belief, nor inconsiderately to be transported with the first apparence of objects. The second, Not to pursue that, which one cannot attain. The third, To put out of your memory those evils, the remedy whereof is not in your power. Upon these instructions the bird is delivered; which, desirous to make triall of the docibility of the man, told him in her language he was very simple, to dismisse her so easily, for that if he had ripped up her belly, he had found a precious stone which had made him rich for ever. The Fowler, vexed at his own avarice and curiosity, begins to pursue her through the woods and forrests a very long way till seeing she was out of his reach, he afflicted himself with his own folly. But the Nightingale said unto him, Art not thou a miserable man to have observed with so little constancy the precepts which concerned thy Happinesse? Thou didst imagine there were Diamonds in the belly of a Nightingale; who misled thee, but thy own credulity? Thou most inconsiderately hast followed me, not observing that thou art a man, and I a bird: that thou art an inhabitant of the earth, and I, of the air: that thou hast naturall weight, and I, wings. Lastly, thou art out of hope to be able to catch me; and had it not been much better to believe what I told thee, which was, not to trouble thy self for an Impossibility? Behold, how this great Divine personates Æsop, to give sage directions to Courtiers in love with Hope, whence they may learn the means how to hope well. But, as for others who mock the world, and perpetually promise to those who serve them rewards which end in nothing; they deserve to have the same punishment inflicted, with which the Emperour Alexander Severus chastised an Impostor of his Court who made very advantageous promises to many honest men, without ever coming to performance; for which, he caused him to be choked with smoke, the Cryer proclaiming aloud, He who sould smoke is punished by smoke. It were better to cut off at a blow the hopes of many, then to draw them at length in insupportable languours. But it is time we passe from humane manners, to divine perfections: and behold, how, by the examples of our heavenly Father, and the practises of the eternall Word, we may rule and settle this Passion.

Damascen. in Barlaam. A witty Fable of Saint John Damascen.

Petronius apud Lampridium.

§ 3. That God being not capable of Hope, serves as an eternall Basis to all good Hopes.

God hath this property, that, being uncapable of Hope, he is capable to support all hopes. I say, he is uncapable of Hope, not through the want of ability, but out of a singular excellency, and a most abundant plenitude of all perfections. Hope, is of good to come, and no man hopeth for what he possesseth. Now, God expecteth not any thing in the future, since he from all eternity hath felicities perpetually present. It were good to hear S. Zeno speak of the sufficiency of the eternall God. What is it which God may Hope, sith he hath nothing out of himself? And from whom can he Hope, being he alone is the origin of all things? Who hath no other beginning then himself, shall he expect any good from one elder then himself? And know we not he is before all things, since he shutteth all things within his own bosome? All that he is, he is of himself; and no man well knows what he is, but himself. He alone is perfect, because nothing can be added to him, nor taken from him. He is never damnified, but alwayes equall to himself, because he admitteth not Age, but is one day composed of Eternity.

God is not capable of Hope, sith he possesseth all. Jac. 1. Apud quem non est transmutatio, nec vicissitudinis obumbratio Zeno Veron. serm. 1. de gener. verbi. Solus Deus est principium, qui ex seipso dedit sibi principium; solus ante omnia, quoniam in manu ejus inclusa sunt omnia: Ex se est quod est; solus perfectus, quia non potest illi addi, nec minui; solus indemnabilis, ac semper æqualis, quia in se non admittit ætatem.

One may object here, that, to hope for any thing from another; it is not alwayes necessary he be absolutely greater, or more worthy then we. We hope from artificers, we hope likewise from our servants, the performance of businesses which we put into their hands, and therefore one might inferre, that it is not a proposition contrary to reason to say, that God can hope something from us, as are the praises and service which we are bound to render to him, as were likewise our conversion. To that I answer, it is true, that the greatest Monarchs of the earth may hope from the meanest persons of their kingdome, because they are men, and have dependence of men: and in this, God greatly humbleth great men, when he makes them see that all this glorious pomp of their fortune which seems to afford matter of jealousie to heaven, and of new laws to earth, subsisteth not but by the commerce of merchants, and by the labour and sweat of peasants: all which makes no impression on the Divinity. It expecteth (say you) our praises; as if God were not his owne praise to himself; as if he stood in need of a mortall mouth to honour an Essence immortall. Were all the lipps of men the most eloquent at this present covered under ashes, what would it concern him? All the world is before him no more then the turn of a ballance. Hath not he the morning starres round about his awfull throne? I mean those great Angels all replenished with lights and perfections, who praise him incessantly. And were the world annihilated, and the very Angels confounded in the masse of starres and elements; he would ever be God, always as great as himself: and even left alone to his thoughts; in his own thoughts he would find heaven.

God is independent of all creatures and the source of his felicities proceedeth from the infinity of his perfections.

Tanquam momentum stateræ, sic est ante te orbis terrarum. Sap. 11. 3.

Resoluto mundo & diis in unum confusis, cessante naturâ acquiescit sibi, cogitationibus suis traditus. Senec. ep. 9.

But yet you will say, he may expect our conversion, which partly dependeth on our selves; since he, who made us without us, will not save us without us. It is easie to reply thereupon, that God hath no need of the conversion of men, to augment his glory; but to establish their salvation: and should he have need; he continually hath his elect before him in the book of his prescience, without blotting forth, or thereunto adding any names. Think you he expecteth till we have done, to judge of our works? He knoweth from all eternity what we must do in such or such an occasion, his prescience not imposing any necessity upon our free-will. This great God sitting in the highest part of heaven continually beholdeth all the actions of men: and the eternity of his vision perpetually present infallibly meeteth with the quality of our merits. It letteth us go according to the current of the stream, and the choice of our liberty; but if he would proceed with absolute power, there is no will so determinate upon evil which can resist him. And therefore we must conclude, his account is already made both within himself, and without himself, he not any whit depending on the future.

God hath no need of our conversion, to encrease his glory

Fasciculum suum super terram fundavit. Amos 6.

Manet spectator cunctorum Deus, visionisq; ejus præsens æternitas cum nostrorum actuum qualitate concurrit Boet. l. 5. p. 6.

It is more clear then the day, that God cannot hope; but it is likewise most manifest, that he supporteth all good hopes by reason of the capacity of his Essence, of his power, and of his goodnesse: and therefore Esay speaks very notably: You have put your hope in our Lord, who is in eternall ages. In our Lord (I say) the true God, whose strength is not limitted by length of time. Men are weak; and God is the God of the strong: Men sometimes preserve for a time; but God guardeth us eternally: Men have their wills as changeable as their power is limitted; but God (besides that he is of a constancy unshaken) exerciseth a power unbounded. Where then may we better lodge our hopes, then in the Divinity?

God supporteth all good hopes, by reason of the infinite capacity of his Essence.

Speratis in Domino in sæculis æternis, in Domino Deo forti in perpetuum. Isa. 26. 4.

There it is where our second model (I meane the holy humanity of Jesus) placed all his hope. My God, my Hope; I did cast my self between thy arms, so soon as I began to be born in the world, and at my going from my mothers bosome. But one may here aske of theology, If Jesus had the virtue of Hope; what is it then he might hope? I answer, that if he might pray, he might hope. For, prayer, and (namely) a request is not made but with hope to obtein that we seek for. Now, who doubteth but that Jesus prayed on earth? and doth he not also pray now in heaven? He prayed (saith Theology) for four reasons. First, for the exercise of his virtue which is most excellent. Secondly, for our example. Thirdly, for the accomplishment of his commission; and lastly for necessity. I am not ignorant that S. John Damascen hath said, that Christ prayed not but in appearance, insomuch as prayer being properly an ascension of the mind to God; it could not be that the soul of Jesus Christ should mount anew into the Divinity, since from the day of his Conception it was there (as it were) enchased, not being able to be separated from it, one sole moment. But this question is satisfied by saying

We must place our hopes in God, by the example of the holy Humanity of Jesus Christ.

In te projectus sum ex ute o, spes mea ab ubere ribus matris meæ.

For what reasons our Lord prayed

Damascen. l. 4. de fide.

with Vasquez, that it is true that our Lord, in regard of the person of the Word, could not pray, having in this kind no superiour: but by reason of the Humanity, which might be wanting and indigent without the help of the Divinity; therefore he mounted up to the source of the word, not by vision and beatifick love, which he already enjoyed; but by the knowledge of science infused, and by a new desire to impetrate something of his heavenly Father.

I say, he already had Beatitude, and that he was (as it were) engulfed in lights of glory; he notwithstanding had not yet glorification of his body, exaltation of his name, extent of his Church from one pole to the other: which made him pray, and to say with S. John, I beseech thee (O Father) make me glorious and resplendent before the face of all Creatures, as I was from all eternity in the source of thy divine lights, even before thou hadst enlightned the beauty of this Universe. And it is to no purpose to oppose against this, That he had nothing to do, to pray and hope for, since all he asked was fully assured him. For, it is evident that hopes, though certain, faile not to be hopes although they depend on the future. But which is more; the eternall Father had so tyed our salvation to the prayers and hopes of Jesus Christ, that we could not obtaine it, but under this condition. He prayed and hoped for us; but whilst he was yet hanging on the breast of his most blessed Mother, he shewed us we must pour forth all our hopes on the firm rock of the power and goodnesse of God. And to speak truly; what are all the hopes of the world, but reeds without support; shels without pearls; seeming colours of the rain-bowe without solidity? O! how well doth S. Augustine speak when he compareth hope to an egg? saying, that all Beasts bring forth young ones; but birds produce nothing but hopes, which are the Eggs. We are true Birds whilst we are in this miserable life, still hanging upon leaves, still troubled at time passed, ever uncertain of the future, ranging hither and thither, and perpetually restlesse, and finding punishments in the greatest contentments of Nature. We brood weak hopes like unto eggs, which promise us to bring forth wonders, and produce nought but wind. Hope is a marvellous Egg, whereof some eat the shell; others the white; but very few the yolk.

Clarifica me tu Pater, apud temetipsum, claritate quam habui, priusquam mundus fieret apud te. Joan. 17.

The hopes of the world are very deceitfull, and have no solidity. S. August. Serm. 18. de verbis Domini. c. 5.

This very well figureth unto us three sorts of Hopes, whereof some are harsh and irksome; others, vain; the rest in the end good, and nutritive. If you desire to see the harshnesse of worldly hopes, which we have set in the first place of this division; consider first, that hoping much, we must have much dependence upon another, which taketh away from us that sweet liberty, which is a good inestimable. To hope is not a thing which dependeth upon our power, but on the liberality of another. It is much, that Hope, which is so slender and scanty, is not wholly ours. If we hope for a good, and expect it from our own forces; we are in danger to become presumptuous, vain and ridiculous. For how many see we in the world who daily are undone, by having too much presumed on their own power? How many litle birds with feeble wings, have sought to take a flight which hath onely served to render their fall the more notable? If we must expect this good hap from another (besides the submission of dependence which hath always somewhat distastful in it) I see we most depend on men, some whereof want power; others, will; others, both together; but, if the one and other meet for a while, they are not of long continuance. The nature of blessings, which we hope for in the world, is frail, and more frail they from whom we hope them. We oftentimes hope for health from them, who are as sick as our selves; life, from mortals; riches, from creatures, who are all in the poverty of nothing. If we reckon up our evils, our maladies,

Three sorts of Hopes.

Sperare non est possibilitatis nostræ, sed largitatis alienæ. S. Paul. Orosius in Apol. de lib. arbitrio.

our

our suits, our injuries, and our persecutions; we shall find many who will compassionate us but very few to afford remedy. And that which often most vexeth us, is, that if there be some who are able, after they have promised us so much favor, & so many good turns, they in our cause are sparing of a step, and of the very wind of a word.

Others sell us under pretext to succour us. These are Herculeses, to whom we offer sacrifice to drive away Wolves, and they torment us more then the Wolves themselves. O how often are we enforced to say with the Prophet, Babylon my wel-beloved, is set before mine eyes as a miracle! And then presently, that, which is in the same Text, according to the Hebrew, Mishap is the cause, that the bright day-break of my desires is turned into the horrour of my thoughts. This Babylon of worldly hopes sheweth it self, in the beginning, as a miracle; but if we proceed further, we find that those desires that were as pleasing as the dawning of day (which at its first springing appeareth all over studded with Emeralds and Rubies) turn at last, and are changed into the horrours of a sad Tempest.

Isa. 21. 14. Babylon dilecta mea posita est mihi in miraculum. Crepusculum desiderii mei posuit mihi in horrorem.

Many seemed to be already arrived at the end of their hopes, when good success forsook them in the beginning of their rising fortune, and if others went towards the end, they fell: that, albeit it had honey on the lip, and light in the face; it carried poyson in the tail, like unto Scorpions. The vain hope of the world suggesteth us, what the Emperour Zemisces said to a Patriarch of Constantinople. Thou wert but an oven, and I have made thee a pallace, but I will bring thee back to that state from whence thou wentest. And all the splendour of thy false greatness shall onely serve to make thy fall the more miserable. Good God, that those are constrained to eat the egg-shel, who after they have hoped great felicities, see themselves thrown down, and roughly handled with pains waited on by ignominy, and confusion!

Cruentat fortunæ lenocinantes perfidus finis, & vitrum ut scorpius, ultimâ parte percutit.

Aidon. l. 2. ep. 13. Ego te, fute, ædificavi, ego te, fute, destruam.

They hit not upon a much more favourable condition, who eat the white of the egg, and who after they have hoped for great comforts in worldly prosperities, find the acquisition is painfull, the fruition uncertain, and the taste most unsavoury. Never are the hopes of the world specious, but when they are far from us, and all the pleasure we take in them is like to that of dreams; from whence it comes that they very well are called dreams without sleep. What pleasure is it for a thirsty man to dream all night that he is on the brink of a most delicious fountain, if, being awak'ned, he find, that he still hath the fire of thirst on his lips? Libanius the Orator said, he would gladly cite his dreams to appear in judgement, and see them condemned as very impostours, which many times promise golden mountains, and perform nought but matter of sorrow. By a much stronger reason we have cause to say the same thing of all worldly hopes which desist not to deceive us, till we be a-sleep, but surprise us open-eyed; Yet we shall do wrong to question them; for they are innocent: but we are culpable to make so ill use of reason, as to run all our life-time after fancies. One of the wisest men of antient times uttered a matter very remarkable, related by D. John Chrysostome, to wit, that all man-kind is tyed with a great chain; composed of two folds of links, which in great number all our life-time are multiplyed, and interchangeably follow one another. One is called joy, and the other, sorrow. But besides this, there are some (saith this Wise-man) who have fetters on their heels, being tormented with harsh hopes, which, under the shadow of sweetnesse, insult over them, and hold them as long as they live in a painfull slavery. There is a file (addeth he) called Reason, which is very excellent to file our fetters: but, there are none, but the most considerate who find it: fools are enforced to languish all their life-time in this Martyrdome, and as they have lived in the fervours of a feaver, they also dye in illusion.

Aut poterit comedi insultum, quod non est sale conditum. Job 6. 6. Et sicut somniat sitiens, & bibit, & postquam fuerit expergefactus lassus adhuc sitit, Isa 29. 8. Libanius declar. 37.

An excellent passage of a wise man mentioned by Chrysost.

Then let us learn to make an eternall divorce from all those frivolous worldly hopes, and to look on Jesus as a pole-star alwayes immoveable, under whom all mobilities move. What a shame is it to spend the better part of our age after smokes and phantastick semblances, which pay us with nothing but griefs; and not to hope in a strong God, who supporteth the earth with three fingers of his power; in a mercifull God, who loveth us tenderly as the apple of his eye! Shall we never learn to say. Be our arms in the morning, and our salvation in the day of Tribulation? Let us not flatter our selves with these goodly semblances of honour, of greatnesse, of riches, of pleasures, which by heap present themselves to our imagination; but let us say, Lord I will expect the Saviour thou hast promised me. Let us leave the men of the world, who unbowell themselves like Spiders by drawing out their entrails to catch flies; but let us imitate those little silk-worms, who cast forth precious threads, whereof they make a rich bottome in which they sleep, and come not forth but to take wings and soar in the air. Let us go and produce hopes which are as so many threads of gold, that involve us here below in pretious repose, and a certain expectation of Beatitude, untill charity hath perfected our wings to take our flight to the City of peace; where so many chosen souls stretch out an arm unto us. Let us take a very strong comfort, since we put our selves between the arms of hope, (which we hold as a firm, and an assured anchor) to stay all the disturbances of our mind, going forward in our way till we passe the veil, and enter into the Tabernacle of the Sanctuary, whereinto Jesus our Precursor hath made his entry for our Salvation.

Esto brachium nostrū in mane & salus nostra in tempore tribulationis. Isa. 33. 2. Salutare tuum expectabo Domine. Gen. 49. 18.

Fortissimum solatium habeamus, qui confugimus ad tenendam spem, quam sicut anchoram habemus animæ tutam ac firmam, ingredientes usque ad interiora velaminis, ubi præcursor pro nobis introivit Jesus. Heb. 6 19.

The eight Treatise. Of DESPAIR.

§ 1. Its Nature, Composition, and Effects.

The image of Despair.

IF E who would set forth the picture of Despair (me thinks) should do well to represent hope in the manner of some bird variously diversified with curious-coloured feathers, and endowed with a most melodious voyce, that were pursued by a man with much eagernesse; but when he should think to touch her with his finger, she should instantly vanish away in the air, and leave, in stead of her self, a black and ugly Hobgoblin which should possesse all the passages both of the Pallace, and Throne of this goodly Hope. In this property behold what the definition of Despair meaneth, which according to S. Thomas, is a recesse from a good impossible, or which one proposeth within himself he can never attain unto. From whence it cometh, that there are two acts wch compose this miserable Passion: the first whereof is a determinate judgment made upon the impossibility of the good that is sought; whether it it be loſt, or whether the means to arrive unto it be taken away, or whether it be ſo difficult, that the wit of man cannot purchaſe it at any price. Thence followeth a ſecond Act, of grief and ſadneſſe, to ſee it ſelf driven back from the deſired object, without any hope of coming near unto it: for which cauſe, we may well repreſent the diſmall ſpectre of Deſpair, tumbling ſo many Courtiers with frivolous hope down the mountain into the bottome of a valley, where ſome gnaſh their teeth, ſtamp with their feet, and pull themſelves by the hair. Some run to the ſword, to precipices and halters: others lie flat on the ground, drowned in their tears, and drenched in dull ſadneſſe, like people wholly ſenſleſſe, and walking in the way of a Tomb, as having almoſt nothing at all to do with the living. But the thing moſt admirable is, that there are ſome to be ſeen, who, being come to the extremity of miſeries, find themſelves in an inſtant ſaln into a happineſſe unexpected, ſo that Deſpair ſeems to have been for them the ſource of all their hopes.

S. Thom. 1. 2. q. 4. art. 40. Recessus vitalis à bono ob ejus difficultatē vel præclusum futuritionem. There are two sorts of Acts in this passion.

§ 2. The Cauſes of Deſpair, and the Condition of thoſe who are moſt ſubject to this Paſſion.

THey who are of a Melancholick humour are infinitely diſpoſed to the effects of this direfull paſſion. For to ſay truth, Melancholy is the Pit of the Abyſſe, from whence iſſueth forth an infinite quantity of evil vapours which cauſe night in the moſt cheerfull brightneſſe, and make the moſt pleaſing beauties of Nature to be beheld with affrightment.

They who are turmoiled herewith, eaſily reſigning themſelves over to Deſpair, are perpetually upon complaints and lamentations; they ſee publick calamities coming afar off, and, like birds of an ill preſage, do prognoſtick nothing but diſaſtres. They have a ſingular inclination to believe the worſt news, to augment it in their imagination, to amplifie it in their diſcourſes, and to affright the whole world (if they could) with pannick terrours and imaginary fears. The leſt miſhap which befals their family, is (in their opinion) a generall ruine: Menaces are blows; blows, murthers; the leaſt ſparks are Coles; Theatres ſtrewed with flowers, are ſcaffolds covered with black for them; and all the actions of men are nought but Tragedies.

Wiſe Plutarch ſaid, All little Courages were naturally full of Complaints. They are like the river of Silias, wherein all ſinks to the bottome, and nothing floateth; all paſſeth with them into the bottom of the ſoul, nought ſtayes in the ſuperficies: which is the cauſe that the heart repleniſhed with cares and apprehenſions, diſchargeth it ſelf (what it may) by the tongue.

Beſides the materiall cauſe of Deſpair, which is obſerved in Melancholy, we find others efficient, which ordinarily faſten upon great and ſtrong paſſions of Love, of Ambition, and of Avarice. All hiſtories are full of miſerable people, who having ſettled their affections upon objects, whence they could not with reaſon expect any ſatisfaction, after an infinite number of languors, toils and purſuits, have buried their love in Deſpair, and drowned their ardour in the blood of their wounds. Some have hanged themſelves at the gate of their Miſtreſſes, others have thrown themſelves headlong down into ruines, others have been expoſed to ſalvage beaſts, rather chuſing to ſuffer the fury of tygers and lions, then the rage of Love without fruition.

Dido profeſſa in alieno ſolo ubi nuptias regis iniro optaſſet debuerat.

The Poet Virgil did her wrong, to put Dido Queen of Carthage into the number of the Unhappy, ſaying, ſhe ſacrificed her ſelf to the ſword and flames, out of a Deſpair conceived to ſee her ſelf deprived of her Trojan. Tertullian juſtified the Aſhes of his Countrey-woman, aſſuring us ſhe was one of the moſt chaſte Ladies in the world, and did more in the matter of Chaſtity then S. Paul preſcribeth. For the Apoſtle having ſaid, That it is better to marry then to burn; ſhe rather choſe to burn then to marry, making her own funerall alive, and rather entring upon the flaming pyle then to comply with the paſſion of a King who ſought her in marriage after the death of her husband whom ſhe had ſingularly loved.

ne tamen ſecundas ex. periretur, maluit è contrario uri, quàm nubere. Tertul. in exhort. ad caſtitatem.

The paſſion of Ambition is no leſſe violent in proud and arrogant ſpirits (who having been long born as on the wings of glory, and ſeeing themſelves on a ſudden ſo unfortunate, as to be trampled under foot by thoſe who adored them) cannot digeſt the change of their fortune, anticipating that by violence, which they ought rather to expect from mercy. Such was Achitophel, accounted to be one of the greateſt States-men of his time, whoſe counſels were eſteemed as of a Deitie, when ſeeing himſelf faln from the great authority he had acquired, after he had ſet the affairs of his houſe in order, he took a halter with which he hanged himſelf. And it is thought Pilate followed the like courſe, when he ſaw himſelf to be diſcountenanced after the death of his maſter Tiberius, and baniſhed by Caius Caligula, the ſucceſſour to the Empire. This calamity ſeemed unto him ſo intolerable, that he ſought to ſhorten his miſeries by haſtening his death, which he gave himſelf by his own hand. Yet Euſebius, who ſeems to be the chief authour of this narration, and who is followed by Paulus Oroſius and others, doth not aſſure it, as a thing undoubtedly true, but as a popular rumour. For my part, I think it not amiſſe to believe Tertullian, who conceiveth, that after the death of our Saviour, Pilate was a Chriſtian in his conſcience, when he in writing expreſſed to the Emperour Tiberius the things which occurred in the perſon of our Saviour with ſo much honour for our Religion, that from that time the Emperour reſolved to put Jeſus Chriſt into the number of the Gods. But if the opinion of this Author were true, It could not be credible, that a man who had a tincture of Chriſtianity ſhould have ended his life by ſo furious a Deſpair.

1 Reg. 17. 23

Tantis irrogante Caio angoribus coactatus eſt, ut ſe ſuâ tranſverberans manu, malorum compendium mortis celeritate quæſierit Paul. Oroſ. l. 7. c. 4.

Pilatus jam tunc pro ſua conſcientia Chriſtian. Tertul. in Apoleg.

Yes that it might very well, as many examples teſtifie.

Avarice in this point will nothing at all give place to Ambition, for there are many to be found, who (ſeeing themſelves unexpectedly deprived of treaſures which they kept, as the Griphons of Scythia) would no longer behold the Sun, after the Sun had ſeen the Gold which they hid in the bowels of the earth. Witneſſe that covetous man of the Greek Anthology, who ſtrangled himſelf with the ſame halter wherewith another man had determined to hang himſelf, who by chance having found this caitiffs treaſure, was diverted from it. This may very well teach us, that it is very dangerous, paſſionately to affect the objects of the world, becauſe (as ſaith S. Gregory) one cannot without immeaſurable grief loſe all that which with unlimitted love is poſſeſſed. The evil ſpirit, who ſoundeth each ones inclinations, and diſcovereth their diſpoſitions, powerfully intermedleth in them, and layeth ſnares for men in all the things wherein he obſerveth them to be with the moſt fervour, buſied. To theſe occaſions of Deſpair, fear of pain and ſhame is added, which is very ordinary, and is the cauſe that many haſten their end, before they fall into the hands of their enemies, or are laid hold on by Juſtice, which is as much as if one ſhould die, not to dye. This was very common among Pagans, who eſteemed that a glory which we hold the worſt of crimes: and the like opinion crept very farre, into the minds of the Hebrews, who thought themſelves to be ſacred perſons, and imagined they did an act generous and profitable to the glory of God, to kill

kill themselves, before the hands of Infidels were bathed in their bloud. This is the cause if we believe the ordinary Glosse of the first Book of Kings, and the antient Interpreters of this Nation, that we cannot conclude the damnation of Saul by an infallible demonstration for having strucken himself; seeing, that according to their opinion, he was not sufficiently illuminated by the lights of the antient Law, that it was a Mortall sin to hasten his death to save the honour of his Religion, and to deliver himself from the scorn of Infidels. Nay, they assure us, that he in this occasion ordered himself as a treasure of God, refusing to deliver up unto enemies a Head honoured with sacred Unction, to be alive defiled by their profane hands. They add, that he had before him the example of Samson, who was admired by all his own Nation for being overwhelmed with the Philistims under the ruines of a house. And that after him Razias, esteemed a Saint and a courageous man, gave himself the stroke of death, and threw his bowels all bloudy from the top of a turret on the heads of his enemies. But now at this time we stand in a clear light, communicated unto us by Councels and School-Divinity, and know it is not at all lawfull, so farre as that a Decree hath decided, that a Virgin ought rather to suffer the losse of virginity of body by a manifest violence, then of her own accord to tear out her soul. Yet Doctours do not condemne him who throws himself down headlong to avoid a burning, nor him who putteth fire to the powder of a ship taken with Pirats, wherein he cannot doubt but he must perish, but he hastneth his end to take a prey from his enemy, and to sacrifice himself for a Publick good.

Glossa in 1 Reg. 31. Dicunt Hebræi, & alli qui etiam Christiani, quod interfecere seipsum intuitu Divini honoris, nè vituperium exerceatur in proprio corpore redundans in Dei vituperium, sicut timebat Saul, non esse illicitum.

Macch. 1. 13

Placuit, ut qui sibi ipsis voluntariè violentam intulerunt mortem, nulla prorsus pro illis in oblatione commemoratio fiat. Ex Concil. Braccarensi primo. c. 34. Caus. 23. q. 5 in Glossa. Laym. p. 116

The Doctrine which blameth every other act of Despair, is conform to the opinion of the best Philosophers, who held, it is to die like a licentious beast, to go out of this life without his warrant, by whose leave we entred into it. Seneca, who had been of another opinion, changed it afterward at the end of his dayes, nor would he use violence against himself, wherewith Nero was amazed, and sent him the sentence of death, which he received with a marvellous courage; shewing, that if he sealed not his former opinion with his bloud, it was not for want of resolution, but that he had acquired more light. For my part, I probably think he was at that time a Christian, although not declared; and it is to no purpose to alledge, that he in his last words maketh mention of a Jupiter Liberator, since he explicateth it in his writings, shewing that by this word he understands no other God, then the sovereign Monarch of the Universe.

Eundem quem nos Jovem, intelligunt rectorem universi, cui nomen omne convenit.

We ought not to take this glory from him, since S. Hierome so clearly giveth it him, placing him in the number of Christian Authours and Confessours of Jesus Christ. And that Flavius Dexter, a notable Historian, who flourished in S. Augustines time, and who wrote the History of Christianity from the Birth of Christ our Saviour, to the year 430. expresly saith in the year 64. De Christiana re bene sensit, factúsque Christianus occultus. But if this be so, it cannot have been but in the last year of Seneca's life, which is 66. of our Lord, when the holy Apostles S. Peter and S. Paul returning thither the second time, made Christianity in that place to be resplendent. From whence it comes, that they much labour in vain who alledge many passages out of Seneca's book, composed in his Paganism, to disapprove our opinion.

Nat. quæst. lib. 3. S. Hier. l. de Scriptoribus Eccles.

§ 3. Humane Remedies of Despair.

THe cause of Despair and the condition of those who Despair, being sufficiently known, we must fortifie our selves against this pernicious passion with all the courage and prudence we can use. If we consider the humane Remedies, they will teach us, that the inconstancy of things on the earth which overwhelme us, may raise us, that the state of this inferiour world is as a wheel, whereon we do nought but go up and come down; and that when we have the most happinesse, then is the time we fall to the lowest degree of misery. When the unfortunate are descended into abysses, the prosperous leap up in their places. We have seen of them, as the Wise-man observeth, that have mounted to Empires from the deep dungeons of a prison, as did Michael the Emperour, who was unexpectedly snatched out of the hands of Leo when he had resolved to burn him alive: was taken from black Caverns, born to the Palace as yet nasty and all horrid, and on his Imperiall Throne made to file off the fetters on his feet, for that the key of them could not be found. The proud Sesostris, King of Egypt, who pompously walked along in a chariot harnessed out with Kings, was diverted from his insolency by one of those miserable Princes, who taught him a lesson of the revolution of humane things by the resemblance of the wheels of the chariot of triumph, whereunto pride had lifted him. Experience will tell us, that many for having lightly believed their evil fortune, were deprived of very great prosperities; and became unfortunate for no other reason, but that they thought themselves such before their time.

De carcere catenisque interdum quis egreditur ad regnum. Zonaras. in Michael.

Perseverance will instruct us, that in worldly affairs, as are marriages, offices, benefices, suits in law, commerce, good turns, and recompences; we must not still fall off out of mood, but patiently expect the hour of our good hap, whilst there is any reasonable likelihood, Scardion in the third Book of his History, recounteth an excellent passage of Pope Innocent the Seventh, who employed a famous Painter named Andrew Mattineus, in adorning his Chappel of the Vatican. This brave work-man bent himself to it with affection, and therein used his most exquisite inventions, hoping that he who set him awork, would largely requite his merit in so notable a power to oblige all the world. He notwithstanding saw his labours daily to go on, but felt no rewards coming, which one day put him into Choler, with a resolution to be revenged by some trick of his Art. The Pope had commanded him to paint the seven deadly Sins, but he instead of taking his proportions for seven places, added thereunto an eighth, wherein he purposed to make a hideous monster. Innocent more fully informing himself of his design, the Painter answered, he left this place there to represent Ingratitude, as the most capitall of all Vices. The Pope well understanding what he would say, smiled, and said, Matineus, I give consent thou paint Ingratitude as ugly as thou pleasest, but on this condition, that thou place Patience directly over against it, which of all Virtues is the most courageous, from which thou art very much alienated, being unable a little to expect patiently the good I have resolved to do thee: and presently he gave him a good Benefice for his sons preferment.

Lastly, commonly fame will shew us there are people, whose ears are like those gates through which nothing was suffered to passe but direfull things. They burden themselves with all the worst, and become eloquent in the mishap of their friends, as if they infinitely obliged them by learning their disastres. We shall easily find a remedy for the evil we apprehend, by not being over credulous in giving ear to these news-carriers whom Poets will have to be the messengers of Hell. Constancy will assure us, that the evil opinion one hath of his own affairs troubleth the whole businesse; that we must persevere to the end, and albeit, the tempest turmoil us, never to forsake the helm, though tossed in the midst of surges. If it be a last necessity which assaileth us, we must put on the countenance of a Saint to receive it, and confidently believe, that if it take all Hope from us, it will by little and little take away also all our Despair. It is very dangerous at that time to trust our own thoughts, and to entertain dotages of the mind: rather, we should seek (by the comfort of a confident Confessour, and by other good friends) to strengthen our selves against the storm which most commonly, onely threatneth us in the haven.

we

§ 4, Divine Remedies.

Remedies for this Passion.

IF our soul have leisure to take wings, and to raise it self above it self, let us look upon Divine Remedies, whereof we may make use to divert or vanquish this direfull Passion; which is verily one of the most poisonous of reasonable nature. And first of all, let us consider, how God being neither capable of Hope nor Despair, faileth not to invite us to the one, and to withdraw us from the other, by the operations which he exerciseth on the visible world.

An excellent saying of venerable Bede.

Venerable Bede saith excellently well in his Observations, that he hath three sorts of Habitations, wherein he hath lodged six divers things. In heaven, he hath placed Verity and Eternity. On earth, Curiosity and Repentance. In hell, Misery and Despair. Why should we then take to us a Passion of the damned, which is not made for the world wherein we live? It is a remarkable thing, that God to make us hope, hath oftentimes strained the laws of Nature, doing things which seemed impossible to all humane judgements; and in works of Grace he daily also produceth miracles, drawing to salvation and glory people meerly desperate, according to the opinion of the world. How could we have one sole touch of Despair, were we truly faithfull, since God engageth even his goodnesse and power, to make us hope all that, which according to Man, is desperate. There is nothing impossible to the omnipotency of God. He did but speak a word, and it was sufficient to vindicate from nothing all this vast world of Creatures. So soon as he ordained it, so soon it was done. And he hath indifferently let us know his greatnesse, as well in the production of the least things, as in the creation of the most noble and eminent.

Non est impossibile apud Deum omne verbum. Luc. 1. Ipse dixit & facta sunt, ipse mandavit & creata sunt. Psal. 148.

Magnus in magnis, nec parvus in minimis. Aug. serm. de Temp.

What hindereth the production of admirable works.

There are three things which are opposite to admirable works: First, the weaknesse of the Agent created. Secondly, the indisposition of the subject. Thirdly, the frequency of things seen and used. But God takes away these three obstacles to do miracles in Nature. He gives to Active creatures a strength meerly particular, and wholly Divine, to work above their force. He gives to Passive, a power of submission, and a capacity to receive the supernaturall impression of agents, and brings forth effects, which are not onely great, but wholly extraordinary. And which is more, we therein observe five Excellencies, which are as five raies of their glory: to wit, Efficacy, Durance, Utility, the End, and the Means, which render all these works of God infinitely recommendable. It is by his command, that burning pillars walk in the air to serve as a standard for six hundred thousand fighting-men. That the sea parts in sunder and divides it self into two banks of Chrystall, to make a rampart for his people. That the Clouds of heaven showr bread of Angels. That Rocks open their sides to pour forth fountains. That armies of Flies and Caterpillers destroy legions all of iron and steel. That the Sun stands still in the midst of his career. That whales make a temple of their belly for a Prophet. That Sepulchres yield forth the dead alive.

God when he pleaseth takes away all the obstacles which oppose thereunto.

The wonders which God maketh to appear in the old Testament by the help of his creatures.

All this is done in nature by the ministery of Angels and the service of men: but, by the virtue of God alone, to whom it belongeth to do miracles; the soul of Jesus Christ it self having not been but the instrument of the World united to it in such like operation. What is it we ought not to hope from a God, from whom we can despair of nothing, and who holdeth Totall Nature at his service to help our confidence? But, not content with it, he passeth to miraculous works of Grace, wherein he causeth unexpected productions. I will give you an excellent consideration, to encourage you never to despair, either of your own salvation, or that of other sinners. It is, that God, albeit, by his prescience he cannot be ignorant of the successe of souls which are out of the sweetnesse of his predestination, and who are not reckoned in the number of his Elect; yet whilst they are involved in bodies, he treateth them as his own, not shewing that he despaireth of their happinesse.

S. Thom. 3. q. 13. 2.

God indifferently treateth elect souls as reprobate, during life, without shewing that he despaireth of their salvation.

Divines teach us, that there is not any one destitute of the help of sufficient Grace to work his salvation; not any one who is not visited with inspirations necessary for this purpose. Thus doth S. Augustine interpret the passage of the 18. Psalme, There is none who can hide himself from his heat. The ardour of the Word Divine pierceth through the coldest shadows of death. The Sunne is very generall, and there is not a creature in the world so little, which hears not news of him: yet all night long he retireth from us. And there are many people who are plunged in nights so tedious and irksome, that they seem to be (as it were) eternall. But this sun of Grace penetrateth into the darkest obscurities: It finds out men, who have nothing of man but skin and figure, and speaketh to them with its raies, which are so many tongues from heaven: It spake to Herod after the murder of fourteen thousand Innocents: It spake to Nero, in the agitations of a mind troubled with the image of his crimes: It spake to the Emperour Theophilus, when dying, he held between his hands the head of Theophobus his Constable to satiate his revenge: Lastly, It makes us pronounce aloud the excellent saying of S. Clemens Alexandrinus, There are no Cimmerians for the Word of God. He makes allusion to certain people, whom we now call Georgians, or else to those who antiently inhabited in the territory of Rome in places under the ground, such as that which we now-adayes call Sybilla's Grot, and it is thought the Sun never reflected into their caves; but it is not so in the visits of the holy Ghost; The great sea of Divine Lights is ever at hand, and abundantly overfloweth in favour of such evils as will participate therein. I am not ignorant, that certain Divines have said, that some sinners arrive many times to such exorbitancy of crimes and ingratitudes, that they in the end are totally abandoned by God, and have not all the rest of their time, one sole good thought. But the most moderate say, that this happeneth for certain time, and certain moments, albeit, one cannot generally say that a man may come to an estate so desperate, as to be wholly impenetrable to the graces of God: It is an errour to say, that a crime so detestable may happen in the world, of which one cannot have remission. We cannot set limits, nor bound time in the infinite mercies of God. Moses the Ethiopian, who was so black of body, so stained in conscience, so wicked of life, that he was accounted a devil incarnate, was so changed by the Grace of God, that he became an Angel of heaven. An infamous thief having obtained his pardon of the Emperour Mauricius, was put into the Hospitall of S. Samson, where he so plentifully bewailed his sins in the last agonies of death, that the Physician who took care of him, coming to see him, found him unex-

God never faileth, with necessary succours, & sufficient Grace, to save us.

Psalme 18. August. ibid. Non est qui se abscondat à calore ejus.

Desperate people whom God visited to their end.

ἐθνος ἐν Νόμῳ Θεοῦ. Clem. Alex. protrept.

S. Dionys. de Hierarch. cœlesti.

Bellarm. l. 5 de Gratia.

S. Thom. 3. 4. 86. Dicere quod peccatum sit in hac vita de quo quis pœnitere non possit, erroneum est. Misericordiæ Dei nec mensuram possumus ponere nec tempora definire.

S. Leo. ep. 89

Admirable conversions of such as seemed desperate.

unexpectedly dead, and over his face a handkerchief bathed with his tears; and ſoon after he had a certain revelation of his Beatitude. To this purpoſe Pope Celeſtine ſaid, That a true Converſion made at the laſt end of life; is to be meaſured by the mind, not by the time. God cauſed a thief to mount from the gallows to Glory, to teach us, that as there is nothing impoſſible to his Power, ſo there is not any thing limitted in his Mercy. It is onely fit for him to Deſpair, who can be as wicked as God is good.

Cœleſt. l. ep. 2. c. 2. Vera ad Deum converſio in ultimis poſitorum mente potius eſt exiſtimanda quam tempore.

§ 5. The Examples which Jeſus Chriſt gave us in the abyſſe of his ſufferings are moſt efficacious againſt puſillanimity.

The ſight of our Saviour teacheth us to perſevere in our good hopes, and not to deſpair.

BEhold the conſolations we may derive from our firſt model: but if we will conſider the ſecond; we ſhall find that our Lord, who did all for our inſtruction, witneſſed ſtrong hopes in the great abyſſe of dolours wherewith he was all covered over on the Croſſe, to encourage us to hope well in the moſt ſenſible afflictions.

That you may well underſtand this point ſo important, you muſt conſider, what then was the ſtate of the body and ſoul of Jeſus Chriſt: the body was ſo full of wounds, that they, who could not be ſatisfied with his pains, did more in him torment his wounds then his members. He had almoſt no part about him entire, whereof he on the Croſſe could make uſe, but his eyes and his tongue. His eyes not being pulled out as (Samſon's and Zedekiah's;) there was nothing left for him, but to ſet before his view the Martyrdome of his good Mother, who was faſtned on the Croſſe by love, and who imprinted in her ſoul, by a moſt amorous reflexion, all the torments which the King of the afflicted bare on his body. His Tongue, which he had reſerved free to be the organ of heavenly harmonies in thoſe fervent prayers he ſent to his celeſtiall Father, was wholly drenched in gall,

But all this was nothing in compariſon of the dolours of his Soul: For, he was deſtitute for a time of all divine Conſolations, abandoned to himſelf, delivered over as a prey to all the outrageous ſadneſſe which may grow in our minds. It was a horrible blaſphemy in Calvin to ſay, that our Lord deſcended into Hell, there to endure the pains of the damned, without the ſuffering of which, he was not in a ſtate to be able to redeem the world. This (ſpoken in the manner as this abominable Noveliſt hath dared to write) woundeth, and offendeth the moſt obdurate ears. But if we will ſpeak with the moſt eminent Divines, we may ſay, that it is very likely that the Agonies of our Saviours Soul might in ſome ſort enter into Compariſon with the ſadneſſe of the damned; not by reaſon of their condition, but of their exceſſe. And certainly ſome have thought that our Saviour, ſtirring up in his bleſſed Soul a Contrition for all the ſin of the world in generall, and of every one in particular, was wounded with ſo piercing a ſorrow, that it in ſome ſort exceeded that of devils and the damned. For, all the ſadneſſe, which may be imagined in hell conſiſteth in acts which are produced from Principles that ſurpaſſe not the force of Humane or Angelicall Nature: but the pain which our Saviour endured for the expiation of our Ingratitude, was derived from the heart of God according to the whole latitude of the Grace and Charity of the word Incarnate.

Calvin. l. 2. Inſtit. c. 16.

Suarez. in 3. q. 46. Fieri potuit ut intenſivè eſſet major: an ità de facto fuerit non poteſt conſtare.

The exceſſe of the contrition and dolour of our Lord.

The three ſadneſſes of our Saviour.

For which cauſe, it is conformable to reaſon to ſay, by Allegory, that this bleſſed Soul entred into three kinds of ſacred and honourable flames, and of pains wholly Divine. The firſt was, in the garden of Olivet, when he ſaid, His ſoul was ſad to death: The ſecond, when he pronounced on the Croſſe, My God, my God, why haſt thou forſaken me? Complaining, not of the ſeparation of the Word (as ſome antient Writers have underſtood it, little conform to true Theology) but of receſſe from protection (as S. Athanaſius doth explicate it in his Book of the Incarnation; and S. Auguſtine in his 47. Tract upon S. John.) The third was, at the going forth of the incomparable ſoul of Jeſus, when there was not ſo ſmall a filament of a vein in his body, which reſented not the abſence of this divine Sunne.

Mat. 16.

Mat. 27.

Vox recedentis verbi Dei conteſtata diſſidium. Hil. can. 33. Athan. lib. de Incarn. Aug. tra. 47. in Joan.

Notwithſtanding, among all theſe great convulſions which put heaven into mourning, and earth into quakings under his feet: he ſtood firm, and, with an eye bathed in bloud beheld the raies of Glory which were to crown him after ſo exquiſite torments: ſo that in the one and twentieth Pſalme (which it is thought our Saviour wholly recited when he hanged on the Croſſe) having reckoned up the dolours which invironed him on all ſides; he raiſed himſelf up as the Palme againſt the weight of his afflictions, and ſaid, I will declare thy Name to my brethren in the midſt of the whole aſſembly of the faithfull. Yea, my God, all my praiſe ſhall be in thee, and for thee. I will pronounce thy marvels in thine own houſe, and I will offer thee my vows and ſacrifices before all thoſe who make profeſſion to honour thee.

Narrabo nomen tuum fratribus meis, in medio Eccleſiæ laudabo te. Apud te laus mea in Eccleſia magna, vota mea reddam in conſpectu timentium eum. Pſal. 21

6. Encouragements to good Hopes.

AND will we then in ſo great light of Examples, in ſo eminent protection of divine Helps, reſign our ſelves over to ſadneſſe and deſpair; among ſo many accidents of this tranſitory life? Deſpair onely belongs to hearts gnawn with dull melancholy, and to ſouls extremely in love with themſelves and the commodities of the world, or to maligne ſpirits who have loſt all the ſparks of good conſcience; or laſtly, to the damned.

Why ſhould we deprive our ſelves of an ineſtimable treaſure of good hopes, which the eternall Father hath kept for us in his omnipotency; of which the word Incarnate hath aſſured us on the Croſſe with his bloud, and the reſt of his life? Is it not a goodly thing to ſee people who bear the character of Chriſtianity, to lay down the buckler, and to throw away arms at the firſt approach of ſome affliction whatſoever, to grumble and murmure againſt God and men; to cruciate themſelves like Prometheus on the rocks of Caucaſus, to torment themſelves with a thouſand imaginary evils? Wo to you Apoſtate and fugitive children, who have made reſolutions without me, and who have weaved a web which was not warped by my ſpirit. It is no extraordinary matter (ſaid S. Chryſoſtome) to fall in wreſtling; but to be willing to lie ſtill ſtretched out at length on the earth. It is no diſhonour to receive wounds in fight; but, to neglect them, and to let the gangrene through lazineſſe to creep in, is a folly inexcuſable.

Væ, filii, deſertores, dicit Dominus, ut faceretis conſilium & non ex me, & ordiremini telam, & non per Spiritum meum. Iſa 30. 1. Chryſoſt. ad Theodorum

We entred into this life, as into a liſt, to wreſtle; as into a field of battel to fight: why are we amazed, if God uſe us as he did his moſt valourous champions? Let us look upon life on all ſides, and we ſhalll find it preſerved by good Hopes, and is totally ruined by Deſpair. Behold, men build after ruines and fires; ſee, others (after they are come all naked from amidſt waves, rocks, frothy rages of the ſea) gather together in the haven broken planks of their unfortunate veſſels, to commit their life to an element whoſe infidelity they know by experience, and taſte proſperous ſucceſſe onely by very ſlight hopes. Yet flie they like Eagles into dangers, among all the images of death, after they therein have been so ill treated. When Alexander was ready to enter into the Indies, one said unto him, Whither wilt thou go? Beyond the world? where dying Nature is but a dull lump: where darkneſſe robs men of heavens light: and the water hath no acquaintance with the earth. What ſhall you ſee, but frozen ſeas; prodigious monſters; maligne ſtars; and all the powers of life conſpiring your death? To what purpoſe is it to haſten to ſail over new and unheard of ſeas? Inconſiderately to interrupt the peacefull ſeat of the Gods? But (replyed he) Let us courageouſly go on, let us diſcover thoſe forlorn Countreys: Thus did great Hercules deſerve to win heaven.

therein

Aliena quid æquora remis, & ſacras violamus aquas, Divúmque quietas turbamus ſedes? Bamus, inter has ſedes, Hercules cœlum meruit. Senec. ſuaſoria 1.

Hope cauſed Rome to ſet Armies on foot after the battel of Cannæ; and France, to triumph over the Engliſh by the hands of a ſilly ſhepherdneſſe: wherefore will we deſpair of our ſalvation, ſith the mercy of God was never extinguiſhed, nor can he ceaſe to be what he is? what a thought of a devil is it, to deliver ones ſelf over to deſpair in the ſight of a Jeſus, who beareth our reconciliation on his ſacred members, and pleadeth our cauſe before his eternall Father, with as many mouths as our ſins in him have opened wounds? Know we not, We have a Biſhop, who cannot but compaſſionate our infirmities, ſeeing he himſelf hath pleaſed to paſſe through all thoſe trials; and to make experience thereof to his own coſt and charges? It is not the deſpair of our ſalvation which tempteth us, but that of temporall goods; this ſuit, and that money, is loſt: here is the thing which afflicteth this deſolate ſoul, and makes it hate its proper life. O ſoul, ignorant of the good and evil of thy life! It is thy love and not thy deſpair alone which tormenteth thee. Thou then haſt fixed thy Beatitude on this gold, this ſilver, on thy profit by this ſuit; and thou looketh on it, as on a little Divinity. Doſt thou forget the words of the Prophet? Silly partridge thou broodeſt borrowed eggs, thou haſt hatched birds which were not thine: let them flie, ſith thou canſt not hold them.

Non habemus Pontificem, qui non poſſit compati infirmitatibus noſtris, tentatum per omnia. Heb. 4.

Perdix fovit quæ non peperit, fecit divitias, & non in judicio, in dimidio dierum ſuorum derelinquet eas. Jer. 17. 11.

That which thou eſteemeſt a great loſſe, ſhall be the beginning of thy happineſſe: thou ſhalt ever be rich enough, if thou learneſt to be ſatisfied with God. But, this perſon (whom I more dearly loved then my ſelf) is dead, and all my purpoſes are ruined by his death: wherefore doſt thou reſolve with thy ſelf to ſay now he is dead? Began he not to die from the day of his birth? Muſt he be looked on as a thing immortall, ſince both thou and he have already received the Sentence of your deaths from your mothers wombs? If thou onely griev'eſt for his abſence, thou wilt quickly be content; for thou daily goeſt on towards him, as faſt as the Sun which enlightneth us; there is not a day which ſet thee not forward millions of leagues towards thy Tomb. I am content that they bewail the dead, who can have no hope of Reſurrection; they who believe they are dead never to live again. Let them bemoan the loſſe of their friends as long as they will: as for us, we ſhall ſoon ſee one another, and re-enter into the poſſeſſion of thoſe, whoſe abſence we a while lament.

Ruricius. S. Hieron. Fleant mortuos ſuos qui ſpem reſurrectionis habere non poſſunt, fleant mortuos ſuos quos in perpetuum æſtimant interiiſſe, in brevi viſuri ſumus, quos dolemus abſentes.

It is not abſence (ſay you) which moſt afflicteth me; but, to ſee my ſelf deſtitute of a ſupport which I expected, that is it vexeth me. Enter into thy heart, lay thy hand on thy thoughts, and they will teach thee, that all thy unhappineſſe cometh from being ſtill too much tied to honours, ambitions, and worldly commodities. I would divert thee as much as I might poſſibly from deſpair, but I at this preſent find that the remedy of thy evils will never be, but in a holy Deſpair of all the frivolous fair ſemblances of the world. O how wiſely ſaid Vegetius, That Deſpair is in many a neceſſity of virtue. But more wiſely, S. John Climachus, who defining the life of a perfect Chriſtian, which he calleth the Pilgrimage, did let theſe words fall, True, and perfect Religion is a generall Deſpair of all things. O what a happy ſcience is it, to know how to Deſpair of all, to put all our hope in God alone? Let us take away thoſe deceitfull and treacherous props which beſiege our credulous minds, and ceaſe not to enter into our heart by heaps: Let us bid adieu to all the charming promiſes of a barren and lying world, and turning our eyes towards this celeſtiall Jeruſalem our true countrey; let us ſing with the Prophet, All the greateſt comfort I have in this miſerable life, is, that I often lift up mine eyes to the mountains, and towards heaven, to ſee if any neceſſary ſuccour comes to me from any place. From whence can I hope more help or conſolation, then from the great God omnipotent, who of nothing created this Univerſe, and hath (for my ſake) made an infinity of ſo many goodly creatures? Should I ſee armed ſquadrons of thunders and lightnings to fall on me, I would have a ſpirit as confident, as if there were no danger. Were I to paſſe through the horrours of death being in thy company, I would fear no danger. Moreover, I hold it for a ſingular favour, and it ſhall be no ſmall comfort to me, when thou takeſt pain lovingly to chaſtiſe me for my miſdeeds, and to favour me with thy viſits. Happy he, who hath raiſed his gain from his loſſes, his aſſurance out of his uncertainties, his ſtrength out of his infirmities, his hopes out of his proper Deſpairs, and who hopes not any thing but what is promiſed by God, nor is contented but with God who ſatisfieth all deſires and crowneth all felicities.

Vegi. l. 4. c. 3. Neceſſitas quædam virtutis eſt deſperatio. Clym. gr. 3. peregrinatio vera eſt omnium prorſus rerum deſperatio.

Levavi oculos meos in montes, unde veniet auxilium mihi. Auxilium meum à Domino, qui fecit cœlum & terram. Pſal. 120.

Si conſiſtant adverſùm me caſtra, non timebit cor meum. Pſal. 26. 3. &c.

The ninth Treatiſe, Of FEAR.

§ 1. The Definition, the Deſcription, the Cauſes and Effects thereof.

The nature of Fear, and the bad effects of it.

FEar is the daughter of ſelf-love and opinion; a Paſſion truly horrid, which cauſeth all things to be feared (yea, thoſe which are not, as yet in being) and by making all to be feared, hath nothing ſo terrible as it ſelf. It falleth on a poor heart, on a miſerable man, as would a tempeſt not fore-ſeen, or like a ravenous beaſt practiſed in ſlaughter; and confiſcateth a body which it ſuddenly interdicteth the functions of nature, and the uſe of forces. It doth at firſt, that, with us, which the Sparrow-hawk doth with the Quail. It laies hold on the heart, which is the fountain of heat, and ſource of life; it ſeizeth on it, it gripes it, it tortureth it in ſuch ſort, that all the members of the body extremely afflicted with the accident befaln their poor Prince, ſend him ſome ſmall tributes of bloud and heat to comfort him in his ſufferings, whereby the body becomes much weakned. The vermillion of cheeks inſtantly fadeth, and paleneſſe ſpreads over all the face, deſtitute of the bloud wherewith it was formerly coloured; the hair hard ſtrained at the root with cold, ſtares and ſtands on end; the flames which ſweetly blaze in the eyes, fall into eclipſe; the voyce is interrupted; words are imperfectly ſpoken; all the organs and bands are looſened and untyed; quaking ſpreads it ſelf over all, eſpecially the knees, which are the Baſis of this building of Nature:

cure) and over the hands, which are frontier-places most distant from the direction of the Prince, who is then toiled with the confusion of his state. This evill passion is not content to seize on our body, but it flieth to the superior region of our soul, to cause disorder; robbing us almost in a moment, of memory, understanding, judgement, will, courage, and rendring us benumm'd, dull, and stupid in our actions. This notwithstanding is not to be understood but of an inordinate fear. And that we may see day-light through this dark passion, to know it in all the parts thereof; I say first in generall that there are two sorts of Fear, Morall and Naturall. Morall, which comprehending filiall, and servile, is not properly a Passion, but a Vertue, which S. Barnabi (according to the report of Clement Alexandrinus) called the Conductrix of Faith. S. Ambrose, the rudder of the soul. And Tertullian, the foundation of Salvation. Of this very same it was S. Zeno spake so eloquently. O necessary fear! which art to be procured by care and study, and not to be met by chance; voluntarily, not out of necessity, and rather by over much piety and tenderness, then by the occasion of sin, which brings a guilty soul vexation enough.

The sorts of Fear. Clavus animæ fugientis. Ambr. de Paradis. Tertul. de cultu fœmin. O necessarius timor! qui timet ante non cadit, voluntate non necessitate, religione non culpa. S. Zeno.

Naturall fear is properly an apprehension of a near approaching evil framed in the soul, whether it be reall, or seeming, to which one cannot easily make resistance. It is divided into six parts, according to the Doctrine of S. John Damascen, to wit, Pusillanimity, Bashfulnesse, Shame, Amazement, Stupidity, and Agony. Pusillanimity feareth a labour burthensome, and offensive to nature. Bashfulnesse flyeth a foul act, not yet committed. Shame dreadeth disgrace which ordinarily followeth the sinne when it is committed. Amazement (which we otherwise call admiration) is caused by an object we have of some evill which is great, new, and not expected, the progressions and events whereof we cannot fore-see. Stupidity proceedeth, from a great superabundance of fear which oppresseth all the faculties of the soul. And Agony is the last degree which totally swalloweth up the spirit in the extreme nearnesse of great evils, and greatly remediless.

Six sorts of naturall Fear.

The causes of fear.

Forasmuch as concerneth the causes of this passion, if we will reason upon it, we shall find, that the chief and most considerable, is self-love, which is ever bent upon the preservation of it self, and the exclusion of all things offensive; from whence it cometh, that all the greatest lovers of themselves are the most fearfull, and the most reserved in the least occasions of perill, as are ordinarily persons rich, full of ease, and nice; who resemble the fish that hath gold on his scales, and is the most timorous creature of the sea. The second, wherein many particular causes meet, is the evil to come, namely when it is great, neer, inevitable, and that it tends to the privation of our being. From thence arise a thousand spectres of terrour; as are poverty, outrages, maladies, thunder, fire, sword, inundations, violent deaths, wild beasts; and above all, men powerfull, cruell, revengefull, wicked; especially when they are offended, or that they have some interest in our ruine, and that they can freely be revenged without any fear of laws or punishment. Adde to these, the envious, corrivalls, greedy heirs, friends treacherous, provoked, or timorous, mutinous, quarrelsome, violent, and greedy. The third motive of fear, is, the ignorance, and little experience we have in the evils of the world: for, all that which is covert and hidden from us seems the more terrible, as are solitudes, abysses, darknesses, and persons disguised. From thence cometh, that women, children, and men bred in a soft and sedentary life are more timorous, sith the knowledge of dangers whereof they are deprived is a great Mistresse of Fortitude. The fourth source is coldnesse, and consideration, which is the cause that the wisest justly fear perils, where hair-brain'd young men, fools and drunkards carelessly jeast and make sport: and that was the cause why Sylla, finding himself many times too considerate in the foresight of evils, did endeavour to drown his apprehensions in wine. The fifth is observed in a nature cold, melancholick, imaginative, and distrustfull, which sometimes happeneth to Hypocondriacks, such as was that of the antient Artemon, who caused a buckler continually to be carried over his head by two Lackeys, fearing lest something falling from on high might hurt him: or that of Pisander, who feared to meet his own soul: or that other frantick fellow, who durst not walk for fear of breaking the world, which he perswaded himself was wholly made of glasse.

Ælian. l. 12. de animal. ὁ καρχάρος ἰχθὺς δειλότατος.

The sixth, lastly comes from an ill conscience. For there is not any thing so turmoiled, so torn, and so divided as a soul which hath alwayes before it the image of its own crimes. This was it which made the Nero's and Domitians to tremble: This, which caused Apollodorus (of whom Plutarch speaketh) to have horrible visions, so that it many times seemed to him in his nightly sleeps that the Scythians flaied him alive & threw his chop'd members one after another into a boiling caldron, and that he had nothing alive but his heart, which said to him in the bottome of this caldron, I am thy wicked heart, It is I, who am the source of all thy Disastres.

Semper enim præsumit sæva perturbata conscientia. Sap. 19. 11. Plutarch. de sera numinis vindicta.

§. 2. Of the vexations of Fear, its Differencies, and Remedies.

Fear, a troublesome passion.

WE may well say this passion is one of the most troublesome and vexing among all the motions of our mind; because it is extremely ranging, sith, not content with the evils which are on the sea and land, yea in Hell, it forgeth new which have no subsistence, but in the perplexity of an imagination quite confounded. Besides this, it more spiritually tormenteth us, making our Judgement and Reason to contribute to our vexations, and many times so long turmoileth us, that it maketh us to fear, half an age of time, that, which passeth in a moment. For which cause, I account it a loving clemency of God to hide from us the greatest part of the things which befall us, the knowledge whereof would continually over-whelm our wretched life with sadnesse and affrightment, and not give us leave nor leisure, to breathe among the delicious objects of Nature. If so many great and eminent personages, who being mounted to the highest degrees of honour, have been thrown down into abysses, had continually beheld the change of their fortune, and the bloudy ends of their life; it is not credible but that the joyes of their triumphs would have been moistned with their tears, and by a perpetuall fear of an inevitable necessity, they would have lost all the moments of their felicity.

The ignorance of our evils is a stratagem of the divine Providence.

Three sorts of fear.

Now, in some sort to remedy a plague so generall; I find, the troubles which come to us this way either are naturall timidities, or fears of things very frequent in the condition of humane life, or are affrightments upon some terrible and unusuall objects. Forasmuch as concerneth timidities which we see in fearfull natures, they proceed either from the disposition of body and melancholick humour, or from the quantity of heart which is sometimes too great and hath little heat; or from idleneſse and effeminacy of life; or from a base birth and from a sedentary breeding, or from small experience, or from overmuch love of reputation, and ease both of mind and body. Some are timorous in conversation and fear to approach men of quality, they dread the aspect of those whom they have not accustomed to see, they quickly change colour, they have no consequence in their speech, no behaviour, no discourse, their words are broken, the tone of their voyce is trembling, and their countenance nothing confident; which very often happeneth to young men timorously bred, and little experienced: Others fear all occasions of Ceremonies, of pomp, and splendour, to see and to be seen, and would willingly borrow the veil of night to cover themselves from them. Others are very bad sollicitours of businesses, daring not to say, nor contradict any thing; and if they must needs ask a question, they do it so fearfully, that in asking, they shew how they should be denied. There are, who more fear to speak in publick, then one would a battel: which hath happened to many great wits, as to Demosthenes, Theophrastus, and Cicero, who protesteth, that being already of good years, he still became pale, and trembled in the beginning of his discourse: which in my opinion proceeded from an excessive love of honour, which these men seemed to hazard when they made Orations before Princes, the Senate, and people. A block-head exposeth himself with much more confidence, because he hath nothing to lose, and is like a Pilot who steereth a ship fraught with hay: But these were masters who guided vessels furnished with pearls, such credit and authority they had purchased. Æschines, a man well behaved, a great talker, and a huge flatterer, triumphantly spake before King Philip and the Macedonians, where poor Demosthenes had much ado to deliver his mind; so that one might have taken the one for an Ideot, and the other for an Oracle: yet there was no comparison, seeing the one had high and sublime thoughts, the other triviall and very vulgar, which were onely made good by the utterance of voyce and gesture. Some there have been so afflicted to have failed in a publick Oration, that they thereby have fain into despair; it so happened to Herod the Athenian (the proudest Oratour of his time) who being gravelled before the Emperour Marcus Antonius, was like to die with grief: yet judiciall hearers, do not the lesse value a learned man for the misfortune of these accidents; whilst popular spirits account them for disgraces, which more truly fall upon those who intrude themselves out of temerity, where they are not called out of duty, and striving to gain glory, do lose all the title they might have acquired. This happens to some by a precipitate imagination, who think upon the middle, and end of a discourse, when they are (as yet) in the beginning: To others, out of a light and skipping spirit, which in despite of them doth overflow: To others, by unexpected accidents, as it happened to the learned Oporinus of the University of Basil, to whom it was given in charge to receive the famous Erasmus, by offering him presents of wine in the name of the City: He was prepared for it with a brave and a long Oration; but being trained up to the School (which had little curiosity and quaintnesse in Complements) going about to kisse Erasmus his hand full of the gout, he did it so roughly that he hurt him, and made him to cry out of the pain he had put him to, by this kisse: which made the good Professour lose himself, nor could he ever hit upon the beginning of his discourse, untill they plentifully had powred out some of this presented wine for him to drink, so to awaken his memory.

Timidity, its causes and symptomes.

Certainly we must needs tell you, it is like a dancing on a rope to recite a long oration by heart, and there are many rocks for those who are naturally fearfull. There is not any thing which so much correcteth these timidities, as to break them in ones youth; to put ones self upon hazard when he hath not so much to lose; to cry out, to declaim, to take on in the theatres of a Colledge; to accustome ones self to see good company; to be fashioned for entertainments, discourses, replyes; to learn the garbs of the time and countrey; to study the art of penetrating spirits; not to be out of countenance with ill successe at the beginning; fairly to put on a businesse what one can, and not to become impudent by striving to resist fear. For it happeneth that such as were very timorous become many times so bold by complacence, that they must master their passion which is grown a little too insolent. One would not believe how resolute and fearlesse a man is upon all occasions, who hath been accustomed to declaim.

When Luitprand Bishop of Cremona was sent in Embassage to Constantine sonne of Leo the Emperour of Constantinople, he gave him audience sitting in a throne which suddenly was lifted up to the roof, and was inviron'd with Lions of brasse, who by art began to roar, of purpose to astonish him; but, he gave not over to speak as confidently, as if all this spectacle had been but a childish sport, because he had overcome himself before in a thousand occasions.

But they who after they have in youth tryed to correct these naturall fears, seeing they therein very little profit, should do well to withdraw from great conversations of the world, from the embroilment of affairs, from specious offices, from negotiations (which must be treated with bold and quick spirits) from warfare, from the Court, from Ceremonies, from Orations; to cultivate a sweet repose, without being stirred up by worldly ambitions, and to set themselves on the rack to be successfull in a profession, whereunto nature stands indisposed.

This did Isocrates, who had an excellent wit, and very capable of Eloquence; notwithstanding, finding himself destitute of Countenance, Gesture and Confidence, he never durst to speak in publick, contenting himself to teach even to his decrepit dayes; and commonly saying, he taught Rhetorick for a thousand Ryals, but would give more then ten thousand to him who would teach him Confidence.

Fearfull Oratours.

Ælian. l. 8. variæ Hist.

Philostratus in Sophistis.

Theodorus Zingerius.

The courteous meeting of Erasmus and Oporinus.

The shelf of Orations.

Remedies for timidity in declaiming.

Timidity sometimes turns into Insolency.

Luitprand. l. 6. de rebus in Europa gestis.

How perverse timidities should be handled.

§ 3. Against the fear of the Accidents of humane life.

THe second manner of fear is more troublesome, as poverty, scorns, chains, imprisonment, pains, maladies, and of death which assaulteth us in a million of objects plentifully diffused throughout totall Nature. But we must confesse, that of all evils there is not any one so terrible to man, as man himself. An enemy powerfull, factious, and wicked; he employeth all the instruments of terrour, to serve as arms for his iniquity; he inventeth crafty tricks, he whetteth swords, he mingleth poysons, he prepareth fetters and dark dungeons; he tyeth tortures, he raiseth gibbets to satiate his Revenge: and it seems he holds all the Furies and Devils under hire, to torment the miserable.

What shall a poor heart do which sees it self menaced by many mischiefs, greatly contrary to nature? Think yon it is a rock, or an anvile, which is moved at nothing? we must not brave it on paper, and with a Stoicall insolency mock at Phalaris his Bull, and Rhadamant's tortures. All these fears of things adverse to our nature may fall into the life of men the most constant, namely when hostilities (which assail us) are sudden, and violent, that the issue of them is irreparable.

Notwithstanding, it much helps to sweeten this passion, to consider what Seneca saith, That often we fear too much, or too soon, or without cause. We fear too much, by fearing things mortall, as if we were immortall. We have infinite apprehensions of pains which end with a life so short. It is to be ignorant of the things of nature, and to make an ill divident of our thoughts thoughts, to caſt perpetuall cares upon an evil which is not many times ſo ſoon come, but that it ceaſeth to be an evil, taking away the ſenſe by the violence, or fortifying it by its faintneſſe. We fear too ſoon by apprehending things far diſtant from us. There is but too much time to be miſerable in this life: Let us not haſten to anticipate it, nor let us loſe one ſole moment of preſent happineſſe for imaginations of the future. We fear without cauſe, when we dread things which will never happen; and if they do happen, it will peradventure be for our advantage.

Fear of accidents in the world.

Man terrible above all terrible.

Remedies against accidentall fear. Senec. ep. 13

There are who eſcape out of priſon by fire, others who are faln into precipices very gently, and have in the bottome found their liberty; others, to whom poyſons are turned into nutriment; others, to whom blows of a ſword have broken impoſtumes: ſo true it is, that the ſeeds of good hap are ſometimes hidden under the apparances of ill.

To take things at the worſt

Beſides this, give your ſelf the leiſure to find out the whole latitude of the evill which ſtrikes you: Take (if you think good) all things at the worſt, and handle your ſelf as an enemy; yet you ſhall find that this evil is not ſo bad as it is ſaid; that many have gone that way before you; and that if God permit it, he will give you ſtrength to bear it. The fear it ſelf (which is the worſt of our evils) is not ſo great a torment, ſince it affordeth us precaution, induſtry, and fit means, and ſuggeſteth us wayes to fear no more. If you never have experienced evil you have much to complain, that you ſo little have been a man; and if you have ſome experience of the time paſt, it will much ſerve you to ſweeten the apprehenſion of the evils to come. Vanquiſh your own conceits as much as you can, and pray them not to preſent unto you under ſo hideous a maſk, thoſe pains, which women and children have many times laughed at: If you in the beginning feel any horrour, and the firſt rebellions of nature, loſe not courage for all that, ſince the Poet painted Boldneſſe with a pale viſage. We have often ſeen great Captains (as Garcias) to quake in the beginning of dangerous battels, becauſe their fleſh (as they ſaid) laid hold of their courage, and carried the imagination into the moſt hideous perils. Laſtly, be it how it will be, you ſhall find the remedy of your fears, in the preſence of that which you fear, ſince there are ſome who in the irreſolution of ſome affair do endure a thouſand evils, and ſo ſoon as the determination thereof ſucceedeth, though to their prejudice, they feel themſelves much more lightned. Many priſoners who ſtand on thorns in priſon expecting the iſſue of their triall, go very reſolute to execution, ſeeing it is better to die once, then to live ſtill in the apprehenſion of death. David ſhook with fear, wept, and faſted, lay on the ground for the ſickneſſe of his young ſon: But after the death was denounced him, he roſe up from the earth, changed his habit, waſhed and perfumed himſelf: then having worſhipped in the houſe of God, he asked for his dinner; and firſt of all comforted Bathſheba upon this accident: whereat his houſhold-ſervants were amazed. But he taught them, we muſt not afflict our ſelves for thoſe things, whereof there is no remedy.

Fiducia pallens. Statius Theb.

Rodericus Toletanus rerum Hiſp. l.5.c.23.

Reg 2.12.

I conclude, with the laſt kind of fear, which comes from things very extraordinary, as are Comets, Armies of fire, Prodigies in the Heavens and the Air, Thunders, Lightnings, Monſters, Inundations, Fires, Earthquakes, Spirits, Spectres, Devils, and Hell. Good God! what terrour is there in this miſerable life, ſince beſides theſe which are ſo ordinary with us, we muſt expect other from places ſo high, and ſo low? But howſoever, we notwithſtanding do find courages which ſurmount them with the aſſiſtance of God, although it do not ordinarily happen without ſome impreſſions of fear: otherwiſe we muſt be far engaged in ſtupidity. Comets, Eclipſes, flying fires, and ſo many other Meteors, do not now-a-dayes ſo much affright, ſince we have diſcovered the cauſes, which is a powerfull proof, that ignorance in many occaſions makes up a great part of our torments. Pericles ſtrook a fire-ſteel in an aſſembly of his Captains and Souldiers (who were aſtoniſhed at a thunder and lightning happened in the inſtant of a battel) ſhewing, that what the heavens did, was that he was doing before their eyes, which marvellouſly ſatisfied them.

Stratagem of Pericles, Polyænus l. 3.

Superſtition makes a thouſand fantaſies to be feared, whereat we might laugh with a little wiſdome. The Egyptians were half dead, when the figure of a huge dragon, which ſometimes of the year was ſhewed them, did not ſeem to look well on them: and the Romans fell in their Courage, when the Cocks which governed their battels did not feed to their liking. Hecataus an antient Hiſtorian, telleth that Alexanders whole army ſtood ſtill to look on a bird, from whence the Augur went about to derive ſome preſage, which being ſeen by a Jew named Moſellan, he drew an arrow out of his quiver and kill'd it; mocking at the Grecians who expected their deſtiny, from a creature which ſo little knew its own. As we laugh at this preſent at theſe fopperies, ſo we ſhould entertain with ſcorn ſo many dreams, and ſuperſtitious obſervations which trouble them enough who make account of them. Wild beaſts, inundation of rivers, productions of mountains big with flames, ſulphur, and ſtones; are other cauſes of terrour: nor hath there ever been ſeen any more hideous, then that which happened theſe late years in Italy, in the laſt fiering of Mount Veſuvius, which is excellently deſcribed by F. Julius Recupitus: Then it, there can be nothing ſeen more able to excite terrour, unleſſe in an inſtant the bottome of Hell were laid open, and all the hideous aſpects of the torments of the damned. Yet it is a ſtrange thing, how among waves of fire which ran on all ſides, clouds of Aſhes which appeared like vaſt mountains, continuall Earthquakes, countrebuffs of Hillocks, and of houſes, of Abyſſes, of Gulphs, and of Chaoſes; there were people to be found, who yet thought upon their purſes, and took the way towards their houſes to lay hold of their ſlender ſubſtances; which makes us ſee, that there is nothing ſo horrid where the ſoul of man (returned to it ſelf) findeth not ſome leiſure to breathe. The monſters of the Roman Amphitheatre, which in the beginning made the moſt hardy to quake, were in the end deſpiſed by women, who were hired to combat with them. Things not ſeen, which (it ſeems) ſhould moſt trouble the mind, becauſe they are moſt hidden, are alſo in ſome ſort ſurmounted; ſince we read how that many great Anchorets lay in Church-yards infeſted with ghoſts, and ſpectres, and about ſolitudes, in forreſts and wilderneſſes the moſt retired, in the midſt of ſo many illuſions of evill ſpirits: as it is written in the Acts of Saint Anthony, S. Hilarion, and S. Macarius. There is nothing but the day of Judgement, Hell and the puniſhments of the damned, we ſhould reaſonably fear, and not out of viſionary ſcruples, to free us from all fear.

Euſeb. l.1. de præparat. Evang. c.9.

Hecatæus apud Cuneum, l.2. de Rep. Hebræorum.

The burning of Veſuvius in the year 1631. Julius Recupitus.

The fear of poverty cauſeth ſtrange boldneſſe.

§ 4. That the Contemplation of the power, and Bounty of God ought to take away all our fears.

Remedies. The power and providence of God which preſerveth us ought to drive away all our fears.

But if theſe reaſon (which I more according to humane nature have deduced) enter not ſufficiently into your mind; lift up your thoughts to things divine: and when you have contemplated all the devaſtation of this paſſion, learn a little to deplore your miſery, which causeth you to fear almost all except that which is able to deliver you from all fear. Behold, in our first model, the Power and Providence of God, which are two perfections able to fortifie our weakneſſe, diſſipate all our faintneſſe, and encourage all our puſillanimity. The omnipotency of God not onely ſets free from the ſurpriſals of fear; but aſſures all which is under its power and protection, to which we voluntary have ſubmitted. What ſhould he fear; nay, what ſhould he not hope; who hath a God for protectour, and a God abſolutely powerfull? His Power, and his Eſſence walk hand in hand, inſomuch as Power in God is nothing elſe but the effective Eſſence of God.

Apud Deum non erit impoſſibile omne verbum. Luc. 1.

We need not fear, that his juriſdiction is onely extended to certain places, ſince it is without limits, and embraceth all places: That it is limited, to a certain number of Ages; ſince it is eternall and involveth all Time: That it is greater at one time then at another, in that which interiourly concerneth it; becauſe it is immutable: That it looſeth any thing of its vivacity in the revolution of ſo many years; for that it hath an infinite vigour which comprehendeth all the perfections of Eſſence. As much as the Divine underſtanding can comprehend, ſo much the Divine power can execute. Both have no meaſure; and both alwayes go in the ſame proportion; equalling their greatneſſes, whilſt nothing equalleth their worth. What abyſſes, and what treaſures of power muſt He poſſeſſe, who hath within himſelf ſo inexhauſtible ſources, and ſuch communications, as are in God, who can endleſſy communicate himſelf in the orders of Vegetative, Senſitive, and Intellectuall nature; and laſtly in Grace and Glory, where he doth ſo many wonders, never emptying nor limiting his Virtue! All this great world, where the Sun (as ſome Aſtrologers ſay) is an hundred and fourty times greater then the Earth, and progreſſeth in twenty four hours more then twelve millions of leagues; where there are fixed Stars which go in the ſpace of an hour more way, then a Horſeman could in ſeventeen hundred, and twenty ſix years: All the great variety of this Univerſe (where there are creature without number, beauties without end, and greatneſſes to our eyes immeaſurable) is but an effect of his word; He made it with the leaſt blaſt of his mouth; and with the leaſt breath of his mouth can unmake it, and inſtead of it build up an infinity of other worlds much greater and more perfect then this. Good God! what ſay we, when we ſay God? when we ſay the power of God? All that is, and moves in nature, actuateth not, but by this predominant Power; and ſhould he once draw back an arm, totall Nature would ceaſe from its operations, and diſſolve into nothing. All thoſe vaſt armies which made oſtent to tear down ſmoaking Cities, and dry up ſeas, to render mountains navigable, to turn the courſe of whole nature topſie-turvey, were overthrown by the hand of God, who for this purpoſe made uſe of graſhoppers and flyes, which he calleth his Great Forces, in the Prophet. It is he who circumvolveth the heavens, who ſupports the earth, who diſtendeth the waters, who quickneth the whole world with his fire and breath, who darkneth the air with tempeſts, when he pleaſeth; who maketh clouds to pour down in deluges, who ſwalloweth up the fleets of petty Pharaohs, who flyeth upon the curlings of waves, who imflameth lightnings, and maketh bloud and ſcorpions to rain upon the rebellions of earth. O power of God! what do we ſay, when we tell your wonders? It is not ſufficient to ſtrike terrour into the wicked, and to occaſion confidence in his children; ſince it hath an eternall alliance with this great Providence which governeth the world? For, in a word, we are in his hands, both we, and all our deſigns, and all our poor providence: as for him he powerfully actuateth from one extremity to another, and ſweetly diſpoſeth of all, without any trouble. What aſſurance would a good ſoul have if it would attentively conſider it ſelf all covered under the wing of God, all looked upon with the eye of the divine Providence which protects Sceptres and Crowns, not forgetting the ſillyeſt little worm of the earth?

Nempe in ſemet manens quod habet, eſt; & quod eſt ſemper uno & eodem modo eſt. In eo & multa in unum, & diverſa in idem rediguntur, ut nec numeroſitate rerum ſumat pluralitatem, nec alterationem de variatione ſentiat. Bernard. in Cantic.

The Sun is an hundred and fourty times bigger then the earth; and in twenty four hours goeth more then twelve millions of leagues. Prodigious courſe of ſome ſtars.

Locuſta fortitudo mea magna. Joel 2. 25.

In manu enim ejus nos, & ſermones noſtri, & omnis ſapientia artingit à fine uſque ad finem fortiter, & diſponit omnia ſuaviter. Sap. 7.

It ſhielded the little Moſes under the waves, and the three Children in the flames: it likewiſe ſhielded all the juſt, nor doth it ever permit them to ſuffer, but to derive lights out af their Eclipſes, and glory from their torment. If we ſpeak with S. Thomas, we will ſay, it is the unchangeable rule of all the alterations of the world: If with S. Denis; it is a fountain which overfloweth from the higheſt part of the heavens upon the leaſt creatures of the earth: If with Clemens Alexandrinus; it is the ſuperintendent of all this great circle which we call the world: If it be the rule; why do we wander from it? If it be the fountain; why do we deprive our ſelves of its favour? If it be all Eye; why do we depart from its lights? Blind that we are, if we forget it, living daily in its boſome, and between its arms; diſloyall, if we forſake it; unnaturall, if we betray it.

Opuſc. 10. 23. S. Dyonis. de cœleſti Hierarch. c. 4. Clemens Alexandr. in protrept.

§ 5. That the Example of a God-man ought to inſtruct, and aſſure us againſt affrightments of this life.

LEt us caſt our eyes upon the ſecond model, and add to theſe, two great Motives which we go about to deduce, the example of Jeſus, which ſhould ſerve us for a bulwark of Adamant againſt vitious fear. He was the ſtrong of ſtrongs, and the moſt noble Courage which ever fell into the ſtrongeſt Ideas of Angels. The holy Scripture likewiſe calleth him by the name of Man, and of a ſtrong man, from his mothers womb; and as heretofore, in the ſacrifice which was made for the expiation of ſinnes, the Old Law admitted not any but males; ſo it was fit to ſeek out for a man perfectly man, to celebrate this great and eternall ſacrifice which was once made, and which is renewed every day for the Redemption of the whole world.

The example of our Saviour ought to encourage us againſt fear.

Fœmina circundabit virum. Jer. 31. 22. Num. 18. 10. Mares tantum edent ex eo.

All Divines and Philoſophers agree, that Fortitude (which properly reſiſteth Fear and Puſillanimity) is a courageous and a conſiderate daring in great hazards, conjoyned with a Patience in great miſadventures: For it hath two arms, whereof the one aſſaileth, and the other ſupporteth; and the whole extent of its wonders is very aptly contracted within the circle of four virtues, which are Confidency, Conſtancy, Patience, and Perſeverance. For which cauſe we may truly ſay, that the champion that combateth in the honourable liſt of Fortitude, giving notable proofs of his courage by every one of theſe virtues, with reaſon, election, and intention (which are the conditions required by Saint Thomas) is arrived at the higheſt period of honour, generouſly triumphing over all the images of terrour. Now this is it which Jeſus Chriſt did with incomparable tranſcendencies for our inſtruction. For firſt, he would not, out of infirmity of nature, but through a diſpoſe of the ſacred œconomy of our Redemption be aſſaulted by the moſt furious object of fear which ever fell into the mind of man; permitting fear to invade the moſt elate part of his ſoul, and to ſurpriſe it, as in the Sanctuary of the Divinity.

What true fortitude is, And the parts thereof.

All the greateſt ſubjects of apprehenſion which ever men the moſt valourous had, concluded in the loſſe of a miſerable life; & if they did apprehend an evil to come, it ordinarily was the ſpace of ſome very little time; and when they expoſed themſelves thereto, it was by fits of neceſſity, and with feeble intentions, and intereſſed in ſelf-love. But if they had the worſt in the beginning of the hazards which they confronted, their Confidence was quickly changed into Diſtruſt, their Conſtancy into Levity, their Patience into Fury, and their Perſeverance into Smoke. Theſe are the vices which we obſerve in the comportment of Alexanders and Ceſars, and of all the valiant men of the earth: but, Jeſus, the true model of Valour, gave up for us a life of God, which is no ſmall object of Fear; for, otherwiſe feareth the Merchant who is fraughted with ſlight merchandiſe; otherwiſe he who carrieth gold and precious ſtones. Should a man to do a generous Act, hazard all the lives of men, if they might be confined within his heart; he ſhould endanger nought elſe but a little ſtraw or ſtubble: but, our Saviour expoſeth a life created, rooted in a life increate; which did as much excell all the lives of men, as the ſun doth ruſhes. He expoſeth this life, not to common and ordinary torments, or to mean tortures; but he delivered it over to exceſſive pains throughout all the parts of his body, to unheard of ſcorns, and to execrable cruelties. He contenteth not himſelf to have once had them in ſight a little before his death; but he looks them in the face from the firſt day of his conception; ſo ſoon as his bleſſed ſoul is poured into his body, he ſeeth two abyſſes, the one of dolorous pains, the other of deep ignominies which he was to undergo in the undertaking of the reparation of the world. There is not a man who had not rather fall once, then to be three dayes onely in the Fear one ſhould be in, to ſee himſelf upon the point to fall into a precipice; and yet Jeſus would live thirty three years in the object of his pains: nay, not onely of his, but of thoſe which in ſo long a revolution of ages were to be practiſed on all the Martyrs who were members of his body.

in

Gen. 7. Noah ſeems to have been one of the greateſt courages that ever was, ſince he was choſen out by God among men to ſail in a frail veſſel in a generall deluge, and to ſuſtain the ſhock of the fatall convulſions of the world; but the Scripture teacheth us that God with his own hand ſhut the window of the Ark wherein he was encloſed, and that he ſaw not any of the deaths and diſaſters which then happened, to the end Fear might not take away his life. There is none but Jeſus for whom the Curtains are drawn-aſide, to whom all the gates of lights and knowledges are opened to let him ſee the iſſue of all his labours; He accepteth them with a powerfull reaſon, a full liberty, and moſt glorious intentions; He entreth into them with a generous confidence: He remaineth in them with an unſhaken conſtancy, he endures them with an incomparable patience, he perſevereth in them with an entire conſummation of love, of ſufferings, of virtues, and of myſteries; waſting himſelf as the victimes of the old Law which were to burn all night till morning. So did he burn in this tranſitory life, untill the Aurora of the great Eternity. This true Joſhua never laid down the bucklers untill he ſaw the profane City of Ai (the City of the wicked) overthrown under his feet, and the Church eſtabliſhed in his bloud. And that which alſo raiſeth the merit of his magnanimity in all this, is, that in all the greateſt terrours and ſharpeſt dolours to which he reſigned himſelf for our ſakes; he did all which concerned our inſtructions with an entire judgement, in a manner deliberate and reſolute, and a ſpirit equall. He prayed moiſtned with his ſweat and bloud in the agony of the garden of Olives, he exhorted his Diſciples, he went out to meet the Souldiers, he delivered himſelf up to Executioners, he gave order for the ſafety of his Diſciples in the perill of his own perſon, he healed the wounds of his enemies, he gave leſſons of Virtues, he rendred oracles of Wiſdome, he meditated and preached the Croſſe; and whilſt all heaven was troubled over his head, and the earth trembled under his feet, he was immoveable; expecting the time of the Conſummation ordained by his heavenly Father.

Levit. c. 6. Cremabitur in altari tota nocte uſque ad mane. Joſ. 8. Leva clypeum quod in manu tua eſt contra urbem Ai.

O the greatneſſe of the Combats of Jeſus! O the force of the reſiſtances of Jeſus! O the Exceſſe! O the Example! ſhall we not be aſhamed, if from the ſpectacle of his ſplendours we caſt our eyes upon our own puſillanimity? We now-a-dayes fear all in the world, and fear not the Sovereign Maſter and abſolute Governour of the world. All creatures which ſhould be the objects of our contemptments, are the ſubjects of our fears, ever ſince we made a divorce from the Creatour; it being a matter very reaſonable that God make uſe of all manner of arms to proſecute a fugitive from his Providence, who ſeeks to ſave himſelf in a Region of nothing.

Dominus exercituum, ipſe Pavor noſter, & ipſe terror veſter. Iſa. 8.

O poor ſoul! thou feareſt the poverty which thy Jeſus hath conſecrated in the Crib and in Clours: Thou feareſt the reproaches which he hath ſanctified in the loſſe of his reputation: thou feareſt the dolours which he hath lodged in his virginall fleſh: thou feareſt death which he overcame for thee: thou feareſt the falſe opinions of the world. And what feareſt thou not, ſince thou dreadeſt fantaſies which are leſſe then the ſhadow of an hair! There is but one thing which thou feareſt not; to loſe innocency and ſanctity which thou expoſeſt to ſo many liberties, and alluring occaſions; ſo prodigall thou art of a good which thou haſt not. O thou welbeloved of God, although the moſt ungratefull to the love of God! wilt not thou dreſſe thy wounds? wilt not thou apply ſome remedies to thoſe vicious fears which gnaw thee and daily devour thee?

Reſolution againſt fear

Nulla medendi cauſa, niſi ne quod amamus, aut adeptum amittamus, aut non adipiſcamur ſperatum. Aug. q. 33. & 83.

If thou wilt follow my counſell, thy firſt reſolution ſhall be to regulate the love of thy ſelf, not to have ſo indulgent, and paſſionate a care of all things which concern thee, as if thou wert an onely one in the ſpecies, and that thy death were waited on by the Sepulchre of the world. Thy aim ſhould be to unloode thy ſelf as much as thou mayeſt from ſo many ties and dependencies which multiply thy ſlaveries. Thou muſt (as it were) live here a life of Nabatheans, which were people of Arabia, who neither planted, nor ſowed, nor built but by expreſſe laws, flew from delicious and fruitfull Countreys, for fear that Riches might ſubjugate them to Paſſions & the Commands of great ones. But if we cannot come to this heighth; at leaſt let us have our heart well deveſted from theſe ardent affections which we have towards worldly enablements; and behold them as one would an inconſtant moving of ſhadows and ſpirits which glide before our eyes with a ſwift courſe, and which ever move with the ſtep of time and of the Sun; to account as already loſt whatſoever may be loſt; to caſt your immortall cares upon an immortall ſoul; and to place it in the firſt rank of your affections. But if naturall love do yet tie us to health, to life, to honour, and to ſlight pleaſures, to the preſervation of our own perſon; to whom ſhould we entruſt all this, but to the Divine Providence, with whom ſo many juſt have depoſited their goods, their reputation, their life, their bloud; and have loſt nothing by this confidence, but have tranſmitted their purchaſes and conqueſts to the boſome of Eternity? In all which happeneth to us, let us look towards this eye of God which perpetually beholdeth us, this puiſſant hand of God, this amorous direction: Let us behold it as our Pole-ſtarre, as our flaming pillar, as our great intelligence which manageth all the treaſures of our life: Let us learn to repoſe us in his boſome, to ſlumber upon his heart, to ſleep between his arms. Upon the firſt accident which befalleth us; let us readily bend our knees in prayer; let us adore the ordinances

Diodor. l. 5.

Qui te tibi committit; melius te poteſt ſervare qui te potuit antequam eſſes creare. Aug. ſerm. 8. de verbis Apoſtol.

dinances of our ſovereign Maſter: Let us behold with a confident countenance all which is happened, or may happen: Let us ſay, God knoweth all this, God permitteth all this, God governeth all this: He loves me as his creature, he wiſheth me well as one who hath given himſelf to him; he can free me from this affliction, if it be his holy will: He is all good, to will it; he is all potent, to do it. Nay, he is all wiſe, to will, and to do, all that which is beſt. Let us not meddle with the great current of his Counſels. He maketh light, in the moſt dusky nights, and havens in the moſt forlorn ſhipwracks. Were we with him in the ſhades of death, what ſhould we fear being between the arms of life?

Nullus eſt miſeriarum modus, ſi timetur quantum poteſt. Senec. ep. 13

Secondly, let us not be corrupted by opinions which invade us with a great ſhew of ſpectres and terrours, and make us ſo often to fear things which are not, and which ſhall never be. It is to be too ſoon miſerable, to be ſo before the inſtant: and if we for ſome time muſt be ſo; let us conſider that all the bleſſing and evils of the world are not great, ſince they cannot long time be great. Let us take away the mask from theſe fears of Poverty, of Sickneſſe, and above all from humane reſpects, as one would from him who goes about to affright children. Why fear we ſo much ſuch and ſuch accidents, which they, who are made of no other fleſh and bones then we, do daily deſpiſe? The acquaintance with perils hardneth to perils: and there is nothing ſo terrible, as the ignorance of reall truths. Laſtly, let us hold for certain, that a great part of our tranquillity dependeth upon our conſcience: Let us ſettle in it repoſe by a good Confeſſion; let us conſtantly undertake the fear of God, who will cure us of all our fears, ſince the Anchor of the floating underſtanding is the Honour of the Divinity.

Anchora mentis pondus timoris. S. Gregor.

The tenth Treatiſe, Of BOLDNESSE.

§ 1. The Picture, and Eſſence of it.

The picture of Boldneſs.

BOldneſſe is very well depainted in the boſome of power, ſhewing a heart in its hand, all encompaſſed with ſpirits and flames, its viſage is repleniſhed with confidence, its habit altogether warlike, and countenance undaunted. It looketh upon good all invironed with dangers, as a Roſe among thorns, or as the golden fleece among dragons, and is no whit amazed; but it is on fire to flie through perils, and to beat down all obſtacles which oppoſe its conqueſt. Good hap walketh before it, by its ſides innocency, benignity, piety, ſtrength, experience, and other good qualities which excite courage. The preſence thereof diſſipateth a thouſand petty Fancies which are loſt in the obſcurity of night, not able to endure the ſparkling of its eyes.

Its eſſence.

All this natively repreſenteth unto us the nature and condition of Boldneſſe, which is properly an effect of good hope, and a reſolution of courage againſt dangers. It is no wonder, if Power hold it in its boſome, ſince all the Boldneſſe a man hath comes to him from the opinion he conceives to be able enough, not to yield to the accidents which may aſſault him. This heart of fire, in which ſo many vigorous ſpirits ſparkle, is a token of the bold, who commonly have more heat and vivacity; from whence it cometh that young-men have herein more advantage then old, were it not that they derive more aſſurance from ſome other part, then from the weakneſſe of their age. The Eye, Port, and Habit ſuitable to warriours make it ſufficiently appear, it is a virtue wholly Military; and if it regard good environed with perils, we may thence conclude, it is the proper profeſſion of Boldneſſe to haſten to the conqueſt of a good, but of a good very difficult. For it will not gather palms and crowns but in a field watred all over with ſweats. All thoſe virtues which are by its ſides ordinarily, ſhew us ſuch as are the boldeſt, as are thoſe, who have their conſcience moſt clear, who are not offenſive, and therefore leſſe fear to be offended; who are underpropped by ſome great favour, and namely the protection of heaven; who are well diſpoſed both in mind and body; who have experience of other hazards from which they ſucceſsfully have vindicated themſelves, and the good hap which hath alwayes accompanied them. Thoſe aiery fantaſies which fly from Boldneſſe, are fears and affrights which are ſcattered by the firſt ray of its eyes.

§ 2. The Diverſity of Boldneſſes.

LEt us now more enlarge our thoughts to conſider the differences, cauſes, effects, qualities, and appurtenances of this Paſſion.

It is hard enough to make a ſound judgement of a man truly bold, ſo many illuſions there are of Boldneſſe which preſent themſelves to our eyes, and would have us make that to paſſe for virtue, which is meer crime and ſtupidity.

There are ſottiſh and beſtiall Boldneſſes which proceed from the ignorance of dangers, and which conſider not what is good or bad, hurtfull or innocent, perilous or ſafe in humane life.

This is it which makes ſuch, as know not what ſea-matters are, to laugh many times, and to take delight to ſcoffe in occaſions which cauſe pilots, the moſt experienced, to become pale.

This makes little children ſport and dally upon the brink of a precipice; that drunkards and fools go together by the ears, haſtening to ſword and peril; and that thoſe who walk, and are active in ſleep, to ſcramble upon houſe-roofs, paſſe over rivers, and precipitate themſelves into accidents, able to make the moſt hardy to tremble. The tree of the knowledge of good and evil coſts us very dear: It ſetteth before our eyes all the extent of our hazards and miſeries; it draweth our evils at length; it frames in our thought, that which ſhall never happen in effect; it armeth our knowledges againſt our ſelves; and, as Baſilisks kill themſelves by the reverberation of the mirrours they behold; ſo very often we cauſe the death of our ſelves by the reflexion of our lights.

A prima deſcendit origine mundi cauſarum ſeries, atque omnia fata laborantſi quidquam mutaſſe velis. Lucan. l. 6.

There are in the world who have Turkiſh opinions, and who believe a fatality in our lives, thinking the hour of our death is fixed; and that the heighth of rocks, the deſcent of precipices, ſquadrons briſtled with ſwords, deſarts full of ſerpents, flames iſſuing out of the bellies of ſcorched mountains, all poyſons and contagions haſten it not one ſole moment: and that on the other ſide; brazen walls, centinels full of terrour, fortreſſes and caſtles, flights and coverts cannot deferre it one ſilly inſtant. This opinion is very contrary to reaſon, becauſe it maketh from life all diſcourſe and diſcretion: and were it true, we need not eat nor drink, make uſe of arms, of garments, of munitions, of counſel, of induſtry, of puniſhment, or of reward; but to let all our actions looſe in a generall defection, which is wholly impertinent: and yet thoſe Maximes help Generals of armies, and and are the cauſe that Turks throw themſelves with a brutiſh Boldneſſe into the moſt dreadfull dangers, and ſuffer themſelves to be killed like flies, out of perſwaſion of this Deſtiny. It is very true, that God knows the number of our dayes, and that he likewiſe by his Providence ſtayeth the courſe of our years: but on the other part, he obliging us to a reaſonable preſervation of our ſelves, if it happen that out of ſome temerity meerly extravagant we run into an evident danger of death, and that we therein perſiſt; well is our death according to Gods calculation, but the cauſe is an effect of our folly and preſumption, for which God reſerveth a chaſtiſement in the other life. So, that ſuch blind Boldneſſes being in no ſort laudable cannot have any place among actions of virtue.

There are others which are abſolutely impudent, and which deſerve the title of ſhameleſneſſe, as are thoſe bold askers who offer up armed ſupplications, and will have demands the moſt diſadvantageous to be aſſented unto: as are thoſe alſo of deceivers and impoſters, who readily lie to enſnare the goods of another. They invent a thouſand crafty tricks and guileſull impoſtures which they diſtribute piece-meal, as ſeriouſly, as if they were the moſt confeſſed truths of all the world. Some, who are men of no account, make themſelves noble and illuſtrious, even to the pretending of their being deſcended from Demy-gods: others feign riches in picture, and ſirname themſelves from Baronies and Marquiſates, which are no more in being then Chymera's and flying ſtags: others ſeem valiant like unto Rhodomonts, and would willingly ſay in the tone of Romances: That they have had brave Combats with Rowland, Oliver and the Knight of the burning ſword. Others are bablers, offenſive, and ſeem to be onely born to affront men of worth. There you find throats ſtretched wide, affected countenances, diſſolute tongues, crooked finge s, hands exerciſed in thefts and robberies. There are likewiſe ſome who go up the gallows with a countenance as confident as if they had learn'd no other trade all their life time, but the practice of this kind of puniſhment; others bluſh not at any crime whatſoever, living in a ſtrange proſtitution of renown; and purſuing this courſe, frame to themſelves other diabolicall Boldneſſes of cut-throats, who out of an overflow of enraged furies, dare attempt upon the ſacred perſons of Kings and Biſhops; eſteeming nothing to be ſafe from their miſchief, nor impoſſible to their daring.

All theſe manners of proceeding are moſt abominable, and in no ſort deſerve the title whereof we treat in this diſcourſe, wherein I intend to ſpeak of generous Boldneſſes, which are neceſſary for humane life; and wherein there are ſome Military, others Civil, others, Holy and Religious.

§ 3. Of laudable Boldneſſe.

IS it not a wonder to behold, that, which is ſo illuſtrious in combats, and is the inſeparable companion of true valour, to which ſo many valiant men have in all times made love, ſacrificing themſelves in ſo many members to the honour thereof; to be glorified with ſuch crowns by its liberality? It is it which enkindled a brand of fire in the heart of Alexander, and gave him wings to flie into the thickeſt ſquadrons of his adverſaries: It, which Ceſar looked on boldly ſwimming amidſt the roaring waves, fearleſſe of the hail-ſhot of his enemies arrows: It, which ſparkled with ardent flames in Attila's eyes, when at the ſiege of Aquileia, ſeeing himſelf all alone unexpectedly ſet upon by a number of ſouldiers, he ſlew ſome of them in the place with his own hands, and ſcattered the reſt with the lightning flaſhes which reflected from his face: It, which crowned Pyrrhus in two duels: It, which made Conſtantine appear like a thunder-ſtroke in the battel againſt Maxentius: It, which animated Scevola when (left alone in the ſtreights of an Iſland by the Ebb of the ſea) he withſtood a whole Army of Barbarians: It, which accompanied Sicinvius in a hundred and twenty pitched battels, and affixed on his body fourty five wounds, as ſo many Rubies: It, which taught Cynegirus after his hands were cut off, to lay hold of a veſſel of his enemies fleet with his teeth: It, which cauſed a ſouldier of the Roman Army ſeeing himſelf lifted on high, and born with his armour upon an elephants Trunk, unaffrightedly to ſtrike him with ſo ſtrong and violent a blow that he made him let go his hold, and alone become victorious over a beaſt which carrieth turrets and houſes on his back. It is more eaſie to number the Stars in the ſky, then to keep a regiſter of ſo many valourous men who have been throughout all ages. Women and Virgins have had a ſhare in glory of this kind among many nations, envying the Laurels which crown the heads of brave Captains. The Scythian Jaxametes married not their daughters untill they brought the head of an enemy. The Lacedemonian women defeated the army of Ariſtomenes who had aſſailed them at a ſacrifice, and they maſſacred them with ſpits.

Lybyſſa ſlew ſeven men in a battel with her own hand. Semiramis was in a Bath, when hearing the news of the rebellion of a Province of her Empire, ſhe ſpeedily haſtned thither not taking the leiſure to put on her ſhoes, or dreſſe her; and brought it to obedience. She cauſed to be graven on a pillar of her tomb, That Nature had made her a Woman, but that Valour had equalled her to the moſt valiant Captains; that ſhe had made rivers to run along according to the current of her liking, and her likings, by the courſe of Reaſon; that ſhe had peopled deſart lands, hewed with the ſword through rocks, with ſilver-ſowed fields which were unknown but to ſavage beaſts, and that amidſt all her affairs ſhe ever had time for her ſelf, and for her friends.

In the fore-going Age in the warres of Hungary, we reade of a young Chriſtian woman at the ſiege of Agria, who with her mother and husband fought againſt the Turks, and the husband being ſlain, the mother adviſed her daughter to retire, and to interre the body of her dear Spouſe. But the valorous Amazon having anſwered, It was no time for funerals, took the ſword of her dead husband, thruſt her ſelf into the thickeſt of the troops, killed three Turks with her own hand, and in the end bare away the body of her well-beloved on her ſhoulders in deſpite of ſo many enemies, who ceaſed not to ſhoot at her. What may one adde to this Military Boldneſſe? Do we not daily ſee examples of it in our French Nobility, who fight upon occaſions, as if every man had a hundred bodies to loſe?

There is another, which hath place in civill life, and which maketh men bold in converſation, forward in affairs, courageous in occaſions, and patient in adverſity. Many who have not this great heart, are content to be eternally what they are, and do cultivate a litte life within the limits of modeſty. But others breathe nothing but buſineſſes, but bargains, but forreign commerces, but ſea-voyages; fearing neither ſtorms nor ſhipwracks. When this hardineſſe meets with great States-men, it maketh them pillars of Adamant, which a thouſand countrebuffs cannot ſhake. All the malice which is in corrupt minds, impiety in profane, inventions in the factious, daring in the inſolent, terrour in the potent, threats in the paſſionate, and cruelty in the bloudy,

Valer. l. 3. cap. 2.

Plin. l. 7. cap. 28.

Sabel. l. 7. Ænead. 8.

Alexander ab Alexandro.

Pauſanias in Meſſeniacis.

Æneas Sylvius in hiſtoria Bohemiæ.

Herodotus.

Aſcanius Contorius lib. 5. Bellar. Tranſilvan.

Olathus in vita Attilæ.

Thuanus.

bloudy, doth not make them go back one ſtep. They think with wiſdome, they ſpeak with liberty, they act with courage; nor have they any other fortune in their heads but the law, other life but innocency, other aim but truth, other reward then glory. Of this temper was the magnanimous Papinian (the honour of Lawyers) to whom the Emperour Severus, dying, recommended his two ſonnes, with the Government of the Empire. But the impious Caracalla having embrewed his hands in the bloud of his own brother Geta, and deſirous this great man ſhould ſet ſome Colour by his eloquence before the Senate and People upon an action ſo barbarous; he freely anſwered him, it was more eaſie to commit a paricide then to juſtifie it, uttering this truth, to the prejudice of his head which this wretched Prince cauſed to be cut off, and which the poſterity of great men hath honoured with immortall Crowns. Of the like conſtancy was Ariſtides the Locrian, in the Court of Dionyſius King of Sicily, who would have married one of his daughters; but the father ſtoutly anſwered, he had rather ſee her in her ſepulchre, then in the bed of a tyrant; which coſt him the life of his children: nor for all this did he repent him of his free Boldneſſe. Such alſo was the great Oratour Lycurgus, who managed the affairs of the Athenian Common-wealth, with ſuch equity and conſtancy, that being ready to die, he cauſed himſelf to be carried to the Senate to give an account of all the actions of his life; and to ſatisfie all thoſe whom he might have offended in his Government: but ſuch a life, inſtead of ſtains, had nought but palms and lights. To this may be joyned the boldneſſe of Saints, who have ſo often defended the Truth with the perill of their life againſt the rage of Tyrants: as that of S. Athanaſius, againſt the Emperour Conſtantius: That of S. Ambroſe, againſt Maximus: That of S. Chryſoſtome, againſt Eudoxia: That of S. Baſil, againſt Valens: Of S. Staniſlaus, againſt Boleſlaus: Of S. Thomas, againſt Henry King of England. With this, a million of Religious are to be found who have undergone, and do daily undergo the labours of Giants, who forſake the ſmiling favours of their native ſoil, to go into places, whither it ſeems nature hath been afraid to come. Thither they paſſe through an infinity of dangers, tempeſts, and monſters; there they live in forlorn wildemeſſes, among tombs of ice and ſnow; there they feed upon that which, to the curious and nice, would be a death to taſte. All ſweetneſſe and pleaſures of humane life are thence baniſhed; rigours, toils, and miſeries there perpetually reign; their eyes ſee none but barbarous vilages, their ears hear nought but outcryes and yells, their taſte finds onely bitterneſſe, their travels nought but thorns, their repoſe but torment, life but anxiety, and death very often a tomb of water. And yet holy Boldneſſe reſerveth to it ſelf courages which it leadeth forth, as it ſeems, beyond the ſun, time, and ſeaſons, to conquer ſouls to God. Muſt we not ſay, this paſſion is infinitely generous, and that it mounted to a heighth of virtue almoſt prodigious?

Notable Boldneſſe. Spartianus.

Voyages of Canada & the Indies.

All are not created to come to the moſt eminent degree of its excellencies; Nature muſt therein have a part: and verily in my opinion, the divine Providence prepareth bodies greatly adapted to thoſe daring ſouls which in them he reſolveth to encloſe.

Their temperature is hot, their heart little in bulk, but a rare fornace of heat; the members well compoſed, the ſpeech ſtrong, and the arm ſturdy. Education and Cuſtome create another nature; which hath alwayes been obſerved to be extremely neceſſary in the children which are to be trained up to valour. Thoſe people of India muſt in ſome ſort be imitated, who ſet them on the backs of certain great birds to carry them in the air, whereat theſe little Cavalliers are at firſt aſtoniſhed, but in the end, they ſo faſhion themſelves thereto, that they deſpiſe all other perill. The Romans daily made them to ſee lions and elephants in the Amphitheatre, and the bloud of ſword-players ſhed almoſt as ordinarily as wine; others leade them out to the ſea, among monſters and tempeſts; others practiſed them to combats, where they quickly learn'd the art of giving and receiving wounds, and to beat men down. David, Theſeus, and Braſidas, began the profeſſion of Warre very young. The ſon of King Tarquin, at the age of fourteen years, ſlew an enemy with his own hand. Scipio ſaved his father in the confuſion of a battel, being then but ſeventeen years old. Probus was without a beard when he was made Tribune in the Army. Alboinus very young in duel vanquiſhed the ſon of Thoriſmond King of the Gepides; which was the cauſe that his father, who before bred him amongſt his ſervants, did ſet him at his own table.

Cranz. l. 3. Dania.

Some think that ſtudy and learning are very much oppoſite to Military Boldneſſe; and it is very little to be doubted (if it be exceſſively purſued in the vigour of years which are proper for the exerciſe of arms) but that it will endanger mens Courages to become timorous. But it is of infinite uſe for Princes and young Gentlemen, who are to be diſpoſed to actions the moſt elate. For by a laudable temperature it ſweeteneth all that which a warlike humour might have contracted of roughneſſe and incivility; it awakeneth wiſdome, it enlightneth counſel, it renders Boldneſſe intelligent and magnanimous; it poliſheth the tongue; it gives authority in charges, grace in converſation, invention in the cabinet, honour among the wiſe, and glory with poſterity.

Study leſſeneth not courage.

After nature and education; to become bold, he muſt be ſenſible of Honour, which enkindleth the moſt timorous; he muſt vigorouſly exerciſe himſelf in the toils of Military diſcipline, and the practice of brave pieces of ſervice; he muſt not be either vaunting, ſcoffing, captious, or offenſive; but prudent, reſerved, active, and laborious: he muſt very little faſten his affections upon things of the earth; compoſe himſelf to the contempt of death, make account one is not born but to die for his Prince and Countrey, and to eſteem no life in the world more precious then Glory.

Nec triſtibus impar, nec pro ſucceſſu timidus ſpatiúmque moraudi, vincendíque modum mutatis noſcit habenis. Claudianus

§ 4. That true Boldneſſe is inſpired by God, and that we muſt wholly depend on him to become bold.

BUt beſides this, to raiſe ones ſelf to ſomething more excellent, we muſt look upon the divine Vertues which ought to be the perpetuall ſources of ours. But if you now ask me wherein we may be aided by our firſt model, to acquire Boldneſſe? I do not affirm we may properly ſay, that Boldneſſe is in God; becauſe this Paſſion is eſſentially conjoyned to a regard it hath towards a thing very difficult, and encompaſſed with dangers. Now we know, that nothing can be difficult or dangerous before God, by reaſon of his Sovereign Power and moſt accompliſhed Felicity. God (to ſpeak perſpicuouſly) can neither be timorous nor bold; but it is he who makes all thoſe who are truly bold within the limits and laſts of virtue. Certainly Ariſtotle ſaw much, when he ſaid, That the moſt bold were ſuch as were moſt in Gods favour.

Why Boldneſſe is not in God.

Ariſtot. 2. Rhetor. Audaciores eos eſſe quo recte ſe habent ad divina.

I will make good this propoſition in the firſt part of this diſcourſe, and ſhew a moſt manifeſt reaſon, which teacheth us, that every able man conſidering what he is, cannot be hardy of himſelf, by reaſon of the incapacity and weakneſſe of humane nature, and therefore we muſt ſay, that if he have ſome Boldneſſe, it neceſſarily comes to him from above.

The

Seven things able to humble a man.

The Platonists said, there are seven things able much to humble a man; the First whereof is, that his spirit is caitive, thorny, and light. Secondly, that his body is brutish, and extremely exposed to all the injuries and impressions of exteriour violences. Thirdly, that being so inconstant in his manners, he commonly is very constant in his errours. Fourthly, that his endeavours are infinitely vain, and that many times being ready to enter into his tomb (when he comes to behold and consider his whole life already past) he finds it to be full of spiders webs which he with much labour and industry hath spun, but to no purpose. Fifthly, that his fortune is of glasse, and many times catcheth a crack when it is most resplendent. Sixthly, that if he find wisdome amidst so many errours, it is but too late, and when he scarcely hath time left to use it. The seventh, that wisdome coming so slowly, death fails not to make haste, and to surprise a man, when his heart is embroiled with divers designs, and with certain knowledges of having done ill, with uncertainty of doing better. Besides Reason, doth not the Scripture in many places teach the weaknesse of man, and the necessity he hath of Divine succour for his subsistence? Behold, you are but a nothing, and all your works are as if they were not. Man is the very image of vanity, and a sherd of an earthen pot; Hay, that withers at the first rising of the hot sunne. The name of God, is a strong and most assured tower, the just shall there have their refuge, and there shall be exalted.

Apulei de Dæmonio Socratis. Homo levi, & antiâ mente, bruto, & obnoxio corpore, sui similis erroribus, dissimilis moribus, casso labore fortunâ caducâ, tardâ sapientiâ, citâ morte.

Is.41.24. Psal.143.4. Is.45. Jac.1. Pro.18.

Hence we see, how all those who have appeared in the world with some eminency, have ever had some particular favours from heaven to authorize their actions, and to make men believe, they had somewhat above man. So Moses, Joshuah, Deborah, Gedeon, Samson, David, Solomon, and so many others sent by God for the government of his people, came with certain characters of his Divinity, which gave them an admirable confidence, and framed in their souls notable persuasions of their own abilities. And it is a thing very remarkable, that such as were not in the way of true Religion, and who consequently could not have those assistances and singular protections from heaven, sought at the least to fortifie themselves with some semblances. All which filled Alexander with Boldnesse, was, that they had perswaded him he was of Divine extraction, and that this belief had seized on the souls of the credulous people; which was the cause that he was looked on as a man wholly celestiall, destinated to the Empire of the world. It is thought that Pyrrhus who imitated him, shewed his teeth in great secret to his friends; on the upper row whereof the word Λέων was engraven, and on the lower, βασιλεύς; as much as to say, He was a King as generous as a lion: but that which most made this Elogy good, was, that these letters were thought to be formed by a Divine hand, to give a testimony from heaven of the greatnesse of this Monarch: And this being spread among the people, it made them to expect prodigious things from him. Augustus Cæsar, who changed the face of the Common-wealth into Empire mounted on the Throne of the Universe by the same means. For it is said, that his father Octavius whilst he sacrificed in a wood, having shed a little wine on the Altar, there came a flame from it which flew up to heaven, whereon the Augur foretold him, he should have a son who should be Emperour of the world. It is added, that this Prince, being yet very young, in his child-hood, played with Eagles, and made frogs to cease their croaking by a silly command; and that as he entred into Rome after the death of Julius Cæsar, the Sunne was encompassed with a Rainbowe, as a presage of the great Peace he should produce in the Roman Empire.

A notable observation of Pyrrhus.

Adolphus Occo.

Suetonius.

Presages of the generosity of Cesar.

Dio, & Ziphilinus in Augusto.

Vespasian had never dared to aspire to the Empire, without the favour of presages, and namely of that, which happened to him on Mount Carmel, when, sacrificing in the same place, and being in a great perplexity of mind what resolution he should make in this affair; the Priest bad him to be of good courage, and the secret hopes of his heart should have very good successe. The world hath not been content to afford these favours to men alone, but it hath also given it to famous places. Rome, for good lucks sake, was termed, among other titles, Valence, by the name of Valour; and Cephale, as much as to say (Head,) to shew it should be the Head of the world. Presently also it was flattered with the opinion of its Eternity, so that many termed it the Eternall City, which was the cause that the Romans in their greatest desolations would never forsake the place.

Cornel. Tac. histor. l. 2.

Elogies of the City of Rome.

Solinus l. 1. Gergyrhius.

Ammianus l. 15. c. 6.

It appears out of all this, that men having not the power to be ignorant of their own weaknesses, never think themselves strong enough, if they have not some (I know not what) of Divinity: wherefore we must conclude, that the true means to have a generous and solid boldnesse, is, to be well with God, and to tie ones self to this most pure spirit by purity of heart; for if a little opinion of Divine favour so much encouraged Kings and People; what will not the testimony of a good Conscience do?

The most bold are such as have a clear conscience.

The Egyptians amidst so many plagues from heaven, and that dreadfull night which took away their first-born children, were dejected, and couched low on the earth without any spark of courage, because their evill Conscience was more weighty upon them then all their miseries, as the Book of Wisdome observeth.

Sap. 17. Ipsi ergò sibi tenebris graviores erant.

What assurance can one have in perils, when, after he hath committed some crime, he feeleth a little Executioner in his heart with pincers and hooks of iron? Contrariwise, a good Conscience is well compared by S. Basil to that little Kell which environeth the heart, and which continually refresheth it with its wholesome waters; to signifie unto us that the heart of a good man abides in perpetuall solace, which among dangers preserveth it from disturbances. I ask you, with what assurance stood the good Malchus with his holy wife at the entrance of the lions den, when of one side the glittering sword was presented them, and on the other, they heard those savage beasts to roar, and they notwithstanding remained immoveable? With what arms? but with those which S. Hierome gives them, when he saith, They were encompassed as with a strong wall, which they found in the testimony of their innocency, whereof they were most certain. With what confidence went S. Macarius to lie in the sepulchres of Pagans, and (wholly fearlesse himself) to strike terrour into the spirits of the damned! was it not the assurance of his holy life which furnished his heart with all this resolution? And shall we then doubt but that the true means to be replenished with a holy Courage, is, to set the Conscience in good order, and to make entire Confession of sinnes to preserve ones self afterward, in all possible purity, from our infirmities?

Carnificis occulto in cruciatu sceleris tormenta deserviant. Pet. leg. ad Demetr.

S. Basil. in Isa. κεφ. ιθ.

Hieron. in Malcho.

Pudicitiæ conscientiæ quasi muro septi.

§ 5. That Jesus hath given us many Pledges of a sublime Confidence to strengthen our Courage.

Let us next contemplate our second Model, and consider a thing very remarkable, which is, that Jesus Christ, who putteth us into a holy dread by the consideration of his greatnesse, hath acquired us boldnesse by his proper fear. These are the words of great great S. Leo, I have borrowed fear from thee, and I have furnished thee with my confidence. He expressly would admit the agony of Mount Olivet in his sacred Humanity, to encourage our pusillanimity; that we in mildnesse being Lambs, might become Lions by courage: and this is the course he hath observed in all his actions in this great contexture of pains and dolours, of punishments and glory. He descended from heaven like a rich Merchant laden with great treasures, he came to lodge in a wretched cottage among mortals, whom he held for his brethren. He was charmed with a love so powerfull, and entranced in a manner so prodigious, that he made a change, admirable to all the world; taking upon him our infirmities to give us strength, our affronts, to conferre his dignity upon us; our wounds, to bestow his health on us.

Jesus Christ acquired us Boldnesse by his fear.

S. Leo hom. de Pass.

Christus venit suscipere infirmitates nostras, & suas nobis conferre virtutes, humana quærere, præstare divina, accipere injurias, reddere dignitates: quia medicus qui non fert infirmitates, curare nescit. Chrysol. serm. 150.

When I here below behold a man, well may I have some small impression of his example, but I thereby become not enriched with his merit. Now Jesus hath this property, that besides the benefit of the celestiall Doctrine which he communicateth to us, besides that of example (which is infinitely ravishing) he maketh in us, under the title of Adoption, a powerfull infusion of his Graces. He continually powreth his virtue on souls who are in the possession of Justifying Grace: as the head on the rest of the members, and as the root of the vine sendeth nourishment to all the branches which depend upon it. He is our Aaron, who (as it is said in the Book of Wisdome) is crowned with vessels of virtue, since the treasure of his merits are so many vessels of sanctity, which flow over the whole masse of mankind.

Tanquam caput in membra, & tanquam vitis in palmites; in ipsos Justificatos jugiter virtutem influit. Concil. Trid. sess. 6. c. 16. Eccli. 45. 9.

Note, that he communicateth to us three Pledges of his inestimable Love, to give us confidence; that is to say, his Name, his Crosse, and the Sacrament of his Body and his Bloud. Good God! What dastardlinesse would not be animated, and what courage not raised in the presence of three so much to be adored assistances? The Name of Jesus is the Name of names which we should grave on our fore-heads, as the Character of our Christianity, and the assurance of our salvation against all hostilities. This is the Name, which the high Priest of the Jews bare on his Mytre. It is the name, in sight of which, Alexander, when he went out to besiege Jerusalem, became a lamb of an enraged lion, breaking all his choler at the feet of a Priest, as waves are dashed against the rocks. It is that Name, which made Daniel to take his refection, whilst he was in the paws of lions, with all tranquillity. That Name, which the flames of the Babylonian fornace acknowledged. That Name, which God maketh use of to seal up the Abysses.

Three powerfull succours of our Saviour to animate our constancy.

The power of the name of Jesus.

Facies laminam de auro purissimo in qua sculpes opere cælatoris sanctum Domino. Exod. 28. Oratio Manassis. Concluisti Abyssum, & signasti eam, terribili & laudabili nomine tuo.

And what shall I say of the Crosse, and of this Royall Standard of the Monarch of monarchs, laid the voyce of heaven to Constantine. It is he under whom so many brave Colonels of Christian souldiery have flown from one Pole to another as Eagles, fain like tempests upon the armies of Sarazens, cut like keen razours, consumed as with coles all Powers opposed against Christianity. How often hath this sign lifted up dejected Courages? How often hath it thrown terrour among legions of Infidels? How often hath it driven away Devils? On this wood, God established his Throne. Jesus Christ (as saith S. Augustine) fought with his Crosse. He by it, defeated the Kings and Monarchs of the earth; and having gloriously overthrown them, hath made them to carry the Crosse on their fore-heads. O how unhappy be we if we resemble vipers who bear the Crosse, but hidden under their jaws! It is to do like the brood of vipers, to blush at the Crosse, and to be ashamed at the venerable scorns of the Passion of our Saviour. But it is our work to bear it in the sight of all the world, and to regard it as the sign of our Redemption, and the harnesse of our Protection.

The admirable effects of the Cross of Jesus Christ.

Dominus regnavit à ligno. Aug. in Psal 91. Pugnavit Cruce sua Christus, vicit Reges & subjugatis eis ipsam Crucem in fronte fixit.

Raymund. in Antechrist. fo.

What shall we not do with it, and with this adorable Sacrament of the Altar, which maketh us present with God, and God so present to us? Is it not from thence, that so many Saints have gone forth as lions casting fire and flames out of their mouths? (as saith S. John Chrysostome) The learned S. Gregory of Tours teacheth us, that antiently the holy Eucharist was kept in Churches in a little tower of silver. In my opinion, to signifie, that this pledge of the love of God is a fortresse inexpugnable, against the assaults of our enemies. That is it, which at all times fortified Virgins against the ardours of Concupiscence and the importunities of carnall lovers who would have bereaved them of their honour. That, which made Martyrs run to flames and wheels, as others, to delights. That, which made them to look with alacrity upon their streaming bloud, and to hold it more precious then orientall pearls.

The courage we may derive from the help of the holy Sacrament of the Altar.

An excellent observation of S. Gregory.

The Scripture telleth us, that the Children of Israel being departed from Marah (as much as to say a place of Bitternesse) arrived at Elim, where they found twelve Fountains and seventy Palms. And I must tell you, that when, after the Mortification of the flesh, the afflictions of the world, the fears of so many accidents which menace us, we come to this divine Sacrament; there we meet with fountains which stream from the wounds of our Saviour; there we gather palms and victories, numberlesse. Who then would not learn holy Boldnesse in the school of Jesus Christ? But alas! it often happens that instead of profiting in so good a school, and in the Doctrine of so great a Master; we are bold for the world, and timorous in the affairs of God. What a prodigy is it to see now-a-dayes so many who are onely bold, to do ill? If a falshood be to be averted, if a wretched maid to be debauched, if a revenge to be put forward, even to the effusion of humane bloud, if lawfull Powers to be resisted, if laws both Divine and Humane to be spoken against; there Boldnesse and Confidence appeareth. But, what say I? Confidence? yea, Impudency, fomented by the mildnesse of laws and impunity of so many crimes. But, in undertakings made for God, we have hearts of wax, and souls trembling like leaves under the breath of winds.

Numb. 33.

O detestable Boldnesse! which art not born but to serve as an instrument to mischief; dost thou not know there is no assured Power against God, who in the twinkling of an eye overthroweth the children and race of Titanians? O senslesse man! canst thou not be bold, but from the presumption of thy strength? And hast thou not yet learned, that the things which, according to the opinion of the world, are most strong, are confounded by the weakest? Lions have been fed upon by flies, and wretched rust wasteth the hardest metals. If we must be bold, let it be in things honest; let it be for virtue, for verity, for Gods cause. Should the heavens fall in thunder-claps upon our heads, their ruines have not power to astonish a mind courageous. Turn a square stone which way you will, it never stands immoveable upon the solidity of its Basis, said S. Augustine. One would have me do an ill act, and if I consent not thereto, I am threatned with the losse of a suit, of a ruine of my affairs, and with poverty, the worst scourge of all. Let my enemies vomit forth all their rage on me, they cannot make me poorer then I was when I was born. I came not into the world glittering with precious stones, and it was not gold which instead of bloud ran up and down my veins; let poverty come against me with all the train of its terrours. When I behold behold on the Croſſe a God all naked, who in his nakedneſſe giveth all things; I ſay, we ſhould account it a glory to die poor, for a God ſo deſpoiled. They threaten me with baniſhment, the Spirit of God teacheth me, not to care what land be under my feet, when my eyes are fixed on heaven, and on the moſt bleſſed repoſe of the living, which concludeth all evils in a beatitude infinite.

Si tactus ille labatur orbis, impavidum ferient ruinæ: Quadratum lapidem qua verteris stat. Aug. in Psal. 86.

We muſt fear nothing in the world, to the prejudice of our ſoul.

They threaten me with impriſonment, fetters, gibbets, and death, the terrible of terribles. I expect not till it fall on me. I look on it afar off with an eye ſtrucken with the firſt rayes of felicity. What can death take from me but a miſerable carcaſſe ſubject to a thouſand deaths, but a life of piſmires and flies? And what can it bring unto me, but a ceſſation from ſo many relapſing actions, and from a wretched embroilment, which every day endeth not, but to begin again? O how little are all things mortall, with him who looks on a God immortall! I will walk in the ſhades of death with a firm footing, and a confident countenance, ſince it cannot ſeparate me from the ſource of Lives.

The eleventh Treatiſe, Of SHAMEFACTNESSE.

§ 1. The Decency of Shamefac'tneſſe, its Nature, and Definition.

Shamefac'tneſſe a very reaſonable Paſſion.

SHamefac'tneſſe is a humane Paſſion, more reaſonable then the reſt: becauſe (being properly A fear of Diſhonour) it makes diſtinction between that which is decent or undecent; laudable or blame-worthy; glorious or infamous; which appertaineth to the Court-hall of Judgement and Reaſon: It hath this priviledge, that it takes its Origin from two very eminent ſources; which are Conſcience and Honour: ſeeing the things which cauſe ſhame in us, are ordinarily vitious, or naught in the common underſtanding of men.

Its ſource, honour, and conſcience.

Conſcience (which, according to S. Thomas, is a naturall habitude that exciteth us to good, and maketh us to diſapprove evil) inſenſibly ſtirreth in us ſhame ſo ſoon as any of our thoughts, actions, or words tranſgreſſe its laws. Honour, on the other ſide, caſts forth a ray from the circuit of its glory which viſibly figureth unto us the blemiſhes that darken its beauty. The love of Reputation is powerfull. It ſeems to be ſome Atome of Divinity which enters into hearts the moſt generous, makes men very deſirous to be well eſteemed, thinking by this means to lead a pleaſing life in the minds of many: which is much more prized then the life of bodies, ſeeing there are ſome who daily ſacrifice themſelves for Punctillio's of Honour, to bloudy deaths, in the moſt exalted heighth of their proſperity. This reputation pompouſly marcheth before Conquerours, and cauſeth a million of Trumpets to be ſounded to make them famous: It cultivateth the verdant Laurels of great Captains: It encourageth the moſt heartleſſe ſouldiers to Combat: It cheriſheth the learned, and ſweeteneth the toils of their pens: It awakeneth arts: It raiſeth the moſt excellent Ladies, as it were, on the wing of Glory, by ſingular praiſes of their Chaſtity: It entreth into places the moſt infamous, as the ray of the Sun into a puddle, and makes even thoſe who have renounced Honour ſtill to ſeek ſome rag of Renown to cover their reproach. S. Auguſtine ſaith, men are ſo ready to make themſelves to be known, that thoſe who cannot be known for their goodneſſe, make themſelves many times to be talked of for their wickedneſſe, as if they thought, it were as good to be nothing as to ſee themſelves deprived of the knowledge of the living. S. Ambroſe ſaith admirably well, I am not ſo great a man, as to be ſatisfied with my own Conſcience. I have this infirmity that I cannot endure the leaſt ſtain of ſhame without waſhing it off. This is the cauſe, that the whole world endeavoureth to preſerve for it ſelf (as much as it can) an inviolable eſtimation among ſo many different opinions of judgements, paſſions, favours, diſgraces, intereſts, and revolutions of the world. Manners (ſaith S. Bernard) have their colours, and their odours, which are good examples.

1 Part. q. 80

The love of reputation is a ſtrong ſpurre.

S Auguſt. in Pſal. 19. Heroſtratus and others. Non ſum tantus, ut ſim contentus conſcientia mea. Ambr. l. 1. Offic. c. 48.

So ſoon as Reputation is wounded by the object of ſome diſhonour; the ſoul is moved, all the bloud is ſtirred, ſpreading it ſelf over the face with a ruddineſſe, as if it proceeded from this wound. It is a favour from heaven, when we have our ſenſes tender in this kind: and I find the antient Oratour Demades ſpake right, when he ſaid, Shamefac'tneſſe was the Cittadel of Beauty and Virtue. Likewiſe, the Oracle of Doctours, S. Auguſtine writeth, that a more acceptable ſacrifice we cannot give to devils, then to offer them up our Shamefac'tneſſe; forſomuch as if that be once extinct, there remains nothing but to expect a generall inundation of all wickedneſſe.

αἰδὼς τὸ κάλλος τῆς ἀρετῆς πρόπυλον. Demades.

Aug. Epiſt. 202.

§ 2. Divers kinds of Shamefac'tneſſe.

NOw we muſt here obſerve, that there are many kinds of Shamefac'tneſſe, one whereof is Holy, the other Humane, and the other Evil. I ſay, a holy Shamefac'tneſſe (as that which being a moſt faithfull companion of Chaſtity) cannot endure the leaſt thing contrary to this holy virtue, but that it becomes much intereſſed therein. This moſt evidently appeareth in ſo many good men, in ſo many virtuous women, and chaſte virgins; who cannot hear an unchaſte word but that it fixeth a wound in their hearts. Tertullian ſaid, Virgins ſhould bluſh even at the good they poſſeſſed; meaning, that albeit their virginall body bear nothing upon it but the characters of honour: yet ought they not to permit the view of their beauty, as a pillage, to curious eyes, fearing leſt any glance might ſteal away ſome tender bloſſome of amiable Virginity. There are ſome who eaſily bluſh at the approach of another ſex, and at words too freely ſpoken, not that they feel themſelves guilty of any thing; but of a naturall Shamefac'tneſſe, which cannot ſuffer the leaſt thought of things reproachfull: and many times alſo out of the fear they have to be ſuſpected in matters, of which they in conſcience have no remorſe. This is a ſign of a good ſoul, and it is neceſſary for ſuch an one as will preſerve a Chaſtity inviolable; to avoid the leaſt approaches, and all which may prejudice Decorum. Libanius an excellent Oratour obſerveth, that a Painter one day deſirous to paint Apollo upon a board of Laurel, the colours ſeemed to be rejected and could not be laid thereon. Out of which, this curious wit invented an excellent rarity, ſaying, That the chaſte Daphne (who according to the fiction of Poets was turned into a Laurel-tree, flying from Apollo who would diſhonour her) could not endure him, yea, even in painting; although ſhe now was nought elſe, but a piece of inſenſible wood. Whereupon we may inferre, that chaſte bodies fear the leaſt images and reſemblances of impurity,

Three kinds of ſhamefac'tneſſe.

Holy ſhamefac'tneſſe.

Virginibus etiam ipſum ſuum bonum erubeſcendum eſt. Tertul. de Velandis Virginibus cap. 3.

An excellent obſervation of Libanius.

impurity, and do, even beyond a Tomb, preserve some sense of Integrity. It is read in the life of S. Epiphanius, that he gave a kick with his foot, after his death, at a curious man who looked too near upon him. And we also see many who expressly by their will forbid themselves to be opened, and to have their entrails pried into by dissections, which somewhat savours of inhumanity. We must not be too curious in these matters, when we make no profession of them. For, sometimes many maids are more knowing before marriage, then is requisite for Chastity. Marcia daughter of Varro, who was one of the rarest wits of her time, was skilfull in all arts, yea, even in Painting; but never would she paint naked men, lest she might offend modesty. Is it not a brave sight to behold a Christian, whose bloud flyeth up into his face when he heareth blasphemies vomited forth against God, as a good son would blush when the Ashes of his father were defamed! What a goodly thing is it to see a vice rejected, which, a dissolute brazen-face, or a confident corrupt spirit suggesteth to a young tender soul of an Angelicall Shamefac'tnesse, that draweth bloud from the face, and makes use of this vermillion as of mysterious ink, to write down the condemnation of dishonour!

Simeon Constantin. in Epiphan.

Fulgosius l. 6

Humane & interessed shamefac'tnesse.

The second kind of Shamefac'tnesse is much more humane, and more interessed, which is daily observed in a thousand occasions in the world, when one blusheth, out of an apprehension of incurring some blemish of a good reputation, in what concerneth Extraction, Body, Wit, Profession, Integrity, Virtue, Condition, and Estate. Some are much vexed at their own birth, and when they see themselves raised to some degree of honour, they are ashamed that their enemies reproach them with the baseness of their beginning: but, they should remember, that Birth is a businesse wherein they are not called; that it is no more in our power then are the stars and the winds; and that many great personages have boasted they have mounted higher by Virtue, then their ancestours had descended by the obscurity of their Extraction.

Obscurity of birth in great personages.

Porus the Monarch of the Indies was the son of a Barber: Bradyllus Prince of the Sclavonians, of a Collier: Orragoras Duke of the Sicyonians, of a Cook: Agathocles King of Sicily, of a Potter: and yet they gloried to have made a large way to greatnesse for themselves from the recommendation of their valour. Primislaus, come from the condition of a peasant to principality, caused his old homely rags to be kept, that he might sometimes look on them. The Archbishop Villegesius son of a Carter, commanded wheels to be painted all over his Scutcheons of Arms. There are none but inferiour hearts which are offended with Gods counsels, who is the distributour of Glory. Others are confounded for deformities of body, as he, of whom Chrysippus speaketh, who was extremely discontented that he was called Sea-Ram: and Cornelius who wept in full Senate for being compared to a bald Ostritch: but this tenderness of apprehension proceeded from over-much prizing the body, which is but a dunghill even in those who are most resplendent in beauty. We should prevent such a scoffe upon so slight occasions, and to take the word out of their mouth, as Vatinius a man much mishapen, who mocked so long at his own throat and legs, that he in conclusion left nothing for Cicero to declaim against. Others love not to have their age talked of, as if that, which is to be desired, were a crime. Others must not be seen in a mean habit, as if they were much greater then Adam and Eve, who in the beginning of the world were cloathed onely with leaves and skinnes. Others are infinitely apprehensive to seem poor, not considering that by hiding poverty, they reproch themselves, and condemne Jesus Christ, who spread it over the Crib as on a Throne of Honour.

Senec. de constantia sapientis.

Shame of scoffing.

Others are dejected with deep melancholy, to see themselves despised in parts of Wit, Judgement, Understanding, Capacity, Industry, and Dexterity in matters, whereof they make profession, and wherein they think to excell; namely, when this contempt is offered in company before men of reputation whose good opinion they affect, before their competitours, their corrivalls, their enemies, who take a direfull comfort in their confusion. Then is the time when one sinketh into the bottome of dishonour, and when shamefac'tnesse covers all the face over. Cronus was so abashed, that he was not able to solve a Sophisme at King Ptolomy's Table, that he died with discontent. A Polonian Prince strangled himself upon an oppression of Ignominy, seeing Boleslaus the Third, who was his King, had sent him a Hares-skin with a distaffe, to upbraid him with his Cowardise in a battel against the Muscovites. But we must say truly, that all this proceedeth from an enraged desire of punctilio's of Honour which ought never, to such extremity, take root in the soul of a Christian.

The strange shame of contempt, Laertius.

Cromerus lib. 6.

Lastly, there be who are touched with some shame for vices, not those which they know do displease God, but for such as are accounted ignominious in the opinion of men: as to be a Villain, a Miser, a Liar, a Traitour, a Falsifier, an Impostour, a Thief, Unjust, Ungratefull, Base, and exorbitant in the excesse of bodily vices, especially when those exorbitancies are waited on by shamefull punishments and publick infamy. All this is able to confound one who hath any feeling of honour; but if shame happen for sinne, it must be driven away by virtue; nay, it is much better to take shame, then to be taken by it; for the one flyeth the sinne before it be committed, and the other blusheth to have committed it. There are others to be found who make a little account of grievous sinnes with which they defile their consciences, and dishonour their reputation: But if there be any blemish or some suspicion concerning the honour of their wife, that thrusts them into despair: as it happened to Valerius a man of eminent quality, who was wounded with the most sensible arrow that ever he received, when the Emperour Caligula reproached him at his table, and in the presence of many, with some very secret defects which he said were on his wives body, which was indeed to publish an Adultery, and the contempt of a Lord one of his dearest friends, and of a man of his own nature, fierce enough to take revenge, as it happened a while after, when the insolencies of this miserable Prince bare him to a violent and a direfull death.

Seneca de constantia sapientis.

Let us conclude with a third sort of Shamefac'tnesse, which is absolutely bad and blame-worthy, when one blusheth for Devotion, for Chastity, for Temperance, and other Virtues which are not accounted of in the souls of Libertines and dissolute people. How many are there, who, to comply with ill company, attribute sins to themselves which they never committed, and vaunt imaginary vices, as if there were no Hell for them, but in picture? Others had rather be found in an ill place, then to be often seen at the feet of a Priest, or at the Communion-Table, in a time when great spirits accustome not to observe Christian duties. They fear lest the reputation of being devout may draw along with it some suspicion of weaknesse: they are troubled, that nature hath not made them impudent enough, to shake off the stings of a good Conscience. It is a monstrous shame to betray so good a Mistresse as Virtue, and to esteem the services ignominious which are done her. They who adulterate metals, and poison the sources of lively fountains, do lesse ill, then such as corrupt the pure lights of the apprehensions we ought to have out of vertue. But, although it be many times ill to be shamefac'd; yet there is not any thing more intolerable then to be impudent: for, that is it which putteth all vice into authority; and all the noblest actions into a base and bad esteem.

and

§ 3. The excellency of shamefac'dnesse, and the uglinesse of Impudency.

A notable observation of Clemens Alexandr. 3. Stromat.

I have alwayes made great account of a Curious note of Clemens Alexandrinus, who observeth that at Diospolis a City of Egypt, on the gate of a Temple named Pylon, were seen five figures: To wit, of a child, of an old man, a Hawk, a Fish, and of a Crocodile: A child, to signifie Birth; an old man, to denote death; a Hawk, to represent the eye of God; A fish, to be the Hieroglyphick of Hatred; and the Crocodile of impudency. And this excellent Authour addeth, that these five statues onely meant this sentence, O you who are born, and shall dy, Know God hateth impudency.

The esteem antiquity had of shamfac'dnesse, Virpudens.

Shamefac'dnesse hath been so recommended by all Antiquity, that when one would praise a man of honour by a most speciall title; he was called a man of shamefac'dnesse, as we see in antient stiles, and contrariwise, to name a man impudent, were to qualifie him with the titles of all vices. The Scripture, which is admirable in representing to the life the propriety of all things, hath not forgotten this: For, willing in two draughts to give the picture of a bad man, in the person of Antiochus; it saith, An impudent, and a crafty king, shall rise who shall seek to understand all manner of subtleties. And it is a strange thing, that, going about to set forth a man who was a masse of ordures and bloud; it is content to give him, for the chief of his titles, the term of Impudent in his countenance; leaving us from that, to conjecture that he had lost shamefac'dnesse, the nurce of vertues, and the Guardian of the Temple of Sanctity. To this purpose the learned Melissa in the sixteenth discourse, speaks two excellent words. The first of all vertues is Innocency, and the second Shamefac'dnesse, Consurget Rex impudens facie, & intelligens propositiones. Dan. 8. 23.

Melissa disc. 16. Πρῶτον ἀρετῶν ἡ ἀναισχυντία δεύτερον δὲ ἡ αἰσχύνη.

He who hath once lost it, hath nothing entire, since he hath likewise broken the sacred instrument of all vertues, which is Conscience. Thence we may easily understand, that impudency (which is no other then a neglect of reputation, as Theophrastus a Disciple of Aristotle defineth it) is a great evil. Should I depaint it, I would give it a brow of Brasse: What is more impregnable against blushing? I would make it with the eyes of a Frog, black, and bloudy: What is more inflexible to modesty? And could I give a voice to my Table, I would make the voice of Stentor to resound from its mouth, who was the most open-throated of men: For what is more filled with outcries, or is more tumultuously clamorous? I would give it hands of violence and rapine: for what is more injurious? Wandering feet: for what is more straying? I would set by its side liberty, and hope of impunity, which are two disorders that support and foment it. Finally, it should have all vices waiting on it, since he who is not ashamed of doing ill, is capeable to produce all manner of monsters. I would figure at its feet a Crocodile; for it is a creature which, from the least of all, proportionably, becometh the greatest: and impudencie, which in its beginnings seems in children but a little spark, doth in conclusion kindle a huge fire. Besides, I behold in the region of this unhappy passion divers subjects, according to the diversity of age, sex, and conditions: I there see little children, to whom Nature hath given a veil of shamefac'dnesse, which made their scarlet innocency appear upon the first object of malice. And I perceive that Impudency by little and little breaks in upon them, some have more of it, some lesse; but all, instantly begin to prattle too freely, and indifferently to take liberty by slight mis-becoming actions. I see others of them at the age of eighteen and twenty, who have shaken off the yoke of parents, masters, and kindred, tearing away even in a moment the scarf of shamefac'dnesse, and sucking in the breath of liberty, as if they were little wild-Asses in a wildernesse. O! what dangerous beasts; oh! what salvage creatures (saith Plato) are children ill bred! Foxes and Wolves are a thousand times more easy to be tamed, then dissolute youth, which hath folly for guide, and Impudency for companion. O God! what a monster see I here? I also discover young maids and women to whom Nature (as S. Gregory Nazianzen saith) had supereminently afforded the goodly veil of virtuous shamefac'dnesse, dyed in the richest and most beautifull Incarnadine that may be; yet have they defaced it. When they conceived sin, they had got a little shame; after they had brought it forth, they became extreamly impudent in glances, in words, in conversation, in immodesty, and dissolution. I have seen Lionesses, and Panthers taken out of the most salvage wildernesses, which one (well practised in the ordering of beasts) with a little industry lead along through cities and villages; but I never found a bridle strong enough to curb an impudent woman. A cohabitation with Aspicks and Vipers would be more sweet and supportable. I see (moreover) in this Region many deceivers and impostours, many Buffons and hunters after bountifull meals, who have belly-talk perpetually in their mouths and actions, such as were those of the Cynick Diogenes, which they cover with a pretext of Nature. Lastly, I see servants bandied against their Masters, sonnes rebellious against their fathers, people revolted against their King, who trample under foot all manner of obedience and justice. I see hideous Monsters of Heresies, of impiety, and Atheisme; who uncontrolably throw forth blasphemies against religion. Behold the effects and goodly government of Impudency!

Plato de Repubi.

Greg. Naz. Carm. in matter.

Basil. apud Melissam

§ 4. Of Reverence due to God.

Remedies

TO reform the Image of Shamefac'dnesse, let us reflect on our first originall, and see how God would train us up to Reverence by an admirable way of his divine Providence. Is it not a thing very remarkable that the apparitions and communications of the Divinity, although they seem to be most important to awaken our faith, were at all times so rare; that God rather chose to permit doubts in the faith of his Essence, and formall infidelities, then to shew and communicate himself upon all occasions under corporall and visible formes, which might cause any diminution in the reverence due to his Majesty? He is in the world, as a King in his palace who sees all, and is not seen by any: He looketh on us through so many latice-windows, as there are creatures, yet is invisible to our corporall eyes. Verily, It was an ancient maxime held by the Hebrews, to oblige them to the reverence of the Divinity; that the Majesty of God was so potent, and awfull, that no man might see it without dying in the place; which they inferred upon the passage of Exodus, No man shall see me, and live.

The great reverence of the Divinity.

Exod. 33.

Thence, Manoah father of Samson after the admirable apparition of the Angell (the Lieutenant of God) which appeared unto him said to his wife, we shall dy, for we have seen God. And Jacob according to the interpretation of some Father, after the notable vision of the ladder, said, not by a motion of joy, but out of admiration, Judic. 13.

Gen. 32.

O wonder! I have seen God face to face, and yet I am alive. And albeit God communicated himself to his greatest favourites under visible figures; yet never did he shew himself properly in his Essence, no not to Moses, although S. Ambrose saith of him, that God gave him a clear and most manifest view of his divine presence.

Clarâ atq; perspicuâ præsentiâ divinæ dignationis donatus. Ambr. I. Hexam. c.2.

We must understand it, in such manner, as that this great law-giver had most resplendent and most familiar apparitions of God, above the other Prophets. For God seemed to speak with him face to face, as one friend talks to another: notwithstanding we must say, with the greatest doctours of the Church, that for all this, he saw not the essence of God. Such is the opinion of Pope Euaristus, of S. Dionysius, of S. Irenæus, of Tertullian; and, the text of S. John is therein expresse, No man hath ever seen God; and the decision of S. Augustine, who saith, That as for those who have seen him, this favour was granted them, Because God appeared when he would, and how he would, in such figure as it pleased him to make choyce of, his Essence still remaining under covert. Let us also add, for a reason, that as often as God in the old Testament gave to his people visible marks of his presence, he gave them with so much terrour and affrightment, that the poor people astonish'd at his approch so prodigious, were enforced to say, Let not God speak to us. We know it by the apparition of the mount Sinai, where they saw voices, that is to say exhalations of flames which made a great noise in the clouds, and burning lamps, and horrible smokes, the sound of Trumpets, and Clarions being mingled throughout all this loud Dinne; which made them to swoon, and become pale at the foot of the mountain, and with suppliant hands to beseech Moses to speak to them, because the voyce of God was too terrible. Wherefore was all this done? but to maintein reverence in the people which were ready enough to let themselves loose to impudency.

Buarist. Dionys. c.4. Hierarch. cœlestis. Origen. 2. princip. Irenæus l. 4. adve. sus Hæreses. c. 34. Tertul. adversus Marcian. Deum nemo vidit unquam Joan. 1.18. Illi autem ideo viderunt qui cunq; Deũ viderunt, quia cùm voluerit, & cui voluerit, apparet, eâ specie quam voluntas elegerit etiam latente naturâ. Aug. ep. 112. ad Paulinam. Non loquatur nobis Dominus. Exod. 12.

Alas! How can we live under the laws of God with so little respect and reverence, even in Churches? Have we not still the same signes? the like advertisements? All in this universe, on us, about us, and above us, is marked with the messages of the fear of God. Above us, God reigneth in the store-house of air and clouds; the pillars of the Firmament tremble, the heavens are bowed in all their regions under the glory of his steps. The winds are the Courriers, and Postillions of his will, who run along spreading his name throughout the four quarters of the habitable world. The Sun confesseth, he is but a shadow in comparison of the increated light, and presenteth as many fingers as there are rayes, to write down the commandments of God upon the brow of clouds; his decrees move with wings of lightnings, and are heard in the roaring voyce of thunders. It is so naturall to bear a reverence to his Divine Majesty, that there is not a creature in the world, how insensible soever, which feeleth not the touches of this much-to-be-adored greatnesse. Wild beasts, who roam up and down Forests with bloud and massacres perpetually under their paws, by naturall instinct quake at the thundering voyce of God. Fishes in the bottome of seas, and abysses with horrour hear it: enraged tempests (which seem ready to tear the world in pieces) become silent at the command of the Highest, and draw in their wings under his throne: waves and floods which make a shew not to regard this great All, no more then a single Element, dissolve their fury upon the sight of one silly grain of sand, which imposeth a law on them by virtue of Gods ordinance. The very divels, all on Fire in the flames of their punishment, which, infinite misery seems to have exempted from fear, can not free themselves from this sting. O most mighty! O most sovereign Lord of things visible and invisible! O great Eye, who seest all, and art not seen by any here below! Thou art truly worthy (If we with mortall lips may call thee worthy; yea worthy) to whom all intelligent and reasonable Nature should give continuall thanks for thy inexplicable benefits; worthy, before whom we on our bended knees should all our life-time remain prostrate; worthy, that for thee we should have praises and prayers everlastingly on our lips. And where is that brazen brow which dares to offend thee in the midst of thy Temple of this universe, from whence thou on all sides beholdest us? O what a monster is impudency, if it persist insensible to such considerations!

O maxime, O summe invisibilium procreator, opifex invise, & nullis unquam comprehense naturis, dignus es vere, si modò te dignum mortali dicere dum est ere, cui spirans omnis intelligéns q; natura, & habere, & agere nunquam gratias desinat, cui tota conveniat vitâ genu nixo procumbere, & continuatis precibus supplicare. Arnob. contra gentes.

§ 5. Of the reverence which the holy Humanity of our Lord bare to his Eternall Father.

LEt us look on the other Modell, and consider how Jesus Christ, uncapable properly either of fear or Shamefac'dnesse caused by any defect, observed all the dayes of his mortall conversation so lowly a reverence towards the divine Majesty, that it serves for matter of admiration to all Angels, and of example for all ages. To understand this well, I beseech you to take into your consideration two reasons that I will set before you, which me thinks are well worthy of your ponderation. First, that the greatnesse of actions ought ever to be measured by the end for which God hath instituted them: as if one prove that the actions of understanding are given us to raise us to the knowledge of God, we by the same means infer that those actions are very noble, since they are directed to an end so eminent. Now wherefore, think you, was the eternall Word Incarnate in the womb of a holy Virgin? I say, that besides consideration of humane Redemption, and the instruction of all mortals, God covered himself with the flesh of man, that there might by that means be a person in the world able to praise and honour God, asmuch as he is praise-worthy, and honourable, by a nature create, hypostatically joyned to the divine nature. Philo in the Book of Noahs plantation saith, that search was made through the world for a voyce suteable to the divine Majesty, to speak, and recount his praises, and there was none found. For although the sovereign Creatour hath been praised from the beginning of Ages by the morning starrs, which are the Angels (as saith Job) yet we must say, that all the praises which the highest Seraphims may give to the Divinity (if we compare them to the merits of its incomparable greatnesse) are like a Candle in comparison of the Sun; a small drop of water parallell'd with the sea; and an infant-like stutterer who should undertake to declare the prowesses of the most illustrious Cesars. There needeth a lauding God, a reverencing God, and an adoring God, to praise, reverence, and adore God worthily: otherwise there were nothing suteable to his Divine Majesty, there being no proportion between the finite, and the Infinite. And that which seemed to be impossible is accomplished in the person of Jesus Christ. All reverences of Angels and men are dissolved into him, as if one should melt many small Bells, to make a great one. And verily all creatures being dumb in his presence, he made himself as a huge Bell of the great clock of the word, which striketh the hours, and resoundeth thanks to his heavenly Father. All our reverences, our homages, our adorations have neither force, dignity, nor value, if they be not united, and incorporated with the homage, submission, and adoration which this glorious Humanity rendereth to his Celestiall Father, even above the vaults of the Empereall Heaven. This is the great Angel

The reverence Jesus bare to that divine Majesty.

Philo de plantatione Noemi.

Cum me laudarent astra matutina, & jubilarent omnes filii Dei. Job 38.5.

of

of Counſel, of whom we may pronounce theſe words
Apoc. 8. 3. of the Apocalypſe, That he came to preſent himſelf before the Altar having in his hand a golden Incenſorie, and much incenſe was given him, that he might offer the prayers of holy Saints on this golden Altar.

The ſecond reaſon is, that the reverence and honour we do to one, is juſtly augmented according as we more clearly know his great and worthy parts; whereupon we may inferr, that as our Saviour had knowledges and incomparable lights of the Majeſtie of his heavenly Father, not onely in reſpect of ſcience increate, but of ſcience beatifick and infuſed: ſo had he proportionably reſentments of honour, ſo profoundly reverent, that he perpetually lived abſorpt in this reverence, as a drop of water in the ſea, or a hot Iron in the fornace. There was neither vein nor artery which was not every moment penetrated and overflowed with the veneration he yeilded to God his Father.

Men who naturally are dull and ſenſuall, ſtand in need of exteriour ſigns to raiſe them to the reverence of God. For which cauſe the ſages of the world in the falſhood of pretended religions, have always affe-Philoſtr. l. 1. c. 16. de vit. Apollonii. A notable cuſtome of the Babylonians in doing Juſtice. cted ſome tokens of terrour to affright perjured and wicked men. So the Babylonians when they ſat on matters of Juſtice went into a Hall of the Palace, made in the form of the heavens, where were hanged the figures of their Gods, all reſplentent in gold, and where were to be ſeen on the roof certain forms of birds which
The cuſtom of Bochyris a Judge of Egypt. they thought to be ſent from on high, as meſſengers of the Sun. So Bochyris a moſt famous Judge of Egypt, (ordinarily named as the Father and protectour of Equitie) that he might powerfully imprint an apprehenſion of God avenger of Injuſtices, when he ſate on his throne of Judicature, always had the image of a ſerpent in emboſſed work, hanging over his head as in a readineſs to ſting him if he pronounced an unjuſt ſentence. This is partly tolerable, partly alſo praiſeworthy among mortal men; but as for the perſon of our Saviour, he had not any need of exteriour ſigns, having always a perſpicuous viſion of the Divinitie. And tell me not, this continuall ſight of God, this ſo expreſt familiaritie, might leſſen the reverence which ordinarily is preſerved in things leſſe accuſtomed. This verily hath ſome truth: if we ſpeak of men, their perpetual preſence many times diminiſheth the reverence of thoſe who familiarly converſe with them; becauſe being men, their perfections are finite, and imperfections almoſt infinite; which is the cauſe they are exhauſted like roſes, which with their odour caſt forth part of their ſubſtance. They waſte like Torches which annihilate themſelves before the eyes of beholders, leaving moſt times nought behind them but ſtink and ſmoke. They are to be looked on afar off and in the dark, as painted women and adulterate merchandize: but in God, whom S. Denis calleth Dionyſ. de divin. nominibus, c. 1. the Hearth and Houſe of Eſſences; we muſt not apprehend theſe limitations, theſe defects, and theſe diſreliſhes, ſince he, being of his own nature infinite, is never leſſened.

The moſt bleſſed ſoul of Jeſus Chriſt entred into the conſideration of his greatneſſes, as into a moſt ſpacious Labyrinth all repleniſhed with lights, perfections, and virtues which never ſatiate; but on the contrary give (as in an eternall Theatre) ſpectacles delicious, immortall, and inexplicable. For there it is, where all the bleſſed draw their felicitie; always greedie and ever full, always in poſſeſſion and ever deſiring; their ſatiety is without loathing, and their hunger free from torment; ſtill they eat the bread of life, and never Hymn. Dam de gloria Para. waſte it. As S. Auguſtine hath moſt divinely obſerved in the Hymn, which Cardinall Damian hath framed out of his words. Thence I leave you to conſider with what reverence our Lord walked on the earth, as a man ſuſpended in heaven, drenched in God, as a ſpunge would be in a vaſt ſea; a man who held not of the earth, but by roots of compaſſion and mercy. Still he had his eyes lifted up towards heaven in doing miracles, ſtill his hands raiſed towards heaven in prayer, ſtill his heart contracted with ſadneſſe for the irreverencies committed againſt the irreverencies of his father. Converſation, drinking, eating, ſleeping deſolved not the ſweet converſation he had with God. Sometimes even in company, being overwhelmed with the impetuous approch of this holy Majeſtie, he brake forth into words of reverence, of love, of thankſgiving, as it were ſaying, I laud Matt. 11. 25 thee my Father, Lord of heaven and earth, that thou haſt hidden theſe goodly lights from men who make account of the wiſdom and prudence of the world, and haſt made them known to the moſt ſimple and little ones; yea dear Father, for ſuch hath been thy moſt holy will.

In honour of the lowly reverence which Jeſus Chriſt bare to his heavenly Father. Let us reſolve to preſerve in our ſelves three ſorts of ſhamefac'neſſe; of pietie, of chaſtitie, of diſcretion: Shamefac'neſſe of pietie; by obſerving a holy and religious modeſtie in Churches, and all thoſe actions which do appertein to the ſervice and honour of God: Shamefac'neſſe of chaſtitie; by abſtaining from all words and actions which render converſation too free and exorbitant, not without ſome prejudice to chaſtitie. And therefore (O Virgins) engrave in your hearts this document of Tertullian, who ſaith, That it is fit a virgin ſhould bluſh even at virtue. Laſtly, let us have ſhamefac'neſſe of diſcretion in demeaning our ſelves very circumſpectly in all the duties we ought to yield to perſons worthy of honour, and namely to thoſe to whom we are tied by ſome obligations.

Alas! who can endure thoſe that have loſt not onely reverence of a God inviſible, but even the ſhame of men viſible? Shamefac'neſſe is the laſt ſhirt of virtue which one never putteth off, but when he is readie to clothe himſelf with an infinitie of vices. It is a ſtrange thing that Adam and Eve, who bare (as it were) in one veſſel all the riches of Mankind, after they had made that miſerable ſhip-wrack (the loſſes whereof we yet deplore) after they had loſt all that which a wretch might loſe, and all that which a happie man might deſire; they yet ſtill, in the midſt of this great breach preſerved ſhamefac'neſſe as the laſt plank of this lamentable ſhip-wrack. They yet were aſhamed to ſee themſelves naked; and by this ſpectacle of their nakedneſſe, were perſwaded to penance. And thou wretched and depraved ſoul, over head and ears; thou feareſt neither God nor man, father nor mother, neighbour nor kinſman, friend nor magiſtrate, force, mildneſſe, admonition, menace, nor reputation, either good or bad. Ah Caitife! It is to run to a downfall with veiled eyes, to live in this manner: It is to lift up an armed hand againſt heaven. Thy conſcience juſtifies thee (ſayſt thou) and thou careſt not at all for men; what conſcience, if thou neglecteſt reputation which is the bridle wherewith God uſeth to repreſſe all ſorts of vice? Thou haſt no conſcience, which notwithſtanding, never forſakes any man, enlightening and ſtinging thieves in wild caves, and in the maſſacres of men, to expoſe to light vices (which could never endure the rayes of the Sun which were confined to darkneſſe and Gomorrhian night) to eſtabliſh them in the converſation of men, to publiſh them, to practiſe them openly before the eyes of heaven and earth, and to ſay we ſhould give nature free libertie. Ah! wicked Zimri. Haſt thou not read the Hiſtorie in the book of Numbers? haſt thou not in this picture observed the effects and disasters of impudency? As that of Zimri, a Prince of Gods people, who hastening to make love to a Madianite, a Cozbi, at mid-day, in sight of all the people of Israel; cast under foot the laws of God, the shame of men, the honour of Reputation, the reverence of all posteritie: Wretch, whither goest thou? said one to him. Knowst thou not the law of God forbiddeth alliance with strangers? what hast thou to do with this Madianite? she will ruine thee. It importeth thee not to say, I will go. But dost thou consider thy qualitie, and the rank thou holdest, being a Prince of People? Thou well seest, the bad example thou wilt give to all the world, cannot but be pernicious. It importeth not, I will go. Behold thy Parents and neerest of kin stretch forth their hands to thee, and say; Son, Do not our family this dishonour: Bring not such a crime into our house, which will make us incurre the malediction of God, and will overwhelm thee first of all under some notable disaster. It importeth not, I will go. Alas! seest thou not poor Moses, who weeps with all the people prostrated before the Tabernacle of God, that he would be pleased to divert such a thought from thee, lest thou become culpable of the anger of God, which will fall on the whole Army, if thou goest to this stranger? It importeth not, I will go. Son, if thou resolvest to sin, then stay till night; make a veil of darknesse further to cover thy wickednesse from the eyes of the world, for fear lest thy example may serve for a rock of scandall to those who are yet novices in virtue. Yet, thou perversly sayest, I will go in full day light: I will enjoy my pleasures; and who art thou that givest me a law? Go Zimri, Go impudent man, thou in thy calamitie shalt know the salarie of thy sin. You know the rest of the History, he goes thither, he accosteth the Madianite in sight of all the world. At which time God raiseth a young Prince, as courageous as a Lion, grand-child of Aaron, who followeth him armed with zeal and sword, crying out aloud; Ah Traytor! Ah infamous man! He finds him out in the throne of Lust, in the bed of iniquitie, in the heat of Crime; and with his sword transfixeth him and the Madianite, making the abominable Bed and their unchaste loves to float all in bloud. O bloud horribly (but justly) shed, which still cryeth out with a voyce of bloud, and saith to all posteritie! Men, women, children, great, little, poor, rich; flie from Impudency, flie from Impudency, as the last of vices: otherwise know, there is a revenging sword, and a Judgement of God inevitable to all the Shamelessnesse of Sinners.

Num. 25. The miserable end of an unhappy impudent man

The twelfth Treatise, Of ANGER.

§ 1. The origine of Anger, its Nature, Causes, and Diversities.

The marveilous effects of fire.

FIre, which is a Mean between Spirits and Bodies, doth work very diversly according to the matter and disposition it meets withall; In the heavens it enkindleth the stars with flames the most pure in totall Nature: it diversifieth clouds with Gold and Rubies: it maketh Bowes and Coronets in the air: it enterteineth a heat of life in the bodie of living Creatures, which being maintained in a good temperature, cause all the harmonies of health; but, when it mounteth up into a tempestuous cloud, when it boyleth in Fornaces, and creeps into Canons, which are as mouths of fire to pronounce war; it maketh so strange devastations, that it vanquisheth the most valiant, beats down the most boysterous, mollifieth the hardest, and terrifieth the most daring.

In the same manner we may say, heat, which in our bodies is an admirable work-Mistresse, multiplyeth its effects according to the diversitie of the stuffs, and occasions it lights on: it conspireth with our spirits, to serve as an instrument for the soul in its great operations: it exciteth the honourable flames of chaste loves: it disposeth courage to generous resolutions: it polisheth the mind to embrace worthy purposes: It secondeth the Imagination in its apprehensions: It makes it self the steward of the vegetative faculties for the generation and production of men; But if it once meet with burnt blood, and fuming Choler, which is as it were in the hands of the imagination; when it is touched with some displeasure, it insinuateth it self thereinto, as into a cloud swoln with storms and tempests, which throws forth fires, roareth with thunders, shooteth with inflamed darts, and practiseth nought but ruine.

What Anger is.

This is it we call Anger, which is properly an ardent appetite of revenge caused by an apprehension of contempt, and injuries. Now this opinion of Contempt springeth in some from disesteem, or for that they are forgotten and neglected by those of whom they think they ought to be respected: In others, from being crossed in what they desire most, as in their profession, their ambition, and especially their affections: In others, from being depressed in that wherin they imagine they excell, and principally before such, by whom they perswade themselves they are beloved and honoured; In others from being derided for defects of nature aswel of body as of mind, and extraction also: In others, from being injuriously disgraced, and insolently outraged by base and abject people, and such as they have obliged, As the opinion of injury increaseth, and as it meeteth with a nature disposed, and matter prepared, this ardour is inflamed: and if it be accompanied with a great power, it teareth down smoaking cities, it desolateth Provinces, it swims in massacres, it raiseth scaffolds all sprinkled over with bloud, and hung with black, whereon it acteth horrible Tragedies.

Dum incipit tota est Gen. de Ira. How Anger is formed.

The other passions are augmented by degrees; but this ariseth fully formed, and appears perfect so soon as it beginneth. The opinion of contempt no sooner entreth in by the eyes and eares, but it striketh the imagination, which promptly communicateth its influence to the irascible appetite; and then, as if fire were given to a Canon, it becomes Thunder and Tempest, which disfigureth the bravest bodies, turmoileth the bloud and spirits, and bendeth all the veins to vengeance. You would say, the heart is not at that time any other then Vulcans Forge, where the thoughts, like so many Cyclopes, labour to make Hail-showrs, Lightenings and Tempests. It is not known in this countrey what kind of language Reason speaketh: It is no better heard then words among the Catadupes of Nilus; strength hath a hand lifted up to employ the sword, and a thousand instruments of iniquity, to commit outrages. This passion resembleth the furious Martichora renowned among Indian wild beasts, who teareth his members asunder to make of them the arrows of his vengeance; It hath nothing so resolved on, as to destroy all, and to raise unto it self a Tombe in its own ruines. Yet we cannot but say, that there are three very different sorts of Anger, according to the offences and persons who either raise it, or suffer it. In some it is cold in apparence, and more inward; but these oftentimes have the aspect of Virgins, who in conclusion throw forth the fire of dragons: In others, it is fervent, and headlong: In others, haughty, and scornfull: In others, dumb, and malicious: In others, obstreperous, and stormy: In some it is frequent, and sudden: in others, sticking, and obstinate. There are some, who being offended for frivolous things, cease not to persevere therein for fear some may think they began without reason, in which the lesse the cause is, the more passionate they become: Others, blame their greatest friends for having done them lesse good then they expected. In some, Anger is but yet in bloom; in others, it taketh great and deep root. Some satisfie themselves with clamour and injuries; others, therein employ the hand; others, wood, and Iron; others would have lightening in their power for some time, of purpose to prosecute their revenge with all advantage. Lastly, this passion thrusts forth all that is hidden in the heart: Which made Cassian, according to the Septuagint, to write, that it disentombed sinnes which were before (as it were) interred.

Divers qualities of anger.

offences

Vir iracundus effodit peccata. Cassian. de spiritu ira. c. 1.

§. 2. Three principall Kinds of Anger.

WE notwithstanding can say with S. John Damascen, that Anger stirreth up and down in three principall regions, where it produceth very different effects. The first is called the region of sharp choler, the second of bitter choler, and the third of fury. In the first region are all those who have slight heats of the liver; who are angry upon every light occasion, and almost every moment. In this are to be found many women, many children, and lovers; and besides; Hungry, Thirsty, needy, sickly and nice ones, fantasticks and extravagants, as that Smyndrides, who seeing a peasant taking pains before him, said, his body was quite broken therewith. There needs almost nothing to make choler fly up into their faces, so much they are thereunto disposed. The slightest things put them out of the limits of reason; and if no man contradict them, they frame quarrels to themselves with wood and stones, and with other things inanimate which serve their use; and in the end, fall out with themselves, and skirmish against their own shadow. The great Cesarius, a Greek Authour, saith that Mil-stones, having not com to grind, strike fire: so we oft-times see, in households and Communities, when there is no employment, no gain, nor profit; the fire of Anger interposeth between man and wife, between brothers and friends; yea among religious, who are not throughy well applyed to the functions of their profession.

Three regions of Anger. Damascen. l. 2. orth. c. 16. Weak spirits ordinarily cholerick. Cæsarius in dialog.

The second Region is, that, of inveterate choler, wherein malicious souls are engaged, who do nothing else but gnaw their own heart, and envy the felicity of another, closely undermining it as much as they can, both by word and deed. There you behold them all ranked in order, which is nothing but disorder, with a visage ghastly and disfigured, an eye of an owl, a countenance moody, a gate slow, speech wrangling, and most often an enraged silence. O discontented, and dismall Region! I had rather see the Comet which appeared not long since, then to behold a man so composed, who perpetually hath vultures in his entrails, executioners by his sides, and who moreover hath a petty hell within himself. It is of this anger, the wise-man saith, that A stone was very heavy, and sand weighty: but choler, incomparably more. I had rather roll Sisyphus his stone, eat sand and coles, then hatch in my heart such anger. Have you ever observed the unlucky Tree, whereof Theophylact speaketh upon the Prophet Nahum, which we in our Language call the yew Tree? It is a Tree of death, which with its shadow alone, killeth the herbs and plants about it. This worthy Interpreter addeth, that it out of a singular malignity devoureth them. And Dioscorides noteth, that being once set on fire, it will many moneths keep a melancholy fire, hidden under the ashes, not, almost, to be quenched. Behold the picture of one who is tainted with the cursed choler of the second region; you see him anxious, and burthensome to himself, dull like an old yew, an old Tree in a Churchyard. He is impotent, in effect, for revenge; but hath a furious appetite towards it, which he dissembleth under the meagerness of the Countenance of a dead man, and under the coldness of a maligne passion. The fire is, as under ashes, the space of so many moneths, so many good friends, so many good advises, so many convincing reasons quench some little spark of it; yet there still remaineth some of it behind. So many powerfull Sermons, so many confessions, so many communions cry out, Fire, Fire, pour on water. Miserable creature! thy house smoketh. It will burn thee when thou art asleep. But he hath no ears. And when this serpentine soul shall be snatched away by a sudden death, if you search into the ashes of his body, there you shall yet find fire. The Earth which shall cover him, shall be like burning pitch, It shall burn night and day, and make black and thick smokes arise, which shall eternally issue out of it. Preserve your self from this second region, and observe the words of S. Augustine; Choler, which proceedeth from some innocent promptitude, is as a stick; but this, is a beam. A stick is the beginning of a beam. For the beam at first, is but a stick; if you water it, it becometh a beam: and if you cherish choler, by evill suspicions; you turn it into Hatred.

Second region of anger wherein rest malicious and covert souls. Proverb. 26. Grave est saxum & onerosa arena sed ira utroq; gravior. The property of the yew Tree, like unto Anger.

Et erit terra ejus in picem ardentem, nocte, & die non extinguetur; in sempiternum ascendet fumus ejus. Isai. 34. Festuca in oculo ira est, trabs verò odium. Festuca initium trabis est, nam trabs quando nascitur prius festuca est; rigando festucam deducis ad trabem, alendo iram malis suspicionibus perducis ad odium. August. l. de verbis Domini, ser. 16.

The third region of choler, is fury, in which all such are, as play the part of mad Orlando, and become as red as the Comb of a Cock, and presently as pale as the dead; who have eyes bloudy like frogges, sparkling like Gorgons, rolling as those of Cain; who roar like lions, who foam like Boars, who hisse like serpents, who poyson all they see, like Basilisks; who cast forth fire like Medeas buls; who tear one another, like Canniballs; who sup with lights and lamps of bloud, like Cyclops; who walk in the night to strike and commit outrages, like Furies; who are perpetually in disturbance, like Devils; who do nothing but vomit forth blasphemies; who swear by heaps; who breath nothing but wounds, but plague-sores, and revenges; who have no more of man in them, but so much as may serve for food to eternall fire, unlesse they betake them to repentance. There are of them so ardent that they resemble those dogs of hot Countreys, whereof Xenophon speaketh, which strike their teeth so eagerly into the skin of a boar, that, together with the gash, they make fire to fly out.

The region, wherin are the furious

Behold a horrible sphere of monsters, and tempests, bloudy Comets, horses, and arms of fire. It is they of whom the Scripture speaketh, Simeon and Levi (you vessels of warre, instruments of Iniquity, Trumpets of fury and bloud) never, shall my spirit have to do with you, never will I defile the glory of a peacefull soul by the contagion of your company. Cursed be your fury, for it is head-strong, cursed your anger and revenge, for it is wicked and insatiable.

Genes. 49 Simeon, & Levi vasa iniquitatis bellantia, &c. Maledictus furor eorum, quia pertinax, & indignatio quia dura,

Two things principally are deplorable, in this third region; The first, is, that anger is exercised, with outrages and violence, upon the renown, estate, body, and soul of a neighbour, who crieth out for vengeance before God: and above all, it is much to be feared, when great passion is linked to great power, where fortune permits all which vengeance desireth. For, fire, water, and greatnesse never overflow without bearing down the common shore. Secondly, it so bewitcheth some infatuated spirits of these times, that they make tropheys of the greatest reproches which are in nature, and to make their torments everlasting they deifie their Crimes. That is it which the excellent Authour Paulus Orosius said, Fury, as it ordinarily walketh without reason, will make its dolour to passe for virtue, and boldnesse promiseth to accomplish all whatsoever anger suggesteth it.

Paulus Orosius lib. 3. adversus Pagan. c. 16. Rapere consilii furor, dolorem virtutem putat; quantum meditatur ira, tantum promittit audacia.

§. 3. The Contemplation of the serenity of the divine spirit is the Mistresse of meekenesse.

The picture of the Tranquillity of God.

LEt us to this disorder, oppose the serenity of God, which we may contemplate when we are far removed from the surprisalls of this passion. If this place would permit me to delineate the picture of the Tranquillity of God, as the sublime Tertullian hath done, that of patience; I would give it a visage wholly angelicall. What is more divine and celestiall, then this virtue? I would set it in a fortunate Iland (all tapistred with verdure, and enamelled with flowers) where the sun should smile out of all its mansions. For, what is more delicious? I would place it on a Rock such as was that of Egypt, which was never touched by profane feet: What is more stable, and more religious? Thereon I would raise a Temple to it, such as was that of Adonis, in Greece, wherein lions were tractable: what is more lovely? I would give it a sceptre of diamond; what is more solid, or powerfull over the passions of mans heart? I would set upon the head thereof a Crown of starres: What is more sublime? what more majesticall? At its feet I would hang harps and lutes; for it is the Mistresse of holy Harmonies. About it should be little nightingales, Halcyons, and holy Fishes which cause a calm every where: what is more peacefull? A good distance from it, should be sea-dogs, storms, and waves which should roar, without troubling its repose; since it is immoveable. It should have eyes lifted up to heaven, and should live by influences flowing to it from the union it hath with God; as it is said the bird of Paradise liveth on the thinnest vapours of the air.

But let us in a word tell you, that Tranquillity is the Essence of God himself, and that all which is peacefull draweth near towards God. I am not ignorant of what the Scripture speaketh in many places of Gods anger, and among others, David, in his Psalms, with a certain admiration; Who is it knoweth the force of thy anger? and can weigh thy indignation in the terrour of thy countenance? But this must be understood by an Anthropopathia, as Theologians do explicate it; which is done when God is represented by sensible figures, like unto men. For to speak truely, God hath no anger, nor can any wise have it, being incapeable either of the form or matter of it. The form is an appetite of revenge, and the matter, a boyling of bloud; as appeareth by that we have said before. Now, we understand, that in God there is neither bloud, nor appetite. If he in all times hath produced Examples of Justice, (as he did in the deluge, in the burning of Sodome and Gomorrha, in the plagues of Egypt, in the defeat of Sennacherib) It was with the same tranquillity which he had when he made Paradise, and the blessed by his aspects. God punisheth not the wicked out of anger; but the wicked punish themselves by the remorse of their own consciences; and if the divine Justice put a hand thereto, the world marcheth in battel-array against them, and is all on fire under the feet of its judge, the Judge being thereby nothing at all enflamed. The punishments which fall from heaven, come not from a headlong precipitation, since they are resolved on from all Eternity.

Quis novit potestatem iræ tuæ, aut præ timore tuo iram tuam dinumerare? Psal. 89. God, to speak properly, hath no anger.

It was a judicious invention of the ancient sages, to tell us, there were three sorts of thunderbolts in Heaven; and that, the first was onely to advertise, without doing hurt; the second did good, but not without causing hurt; the third ruined, and defaced all it met. And thereupon, to shew us the mildnesse of God, they said, the Monarch of heaven and earth of his own motion sent the innocent Thunderbolts; but if there were cause to throw that which doth but little hurt; (although it were to derive profit from it) he called twelve Gods to counsell: but when those great artilleries of heaven were to be shot off, which aimed at the ruine of the most guilty; it was never done without a generall councel of all the Gods: we say more then all this; for we affirm that God stayeth not a certain time to resolve on the punishment of men, but hath decided it from all eternity, and hath ordained Hell for crimes, with the same Countenance he decreed Heaven for the blessed. All is peacefull, and alwayes peacefull in God: from whence it cometh that men most like unto him, as are good Kings, have borrowed the Title of Serenity. Can it then well become a Christian, who makes profession to render himself like unto his heavenly Father, to suffer himself to be transported with the furies of anger, which in man extinguish all that is divine, and leave nothing humane?

Senec. natural. l. 2. c. 41. Three sorts of thunderbolts, which figure unto us, how God proceedeth in the chastisements of men.

§. 4. That the example of our Saviour teacheth us the moderation of Anger.

ONe might perhaps object for excuse, that our Lord, who ought to be the example of all our actions, was angry when he with a whip drave buyers and sellers out of the Temple. I to this answer with a doctrine of S. Augustine, very remarkable, which teacheth us, that as our Lord took a true body, when he was born of the most blessed virgin; so he hath shewed himself to have reall passions descending for us into the shadow of our infirmities, to make us ascend into the light of his glory. Notwithstanding, we must not think he would undergo all sorts of passions, especially such as carry in them any uncomely misbeseeming; but those he took upon him which were most decent, and incident to man. If love (saith the oracle of Doctours) be a humane passion; Jesus hath taken it, shewing many times tenderneesse of affections towards persons of merit: as it is said, that seeing a young man, who had strictly kept the commandments of God, from his most innocent years, he loved him, and had some compassion of him, for that he entred not directly into the way of the Gospel being withheld by the love of his riches. If fear be accounted among the motions of nature; had not he fear and anxiety when he was near unto his passion? If you look for joy; doth not he say, Lazarus is dead, but, I rejoyce for your sake? because by this means the Apostles faith must be confirmed. Lastly, if sadnesse be the inheritance of our condition; hath he not said, My soul is heavy to the death? But there are other passions which he would never admit, as, sensuall Love, Hatred of a neighbour, Envie, and Anger.

To know whether our Lord was subject to anger. The answer.

Aug. l. 14. de civitate Dei. cap. 9. Neq; enim in quo erat verum hominis corpus, & verus hominis animus, falsus erat humanus affectus. An amor affectus est hominis? sed ipse audiens adolescentem scipsum de observatione mandatorum commendantem, intuitus dilexit eum. An timor? sed ipse in janua passionis constitutus cœpit pavere & tædere. An gaudium? sed & Lazarus mortuus est inquit, & gaudeo propter vos quia non eram ibi. An tristitia? sed & tristis est anima mea usque ad mortem.

As for that which concerneth this last passion; it is certain that our Lord was more meek and gentle then all men; from whence it came that he would be called the lamb of God, by a solemn title, and that he in the primitive Church was represented under the same figure, as it appeareth in the Christening Font of Constantine, where the statue of a Lamb of massie gold poured out the water of Baptisme. Never in his greatest sufferings hath he shewed one least spark of anger, or impatience; but was alwayes calme and peacefull, even shewing an incomparable sweetnesse to a naughty servant, who had cruelly wronged him at the time of his passion. And as for that he did, in the matter of buyers and sellers; that ought not to be called anger, but a fervent and vigorous zeal which caused him to punish irreverences committed against his eternall Father.

Excellent observation upon the turning our Saviour a Lambe.

Good God! Had we perpetually before our eyes this mirrour of meeknesse; we need not seek for any other remedies. His aspect would remedy all our anger, as the brazen serpent cured the plagues of Israell. This sacred fish would cause a Calm wheresoever it rested, and the presence of his aspect would banish tempests: but since passion so clondeth our reason; let us apply remedies more obvious against the motions of anger.

§. 5. Politick Remedies to appease such as are Angry.

ANger being a jealous passion ever grounded upon the opinion of contempt, ought to be handled with much industry, and dexterity. There are some who very soon are cured by joy, by the meeting of light-hearted people, and by some pleasing and unexpected accident. This notably appeared at the Coronation of Philip Augustus, where there was a prodigious confluence of many people, who out of curiosity excessively flocking thither, much hindered the Ceremony. A certain Captain troubled to see this disorder, was desirous to remedy it, ceasing not to cry out and thunder with a loud voice to them to be quiet; but the earnestnesse of those that thronged had no ears for Thunders: which made him, being much incensed with anger to throw a cudgell he had in his hand at the heads of such as were the most unruly; and this cudgell being not well directed, lighted upon three lamps of Chrystall hanging right over the King and Queens heads, which breaking, the oil abundantly poured down upon them. All there present were troubled at an act so temerarious; but the pleasure of the sight put off their anger. The King with the Queen his wife instead of being offended, laughed heartily; seeing themselves so throughly besmeared: and a Doctour thereupon inferring, that it was a good presage, and that it signified aboundance of unction, both of honours and prosperities which should overflow in their sacred persons; they had no power to be angry, out of the Imagination of glory which driveth up the root of this passion. Verily, there is no better a remedy to appease such as are cholerick, then to flatter them with honour, and submission: which likewise was to be seen in that which happened in the person of Carloman. He was a virtuous religious man, brother of King Pepin; who had buried himself in humility, that he might courageously renounce all the greatnesse, whereunto by birth he was called. It fell out, that being in a Monastery of Italy, not discovering himself; he begged he might serve in the Kitchin, which was granted him: But the Cholerick cook, seeing him to do somewhat contrary to his liking (not contented to use him harshly in words) with much indignity strake him: But there being not any thing which more vexeth a generous spirit, then to see him ill treated whom he most loveth; Carlomans companion who was present, not remembring himself to be a religious man, entereth into a violent anger, and suddenly taketh a pestle, and throws it at the cooks head, to revenge the good father who bare this affront with incredible generosity.

But so soon as this his companion had declared his extraction, and related all which had happened; the whole convent fell at his feet who was affronted; and begged pardon of him. Where were to be seen sundry sorts of passions; Some of indignation, others of compassion, the rest, of Reverence. But Carloman thought it a thing intolerable, to see himself honoured in such a manner, whilst his Companion laughed beholding the Cook beaten, and the submissions yielded to his Prince.

Rigordus.

Chronicon Cassinense.

There are others, who seeing their friends much incensed, feign to take their part, and seem angry with them; saying, this wicked fellow must at leisure be chastised, to render his punishment the more exemplary. Mean while, they give time, and expect the return of reason, and then they perswade the contrary. Many also have in apparence pretended fear, to flatter the anger of great ones, who take pleasure to render themselves awfull in this passion, as did Agrippa towards the Emperour Caligula.

§. 6. Morall Remedies against the same Passion.

I Will descend into more particulars against the three kinds of choler, which we insinuated. As for the first, which consisteth in that hastinesse and heat of liver, that breaks forth in motions somewhat inordinate; First, I say, God is offended to see persons who make profession of a life more pure, and whose soul verily is not bad, to be perpetually upon the extravagancies of passions unworthy of a well composed spirit. Besides, it causeth a notable detriment to our repose. For, by being often angry, our gall increaseth (as Philosophers observe) and the encrease of gall maketh us the more anxious, wayward, and irksome to our selves.

More particular remedies against the three sorts of anger.

The onely means to amend and correct your self, is, to represent the hurt this passion bringeth, by depriving you of wisdome, of justice, civility, concord, virtue, and of the splendour of the spirit of God. The way to lessen the opinion you have of being despised, is, not lightly to believe tale-tellers, and to find reasons to excuse him who hath erred; not to be curious to know that which may displease you; to fortifie your self in that side you find to be most feeble in you, avoiding objects which most ordinarily provoke you; to live with peaceable people; to shun cares, and troublesome affairs; to afford your self convenient solaces; to extirpate petty Curiosities and false opinions which you have of your sufficiency, in such sort that you imagine within your self that you ought to be used with great respect, and that you should not suffer any disgrace either by word or deed, but that men and elements must contribute to your likings. Behold from whence your feaver proceedeth, and how you may handsomely remedy it. O soul, infinitely nice! It seems you were bred in a box, in perfumed Cotton, and that you must endure nothing. Broth overmuch salted, a garment too straight, a mustachio ill turned up, the creaking of a door, the wind of a window, the least indiscretion of a servant, puts you out of your self. What do you take your self to be? You believe those flatterers who say, Do you suffer this? you measure not your self by your quality. And yet Kings and Queens and the Monarchs of the earth have endured, and daily do endure many slight oppositions with great tranquillity: and you, silly worm of the earth, turn against God, when he permitteth any thing to happen contrary to your liking. Frame unto your self a life simple, and free from affectations; take away your wantonnesse, your pleasures, and petty peevishnesse. Choler is engendred by overmuch curiosities of spirit: stifle them, and you immediately extinguish it. Know that to quarrell with an equall is hazardous; with an inferiour, is contemptuous; and with a superiour, it is foolish. Set before you the Maxime of Pirrhus, that great Master of Fence, who said this passion was a Trouble-Trade; and that whilst you continue the same humour, you shall be unable for all good employments. Do as the brave Philosopher Agrippinus, of whom Epictetus makes mention, who perceiving that when any misfortune befell him, he thereby became hasty and cholerick: What is this? (saith he) I play the slave, where

Seneca de Ira. Ira volo-prarium generatur, & volo-prarium suppressione sopitur.

Seneca de Ira l. 2. c. 14.

Ira perturbat artes.

Agrippinus. Epictetus. Stobæus.

where I should play the Monarch. O misfortunes! I will deceive you. Thereupon he wrote the praises of every evil which might happen against his will. If a calumny; the praise of the profit calumny brought. If an Exile; the praise of exile. If a quartane Ague; the praise of the Quartane Ague. And by this means he came to such a height of Tranquillity, that so soon as a fresh mischief assailed him; he met it with a smiling countenance, and said, God be praised, behold the way of my exercise.

And you who are a child of light, fed with the body and bloud of your master for Heaven, and the company of Angels, you cannot say (when some little inconvenience befalleth you) prailed be Jesus; behold here how the good purpose I have made of patience is exercised. And then if you feel any rebellion; Take heed you shew it not either by words or outward signs, but get you and lodge at the signe of silence, where the haven of Tranquility is. Do as those that are ill of the falling sickneſſe, who retire at the approch of their fits, that they may not let any things uncomely appear. say, Blessed be our Lord God, who teacheth my hands to fight, and frameth my fingers to warre. The Hebrew hath it, Blessed be our Lord who is my rock. To shew you, that God, if you endeavour to vanquish your passions, will place you upon the holy rock of Tranquility, from whence he in his immutability beholdeth the motion of all ages. Take a good friend, a faithfull companion, who may divert your passion in its first fit, who may admonish you, and play on Davids harp to drive away this devil of mad Saul, and take you from the occasions of hurt.

Benedictus Dominus Deus meus, qui docet manus meas ad prælium, & digitos meos ad bellum Psal. 143. Benedictus Dominus rupes mea. Stabilisque manens dat cuncta moveri.

The second remedy. Cogitemus nequaquam licere nobis orare, nec iratas fundere preces ad Deum. quotidie credamus nos è corpore migraturos, nihilque nobis continentiâ castitatis, nihil abrenunciatione facultatum, nihil divitiarum contemptu, nihil jejuniorum vigiliarum, laboribus conferendum, quibus propter iracundiam solam & odium ab universitatis judice supplicia promittuntur æterna. Cassian. l. 8. c. 21. de Institutis Renunc. Vade, prius reconciliare fratri tuo, & tunc veniens offeres munus tuum. Matth. 5. 24

The second remedy. The second choler, and entertain aversions irreconcileable is, that It were good to ponder and consider the words of Cassian, Let us persuade our selves that whilst we are angry, It is not permitted us to pray unto God, and to present him our prayers. Let us take each day to be our last; and let us not think that for being chast and continent, for having forsaken the pleasures of the world, and despised riches, for macerating our bodies with fastings, watchings, and labours; much is due to us, if at the end of the reckoning it be found we carry hatred, and anger in our hearts. That alone is sufficient to condemn us to eternall punishments, by the sentence of him, who shall judge the whole world.

Take not this as my saying, but take it as an oracle which that great man hath collected from many holy men of his age. When you keep in your heart some hatred against your neighbour, you do a notable wrong to your soul. For first, what have we more sweet, more mercifull then altars? There we should seek for mercy, if God had banished it from all parts of the world; and yet whilst you deferre reconciliation with your enemy, you deprive your self of the right of altars: and if you still have some spark of Christianity, as often as you approch to them you hear the voice of the son of God, who speaketh to you in the bottome of your heart, and saith these words of the Gospel, Go first of all, and reconcile your self to your brother, and then you shall come to offer your sacrifice of the altar. By despising these words of our Saviour, and going on, you commit a new sacriledge; by recoyling back, and avoiding the altar, and sacrifice, you fly from pardon, and life. And then in what a state are you? what necessity is there that for sparing a good word, you must perpetually live either a sacrilegious, or an excommunicate person?

The third remedy. Lastly, you must think you are not immortall: the very moment which is now in your hands you must divide it with death: even the sun (which you to day have seen to rise out of his couch) before his setting, may see you in your Tomb. Moreouer, know that should you all your life time have preserved an inviolable virginity; should you have built a thousand hospitalls, and spent your whole estate in entertaining of the poor; should you have lived in Hair-cloth, among thorns, and in great abstinencies: if you into the other world carry a dramme of resolved and determinate hatred of a neighbour, with unwillingneſſe to hear any words of reconciliation; all which may be in you of virtue or merit will nothing avail you; your lot shall be with reprobate souls & devils, O God! what a sentence, what a Decree, what a punishment is this? and who would now purposely cherish hatred against his neighbour, unleſſe he had lost all Reason, all sense, and discretion? Let us conclude with the third remedy, against the furious and bloudy, who are not content to fume; but like unto Ætna, do throw forth their all-enflamed bowels, nor are ever satiated but with outrages and humane bloud. This is it which makes us to behold the goodly duells which have at all times been the profession of servile souls, of fools, or mad-men. There we see men, bewitched with a curſed and damnable opinion, seeking upon the least injury to require reparations sealed with humane bloud; to engage seconds to make them complices of their crime, and companions of their misery; to send challenges many times by pages apparelled like women, then to cut anothers throte with horrible fury; to dragge a long chain of allies, to make a pitchd battel of a single combat, and mothers and wives in the mean time to tremble in expectation of the issue of this butchery. Some slight fellow, who hath a soul miserably shallow and base, to cover his cowardise and acquire reputation, will wash his impurity in humane bloud. It is not courage which puts him forward; he who would behold him a little in the buisineſſe, should see him ready to swoon, to wax pale, and tremble. If he would follow his own nature, he would fly a hundred leagues off, and never look behind him: but for a little vanity, that Hacksters may praise him and say he hath fought a duell; he tormenteth his mind, and especially when he is among pots and glasses he shews himself valiant. Ah (Rodomont) Is this your buſineſſe? you cannot speak, but you must menace to slash a man. Bloudy beast! where have you learnt this, but in the school of Furies and devils? and do not say, he hath put an affront upon me. What affront? a cold countenance, a harsh word, a piece of foppery which you would never have taken notice of, had you not been void of the reason of an honest man. None would affront you, were not you your own affront: behold the root of all these enflamed angers. And he who will give remedy to them, must cut them off in his imagined contempt, where indeed there is none; and therefore it is fit he retire to the haven of silence, and lessen what he may in his imagination, the injury which he thinks he hath received: when you shall have well weighed it, you will find that you of a fly have made an elephant. The true means to forgive all the world, and to pardon it, is to judge of offences, before we be angry. There are offences which we should laugh at; others, which we at least should deferre, and some we should speedily pardon.

Multos absolvemus, si cœperimus antè judicare quàm irasci. Senec 3. de ira. c. 29. Terminum etiam marinis fluctibus ac tempestatibus fabricator descripsit arena maris exigua sæpe inter duas acies inter capedo est: si reprimere iram non poces memento quis indignabundum mare nil ultra humanam & fluctuationem effert. Simocatta.

If this stay you not, at least think upon the end, and say, Behold a quarrell which begins to be enkindled: there is nothing wanting but a poor word, fair, and advised, yea verily but meere silence, to give remedy thereto. If I augment it, in stead of lessening it, I do put fire to dry wood, which will make a terrible havock to consume me first. I must be a homicide, or a sacrifice to death, or live in brawls, quarrels, and eternall divisions, which will involve parents, children, brothers, cousins, and a whole posterity. Behold the goodly fruit which brutish anger bringeth. Since I can prevent all this by a little discretion and patience; am I such an enemy of my own good as willingly to seek my proper ruine! The sea is tempestuous, but there needs but a little sand to represse it; and when it hath made all its menaces which seemed ready to swallow all the world, it retires back, contenting it self onely to leave froth and broken shells.

enemy

The direfull example of Haman, a, against the enraged, who are, at a little offended.

Behold, if you have eyes, the goodly gain which Haman made of his anger, and how, seeking to remedy an affront, he transfixed himself with eternall misery. Mardocheus, whom he accounted a beggar, had not saluted him at his entrance into the Kings palace, for which he must be revenged. His reason suggested to him, he was a man of no worth; why wilt thou take notice of him? No, I will destroy him. What! for not saluting thee? He is a Jew by nation, and peradventure he hath seen on thy garments the figures of the Persian gods embroidered, and dares not bend his knee, lest it might be thought he gave this honour to thy gods; and he should be esteemed an Idolater. It is no matter, I am resolved to ruine him. If thou beest gone so farre, take then the head of the culpable, and pardon all the rest who are innocent. No, I will destroy him with all his race. See, I have in my hand the Kings Signet-ring, and I go to dispatch letters throughout all the Provinces, that all the Jews may be slain, which shall be found on such a prefixed day. O God! what! a slaughter for the deniall of a silly salutation, to make choler swim in the tears of so many widows and orphans, in the murther of so many mortalls, in the bloud of so many Provinces? Dost thou think, there is not a God in heaven to take vengeance upon such torturing cruelties? God may do what he pleaseth; But I must be revenged, my wife, and my friends advise me so. Alas! unhappy wretch! He was then contriving his direfull designe, when the vengeance of God fell upon his head. Behold him disgraced, lost, and shamefully supplanted by a woman; coming to the palace of the King his Master, he heard the roaring of a lion which said, Take him away; when instantly, behold, he was hanged on a gallows fifty cubits high which he had caused to be prepared for his enemy; his ten male children were made the companions of his punishments, and his whole race was destroyed. O God of Justice! what Thunders, and what Tempests fall upon men of anger, bloud, and revenge! O God of the patient, and eternall mirrour of patience! may my soul for ever avoid these three regions of Gall, Hatred, and Fury; to become a Mistresse over its Passions which have hitherto tormented it: And may it arrive in that fortunate Island, where divine Tranquility dwelleth: May it enter into thy temple; and may the eternall odours of the sacrifice of Reconciliation, of Mercy, and Propitiation mount up to thy throne, which thou taughtest us upon Calvary, in the bitter and sharp dolours of thy body, amidst the sorrow of heaven, the darkness of the sun the opening of sepulchres, the breaking of stones, the effusion of thy bloud, and the desolation of thy Soul!

The thirteenth Treatise, Of ENVY and JEALOUSIE

§. 1. The Picture thereof.

The picture of Envy.

Matthias Vienna, in the piece of work which he confesseth to have carefully laboured the space of thirty years to make a present thereof to Pope John the two and twentieth, giveth us a picture of Envy, when he depainteth it born on a Dragon, with a Coat-armour wreathed all over with Serpents, a Helmet on its head figured with Bee-hives, to signifie, that the Envious like unto Bees, carry sharp and sweet; and a Target all over pourtrayed with Batts, enemies of light, as is that which beareth it. Should I amply dilate my self upon his conceits, setting aside all the inventions of Poets and Painters upon this subject; I would place it, not in the deserts of Lybia, where the Sun onely shineth on sands and rocks, but in the midst of Virtues; because such are the objects of Envy: I would give it a fierce eye, a countenance spitefull and dusky; what is more sad and direfull? I would paint it sucking the heads of Aspicks for its ordinary repast, since so, holy Job describeth wickedness, nor should I be deceived, it living on poison: I would set two companions by its sides, which S. Bonaventure giveth it, the one whereof is called Oola, and the other Oliba: the one (saith he) signifieth the sadness which Envy hath at the prosperity of another; the other, the ignominious joy it conceiveth upon other mens disasters. I would make it dine and sup by candle-light, but they should be serpentine lights, whereof the same Doctour maketh mention, which cause straws to seem like unto serpents; so, the slight imperfections of men, which are but straws, are by the Envious, esteemed the malices of a serpent. I would have Truth present a Torch before its eyes, to dazle those infernall lights; but the miscreant should turn its face to the other side, for it hateth all which is true and solid: I would make virtue appear before it with a branch of Palm in its hand; but this caitiff should vomit up frogs, to marre this brave monument of worth, according to the ingenious model which Cypselus giveth us. (Verily, the words of the Envious are as so many frogs which on all sides besiege the benignities of virtue) I would paint round about it screetch Owls, and Hyena's, and all manner of maligne creatures. One cannot do too much to expresse the malice of it: Lastly, I would make it to feed on it self, as the beast of Martreas the Enchanter, and that it should rise again out of its bloud and wounds, ever ready for new torments. For doth not this infamous passion ordinarily do so?

Caput aspidum sugent. Job 20. 16.

S. Bonavent. in dicta.

§. 2. The Definition of Envy, its severall kinds, and first of Jealousie.

Definition of Envy.

But let us leave this pourtraict and tell you, that Envy (which is a sorrow one hath for the good of his like, thinking it to be prejudiciall to his own ends) ever since by the malice of our enemy it entred into the world, hath many officers, and servitours, who notwithstanding are not alike evil. I see in this Picture some like Rachel, who seeing her self barren, and her sister Leah very fruitfull, would not really cut the throat of her sisters children but onely with much earnestnesse desired to have issue, and for that cause she said to her husband the Patriarch Jacob, Give me children, or let me die with grief. Many (saith S. Thomas) are in this degree, which properly is Jealousie; for they are pensive, comparing their want and imperfections with the plenty and perfections of others: to see themselves reduced to that condition, albeit, they have no purpose to prejudice the prosperity they behold in another; and such are not the worst. In this rank

First degree of the Envious.

Gen. 30. Da mihi liberos aliequi moriar. S. Thom. 2. 2. q. 36.

are

are many old folks who envie the graces, pleasures, and good successes of young people: many men painfull and little prosperous, who are troubled at the great felicities of their likes: many Merchants, and handicrafts-men, many women and maids, who are vexed with some discontent, when they see the beautie, gracefull carriage, gentle behaviour, estimation, and account wherein their companions are: and others also are troubled to observe in them, wit, devotion, and more virtue then they could wish. Others honour these fair parts, but they would that those who have them were wholly at their dispose, without having recourse to any other.

The seed of Jealousies.

The great love which many have towards themselves, and the desire they shew of coveting to be in all things the onely of their kind, are the seeds of infinite many Jealousies. So we see old Captains, (who having been eminent in a thousand occasions, and having bred, and raised to themselves a flourishing reputation out of a world of labours, and in a very long course of years) are stung to the quick when they hear speech of some new prowesses of young people, daring and fortunate, who find out short wayes to hasten to the Temple of honour, and do in little time that which others could not with much pain, industry, service, and toil. This afflicteth the hearts of men experienced; to whom it then seems that this new-come-man is born, as a worm in wood, to gnaw and wither up the Laurels, whence they hoped to gather immortall crowns.

Jealousie for honours and dignities.

This Passion very often assaileth Prelates, Princes, Sovereign Monarchs; and by how much the dignitie is exalted, so much the more the fire of Jealousie therein finds matter and bait. A man who beholdeth himself on a throne, in the most supream glitters of glory, who seeth so many powers to bow under his feet; who is the God of Battels, of War, of Peace, Life, and of Death; the distributour of Fortunes, the arbitratour of Differencies; who makes himself an avenging Mars, and the pacifier of minds, when he pleaseth; who marcheth environed with lightnings of arms, who sendeth thunders and tempests, and calm air in the midst of storms; cannot endure a Companion in this dignitie. The least suspicions cause wounds in the mind, which are many times waited on by anger, poyson, furie, and massacres. Bloud and affinitie is not therein acknowledged, is not assured; virtue hath no credit; parents will have no children, how perfect so ever; yea, even those who are worn with old age, borrow vermilion to paint their faces, and still think themselves young enough to command.

Diadems and Sceptres run the like hazard, and they have but one desire in the midst of Authoritie, which is, to reserve the appeals of death to themselves, and never to leave the places void, which they have once replenished. This poyson creepeth into Ecclesiasticks,

Learned men subject to Jealousie into Priests, Religious, Graduates, into the Learned, into Doctours and Preachers, who are willing to bear sway in Letters, in Eloquence and chairs, and to have none to argue their supe.-eminencie; and when some one out-strips the Course of his years by the lustre of his wit, and in the beginning stands in high esteem, the old Gamesters cannot digest it. Masters spare not to lessen the credit of their scholars. Fountain-heads envie rivolets, and the Sun, his proper rayes; especially, when some barbarous applause of people of slender judgement and little wit giveth excessive praise to a young man, who discovereth more wind and ostent in brave undertakings then capacitie. This frenzy endeavours to insinuate it self into Altars, into Tribunals of Jealousie goeth to Altars.

Penance, where (without touching so many deserving men, who worthily acquit themselves therein) there are some, who are more jealous of their spiritual daughters, then the most passionate husbands of their wives. It seems to some, that, now adayes, to have a notable penitent, is to possesse a piece of land that yields a good revenue, or a fat Abbacy; and that they must have a perpetual title to it. It is cunning deceit to blind their eyes, to captive them, to tie them to a Confession-seat with an indissoluble chain, not to permit them conference nor commerce with any, which may let them see their bondage, to be offended if they change Confessour, to throw out complaints, and to make it to be accounted as if it were a sin of Adulterie. God forbid such a folly ever enter into a generous mind, and unworthily profane the Sanctuary. It is very certain, that all good directours imitate the sea which receiveth rivers into its bosome, without asking from whence they come, or what countrey they passed through, and when they came from thence; nay, so farre is it from being displeased, that it hath not any feeling of it; this being not able to cause any diminution of its greatnesse: so, a good spirituall Father leaveth all the souls he directeth, not in exorbitant libertie, but in a discreet permission, to go, to come, to absent themselves; to return according as it shall be most fit for their commoditie, and spirituall advancement. He neither feels them almost to come near him or retire from him, so little is his mind busied in the distinguishment of persons.

Jealousie in Marriage.

One may here adde the Jealousie of unfortunate Marriages, although (to say truly) it is an effect of the Passion of Love. I am not ignorant that great personages and learned Writers have thought, that Jealousie proceeded not at all from Love, because Love is obsequious, and readily taketh the tincture of the affections of the thing beloved, which the Passion of Jealousie doth not, thwarting the most innocent inclinations of a creature, and framing suspicions upon actions. But it is easie to answer to this objection, and to say, that never hath any of understanding had the opinion, That Jealousie might proceed from a generous and well rectified Love, and nevertheless it followeth not, that it doth not proceed from a Love of concupiscence, bad, and inordinate. For it is very reasonable, the definition of S. Thomas stand good, as being the most judicious, who said, That Jealousie is nothing else, but Love impatient of a Corrivall. And it is to no purpose to say, That there are many jealous Husbands to be found, who notwithstanding love not their Wives. For if their passion be without Love, it is not properly Jealousie, but Malignitie, and Envie; because they envie them the sweetnels of conversation, the good and honour they might derive from the honest conversation of persons of merit, and do resemble the Dog who eats no hay, nor suffereth the Ox to come near it. The envious man cannot endure it, out of the hatred he hath of anothers contentment; and the Jealous cannot suffer it, through the over much love he beareth to himself, perpetually fearing lest communication of love may not tend to the diminution of the good he possesseth, or pretends to have right to possesse. This passion ordinarily is framed out of a dull feaver of indiscreet love; and taketh its originall in minds too greatly in love with themselves, greedy, weak, and interessed; upon one side they have a most strong imagination of the excellencie of the thing beloved which they excessively affect; on the other, a certain distrust of their own small capacitie, and of the uncertaintie of love, which makes them perpetually to apprehend the losse of that which they love. A lover (in Plato) seeing the creature he most loved, did use to behold the starres; wished he were heaven, to look on her with as many eyes as there were stars. These eyes

The Jealousie of marriages, which may hold the first place among the envious.

Definition of Jealousie according to S. Thomas.

Out of what Jealousie is framed.

Plato in Anthol. Grec.

in

in my opinion, would be very proper for good love; but Jealousie is a monster with a hundred eyes, which are enkindled with certain flames like to those of hell; dark, and mischievous. And besides, it hath very many ears continually hearkning, and receiving all which any one will pour into them. Its loves are rages; benefits, snares; thoughts, crimes; words, outrages; designes, follies; and events, tragedies. So soon as it observeth in the things beloved the least inclination to another, suspicions are framed, distrusts and giddy fantasies in a man who would willingly number his wives hairs on her head, for fear lest she should have laid apart some of them to give them to a lover. And if these suspicions be fortified by some ill accident, or some reports of a venemous tongue; then do we see anger, anxiety, fury, and despair to come forward, which many times run to fire and bloud, to precipices and halters. What is more ugly or monstrous then this passion? Think you not you see the pit of the Abysse, whereof S. John speaketh in his Apocalyps, when he saith, That the pit of the Abysse is open, and the smoke comes out of it as from a great furnace, wherewith the Sun is darkned, and in the midst of this smoke strange grashoppers are seen which waste and consume all that is verdant. What is the pit of the Abysse, but Jealousie? And what are those smokes, but its suspicions? and what is the darkned Sun, but Reason all over oppressed by Passion? and what are those grashoppers, but the evil effects of cruel Jealousie which over runneth mankind? Ah! How many innocent Ladies have been wounded by this monster in their honour, more precious with them then life? Ah! How many miserable wives have served for victimes to the fury of enraged husbands, who have thrust a sword through the moity of their owne flesh to satisfie their barbarous Tyranny? Our eyes are still moistned with this bloud, and our minds cannot speak of it but with horrour. All the Jealousies men entertain for the goods and persons of the world, have this proper, that they presently make their deformity appear in the disorder of sundry passions which tosse & turmoile them.

Description of Jealousie

Compared to the pit of the Abysse. Apoc 9.2.

Who could see a jealous heart, should behold a huge swarm of distrusts and suspicions which issue thence, as spirits of Hell, and hasten to whisper in its ear; she becometh cool in love; she was in such a place to watch an opportunity to see such an one: If she be simple, she dissembles; if she be prudent, she is cunning; if she be pensive, she contriveth plots; if she be lightsome, she figureth fruition to her self. Never did a more detestable plague come out of the Abysse to trouble the peace of Marriages; never was any thing seen so unjust, never any thing so cruel. An innocent creature who abhorreth sin as hel, sees her self wounded in reputation, more dear to her then life, transfixed with mortall arrows all covered over with ordure and bloud in the soule of a passionate man: afterward this unhappinesse stretching further, first filleth the house with division, then the neighbours with curiosity, and the whole city with a tale which trotteth on tongues.

The havock it makes in the heart.

Advice to women.

Many times they passe from sport to actions tragicall, diresull, and diabolicall. It hath happened that Jealous women running up and down the streets and fields, to discover their husbands loves, have been torne in pieces by wild beasts: and husbands have been hanged and strangled for having sought by infamous wayes into the secret of confession. Many times banishments, and murders have followed which have put all into combustion: witnes Theodosius his appeal, and Mariamne, of whom I have spoken very amply in the first volume of this Book. It is undoubted, that a husband makes his wife loyall, by accounting her such, and that he who suspecteth evil in an innocent creature, gives her occasion of sin. Never doth a generous husband slightly fall into these weaknesses. Women also are most injurious when they give cause of suspicion by a licentious life which striketh the understanding of the most stupid man. It is to cast oil into the flame, and to wish it may not burn, when one in all occasions carrieth her self ill, and cannot endure suspicions, which ordinarily wait on actions too free, as the shaddow on the body. And that which is more insupportable is, that certain women chast enough in their conscience, will needs many times appear Libertines to increase the distrusts of a husband, and to hold his soul in a hell of torments; when they should by all wayes endeavour to divert his Jealousies.

A woman is ill advised to complain of the Jealousie of her husband, when she thinks it sufficeth to have a husband for the Sacrament, and a friend for her own liking; and so that she preserve her self from the extremity of Infamy, that all is permitted her in wedlock. When she imagines it a decent thing to be alone, and (in the obscurity of darkneſse with men who are not reputed Angel-Raphaels; guardians of Chastity) to roam and run up and down the streets, orchards, and gardens; to hearken after appointments, walks, and junketings; to receive and write love-letters; to be quaint, and to desire to be esteemed such; to serve others in their humours, and to wish to be alike served; to wear a wanton garment; to be bare-brested; to talk freely; to live wantonly; to despise all that is said; to follow her own pleasure. Doth not all this tend to prostitution of Honour, and to shipwrack of Chastity?

§ 3. Two other branches of this stock, which are Indignation, and malicious Envy, with calumny its companion.

But let us lay aside that which concerneth the Jealousies of Marriage. There are others plunged in this passion, who have a perpetuall indignation to see those to prosper who are really wicked, or whom they in their thoughts do imagine to be so. They would willingly call God in question, and see not (to speak with S. Augustine) that the fish which they esteem happy in the bait, hath the hook already in his throat. I behold others who afflict themselves, and are unquiet, not for these considerations only, which were more tolerable; but because others are farre more excellent then they, either in wit, industry, beauty, or in estate desirous (out of an irregular appetite of proper excellency, and most palpable ambition) to stand in all things, transcendently conspicuous, to the prejudice and abasement of others: and such Envy (saith the most eminent of Doctours) is of all the most perfect and absolute; and is ordinarily to be found among concurrencies of age, of fortune, and profession. We see others who are not content with simple thoughts, but thrust their passion forward to wretched effects; and I observe that these are disposed to evil by divers motives. Some have a dark and cloudy Envy; as the Philistims who went and secretly filled the pits with earth, which the Patriarch Abraham had made with much labour for the benefit of many: so we behold them, who silently seek to frame obstacles against all the good works which they observe to be begun, casting the stone of scandall as far as they can, then pulling back the arm which threw it. Others are possessed with a furious and fantastick Envy; as that of Saul, who setting himself loose to the extravagancies of his maligne spirit, sought to transfix David with his launce to the wall, when he for his Recreation plaid on the harp: so we see mischievous souls, who out of a transportation of frenzy, frenzy, do brutish acts against such as wish them well. Others have a determinate Envy, and a formall habitude, which proceedeth to rage, to glut themselves in bloud, and massacres; such was that of Josephs brothers, and of Cain who embrewed his hands in the bloud of Abel, out of the jealousie of a sacrifice.

Two other sorts of the envious Indignation.

Augustin. in Psal. 91.

1 Reg 18,11

It seldome happens, but that this Fury concludeth in some execrable Tragedy. At least, it hath calumny for a perpetuall companion, which is a hideous monster whose picture anciently Apelles drew. He figureth it unto us a woman; for it is a feminine vice to skirmish with the Tongue in the want of courage, and vertue. It hath by its sides two waiting-women, one whereof is called Surprizal, and the other Deceit, because these are the two vices which make Calumny prevail: the one surprizing credulous spirits; the other sophisticating and disguizing Truth. It is very curiously decked and pranked up; for, who would not abhorre it, if it had not some exteriour attractive to surprize the unwary? It nevertheless shews in its countenance passion and rage; for it is as hard to hide Love and Hatred, as a Cough, or Fire. It holds in one hand a Torch, like that of the Furies; and who hath not heard that a great personage called it the Phaeton of the world, because it sets all a fire, and in combustion? With the other hand she catcheth a poor man by the hair, as if she were ready to strangle him; and albeit he implore heaven and earth to his aid, there is not any one to deliver him out of the hands of this murthteresse. These are the effects of the tyranny of this Passion. Before it, marcheth a vast fellow, dry, frightfull, and lean, whose eyes are sharp: He is Envy's Agent, and the inseparable companion of Slander. On the right hand is seen a man with great ears, such as were Midas's, who makes a shew to receive this impostresse with open arms. Ignorance and Suspicion (seeing the disposition and inclinations he hath) do put a yoke about his neck, and lead him by the nose. Behold! just so they are compoled who readily hear Detractions. They for the most part are open-eared to receive all poured in; but otherwise suspicious and ignorant. Lastly, Repentance cometh behind all mourning, and ill clad, saying, What have we done? This creature was innocent; and then with a finger sheweth Truth, which in the Evening presenteth her self to enlighten darknesse. It is the misery of humane things, that one never almost repenteth a wickednesse, but when it is remedilesse. Nothing may be added to the conceit of this excellent Painter, so happily he hath hit it. I will onely say, that if you desire to know the officers and inferiour ministers of this tyrannicall Passion (they are not all equall in qualities or vices) I find three principall Orders of them.

Lucian, The picture of Slander.

Lipsius de Calumnia.

The first is, of those who slander of purpose to vilifie the actions of others, and to weaken their reputation, whether they be disposed thereto by some motive of pride which cannot endure any thing eminent but it self, or through some jealousie; (as it happeneth in concurrencies of professions and conditions) or out of some pretension of interest. These are not gone so far yet as to black Slander: for they do not report any criminall matters; but content themselves to fall upon some defects, sometimes slight, and sometimes sufficiently apparent: yea, they seem to be reserved in matter of Slander; for they do as the spies of the Land of Promise, who first told its beauties and singularities, before they mentioned its monsters: They lick the person before they bite, they know the number of his virtues and perfections, as if they had undertaken to make a Panegyrick of them, saying, This man is witty, is sober, is temperate, is just, and other such like; nevertheless there is alwayes a Conclusion which in the end marrs all. You see likewise of this sort, who cover the praises of another under a sad silence; others, who ascribe to chance that which was out of virtue; others, who by comparison of excellent men extenuate the acts of him whom they would blame; others, who punctually decipher all the defects of a good action; others, who say they have great compassion of his imperfections of whom they speak, and would have supplied them at their own charge, if it were in their power. To conclude, all such have some honest cloake for their Passion.

Divers degrees of Calumniatours

The second order is much more dangerous; for it comprehendeth those who publickly and confidently speak of defects not common and incident, but important and notable. So you find an infinite number of them in the world, who seem to have studied the lives, the estates, the families, and genealogies of a whole City; and, as nothing can exempt it self from the curiosity of their eyes, so none escapeth the poison of their tongues.

The third otder is that of the Devill, the father of Calumniatours, and conteineth such as invent mischiefs and crimes with defamatory libels, to brand the reputation of persons most innocent, and many times very virtuous. And as it is said, that the ink of the Cuttle-fish poured into lamps, maketh the bravest pieces of Painting to be seen with horrour; so these wicked tongues, when they have cast their poison upon the lights of a life the most innocent, make it appear with hideous deformities. One cannot say how damnable this vice is, for it proceedeth from a source of Hell, to ruine and extirpate all the members of humane society: and if there be a disorder which deserveth that all men detest it, and by common consent make warre against it; This stands in the first place. Such as forge Calumnies are extreamly detestable; but those who lend their ears to receive them, and do easily believe all which is suggested to their credulity (against the same persons whom they have loved, without hearing their justification) grievously offend the divine Majesty, and shew they have little judgement but much wilfulnesse. An ear very hard to evil reports, is needfull in a time when the tongue is so soft, and streaming in an overflow of words.

§ 4. Humane remedies of Envy.

Humane remedies against Envy.

IF you at this present seek for humane remedies which may be applied against the poisonous passion of Envy and Jealousie; I can then tell you that this evil laies hold very often by the eyes; and that it is expedient to guard them with a carefull heed, and to divert them what one may from objects which are of power to excite many inordinate motives in the soul in this kind. To what purpose is it to be so curious in the affairs of one, towards whom you have no affection; since by understanding his prosperities, you very often learn your own disastres? you look on his lands, his houses, his bravery, his pomp, his family, his alliance, his friends, and all that (entring into your heart through the curiosity of your eyes) causeth therein fits of a lingering feavour which wasts and consumeth you. The amourous eye sucketh in a sweet poison, and the envious eye feeds it self with a venome which is full of bitternesse. It (peradventure) expecteth, that beholding the parts of the person it hateth, it shall see the mischief it wisheth; but God permits it there, to find what least it would, and that those envenomed aspects serve for a torment to the soul.

Greg. Nyss. in vita Mosis.

S. Gregory Nyssen in the life of Moses, saith it resembleth the Vulture whom carrions nourish, and perfumes kill. All the evill it meeteth, prepareth a refection reſection of Serpents for its mind, and all the good, afflicteth it to death.

Accuſtome not your ſelf likewiſe eaſily to believe thoſe tale-tellers who (to gain your good liking by baſe ſervitude) relate the vices and diſaſters of the party whom you envie: for, that much avails to foment your Paſſion. Proſper hath ſagely ſaid, that the envious are ready to believe all the evils in the world which the tongue of a complaining ſpirit telleth them touching the miſhaps of ſuch as they hate; and if any one by chance (not knowing the diſeaſe) happen to ſpeak good of them; they ſufficiently witneſſe by their contradiction, that they believe not what they ſay.

Proſper l. 3. de contemplat. c. 9.

Omne malum quod mendax fama citaverit ſtatim credunt ſerali. ter el, qui illud verum non eſſe probare voluerit, contradicunt.

Secondly, it is very behooffull inceſſantly to labour in the mortification of pride, and the exorbitant appetite of ones own proper excellency, as being the principall root of the paſſion of Envie, as affirmeth the forealledged Authour, ſaying, that Sathan became envious out of pride, and not proud through Envy; we muſt inferre, Pride is not the fruit of Envy, but Envy a ſprout of Pride. The ambition you have, every where to have the higheſt place, to be in great eſteem, to poſſeſſe a petty ſovereignty in all favours, neceſſarily makes you envious and jealous; ſo that one cannot praiſe any body in your preſence, but that this commendation inſtantly ſeems to tend to the diminution of your reputation: Your heart bleeds at it, & the bloud flieth up into your face; nature arms her ſelf to beat back a good office (which a charitable tongue would render a perſon of merit) as if it were a great injury, and a ſuit commenced againſt you. It is a ſign you deſerve little praiſe ſince you cannot endure it in another. How would you be eſteemed, ſince you firſt of all betray your own reputation, ſhewing your ſelf to be of ſo weak a judgement that one cannot ſpeak a good word of another, but it miniſters matter of an evil thought in you? Were you as rich in merits, as your mind figureth to you: you would no more be moved, when a good word is ſpoken of another, then a man infinitely wealthy; to give a ſmall piece of coin to a poor creature who were in want.

Non ſuperbia fructus, invidiæ fuit, ſed invidia de ſuperbiæ radice proceſſit. Proſper. ib.

Multis abundat virtutibus qui alienas amat Vincen. Bel. 3. a. l. 4. c. 7.

I add alſo a third remedy (that many have found to be very efficacious) which is, to know, and much to eſteem the gifts that God hath given us; to content our ſelves with what we are, and with the ſtate the divine Providence allotteth us, without attempting on forreign hopes, which would (perhaps) be great evils unto us. S. Chryſologus ſaith, that Envie once ſhut up Terreſtriall Paradiſe with a ſword of fire: but I may ſay, it daily ſtoppeth from us the ſources of many contentments which would plentifully moyſten all the parts of our life: that, many would be happy, if they could tell how to manure their fortune, could content themſelves with their own mediocrity, and take the felicities which Nature preſenteth them, without being troubled at others. Miſerable that they are, not knowing how to be happy, unleſſe another be unhappy! unfortunate that they are, to forſake Roſes which grow in their gardens, to haſten to reap thorns in their neighbours! Tertullian writeth, the Pagans in his time were ſo enraged againſt the Chriſtians, that all their comforts ſeemed nothing to them in compariſon of the pleaſure they took to hate and torment them. This is the fury which many envious now-a-dayes practiſe. All their proſperities fade, all their joyes languiſh, and all their good ſucceſſes never are accompliſhed, whilſt they ſee thoſe to flouriſh whom they perſecute. It grieves them they are what they are, that God hath fixed them in a mean condition, and that they are not born to be of thoſe great Coloſſes which ſhrink and daily fall by the ſole burthen of their weight. If they knew the black phantaſmes of cares which leap on the top of ſilver pillars, and go athwart gilded marbles (to find out thoſe pompous lives who moſt commonly have but the bark of happineſſe) they would every day a thouſand times bleſſe their condition: but this maligne ignorance which ſealeth up their eyes makes them complain of all that they ſhould love, and cauſeth them to love all they ought to complain of.

Paradiſi nobis amœna flammeo cuſtode ſeclusit.

Tanti non eſt bonum, quanti eſt odium Chriſtianorum.

Laſtly, to remedy the bitings of Envie, you muſt entertain a ſpirit of love and correſpondence, often repreſenting unto your ſelf, that a man who loveth none but himſelf, and wholly lives to himſelf (not able to endure the proſperities of another,) is a piece unloſened from this great univerſe which altogether bendeth to the unity of our ſovereign God, who is one in Eſſence, and who gathereth all creatures into the union of his heart. What would this jealous man have, who is ſo deſperately paſſionate concerning this creature? Doth he not well ſee, that loving ſo inordinately he takes the courſe to be no longer loved by her, and looſeth all he deſireth moſt, by the violence of deſiring it? A woman out of a deſire to be beloved, would not be tyrannized over. She wiſheth love, not fury; fire of Seraphins, not of devils. Theſe Courtſhips are offences to her: theſe ſuſpitions, injuries: theſe prohibitions, rigours: theſe ſolitudes, impriſonments. How can ſhe love a man, who loves not any but himſelf, who will play a God in the world, who will fetter the freedome of creatures, which is, the will; for which God himſelf hath made neither bands, nor chains? How can ſhe affect an Argus who obſerveth her, who watcheth her, who reckoneth up her words, who queſteth at her thoughts, who prepareth racks of the mind for her in the moſt innocent pleaſures? The ſole conſideration of the ruines and miſeries which envie and jealouſie do cauſe to themſelves, were able to ſtay theſe exorbitancies, were it once well conſidered; but if theſe humane reaſons ſeem yet too weak, raiſe your ſelf to divine.

§ 5. Divine Remedies drawn from the Benignity of God.

O Man! Behold (for a firſt remedy, among all the divine ones) thy firſt modell, and contemplate the benignity of God oppoſed to thy malice. It is an excellent thing to conſider againſt an envious eye, that God who will reform us to his likeneſſe, doth all the good to the world by ſimple ſeeing, and by being ſeen. For by ſeeing he giveth Eſſence and grace; and by being ſeen, he cauſeth heaven and beatitude. Thus doth S. Auguſtine aſſure us, that the ſcience of God is the cauſe of all things, which draweth Being from the Abyſſe of nothing, and brings the ſhades of death into light. The world is known by us, becauſe it is; but it is inſomuch as it is known by God, ſo efficacious this knowledge is. O what a goodly thing it had been, to ſee this great world, how it diſplayed it ſelf in all its pieces, and ſmiled in all its manſions under the eye of God! The Heavens were ſtretched forth like a Courtain, the ſtars were inchaſed in the Heavens as Diamonds, the clouds ſuſpended in the air as floating bodies, the air was diverſified in meteors, the eternal veins of fountains began to ſtream, the earth to cover its boſome, and liberally to afford us, out of its entrails, infinite many bleſſings from the benignity of his aſpects.

Remedy by the conſideration of the firſt modell.

God doth all by ſeeing, and by being ſeen.

Tell me not that, which the naturall Hiſtory mentioneth, that the Oſtrich hatcheth her little ones by the rayes of her eyes, yet never ſhall ſhe bring forth eggs by looking on the earth: but the Eye (that is to ſay) the knowledge of God, hath ſuch virtue that it is the maker of all creatures. O beauty! O greatneſſe! O goodneſſe! Beauty, to inhabit in the Idea of God, as in a Paradiſe of Glory: Greatneſſe; to have a capacitie infinite: Goodneſſe; to reſt in the bowels of the mercy of the Creatour.

The differencies of our knowledges from thoſe of God.

See (a little) the difference that is between our knowledges and that of God: you think it a goodly matter to know a man, and to wiſh him well, yet he thereby becomes neither white nor black, hot nor cold, good, rich, nor learned; for our knowledges are ſmall, in their capacities; limited, in their effects; and inefficacious, in their operations. How many brave Captains, and learned Authours are there, who are ſtill well thought of in the opinion of men! but whether they be living, or whether they be dead, (if their ſouls be in an ill ſtate) this knowledge, and this love nothing contributeth to their felicities. But ſo is it not, with the knowledge of God (I ſpeak of an amourous knowledge:) It gives Being, and Grace: Being; becauſe all things, known by God, are, in God, in a more noble manner, then in themſelves.

Here, we behold dying creatures who fade, wither, and ſhrink inſenſibly into nothing, were they not ſupported by the divine hand; but, in the houſe of God, in the palace of Eſſences, the Summers are of Cypreſſe (ſaith the holy Canticle) inſomuch as all therein is immortall, vigorous, perfect, and inco ruptible, and there it is where the bleſſed (who have not here ſeen the world but by two eyes of fleſh, and have ſeen it tottering, and altogether imperfect) behold it in God, fully ſtable, equall, and abſolute, in all its dimenſions. The Saints perpetually have before their eyes the incomprehenſible mirrour of the Divinity in which they at eaſe behold all that which concerneth them, and may conduce to their greater contentment.

Cant. 1. 17.

Beatis pervium eſt omniforme illud divinitatis ſpeculum, in quo, quicquid eorum intereſt, illucescat. Concil. Sennonſe.

I add that this knowledge cauſeth Grace. For, what makes predeſtination, but that preparation of Grace and Glory which God hath conceived from all Eternity in his underſtanding, to communicate it to his elect? See what God doth, ſeeing; and, God ſeen; what doth he elſe but actually make heaven, and Beatitude which conſiſteth in the clear viſion of God? So ſoon as a ſoul, predeſtinated to enjoy without delay the glory of heaven, is gone from out the bands of its body; it hath, for guide, this divine ſplendour which Divines call the light of Glory, which is a quality infuſed into the underſtanding, that ſo elevates and fortifies it beyond its condition, that it is able to endure the lightning flaſh of eternall Beatitude. Is it not of this light holy Job ſpake when he ſaid, he hideth light in his hands and ſaith to his friend, it is his inheritance & poſſeſſion?

Job 36.

Then God (all-good) communicateth himſelf to this ſoul ennobled with ſuch a qualitie, not by ſome image or repreſentation, but by its very eſſence intimately united to the glorified underſtanding; and from thence, what followeth, but an admirable transformation! The ſoul is wholly ablorpt in felicity; and, as a ſmall drop of water poured into the ſea, inſtantly takes the colour, and taſte of the ſea; ſo, the ſouls taſte is fully inebriated, and coloured with the Divinity; It is almoſt no longer in its ſelf, but becometh wholly like to God, not by nature but by participation. We know (ſaith S. John) when we ſhall ſee him, we ſhall be like him. And S. Gregory Nazianzen dareth to call it God. and as we have two principall parts of the ſoul to content; the underſtanding, and the will: ſo God all benigne abundantly ſatisfieth them, making thither to ſtream, as by two dugs of glory, all the delights and contentments proportioned to their condition. For the underſtanding which naturally deſireth to know, is illuminated by a moſt excellent knowledge of things the moſt hidden which it ſeeth in God (as in an incomprehenſible Mirrour) and ſeeth them, not in the manner of the wiſe men of the world, who flutter round about ſciences; as little flies about lamps that ſindge their wings, and make their tomb in the flames; but it ſeeth them with a viſion ſublime, calm, and delicious, which giveth to the will (that is made to love) amorous eagerneſſe, ever deſiring, and ever having what it deſireth. O what miracles doth the eye of God (enkindling with one ſole aſpect of many Divinities) when it maketh ſo many bleſſed ones, like unto it ſelf! as if the ſun riſing ſhould, in the heavens, create a million of little ſuns; and on earth, an infinitie of Diamonds; all which ſhould bear the image of this bright ſtar.

Joan. ep. 1.

Greg. Naz. Hymn.

Avidi, & ſemper pleni quod habent deſiderant. Pet. Damia. in Hymn. de gloria Paradiſi.

All thoſe bleſſed ones illuſtrated by this aſpect (albeit they ſhine divetſly according to each ones merit) are ſo far from envie, receiving the flames of eternall Goodneſſe; that every one accounteth the felicity of his companion, for the accompliſhment of his own. There you ſhall hear no ſpeech of envie occaſioned by inequalitie of felicity, where the union of charity ſhall eternally reign. Go to then, O thou Envious, O thou malign Man! God hath made thee to his likeneſſe, to carry, as he, (in proportion) raies of love and compaſſion in thy eyes, towards men; and thou there beareſt gall, bloud, and poyſon. Nay ſo far art thou otherwiſe, that if it were in thy power to make benefits to grow from thy aſpects, thou wouldeſt rather deſire the eye of a Baſiliſk, to poyſon, burn, and conſume the eſtate, and perſon of thy neighbour. O miſerable Owle, where wilt thou find waters ſtrong enough to waſh a ſtain ſo criminally oppoſite to the Sovereign bounty of the Creatour!

The bleſſed although unequall in glory are not envious.

Non eſt ibi aliqua invidia diſparis claritatis ubi regnat unitas claritatis. Aug.

§ 6. The mercifull eye of Jeſus ſerves for an Antidote againſt all ſorts of Envy.

LEt us next conſider the ſecond modell: and if we be ſtung by the biſings of Envie; Let us caſt our eyes upon Jeſus Chriſt, as heretofore did the Iſraelites on the brazen ſerpent to free themſelves from ſerpents of fire. The eie of Jeſus was a gentle eie, an eie of love, of compaſſion, and of mercy which opened (as the gates of the Eaſt) to let in day light, and the ſpirit of life. It alwayes had in our cauſe the ſymptomes which Phyſicians gave a ſick eie, which is, to watch, to ſparkle, and to weep: yea, the eie of the Saviour of the world was to watch inceſſantly, for our ſalvation, even to the paſſing of nights in oratories dedicated to God, as S. Luke obſerveth. Is it not this eie the Prophet Jeremy meant, when he ſaid, I ſee a waking rod? The interpreters think he alluded to the ſceptre of the Kings of Egypt which had an eye pourtraied upon the top of it; and that ſuch was the ſceptre and power of Jeſus for our ſakes: a power not harſh and imperious, but ſweet and charitable; which ſpent it ſelf without waſte in the watches wherein it perſevered for our ſalvation. Others, following the Hebrew letter, inſtead of a waking Rod, reade a twig of an Almond-tree, which firſt of all other trees, flouriſheth, and expecteth not the ſummer to tell us news of the ſpring; So the eie of Jeſus, ſo ſoon as it began to exerciſe the functions of life, was ſeen all in bloſſome, and in an amorous aſpect for us: In bloſſome; when, at his arrival, he cauſed the Angels to ſing the Hymne of Glory, and Peace; of Glory to God, and of Peace to men: In bloſſome; when, at the age of twelve years he ſo ſweetly darted forth beams in the Temple of his father; In bloſſome; when, from the top of a mountain, he looked on his poor famiſhed people who wandred through the deſerts, as ſheep deprived of their ſhepheard: In bloſſome; when he ſtayed upon ſo many miſerable bodies, detained by incurable maladies, to give them health. O eie of Jeſus! Eie of the Nazarean! always flouriſhing and blown for the comfort of mortals.

The eie of Jeſus watchings, ſparkling, weeping.

He erat pernoctans in oratione Dei. Hier. 1. 11.

I ſay, in the ſecond place, this eie ſparkled when he was to give the example of zeal (which it behoved him him to have) the honour of his heavenly father; then it was when he was armed with tetrours and lightnings, to cast astonishment into wicked souls, and to deliver those from their Tyranny who thereby were oppressed: There was seen I know not what of glittering and flaming to sparkle from his eyes, and the Majesty of a Divinity did shine on his face, saith S. Jerome. Have you heretofore considered the Angel of the living God, who was as a sentinell, in the great flaming pillar of fire which led the Israelites in the passage of the red-sea? Have you observed, how (placed just in the midst of two armies, the one whereof was of the people of God, and the other of the Egyptians) he darted raies of favour on the heads of the elect, which were all lighted with a celestiall light, notwithstanding the thick darknesse of the Egyptian night, and at the same time he threw on Pharaohs Diadem and on his warlike horses the avenging dart of Gods anger, to involve them in remedilesse misery? So the eye of our Lord hath alwayes beheld (and at this day likewise doth lovingly behold) such as fear his holy name and do tremble out of the reverence they bear to his divine Majesty; but as for perverse souls, who have hands armed against heaven, he hath sparklings sharp and quick, which are the messengers of his justice. As for thee (Libertine) this sparkling eie, for thee (Harpy) for thee (bloudy Devil) for thee (wicked creature) it throws forth sparks of fire which in this life will begin to burn thy sinfull soul: but, as for souls (chaste and loyall) he hath sweet influences, and mercies. In the last place, I likewise say, to shew the benignity of this eye, that it was almost alwayes weeping, and dropping for us in tears a thousand times more precious then those of Myrrhe. O what tears were those of Jesus! Jesus was the firmament which divided waters from waters, heavenly tears from earthly tears. And seeing Interpreters say, that the masse of waters was divided into two substances, whereof the one, congealing into a bright Chrystall, made Heaven; and the other, remaining on the earth, made the Sea; I may say, the tears of Jesus were all Chrystalline, and wholly celestiall, as that Palace of God, which we see over our heads; but ours are salt, bitter, and storm like the sea. Jesus yet walking on the earth, was towards the wicked and proud, a mount Sinai, which roared, thundred, lightned, and seemed to be as the Charriot of the God of Hosts; but in respect the miseries of the earth, and the pains likewise which waited on sinners; he was a Mount Lebanon that ceased not to make the waters stream forth in the spring, which issued from the snows wherewith the winter had wholly covered it. Jesus the true Lebanon, in whiteneſse of innocency: Jesus the true Lebanon, in the continuall waters of his eyes, which can no more be dryed up then the fountains of Lebanon. Jesus also the true Lebanon, in the sweetnesse of the odours of his eternall sacrifice. He burnt as the incence of Lebanon, and dissolved as the snow of Lebanon; at the same time giving us fire and water; Fire to enkindle our love, water to wash our sinnes: O how these waters have quenched the flames of the sword of the Cherubin, able to burn all the earth with the fire of Justice! O how sweetly distilled these tears for us on the day of his birth, when he moistned the clots of his poverty! O how often have these tears bathed his eyes in the sacrifice of prayer! O how pitifully these tears bedewed the pomp of his triumph, when he wept over miserable Jerusalem! O how efficacious were these tears; when he offered them for us in the bloudy Sacrifice of the Crosse, and rendered up his sweet soul into the hands of his heavenly Father, bleeding and weeping, and looking this last time on the earth in his mortall conversation to lift it up to Heaven!

Ignoum quoddam, atque sydereum radiabat ex oculis ejus & divinitatis majestas lucebat in facie. S. Hier. in Mat.

Exod. 14. 20

Numquid deficiet de petra agri nix Libani. Hier. 18.

In diebus carnis suæ preces supplicationesque cum clamore valido et lachrymis offerens exauditus est pro sua reverentia. Heb 5. 7.

§ 7. A Detestation of Envie.

WIll we not then enter into the joy of God by participation of the joyes and prosperities of men, whence we shall take a holy and magnificent possession in the quiet we shall find in our hearts, perswading our selves that that saying is most true, That he who loveth virtues in another, hath them abundantly in himself? There is not any way more short or honourable to felicity, then to arrive thither by a contentment taken in the happinesse of our likes. In wishing their hurt we resemble the Thunderbolt, which to strike a rock, breaks the cloud that bred it; we ruine our selves by our proper labours, and profit not but by the Justice of our punishment. But by loving in another, that which others envie, we shall become absolutely rich, and totally powerfull in the kingdome of perfect love. Let us not satisfie our selves with not envying any, and to take pleasure in the good successe of good men; but let us have an eye of affections, a liberall hand, and a heart wide open to the exercise of charity, alwayes remembring two rare documents given by two great Apostles S. Peter and S. Bartholomew.

Multis abundat virtutibus qui, alienas amat Plin. jun. in epist. ad Cornel.

The first teacheth us that the virginity of the soul consisteth in brotherly love Rendring (saith he) your souls chaste in the obedience of charity, in the brotherly love which you ought mutually to preserve. The other hath in S. Denis, left us in writing this royall sentence, which saith, Love is the greatest, and least Theology, because all is abbreviated in this great word. Who is it then would enter into the Hell of Jealousie, to rob himself of all the joyes of chaste marriage, and to live like Ixion on the wheel of an eternall torment? Were it not much better, to tear away this frantick love, this troublesome curiosity, this easinesse to believe tales, this rashnesse of judgement, and all that which fomenteth passion; then to raise matter of Laughter, of Comedies, and Tragedies, to defile your conscience, betray your bed, dishonour your children, and ruine your house?

1 Pet. 1.

Dion. c. 1. de Myst. Theo. Ἀγάπη ὅτι μείζων καὶ θεολογία μία λέγεται.

Thou envious and jealous creature! what dost thou answer to this eye of our celestiall Father, which causeth by seeing, Essence and Grace, and by being seen produceth heaven? What dost thou answer to this eye of Jesus, waking, sparkling, and weeping for thee? Wilt thou yet have an eye of the Basilisk to scorch plants, break stones, and kill men? Ah thou pusillanimous thing! to be envious against thy neighbour for a good which thou hast not, and which thou with excessive passion desirest. Thou dost envie profit, thou envyest credit, honour, riches, and the talent of nature, and all which thy jealous heart beholdeth. Thou wilt not (saist thou) bereave others, but dost onely complain of the want thou findest in thy self. And how knowest thou whether these blessings (thou seekest for, with desires as ardent as fire) would not be great evils unto thee? How knowest thou whether in prosperity and abundance thou mightest not lose thy self with ingratitude, forgetfulnesse of God, arrogance, and sinne? How knowest thou whether the Saviour of the world hath not expresly deprived thee of these temporall favours, to assure thy predestination? Cease to envie, that, which God will not give thee. Ah! Thou on the other side, to be perpetually arguing with God about the prosperity of sinners and out of petty infidelities to waver in the belief of his holy Providence. Ignorant of celestiall blessings, and stupid admirer of the bread of dags! who seest not that all these favours are rough obligations, and rich punishments, which will rather increase the misery of the wicked: then lessen their pain. God promiseth thee a Kingdome if thou be faithfull; and thou longest for the dishes which sinners feed on at the table of the world, even tearing one another with a thousand torments, and as many disturbancies. And thou on the other side, wicked as thou art, not onely to envie the good of thy neighbour, but to desire, and work his hurt with impatient madnesse, one while biting his reputation, another while hindering his good; one while deliberately wishing his death & another while having direfull enterprises upon his life: what canst thou expect from this infernall passion, but an eternall damnation? Wouldest thou know whom thou art like? Behold (I pray) in histories the mount Etna which rends and throweth forth its all-inflamed entrails, as if it would scorch and consume the flowers, which in the mean time flourish upon its top. Thou ceasest not to cry out, to storm, to thunder against this man; Thou castest forth fire and flames from thy throat, with which it seems thou art resolved to vomit up thy heart infected with poyson. What getteſt thou with this brutish fury? This man whom thou wouldest swallow alive, by the permission of God shall flourish over thy head.

Joseph triumphant maugers the enraged envie of his brothers.

Let us go, let us go to seek in Judea for the cruell brothers of Joseph, and let us shew them the innocent, not any longer groaning under the weight of fetters, but born on the wings of glory, and mounted upon the chariot of Pharaoh, in a habit full of Majesty, and in a pomp which dazleth the eyes of those, who have now no other word in their mouthes but Abrech, Abrech, which was an acclamation of joy, by which the people acknowledged him, as the Father and Protectour of all Egypt, Abrech, Abrech. O wretches! know you this man? This is he, of whom you said, Behold our Lord, come let us kill him Gen. 37. 9.

Look well upon him; this is he, whom you inhumanely did despoil of his garments, to embrew them in the bloud of beasts, and represent them to your deplorable Father, to give him the stroke of death. Acknowledge your own bloud; this is he, whom you threw into the bottome of an old Cistern, and banqueted over his head. Detest your fury; This is he whom you did sell to the Amalekites! Behold what your envie hath brought him to! Bend your knee with all the people who adore him, and say, O caitif Envie, the Hang-man of the envious, mayst thou never find any habitation but in hell, whence thou first camest to trouble the peace of men.

Heavenly Father, I beseech thee by that Eye which createth heaven; and (thou word Incarnate) by that Eie which hath wept so many tears of compassion and love over us; banish this fury from our hearts, and make thy holy charities there to flourish, which shall by us for ever be as much adored, as they have been to mankind profitable, who hath no subsistence but in thy mercies.

The fourteenth Treatise, of MILDNESSE and COMPASSION.

§ 1. The great Miseries of Man make Compassion necessary in the world.

HEaven is repleniſhed with Sanctities, and Felicities; with sanctities without blemishes, with Felicities without disasters: and hell is filled with ordures, and miseries; Ordures, which never are washed off, miseries, which are without end. But this world wherein we live, as it hath sanctities which are not without hazard, and Felicities which cannot be without change: so it hath sinnes waited on by pardon, and miseries comforted by remedies; yet against iniquities God hath given us penance, and against calamities, mercy. God in heaven produceth another God, not in substance, but in person, and on earth a second image of himself, which is this divine mercy. It is an infinite goodnesse of the Father of Nature and grace, to have here below seated this excellent passion, to the end great maladies might not be without great medicines..

Deum extra se efficit, creaturis omnibus providendo. S. Maximus.

Man as he is the most miserable of all creatures, so he is the most mercifull.

Of all living creatures there is none more miserable then man, nor is there any likewise more mercifull then man, whileſt he is man, and that he despoil not himself of that which God hath made him to do that which ought never to be so much as thought on. And if he forget mildnesse and Compassion, which is naturall to him, our sovereign Creatour teacheth it him, by his own miseries. Alas! How can one man harden his heart one against another? on what side soever he look, he seeth the tokens of his infirmities; and scarce can he go a step but he finds a lesson of humility against his vanities. If he consider what is above him; he beholdeth the heavens and the air which so waste and change his life, that (yet) without them, he cannot live: If he cast his eye round about him, and under his feet; he sees waters, which in moistening him, rot him; and earth, which being spread as a Table before his eyes, fails not to serve him for a Tomb.

It is a strange thing that even evils are necessary for him, and that he cannot overslip things which kill him. Smelling, tasting, meat and drink, sleep and repose, do with his life what Penelope did with her web: what one houre makes, another unmakes; and the very sources of the greatest blessings are found to be wholly infected with mortall poyson. But if man come to examine himself; he finds he hath a body frail, naked, disarmed, begging of all creatures, exposed to all the injuries of elements, of beasts, and men; and there is not a hand so little, which strives not violently to pull off his skin. Heat, cold, drouth, moisture, labour, maladies, old age, exercise him: and if he think to take a little repose, idlenesse corrupteth him: If he enter farther in to himself; he meeteth a spirit fastned to the brink of his lips, which is invaded by an army of passions, so many times fleshed for his ruine. And yet we must truly say that of all the evils of man, there is not any worse, then man. It is he who causeth wars and shipwracks, murthers and poysons; he who burneth houses, and whole Cities; he who maketh Wildernesses of the most flourishing Provinces; he who demolisheth the foundations of the most famous buildings; he who reduceth the greatest riches to nakednesse; he who putteth Princes into fetters, who exposeth Ladies to dishonour, who thrusts the knife into the throats of the people, who not content with so many manner of deaths, daily inventeth new to force out a soul by the violence of torments, by as many bloudy gates, as it receiveth wounds. Good God! what doth not man against man, when he hath once renounced humanity? Now what remedy would there be in so great and horrible confusions which make a hell of the earth, were it not that God hath given us this wholesome mercy, which it seems is come from heaven to unloose our chains, to wipe away our tears, to sweeten our acerbities, repair our losses and rebeautifie our felicities! Mercy tilleth the fields of heaven, and had it not descended on earth, all which God did, had been lost. (saith the golden mouth of the West.)

Man hath no greater evil then Man.

Chry. l. 1. 4. so

§ 2.

§ 2. The Eſſence of Compaſſion and how it findeth place in hearts the moſt generous.

The Eſſence of this paſſion.

GOd (then) hath cauſed Compaſſion to grow in our hearts as a Celeſtiall inſpiration, which ſtirreth up the will to ſuccour the miſeries of another; and taketh its ſource (as Theology obſerveth) from a diſlike we conceive out of the conſideration of a certain diſſent and diſorder we ſee in a civil life, when we behold a man like unto us according to nature, ſo different in quality, and ſo ill handled by the miſhap of the accidents of life. Thence it comes to paſſe that all good ſouls have tender hearts, and eſpecially ſuch as know what worldly miſeries are (as learned men, and thoſe who have had experience of them) and who think they may alſo feel them in the uncertainty of life and condition of humane things. The bowels of mercy open with ſome ſweetneſſe in the evils which nearly touch us: namely, when we ſee perſons innocently qualified, delicate, well diſpoſed; to fall into great calamities and ruines of fortune; Honourable old men, ill uſed; young people, ſnatched away in the flower of their age, and beauty; Ladies, deſpiſed and diſhonoured; afflictions, without remedies; or remedies that come too late when the evil is ended: And moreover, when thoſe afflicted perſons ſhew conſtancy and generoſity in their affliction, it penetrateth into the deepeſt apprehenſions of the ſoul. Yet we ſtill find, among ſo many objects of miſeries, hearts which have no compaſſion, and (as if they were made of rocks or anviles) are never mollified with the ſufferings of mortals. This proceeds in ſome, from a great ſtupidity, from a nature very ſavage; in others, from a narrowneſſe of heart cauſed by ſelf-love, which perpetually keeps them buſied within themſelves, never going forth to behold the miſeries of another; in ſome, from long proſperities, which make them forget the condition of men; in others, from the nature of a Hangman who takes delight in bloud, in fire, and in all horrid things. Such kind of men think nature did them wrong in not having given them the horn of a Rhinoceros, the paws of bears, the throat of a Lion, the teeth of Tigers, to cruſh, to quail, to devour, and tear men in pieces. They ſupply, by a curſed induſtry, that which by nature faileth them. They make themſelves mouths of fire by the means of flaming fornaces, and boiling caldrons; hands, by the invention of Iron hooks; arms, with combs of ſteel; fingers, with ſcorpions; and feet, with the claws of wild beaſts. You would ſay, theſe are men compoſed of the inſtruments of all torments, or rather devils crept into humane bodies, to create a Hell on Earth. Such are thoſe Tonoes of Japonia, who ſtudy to ſaw, to hack aſunder, to beat, and bray in a morter the courage of Chriſtians, thinking the greateſt marks of their power to be ſcaffolds and gibbets, where are practiſed inventions of devils, to draw life, drop after drop, out of a miſerable body.

Deteſtation of Cruelty.

But not ſpeaking at this preſent of theſe extremities of Cruelty which ariſe out of Hell; it is evident that the Hardneſſe of heart, and the harſhneſſe of a nature devoid of Compaſſion, is a monſter in humane nature. All great ſouls have (I know not what) tincture of goodneſſe which rendreth them pliant to the afflictions of ſuch as ſuffer. It is a feeling which God hath poured into the maſſe of mankind, and which he would have communicated by the prime men of the world, to all poſterity. The tradition of the Hebrews holdeth that the Patriarch Noah recommendeth mildneſſe even among beaſts, accounting it a capitall crime to tear off a member of a living beaſt. And the moſt ſage commonwealths have walked in the ſame wayes, ſince that of Athens condemned to death a young child, who took delight to prick out the eyes of crows, and having made them blind, let them fly for his paſtime: It judged this heart was baſe and bloudy, and practiſed its firſt apprentiſhip of crueltie upon birds to exerciſe it one day upon men. The Carthaginians publickly condemned a very induſtrious Citizen for no other cauſe but for having made a lion tractable, ſuppoſing that a man who had ſo great converſation among wild beaſts would loſe all he had humane in him, and put on the manners of a tyrant.

Mildneſſe of the firſt men.

Fab. Quintilian. l. 5. cap. 9.

Plin. l. 8. c. 16.

What can thoſe anſwer to this call of Nature, who are aſhamed to compaſſionate their neighbours, ſeeing pity extends it ſelf even to beaſts? They fear, that by ſhewing compaſſion it may be thought their courage thereby is greatly effeminate; and ſee not that to ſeem valiant, they ceaſe to be men.

Compaſſion of great courages.

Conquerours have wept over their Laurels as yet all verdant, blaming the juſt rigour of their arms albeit they could not hate the glory. Marcellus deſired to quench the coals of the city Syracuſa with his tears. Titus ſeeing the city of Jeruſalem all covered with dead bodies, found his heart much ſoftned therewith, proteſting it was an act of Heaven, and not an effect of his own diſpoſition. There is ſome touch of Divinity in good natures; and God hath alwayes been pleaſed that they who neareſt approach to him, ſhould be the moſt humane. The firſt Images of the Saviour of the world were ordinarily painted in the form of a Lamb, and it was likewiſe a Lamb of God which repreſented him in Great Conſtantine's Font, and which poured forth the water of Baptiſm; to ſhew us that the fountains of his Bounty ran throughout the whole Church. The holy Ghoſt hath never been ſeen in the form of an Eagle or of a Hawk, but of a Dove; to ſtamp on our manners the impreſſions of his bounty. It is an inſupportable thing, when there is obſerved (even among thoſe who approach neareſt to Altars, and who conſecrate the Lamb of God in their hands) ſome to be of imperious ſpirits, and wills inflexible, who torment poor ſubjects, and make them groan under their Commands. They reſemble Semiramis who on her Banners bare a Dove which in its beak held a bloudy ſword, as meaning to ſay, that under a womans face, ſhe had the courage and ſtern violence of tyrants. So their name, their character, and degree teſtifieth nought but mildneſſe; but their manners are full of rigour and acerbity which wound hearts even to bloud. This happeneth to many out of a certain ſtupidity, in ſuch ſort, that it ſeems they entering into office, at that inſtant drink of the water of forgetfulneſſe which in them blotteth out the memory of all they were, to become that which they ought never to be. They forget their inferiours are men, who put their precious liberty (to wit a good ineſtimable) into their hands as a pledge, and that they muſt very skilfully handle them, there being not a creature in all nature more tender or more ſenſible then the King of creatures. They conſider not that the power of one man over another is a thing which is alwayes ſomewhat ſuſpected by nature on what ſide ſoever it come, and that it muſt be practiſed inſenſibly, ſo that the fleſh be rather caſt into a ſlumber, then irritated. To others, it comes from a moſt refined pride, which being under the ſubjection of a ſuperiour, kept it ſelf cloſe in the interiour of the ſoul, a ſerpent enchanted, and faſt aſleep; but ſo ſoon as he ſees himſelf armed with a ſword of authority, he cuts with both edges, not ſparing any one, as if the great myſtery of making a dignity valuable, were to encompaſſe it with all the enſignes of terrour. Some are not of a bad nature, and do reſemble the ſea, which is not by nature ſalt, but the ſunne ſtirreth up unto it vapours, cold, dry, and terreſtriall, which being burnt by Concil. 6. in Trul. can. 82. Damaſus in Pontificibus qui eſt potius Anaſtaſius Bibliothecarius.

Non dominantes in Cleris ſed forma factiq; gregis ex animo. 1 Pet. 5. 3.

Revertamur ad populum noſtrum à facie gladii columbæ Hier. 46. 16

Rigour miſbecometh perſons Eccleſiaſticall. Its cauſes, and difference.

Porta in Chao.

heat, ſpread themſelves on the ſuperficies of the water, and cauſe ſaltneſſe: ſo theſe lights of authority which environ a man raiſe ſmokes in him, which, being not wel tempered by prudence, leave a bitter impreſſion on manners, communicating ſome haughtineſſe to words and converſation. It is gotten in others by a long aſſiduity of ſuperiority, which is the cauſe that beholding themſelves perpetually with a head of gold, and a breaſt of ſilver, they conſider not that being in ſome ſort like to Nabuchodonozors ſtatue, they yet have feet of clay. Others come thereunto, by an indiſcreet zeal, and out of ſmall experience of humane things, who are no ſooner raiſed unto ſome degree, but they talk of reformation, of correction, of chaſtiſements; and to ſee them, you would ſay they were ſo many Archimedes who ſeek for a place out of the world, to ſet foot in, of purpoſe to turn the world topſie-turvey. Their power is not alwayes anſwerable to their purpoſe, which makes them ſad and dejected in their courage, cauſing them to fall back to the other extremity; from whence it cometh that they are one while harſh, and another time gentle; and by inequality in their manners, thruſt all into diſorder. That is it which Saint Gregory the great obſerved in Abbot Urbicus, ſaying, that his Monaſtery was in diſtemper, becauſe he made himſelf unequall, one while flattering ſome, and another while reprehending the reſt with immeaſurable anger. Laſtly, there are others who have a very good conſcience, and whoſe manners are rigid, and they be not imprudent; but they have ſuch a deſire to frame the whole world to their humour, that out of the aſſiduity of their admonitions they render themſelves ſomewhat burthenſome to their inferiours, and authorize the ſaying of that ancient who affirmed an honeſt man was a great burthen. There are natures, like to Caper-ſhrubs, which grow worſe by too much manuring, and are much better being left to the goodneſſe of their own nature.

Gregor. M. in epiſtola ad Urbicum.

Moleſta ſarcina vir bonus. Apud Joan. Euſebium.

§ 3. Moderate Severity is neceſſary in government; but it ought to be free from Cruelty.

IT muſt of neceſſity be acknowledged that they who govern States and Commonwealths ſtand in need of ſeverity in ſo great a corruption of mens manners; there being almoſt nothing ſo pitifull as the goodneſſe of a Prince diſarmed, who ſerves for a Butt to reproches, and a ſport for inſolency. The Senatour Fronton, who had experience of many Kingdomes, ſaid it was a miſerable kind of life to live under an Emperour who permitted nothing; but much more wretched likewiſe was the eſtate of ſuch as live under a Prince who permitted all: as it happened in the time of Nerva, who cauſed thoſe men to ſit near him that had conſpired againſt him, and preſented them ſwords to give the blow, and asked them whether they were ſharp enough. His over-faint goodneſſe, which could not engage it ſelf to puniſh any, made men almoſt to deſire the rule of the moſt cruell; good men being unable to endure to be equalized with the moſt diſſolute. Needs muſt Juſtice hold its place, to cut off rotten members, to repreſſe the inſolent, and to make honeſt men live in the ſweetneſſe of repoſe. But it being very hard to find this divine temperature which is between ſofneſſe and too much ſeverity; it is alwayes farre better to lean towards Mildneſſe, then to incurre the leaſt ſuſpition of Cruelty.

Dion. in Nerva.

Cardinall Petrus Damianus, ſeeing himſelf one day very civilly entreated by the Pope, and at the ſame time menaced by his Archdeacon Hildebrand who was a moſt ſevere Cardinall, anſwered according to Plutarchs fable, that Heat deſpoiled more then the North-wind. Theſe ſtormy ſpirits are not alwayes the moſt efficacious. It is not ſparkling flames, but inviſible heats which melt metals, and ſweeteſt influences are thoſe which cauſe the greateſt effects in totall Nature. Our Saviour, in the Prophet Eſay, is called a Rod, and a flower; to correct ſome, and comfort others: but never is he termed a ſword to kill and deſtroy. Power, which is given by God, ought to be managed according to his intentions; and as we cannot but ſee on all ſides the effects of his bounty; ſo is it not lawfull for a man to defile the Character of the Divinity by rigours inſupportable. O what a brave thing it is to poſſeſſe a great Kingdome in the hearts of men by bounty and munificence! to make ones ſelf a Throne of peace, to which love raiſeth an eternall Baſis, on which God raineth from above with full hand an infinity of Benedictions! A Prince which ſo liveth, findeth Corps du gard in the moſt unfrequented wilderneſſes, aſſurance in perils, protection in battels, good hap in affairs, ſucceſſe in his enterpriſes, proſperity in his houſe, veneration abroad, & admiration among forreign nations. When he ſleeps, a million of eyes wake for him; a million of mouths open at altars to carry thanksgivings to God for the favours he receiveth from heaven: and were he not in his Throne, all his ſubjects would make ſteps of their bodies for him to mount up unto it. His joyes are pure, his pleaſures innocent, his repaſts without fear of poyſon, his repoſe dreadleſſe, his life a miracle, and his Memory a Bleſſing. But, what a ſpectacle is it to ſee Tyrants cloſe hidden like old Owls in perpetuall nights; with a mind beſet with horrid fantaſies, filled with ſuſpicions, ſeized by diſtruſt; for whom Thunders ſeem to roar, and for whom Heaven ſeems to prepare all its Thunderbolts! What a horrour is it to ſee them come in publick, clothed with Iron, and deſpoiled of the peoples affections! To ſee them tear their members in the torments of their ſubjects; to ſuck in bloud; to break bones; to make terrours to march before them; and after them maſſacres! What honour is it for them to be hated like plagues and poyſons; to make a Hell of their life a Fyranny of their manners, and a publick vow of their death? Laſtly, the divine Providence (which ſharpneth the ſword of Juſtice with the tears of the miſerable) falls on their heads; ſome have been conſumed by ſtrange maladies; others have been abandoned to the fury of people; maſſacred by a thouſand hands, puniſhed with a thouſand deaths, dragged over lay ſtalls, buried in dunghils; even ſtones and metals have been puniſhed, which had no other crime but to be inſculped with their features: Their life had been a reproch; their memory, the But of all maledictions. All this is not of power to teach us, that there is not any thing ſo ſoveraign for the government of minds, as Mildneſſe and Compaſſion.

Iſai. 11.

The beauty, and utility of Mildneſſe.

Horrour of Cruelty.

§ 8. The goodneſſe of God beateth down the rigour of men.

IF we be not fully convinced of this verity; Let us behold our firſt Model, againſt the infamy of this unnaturall paſſion; and let us firſt ſee the benignity of our heavenly Father in naturall, and civil life; thence we will conſider the mercy of Jeſus in the life of Grace. God, is ſoveraignly good, as Theology noteth, by three ſorts of Goodneſſes; of Nature, of Manners, and of Bounty: His Nature, and his Manners make him to appear good in himſelf: His bounty out of himſelf in ſo many communications as he imparteth to all Creatures. The Platoniſts ſaid, he had the underſtanding of a father, and the heart of a mother, to provide for the great family of the world: and one of them, rapt with the Conſideration of his Bounties, cried out, As for Remedies.

Lib. 1. ep. 16

for thee, O God of ſanctity, Saviour, and conſervatour of all Man-kind, thou haſt the heart of a Mother admirably to comfort the calamities of ſo many miſerable mortals, and there is not a day, a Reſt, nor a moment, which is not repleniſhed with thy benefits. You would ſay he is perpetually bent upon the care of the very leaſt creatures, to give them the contentment and ſatisfaction they can derive from their condition. He is in the feathers of the peacock, to frame a mirrour unto himſelf of his train; In the throat of Nightingales, there to make Muſick; in the innocent theft of Bees, to lade them with booty; in the Husbandry of Ants, to maintain them in their little Granaries. The Authour of the Egyptian Theology ſaith, that the Eternall Father, willing to pleaſe all living Creatures gave them bodies faſhioned to their likings and inclinations: and as there are other inſtruments neceſſary for a Taylour, others, for a Smith: So he hath given other members to Lions; others, to Bulls; others, to Fiſhes, and Birds. He gives to a Lion (which is a predominant Beaſt) a Robuſtuous body, Eyes of lightning, a Roar of Thunder, a Gate Haughty; To Bulls, Horns to defend themſelves; To Birds, a little head and a ſharp beak to cleave the air, feathers to cover them, wings to fly; To Fiſhes, a tail to ſerve them for a Rudder, and little fins to be unto them as Oars.

Tu quidem ſancte, & humani generis ſo-ſpitator perpetue, ſemper fovendis mortalibus mirificè dulcem matris affectionem miſerorum caſibus tribuis, nec dies nec quies ulla, ac nè quidem momentum tuis tranſcurrit beneficiis otioſum. Apul. 11. Metamor. Author. Theolog. Ægypti l. 12 cap. 1.

S. Baſil likewiſe obſerved, that this great Father of a family diſtributeth to birds of prey a body fit to ſeek out for their living, and to ſuch as are of a more peaceable diſpoſition, members ſuteable to their nature. So true it is that there is nothing in the world which is not repleniſhed with the wiſdome of this great Maſter-workman. He provideth and armeth each one according to his Kind; Some have naturall arms to reſiſt ſuch as aſſail them; others have a marvellous promptitude to fly from that which is contrary to them; others have an incomparable dexterity to defend themſelves; ſome poiſe themſelves in the air with their feathers; others grapple with their claws; others fortifie themſelves with their horns: and if there be ſome which ſerve as a prey to the reſt; God ſupplyeth this neceſſity with a very great fruitfulneſſe which he affordeth thoſe poor little creatures expoſed to the violence of the ſtronger. Thus diſcourſeth Lactantius. To conclude, There is not any creature ſo little which beareth not his own Mill, his chimney, his habit, his ware, and his ſhop about him: and, if this paternall bounty continually open its hands to repleniſh all creatures with benedictions; what would it not do for man who ſo divinely and ſo happily buſieth the divine providence, and is the rule of all the reſt of the world!

S. Baſil. in Hexam. Lactant. l. de opificio Dei, c. 2.

It were to enter into a vaſt Labyrinth of diſcourſes and reaſons, to repreſent at this time before our eyes, how this eternall underſtanding maketh infinite many engines to concurre in all the creatures of this great univerſe; to contribute to our benefit, our protection, and delight. I will onely expreſſe one thing very conſiderable which he powerfully doth above the ordinary nature of elements, to divert the inconveniencies of people, and to afford them favours beyond all humane hopes. Behold how under the torrid zone (which would otherwiſe be inhabitable, by reaſon of exceſſive heats) he cauſeth rain to fall ſo commodiouſly, that he ſeems to diſtill it through a Limbeck in rule and meaſure! Behold, how in Egypt, (when the Pharaohs covered the land with arms and chariots againſt his people,) he made Nilus moſt gently to overflow to ſupply the want of rain, which (as it is ſaid) never falls in that countrey! We will alſo tell you what modern writers have obſerved in certain Iſlands, where there are neither rivers nor fountains for the uſe of the living; God gives them certain trees which (at a time determinate by his Providence) fail not to ſprinkle down water with ſo much advantage, that the thirſt of man and beaſt thereby is ſufficiently ſlaked: Who is he that conſidering all theſe works of nature will not cry out that God really is (what S. Iſiodore of Pelenſium ſaid) the common Magazine of all the people of the earth; from whence they inceſſantly derive an infinite number of liberalities, & the true Temple of ſweetneſs and benignity wherein altars are perpetually covered with victimes!

Iſiodor. l. 2. ep. 151. Ταμεῖον φιλανθρωπίας. &c.

What doth he not in civil life; to make men live in peace, abundance and tranquility! what good Laws inſpireth he not into them! what laudable inſtructions ſuggeſteth he not, even to people adverſe to his honour! what induſtries, and what inventions in all acts! what conveniencies in trade! what authority imprinteth he on the face of Kings and Magiſtrates! what obedience he cauſeth inſenſibly to creep into the hearts of people, ſo that bloudſuckers, and murderers do alſo adore ſome rayes of Juſtice! And foraſmuch as he permitteth poor and miſerable creatures in the world, (which ſeems to have ſome repugnance with his bounty;) we ſee by experience, it is ſo neceſſary that we may ſay of them what the glorious Hanna did in her Canticle, The poor of the Earth belong to God, and he hath laid the whole univerſe on their ſhoulders: without them; arts would fail, induſtries would languiſh, the ſervices and benefits (which the rich derive from men who are their likes) would wholly ceaſe; and, which is more; the two moſt eminent virtues of the world (Mercy and Patience) would be baniſhed from the earth. Beſides, God hath an incomparable care of thoſe neceſſitous people whom we think to be wholly abandoned. He hath numbred their hairs, he hath taken the task to preſerve all their bones, he moiſtneth the dry bread of peaſants in taſteſull ſweetneſſe, he diverteth them from the apprehenſion of their miſeries, he fitteth them to their conditions, he comforteth their labours, he crowneth their patience. Laſtly, to expreſſe the tenderneſſe of Gods mercy in a word; there is not ſo much as our own tears from whence he doth not make us to draw ſweetneſſe and conſolation, for our ſolace. O ineffable Bounty! O greatneſſe unheard of! O inexhauſtible liberality! And can we then beholding this model have a heart ſhut up againſt all manner of liberality? what a horrour is it to ſee men burn with enraged avarice which ſticks to their bones as doth their marrow, and which ſhall ſleep with them in their Tomb!

§ 5. The Mercies of the Incarnate word are able to ſoften the harſheſt hearts.

But with what admiration is not the heart of man ſeized on, when he entreth into the great Abyſſes which are diſcovered in the ſecond modell, in the Oeconomy of our Redemption?

Have we any proof more manifeſt then that which is ſo well weighed by S. Anſelm in theſe words? What greater mercy can there be then to ſee a humane nature deſpoiled of the robe of honour and of the diadem of glory, by a juſt chaſtiſement of its rebellions, condemned to a priſon of flames and darkneſſe, even then when it was unable to free it ſelf, and when there was neither Angel nor man could deliver it from the miſery, whereinto it was plunged? to ſee it (ſay I) ſought unto by God when it flew from his liberality, and to conſider how the heavenly Father tranſported with unſpeakable love, ſaid unto it, Take my onely Son to redeem thee from ſo many remedileſſe calamities, and that this onely ſonne diſdaineth not to become its ranſome, delivered himſelf for it to torments ſo enormous, and confuſions ſo hideous.

Quid miſericordius intelligivalet, quam quod peccatori æternis tormentis depuncto, & unde ſe redimeret non habenti, Deus patet dixit, accipe unguentum meum, & da pro te, & filius dixit, tolle me & redime te? Anſel. l. Cur Deus homo.

The earth (ſaith S. Auguſtine) expecteth light and rain from heaven, and we from a Meſſias expect truth and mercy: He came after so long expectations, and hath repleniſhed the earth with his knowledge, and the effects of his benignity. What ſhall we now admire in the ineffable myſtery of the Incarnation!

and

If we caſt our eyes on the heavenly Father, we there ſee a work of the power of his arm, wherein he ſeems to have exhauſted all his ſtrength. The heavens, and the ſtarres (ſaith Saint Gregory Nyſſen) were but the works of the fingers of this divine Majeſty: But in the Incarnation he proceedeth with all the extent of his might, with all the engines of his power, and all the miracles of his Greatneſſe. It is a Maxime among Politicians, that a man, to appear very great, ſhould not waſte all his force at an inſtant; but ſtill to reſerve to himſelf ſomewhat to do, wherein he may make his ability to be ſeen, as it were by degrees, by daily ſurpaſſing himſelf. From whence it came that Seneca ſaid to Nero who had cauſed a certain Pavillion infinitely precious to be made, that he therein had ſhewed his weakneſſe; for if it ſhould chance to periſh, he could not recover it: and were it preſerved, it would be an everlaſting reproch to him, to have done to the uttermoſt of his power. Behold the proceedings of humane prudence. But our celeſtiall Father ſetting aſide all other conſiderations (and forgetting his greatneſſe, to be mindfull of his mercy) did a work in our behalf which hath ſo limited his power that we may truly ſay, that God cannot in the world in all Eternity make any thing greater then a Man-God.

Plutarch. de Ira.

And if we on the other part do reflect on the holy Ghoſt, it ſeems that this third perſon (which in the ſphere of the Trinity had a myſterious barrenneſſe) ſpringing from the incomparability of a new production in the divine emanations, would make recompenſe in this myſtery, pouring out at once, heats, lights, and beauties in the bleſſed Virgin, there to form the body of Jeſus Chriſt, and to raiſe his holy Humanity to the union of the Word Increate. But what piece meriteth more admiration, then to ſee the perſon of a God-man, then to ſee a Jeſus Chriſt, who in himſelf uniteth Divine and Humane Nature, who carries in himſelf the laſt lines of the love and power of his Father, who beareth the conſummation of all his deſignes for the government of man, who includeth all poſſible communications to an inferiour nature in one inimitable communication, who makes himſelf the ſource of Grace and Glory in Angelicall and humane nature, as he is the ſource of life and love in the Trinity! O what a goodly ſpectacle is it, To behold how he bleſſeth by his preſence, how he repleniſheth by his greatneſſe, how he governeth by his power, how he ſanctifieth by his influences, both heaven and Earth! If we yet doubt of his love and fatherly goodneſſe; let us look on his hands, and we ſhall ſee that he hath written our name with his nails: Let us ſee his heart which was opened for us by that lance which at the latter end of his dayes digg'd from out his entrails the remainder of his life; and we ſhall obſerve how we therein live, how we therein breathe, and how we therein honourably burn, as in a great fornace common to all intelligible Nature. If you would know what you have coſt (and happily do not believe your Creatour) aſk your Redeemer and he will tell you. Let us alſo behold the effects which have ſucceeded from the alliance of the Divine nature with the Humane; and let us reverence the divine Goodneſſe which hath raiſed up all the great Maſſe of men in a ſupernaturall Being, to innocency, to felicity, to light, and to life eternall. Who was more deſtitute then Man, more brutiſh, and more ignorant in ſo great a night and in ſo horrible confuſions of Idolatry? and Jeſus by his Incarnation hath revealed unto us the ſecrets and wiſdome of heaven. Who was more unfurniſhed of wiſe direction? and he affordeth us his examples. Who was more forlorn? & he adopteth us for his children. Who was more needy? and he gives us the treaſure of his merits. Who was more hungry? and he nouriſheth us with his fleſh and bloud. Who was more unhappy? and he divideth his Beatitude among us. If after ſo many benefits we remain ſtill faithleſſe to his fidelity; he expecteth us with a ſingular long forbearance: if we delay; he ſtirreth us up: if we fly; he followeth us: if we return; he ſtretcheth forth his arm. He waſheth us in his bloud; He regenerateth us in his love: He makes it his trophey to have conquered us, as if he entred afreſh into the poſſeſſion of an Empire, & cauſeth our proper ſinnes to contribute to our glory. If we endure ſomewhat for him; he endureth with us; he weepeth over us; he prepareth eternall ſources of conſolations: and, as it is ſaid that there is a certain fiſh which ſweetens the water of the ſalt ſea in its mouth; ſo Jeſus mingleth all our acerbities in the inexplicable ſweetneſſes of his benignity.

Quàm pretioſas ſis factori tuo non credis, interroga redemptorem Euseb Gal. Homil. 2. de Symbol.

Faſten apud Maiolum.

And yet thou (O Man) wilt in preſence of this Modell ſtill remain a little Tiger, as irreconcileable to amities, as ſtreight-handed to works of liberality. Believe me, among all the Enſignes of Greatneſſe which thou canſt have; there is not any more ſenſible then the charitable communication of one man to another by waies of liberality and alms, which God receiveth in the nature of victimes. It is a Divinity for one man by his benefits to oblige another, and this is properly the way of eternall glory.

The ſource of charity.

Plin l. 2. c. 7 Deus eſt, mortali benefacere mortalem, & hæc ad æternam gloriam via.

Who are they, in your opinion, that firſt of all deſerved the title of Cardinall, which is now-a-dayes accounted among the great dignities of the Church? Do you think that nobility of extraction, favour of great ones, Eminency of wiſdome, prudence in the government of Empires gave theſe Titles to the primitive Church? I ſay all theſe qualities are very conſiderable; yet nevertheleſſe it is true, that the firſt fourteen Cardinals who were called by this name, were fourteen perſonages of honour and merit, who under Pope Sylveſter were ranged in as many ſtreets of the City of Rome, to take care of the poor. So true it is that they who begat us to Chriſtianity placed the magnificence of men, not in garments which are the food of moths: not in precious ſtones which are the excrements of the ſea and land: not in Coaches and horſes which are the notes of our poverty and dependence: not in titles which are Imaginary felicities: but in the relief of perſons neceſſitous who are the Images of God. A learned Biſhop ſaid to a Pope, He deceives himſelf who thinks that a conſcience ſo near to the Divinity is tyed to its Intereſts; For my part I imagine you do not believe there is any other gain for you, but that which takes birth from your liberality, and that you think you receive good, as oftentimes as you do it.

From whence the Title of Cardinals cometh.

Fabianus. Vide Concil. Rom. ſub Sylveſtro. Laeerdam. adverſar. c. 35. Cardinales à Cardinibus ſeu vicis Romæ.

Errat qui Deo proximam conſcientiam credit commodis invitari: ſola puratis lucra, quæ vobis de liberalitate naſcuntur qui divitias cum tributis accipitis. Innoc. l. 1. Ep. ad Symmachum Papam.

But if there be no ſpurre of honour which inciteth you to proceed confidently, and liberally to open your hands to men, to enter into the communication of the virtue and glory of ſo many Saints; at the leaſt ſoften your bowels from the neceſſity of times, and the calamities of ſo many poor people who ſeem to be the dregs of the earth, or froth of an inraged ſea. Inform your ſelf a little of the wants of Cities and Towns, and you ſhall find many (abandoned of all conſolation, and deſtitute of all neceſſaries) who yet are your fleſh, your brethren, and your coheirs in Jeſus Chriſt: and now, whilſt all ſmileth in your houſes, and all is reſplendent with a luſtre of fair accommodation in your own perſons; there are poor old men couched on ſtraw among copwebs; there are women afflicted with long and irkſome maladies, environed with very many children whom they ſee dying before their eyes, not having any means to give them a bit of bread.

They

They are forſaken by kindred, friends, and all manner of aſſiſtance, as if they were ſome monſters of nature thrown on the ſhore by the ſeas anger. There are Virgins for whom daily ſnares are laid, that they may fall into ſin under colour of poverty. There are ſome who have been heretofore very fortunate according to the world, who are faln into great wants, and at this preſent (when they have ſo many tears to bewail their miſery under the covert of ſome poor cottage) have not a tongue to complain; for having loſt all, they yet retain ſhame which tieth the hands of their poverty, and hindereth them from ſtretching them out to the cruel rich, from whom they expect nothing but deniall. Know we not, how in certain places men many times have run up and down the ſtreets armed with fury and rage for bread, and have ſnatched (as it were) out of bloud and flames a nouriſhment worſe then death? Know we not, there are many who have been divers dayes without bread? And how often have others eaten ſuch as they were fain to ſhut their eyes when they put it in their mouths? Are we ignorant, that certain mothers have proſtituted their daughters out of a curſed and vitious conſtraint to help their miſeries? Their hands peradventure had been more mercifull, if they had hewed them in pieces before they ſacrificed them to diſhonour; but, behold whither the tyranny of Avarice and Prodigality have tranſported the affairs of Chriſtendome! What rock would not be mollified among ſo many direfull objects? What eye of ice would not melt amidſt ſuch ſpectacles of diſaſtres? Will you not then in your houſes eſtabliſh the ſacrifice of Mercy, which God would have to be perpetuall? Will you not conſider what you may do without much prejudicing your revenues? Will you expect death to do good, and to make your torch to be carried after you? They who have renounced Faith, Truth, and light (I mean Hereticks) have not renounced mercy: they exhauſt themſelves for their faction, and many times do acts of liberality to ours, who help the poor. But what ſay I? Hereticks? The Turks in their ſalvage life give the Tenth part of their goods to the poor. There are ſome who build fountains, and pay men wages to give drink to paſſengers; and ſome thereto add camels to carry their ſardels. Will it not be a great honour to you at the day of judgement, if perſiſting in this inhumanity, you ſee your ſelf worſe then the Infidels, and that the Character of Chriſtianity hath ſerved you for no other purpoſe, but to reproch you in the eternity of your pains with the exorbitance of your Infamy? Good God, divert this miſery from thy ſervants: and ſince thou ſo freely haſt opened thy heart unto them; Let them never ſhut up the bowels of their Compaſſion againſt thy brethren who are the poor.

FINIS.

HISTORICALL OBSERVATIONS

Upon the Four Principall

PASSIONS,

VVhich are as Four DEVILS, Disturbers

OF THE HOLY COURT.

Printed, M. DC. L.

To the Reader.

Dear Reader,

I Here find that which Job, the first Writer of the world, saith that our thoughts are as the Branches of our soul which multiply and extend as farre as their Root giveth them vigour and nutriment. You see, the affection you have shewed to these Books of the Holy Court, hath served for vitall humours to my wit; to produce many discourses; and with much labour, to undertake that which I supposed to be profitable and satisfactory for you, which I have ever more esteemed then my own repose.

When I thought I was at the end of my design, you have caused me to set forth a fourth Tome, wherein I conceive I have comprized all the secrets of humane life in the moderation of Passions. It would here have been fit for me to end, were it not that some Lords and Ladies, who make up a part of this innocent Court by the good example of their lives, are not fully satisfied unlesse I afford them Histories. This then hath moved me, to crown these Treatises with most select Historicall Observations, to expose to view the disorder which ill rectified Passions introduce, and the profits they bring when they are ranged under the laws of discretion. I meant expresly to have drawn them almost all out of our own History, for two reasons; whereof the one is, That the Passions of Infidels of Antiquity, and even those of many other Christian Nations have passages too full of horrour and brutishnesse: But ours, albeit they have extravagancies inconsiderate enough, are more within limits ordinary to nature corrupted by sinne. The second is, that writing this to the Court of France, I propose to my self I should more efficaciously perswade by domestick Examples which are partly already known to our Countrey-men, then by forreign and unheard of Histories.

Now all Passions of the Court relate to four Principall, which are Love; Desire of Honours and Pleasures of the world; Anger alwayes animated to Revenge; and Envy which draggeth along with it the black Passions of Jealousie, Sadnesse, and Despair: I will content my self to pursue these Tracts, scoring out unto you the disastres of such as have yielded to these Motives, and the felicity of others who have gloriously surmounted them; And to add a pleasing variety to this last piece, I will conclude with many short and remarkable Examples suited to those four mentioned Passions.

THE DISASTERS OF SUCH

As have yielded to the Pasion

OF LOVE.

AND

The Glory of Souls, which have overcome it.

1. LEt us begin with that Passion which is the Source of the rest, and which in all times hath caused trouble among men, to give a ground to our discourse. The children of great Clodoveus, became not so soon tractable to the severity of Christian manners, but suffered themselves very often to be transported with very violent exorbitancies, and particularly with unlawful loves; which caused ill example in their house, and great disorder throughout their Kingdome.

Gregory of Tours l. 4.

Gregory of Tours observeth sordid and shamefull affections in the person of King Caribert grand-child of Clodoveus, which cast an Eclipse upon the lights of the Diademe of this great King, and could never be rooted out but by patience, by prayers, and by the effects of the puissant hand of God.

The plot of Queen Ingobergua to cure her husbands passion, succeedeth ill out of too much affectation.

Queen Ingobergua, who knew the humours of her husband to be addicted to inconsiderate love, and who was jealous enough of her bed, took not among her attendant Ladies those nymphs of the Court which are full of attractives, and deserve admiration: but purposely chose out base and despicable wayters, thinking it was a singular remedy against the Kings malady. She had at that time in her Court and service two daughters of a Clothworker, the eldest of which was called Marcovessa, and the youngest Miresseur. Caribert (whose love was more lustfull then ambitious) became desperately in love, and courted them to the prejudice of his honour and wedlock, which wounded the soul of the Queen with a very sensible arrow, seeing the havock this passion made in the mind of this Monarch. Jealousie suggesteth her a trick which seemed sufficient to divert him from his infamous servitude; if this passion might be cured by another, and that a jealous woman did not irritate the wounds of love by its proper remedies. She calleth the Father of her two servants, & commanded him secretly to practise his trade in some corner of the Court, whither she very cunningly brought his Majesty, to make him see the base extraction of his Mistresses, and to throw shame & confusion upon him. But he (who at distance saw this wile coming towards him, and the solemn preparation of it) was displeased, saying, that if nothing were wanting but nobility to render these maids worthy of his love, he would sufficiently ennoble them by his person, and that it onely belonged to him to raise inferiour things, by loving them: and as great ones will rather be flattered in their passions, then censured; instantly he made a shamefull divorce with the Queen contrary to laws both divine and humane, to take to wife the younger of these sisters which was Miresseur. But, love (which being of its nature a slave faileth not to be disdainfull) quickly put a distaste of her unto him, to make him look after the elder who seemed the more modest, and wear a religious habit; whether desirous to enflame love by this pretext (which ordinarily is eagre to pursue all it can least obtein) or whether she did it to give lesse advantage and suspicion to the jealous spirit of Queen Ingobergua: The fire of Concupiscence (which spareth not to enflame Linsey-wolsey, as well as Satin) continually blowed by the wind of ambition (which promised this creature a giddy Fancy of a Crown) burnt so strongly; that this spirit (which had more cunning then beauty) caused so much madnesse to creep into the heart of this miserable king, that he resolved to marry her; which he did, qualifying a prodigious whoredome with the title of wedlock. The Queen was ready to dy, and addresseth her complaints to God, and men.

The Bishops, who were assembled in the Councell of Tours in favour of her, made Canons against incestuous marriages; but the Canons at that time were not strong enough against the arrows of love. S. Germain Bishop of Paris sent forth thunders of excommunication; but passion armed with authority made no more account of them then of flying fires, which are quenched in their birth. God thereto put his hand by the prayers of the Church, and took away this religious woman by a horrible and sudden death which affrighted the King, and he in the end conceived shame and sorrow for his fault, deriving his salvation out of necessity, since he could not gain it from the glory of his resistance. That which remained him of life was short and miserable, and his passion having rendred him contemptible to his own subjects, he quickly left Crown and Scepter to pay a tribute to his Tombe.

2. Another kind of foolish love appeared in the government of young Meravæus, which I will here relate, as being able to minister matter of terrour to youth which takes liberty in clandestine marriages. King Chilperic his father happened to bear away the bloody spoil of his brother Sigebert who had been traiterously murthered by the subtile practises of Fredegond, when he was come to the Eve of his triumph. The famous Brunhault widow of the deceased King (as yet) very young was become a party of this miserable booty; and saw her precious liberty enthralled in the hands of her brother in law, and sister, who was born for vengeance, and exercised in massacres. Her fortune represented nothing unto her but a thousand images of terrour; and the cruelty of her adversaries made her apprehend all that which notable miſchievous wickedneſſe can do, when it hath the ſword of power in hand. Yet her bloud was ſpared to conſume her with languors, ſentence of her Captivity was pronounced, by giving her the City of Roan for priſon. A truſty man was ſought for to execute this Commiſſion, and the King caſt his eye on his ſon Meroveus a young Prince of a nature ſweet and facile, & endowed with excellent parts which made him to be beloved, and beheld (as a riſing ſtar) by all the eyes of France. This was to put fire too near to ſtubble, not conſidering that the calme of ſuch natures is ordinarily the moſt turmoiled with ſtorms of love. So ſoon as Brunhault (who according to the relation of S. Gregory of Torus was a very beautyfull and well ſpoken Princeſſe) began to unciel her eyes which had hitherto been drenched in a deluge of tears; ſhe appeared to Meroveus as a bluſhing Morn which raiſeth the more fair after a ſhower; and the arrow of love ſharpned by compaſſion made ſuch flames to ſparkle in his heart, that he was enforced to quench them with his bloud. He ſaw himſelf the captive of his fair priſoner, and already well felt he was not born to be predominant over a beauty ſo triumphant. The eaſineſſe of his nature ſuffered him not to be long in reſolving to give way to his paſſion. He inſtantly declares himſelf and coloureth his requeſt with the title of marriage. Brunhault gives ear, (whether for the love of Meroveus, or whether out of the hatred of Fredegond his mother) ſuppoſing it was an opportunity to carry fire very far into the Royall race.

Gregory of Tours l. 5.

A notable example of Meroueus to dievrt youth from licentious mariages.

They ſecretly marry, the Nephue eſpouſeth the Aunt, by a crime unheard; Love is their Pope and King, from whom they take diſpenſation and leave. Fury conceiveth this marriage: Timerity ſigneth it; but miſery ſealeth the contract. Meroveus returneth from Roan ſtil hiding his fire under the aſhes. He gives account of his commiſſion. The King his father reſolveth to ſend him to take poſſeſſion of Guyenne, which he judged to be fallen unto him by the death of Sigebert. He feigneth to depart from the Court with intention to go to Bourdeaux, but the countrepoiſe of love inſenſibly carryed him to Roan, and he haſteneth to court his pretended ſpouſe, and forgets all cares and affairs, to pleaſe his paſſion: which being not kept with in the limits of moderation, made a great noyſe, and was carried to the ears of the Court. King Chilperic went to Roan with an army to quench the fire in its beginning, thinking there was ſome notable plot contrived againſt his ſtate; but he finds theſe lovers had no other arms, but thoſe of Cupid; and that the exceſſe of their paſſion had given them ſo little leiſure to think on their own ſafety, that ſeeing themſelves beſet by ſouldiers, they had recourſe to altars which were then ſecure refuges: for the miſerable Chilperic durſt not violate Sanctuaries in the preſence of Pretextatus Biſhop of Roan, a man courageous and zealous for things divine. He promiſed himſelf to take this new married Couple by the want of victuall, and other naturall neceſſities But he ſeeing the buſineſſe to be drawn, at length patience ſlips from him, and he made them to come out of the Church, with promiſe of impunity. His ſoul was ſoftned, ſeeing a young Queen, a widdow; and miſerable by the cruelty of his wife. Nature pleadeth in his heart for his own bloud, he embraceth them both with tears in his eyes: and (not to affright them) enterteins them with fair hopes; & whileſt they little think of it, he ſends Brunhault into Auſtraſia her own Countrey, and keeps Meroveus under good and ſure guard, judging one could not well truſt him if he were at his own diſpoſe. In the mean time Fredegonda, immeaſurably diſpleaſed with the proceedings of this affair, and ſuppoſing the King her husband went on too remiſſly; made it a great crime of ſtate, and of manifeſt conſpiracy: wherein ſhe involved the Archbiſhop Pretextatus. He was Meroveus his God-father, & could not but have ſome tenderneſſe towards this Prince his God-child, which being ſiniſterly interpreted, drew much miſery upon him. He with his moveables and papers were ſeized on, where they found certain packets of Queen Brunhaults, which ſtrengthened the ſuſpition they conceived to his prejudice. He is ſent for to an aſſembly of Biſhops, where the King coming in chargeth him with the crime of rebellion, accuſing him to have withdrawn the people from their obedience, to crown his ſon; and thereupon roundly required the Prelates that juſtice might be done according to holy Canons. The witneſſes are heard, and confronted, who do not throughly enough prove the crime whereof he was accuſed. Pretextatus juſtifieth himſelf by a ſolemne proteſtation of his innocency, which cauſed compaſſion in many. But theſe Prelates aſſembled were partly weak, and partly ſold to ſerve the Kings paſſions; there was almoſt none but Gregory of Torus who having an invincible ſpirit in a little body encouraged the whole Aſſembly to the deſence of the truth; the menacies of the King, and murthering flatteries of Queen Fredegonde being unable to ſhake his conſtancy; Other batteries were likewiſe made to ruine a man half dead, by ſtirring up againſt him divers calumnies from which he very happily vindicated himſelf; untill at length ſome treacherous Biſhops counſelled him to accuſe himſelf (by way of humiliation) of the offence of ſtate which was objected againſt him. They told him he muſt not appear too juſt before his Maſter; that it was not reaſonable the King ſhould receive an affront in this affair; that he was a mild Prince who would Pretextatus ſhould owe his ſafety to his clemency, and that he no ſooner could ſpeak one word of confeſſion but he ſhould be freed from this vexation, and reſtored to his Dignity. The unfortuante Prelate (giving ear to the hiſſing of ſerpents) made his tongue the ſnare of his ſoul, and owned an imaginary crime, to undergo a reall unhappineſſe. He had no ſooner pronounced the word, but the King tranſported with exceſſive joy proſtrated himſelf on his knees before the aſſembly of Biſhops, demanding that his robe (for ignominy) ſhould be cut off, and the execrations (thundring againſt Judas) to be pronounced over him. The compaſſion of ſome procured moderation therein. Nevertheleſſe he was inſtantly degraded, condemned to baniſhment, and delivered to the Kings Guard, who lead him to a little deſert Iſland near the city of Conſtance in Normandy, whence he eſaped to be in the end maſſacred by the practiſes of Q. Fredegonde.

This ſtep-mother was not content to ſee Meroveus confined to a priſon, but ſhe violently urged he might be ſhaven, and ſhut in a Monaſtery, which was executed. But it is a great errour to think to make a religious man by holding a poignard to his throan, and by taking hair from his head when the conſent of his heart cannot be had. The thoughts (which according to the Interpreters of Scripture are as the hairs of the ſoul) were not taken away by the roots from this miſerble Samſon. They much perſecuted him about his paſſed Loves, that he quickly forſook Cowl and Monaſtery, to begin new ſirs. He went directly to Torus, (which gave much trouble to good Saint Gregory) and ſpent nights upon the tomb of Saint Martin, faſting and praying to have a revelation which might promiſe him a crown. But ſeeing Chilperic purſued him with armed hand, he fled from town to town, and from Sanctuary to Sanctuary, finding not any one who would ſupport his rebellion. In the end he gets into Auſtraſia, and returneth to the embracements of his Spouſe, as it were to end himſelf in thoſe eyes which had enkindled his first flames. But the cunning Queen (considering that her subjects were raised in alarms upon his comming, and fearing she might draw upon them the totall storm of Chilperics arms, preferred reasons of state before those of love,) besought him to retire. They of Tours (who were suspected by the King for having first of all favoured his flight) thinking not to find their own safety but in his ruine, called him back again under colour to support his arms, and to become of his side. The Prince (in whom passion caused a continuall drunkennesse of Reason) being more easie to believe, then prudent to examine reasons, turned towards them; and presently found himself caught in their snare. When seeing himself betraied and ready to be delivered into the hands of his Father, and stepmother (whom he more feared then a Panther) he addressed himself to Geilan his confident friend, and prayed him to give an end to his miserable life, sith having found so much infidelity in his beloved, treachery in his friends, and crueltie in his father, there nothing remained for him but a Tomb to bury all his miseries. The other thinking to do him great service, thrust his sword into his body, and separated his soul. Which may be a fearfull example for youth, to make them for ever to abhor the charms of love.

led

Paulus Æmilius.

That of Carloman was as light, (although it had not, so long a sequele of accidents.) Paulus Æmilius recounteth that this young Prince, accustomed to sottish and sordid love, having in a street perceived a creature which to him seemed handsome; he began to follow her being mounted on his horse; but the maid very chaste (to avoid his courtships) cast her self speedily into a house, whither Carloman (spurring his horse) desperately followed her, not observing that the door of the house was too low; which smote him, and stroke him down so unfortunately, that he left both love and life. It was a direfull thing to see so great a Prince to die in jeast: but the sports of this passion are ordinarily bloudy, and Venus came from a sea of water, to swim in a sea of bloud.

Concilia Gallicana tom. 3.

3. I will here also let you see the effect of a passion (to all extremity) dissolute and scandalous, which made a great noise throughout all Christendome, and will serve to make men detest the wickednesse of such as break conjugall bands, to satisfie their lust. The young Emperour Lotharius, grand-child of Lewis the Courteous, loved in his younger years a Lady, much mentioned in the Epistles of Popes, under the name of Valdrada. She had a commanding beauty, was of a humour full of attractives and wiles, which surprized the young Prince with an affection so strong and catching, that after a thousand crosses he could not be unlooked from it, but by death. Nevertheless, Time and Reason inviting him to think upon a lawfull marriage; he espoused Theutbergue a beautifull and virtuous Princesse, who was thought fit to quench the fire of his unchaste love, and hereafter to enkindle his heart with flames more chaste and happy. But fascinated by his evil Genius, he presently took an aversion against his wife, being seldome personally with her; and perpetually in mind, and affection with her, who had laid hold of his first love. Whether it were that this audacious woman imperiously ruled over him, (as a man timorous in his passions, who durst not yet confidently do a mischief) or whether he were sufficiently disposed thereunto by the violence of his love; he undertakes a very scandalous businesse, which was to unmarry himself, falsly imputing adultery and barrennesse to his wife. The criminall processe is handled in the Ecclesiasticall Court; Gontier Archbishop of Collen, who had great power and great faults, supporteth the Princes part what he might, & having won Theutgard Archbishop of Trew on his side, Scandalous love of the Empetour Lotharius, and Valdrada.

he drags along souls set to sale by a torrent of authority to which none make resistance. The innocent Theutbergue is condemned in two pestilent Synods, and handled as a prostitute, the Crown is taken from her and put on Valdrada's head, who appeared with a marvellous pomp, whilest the other groaned under the ashes of a publick penance. The chaste Princesse, who not so much regarded eminent wedlocks as the honour of her purity (which she meant to preserve to her tomb) appealed to the Pope, which at that time was Nicholas the first, and wrote mournfull letters to him, able to rent rocks asunder. The common Father of Christendome heareth her complaints animated by truth, and deputeth two Legates to do her right. These Prelates had not courage enough to decide the matter; and seeing themselves upon one side assailed by their conscience, and on the other, besieged by the powerfull contentions of Lotharius and two Archbishops, they found out a way how to wash their hands from this judgement, They shew, that since two Provinciall Councels had passed upon it, and that the Archbishops Gontier, and Theutgard had born sway therein; it were good that the same men took pains to go to Rome to let the Pope see the acts of those two assemblies, and to justifie all their proceedings. These two Prelates (who thought nothing was impossible to their credit) refused not the commission. They go armed with impostures and tattle, to oppresse truth, and overwhelm innocency. The Pope, a clear-seeing and charitable man, interessed himself in the cause, and in full assembly discovereth their jugling, with such vigour and perspicuity, that all the Fathers cast their stone at them. The mischief they meant against the innocent Theutbergue falls back upon their own heads; they are excommunicated, degraded, deprived of their offices and benefices, to be reduced to the communion of Lackies. Never did men practise a mischief with more unluckinesse, and lesse successe. A Legate is dispatched to annull all they had done, which was the courageous Arsenius, who caused all the processe to be reviewed, drave away the impudent Valdrada, restored her honour to Queen Theutbergue, and tied her marriage with an indissoluble knot. Nevertheless this judicious Lady, well foreseeing that those loves (which are re-enkindled with the fires of S. Peters thunders, would neither be happy nor faithfull for her) saith, she was satisfied to have put her honour into safegard, and that having observed so much evil disposition in her husband, and treachery in the world, she desired to spend the rest of her dayes with God. Lotharius was transported with joy upon this news, and addressed an humble supplication to the Pope, shewing he had obeyed his commandments; being dutifully bent to take his wife again: but since the piety of this Princesse, who is not born for worldly matters, is suggested with the thought of entering into religion; it would please him to favour her generous purpose; & to give him leave to marry Valdrada, wch would be a means, to take away all the sin & scandall of his miserable life. The holy Father answers, that he much commended the charity he had towards queen Theutbergue his spouse; but that it was fit this good affection might begin in himself, and should he throughly resolve to enter into a Monastery, the permission he required for his wife should hinder nothing. This answer confounded him, and seeing that of two wives, he was despised by the one, and interdicted from the other; he lived in the world as a man without soul or contentment. Mean while, he hoped that God calling Theutbergue; he at least should then have all facility in his marriage with Valdrada: but the Pope, considering the evil practises of this lustfull love which had scandalized all Christendome, and the former usage of his wife; he let him understand that this match was for ever forbidden. Provoked desire burns to fury: and he again beginneth a most notorious whoredome, since he could not colour it with the title of marriage. Thereupon menaces and thunders from Rome follow, and the name of Valdrada is mentioned in all excommunications reiterated one after another. The miserable Lotharius seeing himself crossed by God and men, perpetually pricked with remorse of conscience, resolved to take a journey to Rome; and to present himself to Hadrian the second, successour of Nicholas, and to get his absolution, and to mediate the affair of his marriage; his heart still propending towards her, whom he so unfortunately had loved. The Pope harkened to him, and received him to penance, and disposed himself to say Masse, wherein he was fully to finish the affair of his reconciliation. When he came to the instant of Communion, he takes the venerable Hoast in his hand, and addresseth himself to king Lotharius and all his complices ready to communicate, and sayes to them, Sir, if it be true, that, having renounced your unchaste loves, you this day do present your submissions to God and to the Church in all sincerity; come near, you and yours to this blessed Sacrament with all confidence in the mercy of God: But, if you still retein the old Leaven of your inordinate affections; get you from the Altar both you and all those who have served you in this businesse, if you will not be involved in the vengeance of God. This speech was a stroke of thunder that affrighted the king and his followers, and which made many of them instantly to retire. Lotharius was ashamed to go back; and albeit he yet felt the flames of his love to burn in his heart; yet failed he not to passe further with his greatest intimates and friends. From that time not any one of those who had unworthily communicated had any health; all miserably died, and the poor Lotharius, returning from his voyage, found the end of his life and direfull passion in the city of Placentia: Valdrada submitting her self to a just penance obteined absolution from Pope Adrian. Gontier and Theutgard seeing themselves deposed without hope of recovery, armed their pens against the Pope to no purpose. But afterward, Gontier made great submission that he might be reestablished; yet obteined not what he desired: for it was answered him that it was from respect of honour and temporall gain that all these humiliations proceeded; and therefore it were much better for him to persever in the exercise of his penance, which was so much the more bitter unto him for that he had in the beginning of this businesse prostituted his Niece to King Lotharius under the hope of marriage, which his ambition figured to him. So true it is that God chasticeth vice with a rod of Iron, in such as too near approch the Sanctuary.

Valdrada is not alone (among the Ladies of the old Court) who hath made her self to be talked of in so ill a sense. Love appeared as weak and shamefull in Ogine Queen of France, Mother of Lewis Outremer, who transported with fooliſh affection married her self to a young gallant named Heribert, sonne of him who had betrayed and imprisoned Charls the simple, her husband.

Annals of France. 5. The like passion was scandalous in the time of Philiple Pel in three noble Princesses married to three sons of France; who were all accused of unchastity by their own husbands. and fell into horrible disasters, to teach women of quality, in what account they ought to hold the honour of chastity.

6. But verily never any thing in this kind did equal the exorbitancy of Queen Eleanor, who renounced France which had eyes too chaste to tolerate her disorders. She going along to the conquest of the holy land, with King Lewis the young her husband, lost piety and reputation, resigning her self to the love of a Sultan Sarazin, the turbant, nor dusky colour of a hideous man being able to stay the fury of her passion. She was the daughter of William the last Duke of Aquitane, who in his time was a scourge of mankind; he alone at one meal did eat as much as eight men; and this vast body filled with wine and viands burnt like a Fornace, throwing out flames of choler and lust on all sides. S. Bernard knocked him down like a Boar; foaming at his feet, presenting the holy Hoast before him, and by that miracle made a Hermit of him. His daughter imitating his evil habits, had no part in his conversion, living in all liberty. Which was the cause that the King, under colour of affinity, made his match with her to be broken, and restored Guyenne to her which she brought. This bold woman, not amazed at this divorce; espouseth Henry of England, a man as passionate as she, where she found a terrible businesse, when (her unquiet spirit, powerfully bustling in affairs of state, and the interests of her husbands children) she saw her self shut up in a prison, where she lay for the space of fourteen years in rage and languours, which put a penance upon her more irksome to her humour, then it proved profitable to her soul.

Good God! what heavie horrours, what Tragedies, and what scourges of God do alwayes fall on sin! What a pleasing spectacle it is to see, amidst such confusions, victories gained over evil love!

The honour the French have born to the virtue of Chastity. 7. It is very true, that he who would recount the remarkable acts of chastity, resplendent in the Court of France, and especially among Ladies, for one (who ought to be forgotten) a thousand might be found, who had lived with very singular testimonies of Integrity: but it is certain that Historians have an itch to set down mischiefs and crimes rather then virtues; which is the cause, that when so many honourable women walk in the beaten track of a well ordered life, we no more admire it then the ordinary course of the Sun: But if one step awry, all curious eyes look on her as on a star in Eclipse.

Yet in so great a negligence of Historians to write the rare effects of modesty, we do not want good arguments which testifie the love our nation hath in all ages born to purity.

8. Nicetas a Greek Authour (in the lamentations of the city of Constantinople taken by the French) cannot hold from admiring Baldwin the conquerour thereof, who, entring into a vanquished City wherein there were many beauties, never did he cast so much as one wanton glance; beginning his triumph from the victory he got over himself: and that which he practised in his own person, he caused to be exactly observed among his attendants, commanding his Heralds twice in a week to proclaim throughout the Imperiall Palace, that all such as should have any ill purpose towards the chastity of Ladies, and meant to debauch the wife of another, were to take heed under grievous penalties never to lodge within the circuit of the house. Verily this is a rare example of integrity, able to shame the nobility so much defamed by giddy and base luxury, which hath blasted the lustre of its conquests, and not spared to raise up bloudy tragedies which still make Historians to lament.

Baronius ad annum 499. 9. Clodoveus who brought not virginity from Paganisme so much honoured virgins, that, in the liberty of arms, he permitted not any to touch either their bodies or lands. He bare a singular reverence to S. Genevieſue who made profession of this angelicall virtue; he willingly gave ear to her request, and often granted her what he had denied the greatest in his kingdome, even to the drawing of offendours from the gates of hel who had already the executioners ax over their heads.

10. Gon-

Greg. Turon. l. 9. c. 27

10. Gontranus his grand-child made himſelf much worthy of praiſe by a notable act he did in the behalf of Chaſtity. It happened that in his time, one Amalon Count of Champaine (who no more ſpared the honour of Virgins then his own, of which he was infinitely prodigall) cauſed a Virgin as fair as chaſte to be taken, that he might diſhonour her. Whilſt he expected the ſucceſſe of this theft, he feaſted and drank (according to his cuſtome) immoderately. Wine, which enkindleth concupiſcence, quenched it in him by reaſon of his exceſſe: and whilſt he more thought upon ſleep then love; this poor unfortunate victime was ſtoln into his bed with all menaces and violences that fury could invent. The poor Virgin ſeeing this Holophernes was faſt aſleep thought it were not amiſſe to renew the Hiſtory of Judith, to vindicate her honour from this gulf whereinto the craft of this treacherous man had precipitated her: ſhe takes a ſword which hung at the beds-head, draweth it out of the ſcabbard, and gave him a wound on the head, which awakened him from this dead-ſleep, and made him cry out Murder. His ſervants ſpeedily ran thither and were ready to knock down this Amazon, when the other, touched with remorſe of conſcience, hindered it, and gave her leaſure to eſcape through the throng of the people. The wound (being mortal) quickly carried him out of the world after he had had ſome time to deteſt his ſin. But his kindred and allies ſought for nothing but to cut this young Judith in pieces, who had dared to lift up a ſword againſt a man of ſo eminent quality. Wherefore ſhe had recourſe to King Gontranus, and proſtrated her ſelf at his feet, telling him all the ſtory which had paſſed between the Count and her. The King hearkned to her, and freed her, taking her into his protection, againſt all ſuch as would enterpriſe upon her life, or honour.

11. Lewis the Courteous conſecrated his Kingdome by the honour he gave to chaſtity, reſolving not to enter into his father Charlemaignes palace, until it was ſanctified. He inſtantly baniſhed thence all thoſe plagues (which laid ſnares for the honour of the Princeſſes his ſiſters; repleniſhing his whole Royal palace with a holy odour of virtue and reputation.

Vita S. Ludovici.

12. S. Lewis may ſerve for an Example to all Princes, inaſmuch as may concern the continency of the married. To baniſh all Love-toyes from his heart; he reſolved perfectly to love the Queen his wife, whom he eſpouſed in his moſt tender years, and both of them lived and converſed with ſo much integrity, ſweetneſſe, and admiration, that one would have thought them a pair of Angels on earth. The husband ſecretly ſtole into the chamber of his dear ſpouſe; and much he feared to be met by the Queen his mother who ſeemed (to ſuch as did not well underſtand her intentions) to be ſomewhat jealous to ſee them together. But to ſay truly, ſhe managed theſe interviews in their tender youth, that their health might not be prejudiced, and their marriage might become the more fruitfull. And the good King, to give her no cauſe of ſuſpicion, had little dogs in the lobby of purpoſe that they might bark and afford him leaſure to ſave himſelf, and not be ſurprized by the diligence of Blaunch, in the Queens chamber. His love was accompanied with ſo much reſpect and confidence, that he diſpatched not any buſineſſe without communicating it with her; in ſuch ſort, that when he was to conclude the conditions of his deliverance with the Sarazens; he freely told them, he could not ſign them without the advice of the Queen his wife, who was not farre off. At which theſe Barbarians were much amazed; but he anſwered them, it onely belonged to them to account their vvives for ſlaves, and that his, vvas his Lady and Miſtreſſe.

Conjugall Chaſtity of S. Lewis.

13. Our moſt Chriſtian King (an imitatour of S. Lewis in the virtue of purity) poſſeſſeth it in ſuch a degree, that in him it more dependeth on a gift from God then the temper of man. Praiſes are often given to Princes, which are as colours in the air, and have no foundation in their merit; but this hath taken ſuch an incorruptible root in the integrity of his manners, that it will never die; which might miniſter matter for me here to enlarge, had I reſolved to write a Panigyrick, and not a Hiſtory which treateth of things paſt, as Prophecy, thoſe which are to come.

14. I think I have ſufficiently touched in the firſt and ſecond Tome the notable acts of Charles the Eighth, and Chevallier Bayard; and I am confident, Hiſtory will never ſuffer the auſterities of holy K. Robert to die; who to mortifie concupiſcence ſometimes lay on the boards the ſeven whole weeks before Eaſter.

Helgaldus Monachus Floriacenſis

15. I do not account them contemptible, who having not had the happineſſe to live in this great purity of S. Lewis, have not ſpared to reſiſt love which had formerly maſtred them. Dagobert, a young King bred in all virtue, by the care and zeal of S. Arnold his Tutour, took liberty in vice very irregularly, ſo ſoon as this grave directour had obtained leave to retire from the Court. There are ſpirits which reſemble the wooden Dove of Archytas the Philoſopher, which flew by engines whilſt they had their operation, and ſoared in the air; but ſo ſoon as they ceaſed, it trailed the wing on the earth. Such was our Dagobert, who perpetually having this worthy man Arnold by his ſides; he ſpake as an Oracle, and lived like an Angel. There was not any thing more chaſte, more devout, and more affable: which was the cauſe that his Tutour, thinking there was no more need of him about his perſon, urgently entreated he might be permitted to withdraw into the Countrey, which the King gain-ſaid, even to the expreſſion of anger, if he ſpake any more of this retreat. Nevertheleſſe, redoubling his importunities, he prevailed; and ſo ſoon as he was ſeparated from his ſcholar; he, who before, was a dove with wings of ſilver, and who in acts of virtue took a ſtrong and confident flight, ſuffered himſelf to fall into the mire with a ſcandal as ſhamefull, as the exceſſe was violent. Luſt aſſaulteth, and on all ſides beſieges him. Licencious youth takes poſſeſſion of his ſoul, and continually blows love and beauty into his ears. It many times hapneth that the paſſions of young men which have been too ſeverely reſtrained, ſo ſoon as they have found paſſage, do the more violently overflow, as if nature went about to take revenge upon art and precepts. They muſt ſometime be ſhewed the world with contempt, they muſt be enured againſt its aſſaults, they muſt be prepared againſt its deceits, that they be not like fooliſh pigeons which have never ſeen any thing but ſuffer themſelves to be taken with the firſt baits. S. Arnold, who was a man that breathed nothing but wilderneſſes, in my opinion held the ſpirit of Dagobert in a life too much reſtrained, which, in the firſt approach of liberty, flew out into moſt violent extravagancies. He preſently took an averſion againſt Queen Gomatrade his wife, and in a liberty of doing all which flatterers told him fell to him as an inheritance; he durſt to repudiate her, and take a young Lady named Ragintrude, whom he moſt affectionately loved. Luſt is the throat of Hell, which never ſayes It is enough; and when ſhame hath no bridle to with-hold it, it makes no difference between things ſacred and profane; and the greateſt crimes paſſe with it, as matters indifferent. This love is not content with common paſſion; he entreth into Cloyſters, and takes a virgin out of a Monaſtery who had begun to dedicate her ſelf to God. To her he addeth many others, and makes a little Seraglio of his palace. All France groaned to ſee ſo ſudden and deplorable a change of life in their King. S. Arnold is invited by ſome good men again to viſit his young plant, and to take in hand the raines of the Kings direction, which he had forſaken; but whether he were charmed by the ſweetneſſe of his ſolitude, or whether he feared he ſhould have no favourable admiſſion after ſo ſolemn a leave; (which he with ſo much importunity had begged) he would not hearken to it, rather chooſing to ſend his ſighs to the ears of God then the Kings. S. Amand determines to undertake the matter, which he did with Eccleſiaſtick vigour, and a moſt undoubted confidence; but the ſick man was too tender to endure a tongue armed with ſword and fire; ſo farre was he from diſpoſing himſelf to remedies, that he could not ſuffer ſo much as the preſence of his Phyſician, cauſing him to be ſent into another countrey. Pepin of Landen, who was the prime man in the Court, thought fit to inſtill ſome good counſel and ſage words as occaſion offered; but the King, tranſported with the exorbitancy of his youth, told him he was a troubleſome man, of whom it were fit to rid the world, ſince he was ſo hardy as to cenſure the innocent delights of his Maſter. For which cauſe, this great pillar of ſtate, ſhaken by the ſtorm of a violent paſſion, much tottered, and was very near to have been thrown down. The Reverence wherewith his virtue was honoured, (which proceeded almoſt to veneration) ſaved him to reſerve his reaſons for a better diſpoſition. During this time the Queen dieth, and the affections of Dagobert began to ſlacken either out of ſatiety or ſhame. This good Councellour layes hold of his opportunity, and takes him on the Biaſſe; ſhewing him, his honour and repoſe joyned with the good of the ſtate required of him a happy poſterity; and that it was a very eaſie matter for him, ſince he had honoured Ragintrude with his affections for her exquiſite beauty and the excellent gifts wherein ſhe ſurpaſſed, that he might take her to wife, and limit his love within lawfull wedlock, which would draw upon him the bleſſings of heaven, and the love of all his people. This ſpeech happily entred into the Kings heart, and he reſolved to follow the Counſel which was preſented him by ſo good a hand. He diſmiſſeth all the women which had tyrannized over his affection; he marrieth Ragintrude: and, as if in an inſtant ſome charm had been taken away; he in himſelf (by the hand of God) made ſuch a change, that his life was a Rule of virtue, and his converſion, a miracle. The Court which commonly followeth the inclinations of the Prince, took with him a quite other face; vice and vicious are thence baniſhed, and all virtues thither brought chaſtity as in triumph.

Notable victory of Dagobert againſt love. Paulus Æmil. Haymonius.

Rigordus. 16, I verily think, it is many times an act as hard and heroick, to free ones ſelf from a miery bog wherein to one by miſchance is fallen, as to live perpetually innocent. For which cauſe, I much eſteem the reſolution of Philip Gods-gift, who being in the beginning diſtaſted with Engelbergue his wife, after he had repudiated her, and taken Mary the daughter of the Duke of Moravia, out of a violent affection which long had embroiled him; he was ſuddenly converted, and laid hold of the occaſion of his ſalvation. The Complaints of the ſcandall he gave flew to Rome, and returned with Cenſures and Thunders. Cenſus, and Meilleur (two Legates ſent by the Holy Sea) durſt not touch this wound which they judged to be incurable. Peter, Cardinall of S. Mary abſolutely incenſed him, putting the Kingdome into interdict, and the King into deſpair, who vomited nought but choller and flames. Two other Legates deputed for a third triall proceeded therein with much ſweetneſſe, which ſo gained the ſoul of Philip that he began to ſubmit to reaſon. Yet the charms were ſo violent, that his reaſon thereby became infirm, and his conſtancy wavering. His buſineſſe was laſtly decided by a Synod, and it was dangerous leſt it might ſtirre up a ſtorm, when this Royall heart (which was come to plead before the Councel, and to diſpoſe of his affections to the heighth of his contentment (there wanting not to men of authority who flattered his paſſion) was ſuddenly touched, takes the Queen his wife, reconcileth himſelf to her, ſets her behind him on his horſe, carries her to his Palace, and cauſed to be ſaid to the Legates and the other Prelates aſſembled, that they had no more to do to trouble their heads any longer about his buſineſſe, for he had happily determined it. If Henry the eighth, King of England, had taken the ſame courſe; love would have been diſarmed, innovations hindered, concord eſtabliſhed, and all the diſaſters baniſhed out of England.

Great Triumph of Philip Gods-gift over himſelf. Laſtly; to conclude this diſcourſe, I verily think, never woman better mannaged love then Queen Blanch mother of S. Lewis. She was very lovely: and among thoſe great lights of perfection which encompaſſed her on all ſides; ſhe wanted not beauty, which was the cauſe that, continuing a widow in a flouriſhing age, there were Princes in her kingdome who durſt promiſe themſelves, that ſhe would reflect on them for a ſecond marriage. Among others, the Count of Champaign propoſed this good hap to himſelf, more then was to be believed, and ceaſed not to play the Courtier, even to the fitting his gallery with verſes and Emblems of the Queen. This prudent widow, who had to do with Great ones in the beginning of her authority of Regent, engaged not her ſelf to any, nor did ſhe likevviſe reject their ſuits: but ſo ſoon as ſome of them perceived ſhe had no purpoſe for them, they preſently took arms to diſturb the Kingdome, and leſſen the authority of the young King. The Count of Champaign ſaw himſelf by neceſſity embarked in the faction; but he had much ado to defend himſelf from the affection vvhich poſſeſſed him for this exquiſite beauty. For vvhich cauſe he pleaded like a lover, and betrayed his faction, diſcovering the things moſt important; vvhich gave Queen Blanch a great light to guard her ſelf from the vvicked enterpriſes of her enemies, and diſſipate all factions.

Obſervations upon the Paſsion of DESIRE.

Wherein we may behold the miſery of ambitious and turbulent Spirits.

Marvellous effects of the paſſion of Deſire. THE wind, which is an inviſible power, and which appears before our eyes no more then nothing, maketh tall ſhips to move, pulleth up trees by the roots, overthroweth houſes, exerciſing on land and ſea powers too-too viſible. Deſires, and hopes likewiſe (which, to ſay truely, are but imaginations almoſt unperceivable) vex empires, embroil ſtates, deſolate Cities and Provinces, and make havock, ſuch, as we cannot in thought conceive, nor can our eyes ever ſufficiently deplore.

It is a ſtrange thing, that from a little fountain-head which onely diſtilleth drops of vvater, great rivers grovv; and from a deſire vvhich inviſibly hatcheth in the heart of man, lofty ambitions, burning avarices, and enraged raged covetousnesse proceed, which destroy mankind.

Our first desires respect body and life, which is the foundation of all the blessings we can hope in this world, and here it is wherein those who flourish in Empires and eminent fortunes shew passions and cares, able to make them immortall, if humane nature might reach to such a state.

Strange desire of life in Lewis the eleventh.

We all know that Lewis the eleventh was a Monarch, who, by the greatnesse of his wit and power, darkned all the Kings of his Time; but we likewise cannot be ignorant, that he had most ardent Passions which gave him infinite disturbances, the consideration whereof may serve Great ones for the establishment of their repose. Never any man more loved life, nor more feared death, then this mighty Prince; who seeing himself laden with infirmities, and assailed by old age, (a disease incurable) employed the whole power of an ample Kingdome to hold together a poor thread of life. There was not any remedy in the world which he tried not; there was no secret in physick which he opened not: his profusion caused him to give a Physician ten thousand crowns a moneth: and although this Monarch were one of the most eminent of his time, and that he sought nothing but to climb over the heads of Princes; yet he made himself a slave to Hippocrates his disciples, to idolatrize health. It is to be thought, if Medea had in his dayes returned into the world, he would have put himself into her hands, of purpose to wax young again, like another Peleus. So soon as he heard speech of a man who cured maladies by certain extraordinary wayes; needs must he come from the utmost limits of the earth: and for this cause he called S. Francis de Paula who drave away feavers and plagues from humane bodies with so much ease; yet could he not prolong the Kings dayes, whom God would punish by the privation of that he most loved. He also took the holy viol of Rhemes to keep it in his chamber, and therein to find treasures of life, which was bootlesse; to teach us there is no greater a Hang-man of our hearts, then inordinate ill rectified desire. The desire of life transported him to extraordinary actions. For having been all his life time very plain in apparell; towards his latter dayes when he went out of his chamber, he sumptuously clothed himself, he shuffled his officers, and changed them out of a certain desire of novelty, that it might be known, he was yet alive: he cared not to be curled so that men believ'd him to be living. Yet, if he had done all this to lead the life of a man, and of a King with some reasonable contentment; his cares might have been the more excusable. But all this great endeavour was but to drag along a miserable life among the distrusts of his neerest allies, among jealousies of his own sonne, among woodden and Iron cages wherein he kept a Bishop of Verdun for the space of fourteen years, among chains and clogges of Iron, (which he called his threads) among disconsolate sadnesses which they sought by all means to sweeten, one while making clowns to sport before him, another while furnishing out a musick of Hogs ranged under a pavillon of velvet, which they pricked through the ears with bodkins to make them chant forth their goodly warblings. What inventions doth a passionate man find out to prolong his punishments!

Next unto life, the most ardent desires are for wealth and honour, which make turbulent and busie spirits to disturb the whole world, without enjoying one hour of repose. One might as soon number the starres and the sands of the sea, as reckon up the souls of this kind, with which the Histories of all nations are stuffed. For, in matters that concern particular ends, you on every occasion see children bandied against their parents, and kinred in mutiny one against another, who bely their bloud, betray nature, and devour lands, bloudy and smoking for imaginary pretensions in the matter of their inheritance.

2. But it would be very hard to find a spirit more covetous, more factious, (and more tempestuous to encrease his estate) then was that of Lotharius the sonne of Lewis the Courteous: Hence it was that he shamefully degraded, shaved, and shut the King his Father in a Cloister: Hence, that he contrived so many matches, and ploted so many conspiracies: Hence, that he levied so many armies, and gave so many battells: Hence, that he ransack'd so many Churches, put the Clergy to ransome, threw down Justice, and exhausted the nobility. Hence it was, that he had alwayes an eye towards the field, and an armed hand to ruine the inheritance of his brothers: Lastly, hence proceeded that bloudy battel of Fontenay, where a hundred thousand men of account died in the place; so many rivers and seas of bloud must an outrageous ambition swim in, which is wedded to particular ends, and covetousnesse.

Prodigious victory which in the end Lotharius gained over himself after a great storm of passions in becoming Religious.

But howsoever it were, he by an unexpected miracle became victour over these two passions, when (after he had embroiled his whole life) he was sensibly touched with a divine inspiration, and forsook the crown of an Empire, to take that of a Cloister, changing his pride into humility, his impiety into devotion, and his ambition into penance. It is an Act which onely appertaineth to a Hand wholly divine, to draw light out of a Chaos, and pull this serpent out of his cavern; but it was likewise a most incomparable happinesse, to see him to die a good Religious man at the years-end, and to receive the Crown in the beginning of the Carreer, although it be not likely, that those grievous sinnes were so soon expiated, but that a good part of them were reserved for purifying flames.

Shallow and Fantastick ambitions.

3. Forasmuch as concerneth the diversity of ambitions; there are some shallow and fantastick which resemble that of a silly Trades-man in Constantinople, who gave all the wealth he had gathered in his whole life, that he might (but so much as one hour) wear the crown on his head, and play a King of the Cards on a stage, where he was used with all manner of scorn: Even so, many Courtiers suffer themselves desperately to runne into certain barren vanities, busying themselves about Genealogies, marriages, extractions, right and left lines; to find, in the Ashes of Troy the great, an ally of their bloud, and to make themselves diadems in picture.

Codinus in Relog.

Others are a little Hypocondriack, and have humours not unlike those of Peregrinus, who presented a letter of challenge in a great assembly of Grecians, inviting all the world to come and see him burn alive, wherein he failed not, throwing himself into the fire to gain the glory of a generous man. All our Gladiatours are in this state, who desire to make themselves famous by infamous Duels, and have a greater appetite to live in the fantasie of men (such as themselves) then in their own bodies.

Lucianus in Peregrino.

4. There are other covert desires of honour which sleep in the bosome of men consecrated to God, and enkindle their flames with the fire of the Incensory, which are much more subtile, and which devour, as fire from heaven.

The ambitions of Ecclesiasticks and Religious much more subtil.

5. This was verified under the reign of Clotharius in the person of Crodielde a religious woman of the Monastery of Saint Crosse of Poictiers. She was daughter of Caribert, and following the example of the Queen saint Radegonde, she had generously despised the world, to take a husband in the house of God: But, as these kind of persons are commonly treated with much honour and fair entertainment; their passions sleep like the the silk-worm folded up in its threads which in the end breaks its prison, becomes a butterfly, and flies aloft in the air.

Crodielde daughter of King Caribert a Religious woman raiseth great troubles by her ambition.

She had a violent desire to hold the highest place, and to yield to none, as far as her power would extend. She patiently enough endured S. Radegunde, because she had been a Queen: but so soon as death had closed up her eyes, and that she saw, without any regard had of Royall bloud, Leuboece was chosen and confirmed for Abbesse of the Monastery; she brake her bands of silk which so tenderly tied her to the Crosse, awakened all her sleeping passions, took the wings of such an exorbitant ambition, that having opened the locks, and broken open the doors, she went out accompanied with Basines her Cousin, and fourty others, Religious Libertines, to provide for her self at Court, and to procure to be chosen Abbesse.

The good S. Gregory of Tours relateth, that she coming unto his City throughly wet, and much tired with her journey, besought him to take her and her virgins into his protection, against the violences of the Abbesse of Poictiers, who had treated her with all manner of indignity. She added that for this purpose she was going to the Court, and prayed him, that expecting her return, he would be pleased according to usuall charity to provide for the entertainment of all her religious women. The good Bishop, who was very busie about his studies, and the function of his charge, would not undertake the trouble of maintaining so many virgins, which he feared as much as a vast army; but entertained her very canonically, saying he could not approve her going forth, and that if she were offended with her Abbesse, she ought not therefore to forsake her Monastery without leave; but peaceably to inform Morovens the Bishop, who, by the obligation of his place, was to order all their differences. She, who would not hear speech of this man, answered; He marred all, and that order cannot be expected from the authour of disorder, so that, seeing S. Gregory nothing disposed to feed so many mouths; she provided elswhere, and went directly to her uncle King Gontran, leaving all her religious under the charge of Basines. Gontran received her very courteously, as his niece, and gave her many gifts; but, having well considered her businesse, he would not meddle with it, saying, It was an Ecclesiasticall affair; and that he would recommend it to the Bishops of the Province; which he most exactly did, without prescribing them any thing to the prejudice of right, or the dishonour of their dignity. Crodielde thereupon returning to Tours found her sisters much impaired, and knew by experience that religious women dissolve in secular life, as salt in water, although thence it took its originall. They were so chargeable to all, but especially to saint Gregory, that he prayed and made vows for their departure, which caused them to hasten their retreat to Poictiers, where instead of entering into the Abbey, they withdrew into the Church of saint Hilary.

In the end, Godegesillus Archbishop of Bourdeaux arrived with his Suffragans, to decide the matter: but these Mistresses (who had good noses, smelling that this assembly was not to favour their faction) levied a regiment of souldiers to defend them, of which they make Childeric to be the Captain; a wicked and a most resolute fellow, who failed not to be well followed, such store there was of Frizlers and effeminate youngsters who put themselves into this army of women. The Bishops failed not to march directly towards them, accompanied with the Clergy, and a great multitude of people, to summon them to reenter into the Monastery; but this Amazon instantly commanded her souldiers to strike, which they did with so much violence, that the Crosiers and banners seeing themselves so unexpectedly charged, began to totter; the Bishops, the Priests and Deacons fled: There was a generall dissipation of the people, and many were wounded in the place, the Church it self being stained with humane bloud. Crodielde running on to the highest degree of insolency, as if she had been puffed up with her victory, entreth into the Monastery with her Hacksters, and takes her Abbesse, who is dragged by the hair, used with all hideous extremities, and confined to a prison. She caused all the religious women to come who had opposed her, she torments them with sundry tortures, layes hold of the charters, seizeth on all the papers, maketh her self Abbesse; and bearing a barbarous soul in the heart of a woman, exerciseth rigours and cruelties which struck horrour into all the world. The Bishops had no other defence, but the Thunders of Excommunication, of which these creatures, abandoned by God, made very little account. Macon Governour of Poictiers was entreated to use a strong hand, but he excused himself, saying, he would not contend with the daughter of a King, without commission. But it was not fit, matters should so continue; and honest men unable any longer to see the Church groan under an unheard of Tyranny, implore by most humble supplications the aid of three Kings, Clotharius, Gontran, and Childebert, who being sensibly touched with these disorders gave large Commissions, power, and commandment to Governours to assist the Bishops of Tours, Colen, and Poictiers, who were appointed to determine this difference. Order is at this time well observed, Justice is there supported by force: the gallants, who had adhered to the faction of the nunnes, scatter under the terrour of arms and Royall authority. This Empresse of Rebels is taken, and carried to the Councell to give an account of her deportments. She comes thither in an audacious manner, retaining still something of her arrogancy and insupportable haughtinesse, even in her depression; and after she had employed arms, she skirmisheth, what she could, with her tongue; which was by falling on the life and manners of her Abbesse, whom she accused of many trifling things, reproching her (among other points) to have made a garment for her niece of a Cope taken out of the Treasury of the Church, which was false; to have caused secular persons to eat at her Table; to have a bath in the Monastery, and to play at Chesse. For this required to have her deposed, that she might be put into her place: wherein it plainly appeareth, that ambition is not onely furious, but blind in its fury. She who swallowed Camells, maketh an anatomy of a fly: she who was defiled with the crimes of Tyrants, reprehendeth slight recreations which had been permitted under the government of S. Radegonde. The Abbesse replied very modestly to all her objections, and made her innocency appear as bright as the rayes of the sunne, whereupon she was reestablished with honour and applause in her dignity; and the other condemned to ask her pardon, and to submit to her commands: To which she stoutly answered, she would never do it, and that they should rather advise upon the means of putting the Abbesse to death, then to use her in such sort. But she persisting in this obdurateness is again deprived of the communion of the Church, separated from all her complices who are placed in diverse Monasteries there to do penance: yet she still finding her self to be supported by some, by reason of her noble extraction; on a time stole her self from the just punishment of evil carriage, and fled with her Cousin to Childeberts Court, where being not able any longer to raise storms, she was constrained to be quiet, rather for want of force, then through the defect of courage. One may by this proceeding ſee the Tempeſts which ariſe from ill rectified deſires, when they are underpropped by ſome manner of power, and that there is nothing ſo ſovereign, as in their root to mortifie them.

the

Ambitions which bud in hearts of baſe extraction are moſt inſolent.

5. But they never are ſo inſolent, as when they bud in the hearts of people of baſe extraction, who behold themſelves unexpectedly raiſed to ſome extraordinary favour.

The example of a Chirurgion of S. Lewis, wiſely repreſſed and chaſtiſed by the prudence and juſtice of Philip the 3. King of France.

S. Lewis had taken into his friendſhip his Chirurgion named Peter La-Broſſe, becauſe, beſides the experience he had in his profeſſion, he had made himſelf praiſe-worthy for the goodneſſe of his wit and great loyalty. This favour mounted much higher under Philip the Third, ſucceſſour of S. Lewis: for, he not content to honour this man with a particular affection; beſtowed benefits upon him with ſuch an ineſtimable profuſion, that he raiſed him to the dignity of Chamberlain, and conferred honours and largeſſes upon all his kindred. This fellow ſeeing the young King had not the moderation of the father, to proportion his affections to his reputation and the good of his ſtate; uſurped upon his ſpirit, entred into all his ſecrets, and needs would intermeddle in State-affairs, from which his birth and the much limited capacity of his wit ought to have deterred him.

The King had in a ſecond wedlock married a moſt virtuous Princeſſe, Mary of Brabant, who held in his heart that place which the Law of God and the Sacrament of Marriage gave her. It is a wonder, how this child of the Earth entreth hereby into jealouſies, and thought the tender affections of the King towards his deareſt ſpouſe might leſſen the good favours of his Maſter, whom he was deſirous to poſſeſſe in the title of a Sovereign.

He ſought to caſt the apple of diſcord into ſo happy a marriage: and, ſeeing this knot could not be broken but with much labour, having a ſoul ſold to Iniquity; it is thought he found means to poyſon Lewis eldeſt ſon of Philip, and of Iſabel his firſt wife. This young Prince is by a ſudden death taken away to the infinite grief of all the Court: Phyſicians being conſulted with upon it, judge his life was ſhortned by poyſon, not knowing the authour of ſo deteſtable a crime. The wicked man in the mean time gives cloſe counter-blows, and under-hand fixeth this ſuſpicion upon the innocent Queen. And, albeit, her behaviour (which did print innocency on the mild aſpect of her face) ſufficiently freed her before all good men; yet the intereſt which commonly ſtep-mothers have in the death of their husbands children, and the ſubtil ſlights of this devil (who coloured the matter with zeal of publick good) began to blemiſh a life which was as free from ſtains, as the brighteſt ſtars. The King is already half wavering, but loth to precipitate any thing in an affair of ſuch importance, he reſolved to conſult with the Oracles of that time, and to have recourſe to the lights of heaven, ſince they on earth were eclipſed. There was in thoſe dayes a religious woman in Flanders, who was thought to be endowed with the ſpirit of Propheſie, and to tell the moſt hidden things; to whom he reſolved to ſend the Abbot of S. Denis to ſatisfie him in the truth of the fact. La Broſſe, who expected a more ſpeedying diſpatch upon his informations, began to be troubled, and fearing this Propheteſſe might marre all; ſo wrought, that the Biſhop of Bayeux his kinſman agreed with the Abbot to undertake the journey of Flanders with him. He being very ſubtil, ſought to prevent the Virgin, and to accommodate her to his likings, wherein he could not prevail according to his wicked purpoſe; and it is likewiſe thought, ſhe let him ſee preſumptions pregnant enough againſt La Broſſe his kinſman. But he, ſurprizing her by way of conſcience, enjoyned her ſilence, ſaying, It was not fit for her to ſpeak, ſince her ſpeech might peradventure be the cauſe of the death of a man whom ſhe could not expoſe to this danger without mortall ſin. The Abbot, being come to acquit himſelf of his Commiſſion, found her wholly reſerved, and could get nothing out of her, which made him to ſuſpect ſome deceit. Both of them returned to the Court, where the Biſhop, being queſtioned by the King concerning his proceedings, ſaith, the religious woman had told him things under the ſecret of Confeſſion, which was not fit for him to reveal. To which Philip readily replied, that he ſent him not to hear her Confeſſion, but to know the revelations ſhe had from God in the diſcharge of Innocents. The Abbot ſaid aloud, he well perceived there was jugling in the Biſhops proceeding, and that he went not ſincerely to work, which was the cauſe that a ſecond Embaſſage was appointed to this religious creature, whereof Theobald Biſhop of Dol, and Arnulph a Knight of the Templers, had the Commiſſion; and they ſo well underſtood how to handle the matter, that ſhe ſpake in theſe terms. Tell the King, If any one hath ſpoken to him in an ill ſenſe of the Queen his wife; let him not believe it: for ſhe is truly, and ſincerely good, and cordially faithfull towards him and his, her virtue cannot be obſcured by the darkneſſe of Calumny. This anſwer cured Philips mind in the matter of ſuſpicion againſt Mary, and turned it upon his bad ſervants, although the want of proof permitted him not, to hazard the puniſhment was due to them.

But God, who draweth brightneſſe out of the boſome of darkneſſe, diſcovered the miſchief of La Broſſe by a notable accident. One of his truſty friends paſſing by the Abbey of S. Peter at Melun is ſurprized by a ſharp ſickneſſe; which made him think upon his laſt paſſage by the aſſiſtance of good Religious men of that Monaſtery; and finding himſelf touched to the quick with remorſe of conſcience, he declared his crime, and gave a little Casket to a Religious man who heard his Confeſſion, charging him to give it to the King with his own hands, and to no other; which he very faithfully did; and when they had opened this box of Pandora, there were diſcovered all the miſchiefs and practices of La Broſſe, and his hopes to be diſſolved. For he was preſently put in priſon and brought to his triall, which was followed by a Sentence that condemned him to be hanged and ſtrangled on a gallows of Felons. Here it was where the ambitious deſires of this diſloyall ſoul were to determine, who found that worldly fortunes in which God is not, are groſſe ſmokes that produce nought but tempeſts.

The French revengers of ambition.

6. To conclude; we find (in the laſt order) bloudy and furious ambitions which cauſe revolutions of Empire, and ſhake the pillars of the earth: Nicetas obſerveth one very terrible, wherein the French were witneſſes, arbitratours, and revengers.

During the expedition they made in the Land under Philip Gods-guift, there appeared a ſtrange accident, and a horrible confuſion in the ſtate of the Eaſtern Empire. Iſaac Comnenus, who held the reins of the Empire, is menaced much miſery by his neareſt allies, and thoſe whom he had advanced to the greateſt dignities. He thereupon conſulteth with a South-ſayer, who, among popular ſpirits, was in great reputation, but who, according to the opinion of Nicetas, was a cheating Impoſter that ſought to paſſe for a Prophet, although his words conſiſted of a thouſand falſhoods. The Emperour with much courteſie having ſaluted him; he diſpoſed himſelf to leap, and to expreſſe poſtures postures which favoured more of a man possessed and frantick, then of a prophet: notwithstanding, without saying any thing else, he threw his staffe at the Emperours Image, and (for an ill presage) put out the eyes of it. Isaac Comnenus, making no account here of contemneth the Southsayer, and in few dayes is deprived of the Empire and of his eyes (by a horrible conspiracy of Alexius his nearest kinsman) and in this condition confined to a loathsome prison all the rest of his life. The tyrant (who had put out his eyes) takes his bloudy spoil, and finding no resistance, possesseth himself of the throne of Constantinople.

The furious ambition of Alexius (the Tyrant of Greece) punished by the valour and Justice of the French.

Alexis, son of the Emperour made blind, escaped out of the chains and hand of the parricide his uncle, and goes to the French Camp, where he made a lamentable narration of his disasters. He prayes, he beseecheth, he conjureth these brave Conquerours by all things the most sacred, to take pity upon a miserable Emperour, and to succour his father against the most execrable treachery that ever was practised in the world, saying, It onely belonged to them to trample dragons, and monsters, under-foot. Besides the glory of this action; he promiseth them wonders, arms, ships, munition, to advance the design they had for the conquest of the holy Land. The French were divided in opinion upon this businesse: some desiring to pursue their journey, others judging, this occasion well deserved to stay them, there being not any actions in the world more glorious, then to do Justice to the afflicted, dispossesse bloudy usurpers of Empires, and to restore true Kings into that rank which nature and the consent of people had given them. This Faction carried it, and ours, using the advantage which their first fervours afforded them, put themselves presently in a readinesse to take Constantinople. One who should well weigh the exploits of arms they did in six dayes, would think their army had consisted of Giants, who bare Mountains and piled them one upon another, to over-look the strongest Citadels in the world. What they did exceedeth ordinary prodigies, and will scarcely find credit with posterity. Two thousand foot, separated from the rest of the army, aided onely by five hundred horse, entred into a city, wherein there were threescore thousand horse, and four hundred thousand souls able to bear arms. This so filled minds with terrour, that the tyrant, as timorous in warre as he had been violent in peace, leaves his place without resistance, and putting his richest treasures into covert, he goes to sea, in an instant to change a great Empire into Banishment.

He went out at one gate, and young Alexis entred in by the other, causing his troups to march in good order, and was with applause received by the chief Citizens who had used much compassion in the afflictions of his Father. There was then seen a strange alteration, when they went to take this poor blind Emperour out of prison, to carry him in triumph to his throne; he thought himself asleep, and in a dream, and imagined it so sweet, that he in his blindnesse feared the day-light. He learned from his son all the successe of this negotiation, and the valor us atchievements of the French. He knew not what he should believe, what he might hope, nor what to admire. A world of wonders overwhelm his mind; and more then ever he bewaileth the losse of his eyes, to behold himself bereft of the sight of these incomparable men who seemed to be sent from heaven.

Finally, he saith, he is satiated with Empire and worldly greatnesse, and that he putteth all his state into the hands of his son. His son embraceth him with all inexpressible tendernesse, calling him his Lord and Father, and protesting he will not intermeddle with any thing of the Empire, but the cares, whilst he liveth, leaving the dignity to his discretion who had given him birth.

The Father, on the other side, answered, that the piety of his son was more to him then all Empires, and that he hereafter should repute himself the happiest man in the world, being enlightned by the raies of such virtue in the deprivation of temporall light. This was an admirable strife, which made it appear that if there be impetuous desires in the Courts of great men, there are likewise sometimes to be found moderations, which surpasse all mens imagination. I am not ignorant Nicetas saith, that this affection afterward turned into jealousie; but we must note this Authour is passionate against Alexis and his father, by reason of the amity he contracted with strangers. The French judged it fit that the son should reign by the authority of the father, and in respect of his infirmities, take the whole government of the State into his hand, which he did, and all seemed to prosper in his beginnings; when, after the retreat of ours, who had made havock enough in the city, out of the liberty of arms; rebels stirred, who put the whole city into combustion, exciting it against the young Emperour, and saying, that under pretext of Publick good, he had called in strangers to the saccage of his Countrey, which made him unworthy both of Empire and life. The conspiring was so violent, that Alexis, having no leasure to look about him, was betrayed by one of his intimate friends named Mursuflus, who, pretending to put him into a place of safety, threw him into an ugly dungeon, where, twice having tried to put him to death by poison, and seeing his plot succeeded not; he out of a horrid baseneſſe caused him to be strangled. Deceitfull Felicities of the world! True turrets of Fayeries, which are onely in imagination! Where shall your allurements prevail from henceforth?

The poor father, hearing the death of his son, and the sudden alteration of affairs, saith,

Good God! to what calamity do you reserve my wretched old age? I have consummated evils, and evils have not yet ended me. I am now but a rotten trunk deprived of vigour, and the functions of life; and if I have any feeling, it is onely of my miseries. Take this soul which is on my lips and which is over-toiled with worldly Empires, and put it in a place where it may no longer fear either hostilities or treasons. Ah! Poor son, thou art passed away like froth on the water, and Fortune did not raise thee within the imaginary Circuit of her Empire, but to cast thee down headlong. I bewail not my blindnesse, it is the happiest of my evils, since it bereaves me the aspect of the horrible accidents which by heap passe through my ears. Dear Sonne! thou hast out-stripped me; but, I follow thee with a confident pace into the shades of death, which shall for me hereafter be the best of lives.

He gave up the ghost in these anguishes, whilst the city of Constantinople was divided by a thousand Factions, and turmoiled with fatall convulsions which minister matter of presage of the change of Empire.

The people, weary of the government of the Angels (whose names were Isaac and Alexis) had already chosen one called Canabus, a man before unknown, who was quickly put down by the power and violence of Mursuflus. He was a Prince arrogant, incontinent, and more cunning then prudent; who kept not long that Scepter which he by such wickednesse had usurped. For, scarcely two moneths and a half were past, but that the French returned, and besieged Constantinople which the new tyrant had already very well fortified. But the Grecians then were so cowardous and and affrighted that they made very little resistance, and flew before the French, and other Westrin and Northern people, as before so many Giants. Mursustus, as faint-harted in peril as he had been adventurous to commit a treason, puts himself upon the sea to flie into Morea; but is taken, and slain by the divine Vengeance which perpetually hath an armed hand over furious and bloody ambitions. The City and Empire of Constantinople yield, in the end, to the Western power: and Baldwin Earl of Flanders is chosen Emperour by the consent of all the army. Nicetas a Greek Authour, who lived at that time, deploreth this change with the Lamentations of Jeremy. But it was Gods judgement, who would purifie the Eastern Throne defiled by so many wicked actions, making a Prince so chast to sit thereon, that Nicetas himself is enforced to praise and admire his singular continency, as I have observed in my first Treatise.

Throughout all these Discourses we now see how the desires of the ambitious are chastised, and how their hopes being vain, their joyes are likewise short and unhappy.

7. Historians give most of our Kings this praise, that they never had turbulent and troublesome spirits; but loved Peace, and mainteined Justice. Moderation of the Kings of France.

The History of the Fathers of the West assures us, that in the generall combustion of Wars between the French and the English, there was a good Hermite named John of Gaunt, who ceased not to beseech heaven to quench the fire of these fatall Divisions, & that he was sent by God to meditate Peace between the two Kings.

He first went to our Charles the Seventh, whom he found infinitly disposed to all the conditions of a good Peace, and this gave him occasion to promise him infinite many benedictions from heaven, that he should have a Son (successour of his Estates) to crown his Felicities: which happened to him (as being a voyce from God, and an Oracle of Truth.) But when the Religious man came to the King of England, he would in no sort hearken to him, but caused him to be used in a manner unworthy his person; which drew the anger of God upon the Kingdome, and occasioned him great calamities.

This subject is so plentifull, that I am willing to abbreviate it: ambitious desires being so frequent that they have more need to be corrected, then sought into.

Observations upon ANGER and REVENGE.

BEhold here the Passion from whence sparkles, flames, and coals proceed, which make horrible havock, unless Grace and Reason cause some temper.

There is not any devil more familiar in Court, more injurious to civil conversation, more pernicious to States, then Choler and Revenge. Pride, which is born with the most eminent conditions, nourisheth it, flatterers enkindle it, insolent tongues sharpen it, fire and sword end it.

In some it is haughty and cruel; as it appeared in Dagobert, a young Prince, son of Clotharius the Second, who in his tendrest years, had (I know not what) of salvage in him, which savoured of the manners of Paganisme, or the humours of his Grandmother Fredegond; albeit, he afterward gained victories over himself. The King his Father had appointed him two Governours; Arnold, to rectifie his manners; Sadragesillus, to breed him up to Armes and Court-like behaviour. The first governed him like the Sun; the second, as the Northern-wind.

Aymonius l. 4. P. Æmilius. Annals of France.

The one insinuated himself with much sweetnesse; the other undertook him with too proud and arrogant an apgroach, which in him rather caused Aversion, then Instruction. From whence it came to passe, that he being one day invited to the Princes Table, where he did eat apart, as the Kings son: he placed himself right ouer against him, took Dagoberts glasse and drank to him: wherewith he was so desperately offended, that instantly he fell upon him, and taking a knife on the table, cut off his beard, and most contemptuously disfigured him.

Choler of Dagobert some what rough.

Sadragesillus, in this plight, presented himselfe to King Clotharius, who was likewise enraged, and caused his son to be pursued, commanding his Guard to apprehend him: but he saved himself in the Sanctuary of Montmartre under the protection of S. Denis, untill his fathers anger was pacified, who spared not to give him a sharp reprehension and to raise Sadragesillus to great dignities, to take away the acerbities of the affront he had received.

Another time, S. Arnold asking leave of the same Dagobert to retire from Court, out of the desire he had to passe the rest of his dayes in sweet solitude; the King many times denied him: and he growing a little earnest in a good cause; he furiously draws forth his sword, threatning to kill him if he persisted in this request. A Lord there present stayed the blow, and the Queen, shewing her husband the unworthinesse of his Choler, so gained him, that he came to himself, gave his Master full satisfaction, and permitted him to go whither he thought good, most affectionately recommending his person and state to him.

Seneca hath well said, that Choler was not a sign of a courageous, but a swoln spirit: as it by experience appeared in Dagobert who was little war-like. For, being but in one piece of service against the Saxons, where he received a very slight hurt; he made so many ceremonies about it, that he sent a lock of his bloudy hair to his father to implore his aid. It is true that this Prince, being in his youth a little unruly, hearkned afterward to the good reasons of his Councel, and became very temperate.

2. There are Martiall angers which are generous and bold, when a heart upon a good occasion is enflamed to the avengement of some Injustice; as it happened to Clotharius the Second, who coming to succour his son Dagobert presently appeared marching along the Rhine, and made himself remarkable by a notable head of hair: whereupon, Bertrand, Captain of the Saxons, darting some insolent words at him; the King suddenly passed the river with great danger of his person, observeth his enemy, pursues him, strikes him down from his horse, and cuts off his head, which he fixed on the top of a launce, to fill the Saxon Army with terrour. Thus should the anger of a great Prince be bent against proud and unjust adversaries, not against his own Subjects. This spurre hath sometimes added valour to the sweetest natures; witnesse Charles the Simple, who seeing that Robert had gathered together a huge army of Rebels against him, passed the river of Aisne to charge him; and the other putting himself into a readinesse to resist him, animating his own side, and braving in the head of his army; Charles looked him in the face, as the Butt against which he should unburden all his gall, spurs forward directly towards him, him, and so successfully hits him with a thrust of his lance in the mouth, that he tore out his tongue and killed him.

Generous anger of K. Clotharius.

Valour of Charles the Simple.

3. Yet Choler is extremely dangerous in matter of Arms, especially in things where some resolution is to be taken with counsel and maturity. For it troubleth the art (said an Antient) and many times causeth errours irreparable.

The passion of anger is very prejudiciall to Military arts in a General.

This is but too much verified in the fatall day of Crescy-field, where Philip of Valois, one of the most valiant Monarchs which ever handled Sceptre, gave battel to Edward King of England. The English Army bravely encamped, heard Masse, leasurely took its repast, and coolely expected the enemy, to fight with firm footing: at which time, our Philip animated with anger, and above all, fearing lest the English might escape him hastned his army what he could, causing it to march, and tyring it out on the day of battel. The Monk Baselius, a man wel experienced in feats of arms, shewed him, it were much better to expect till morning: on which he seemed to be resolved; but this Choler had already put fire into his souldiers: and although some cryed out, Stay, Ensign-bearers; yet those who marched before were so afraid to be out-gone by them who followed, that they had not the patience. When they came to joyn battel, the Genoway Archers who were in the French army, protested aloud, they were not able to do their duty, and instantly disbanded; whereupon the King grew into a fresh anger, and commanded to cut them in pieces, which with all possible violence was executed; ours being cruelly bent to devour their members, whilst the arrows of the enemy fell upon them like hail, and the horse gauled with shot, horribly neighing ran away with their riders, and all the place was covered with dead bodies. This trouble of mind cost the losse of a battel, wherein (Froissard saith) were eight French against one English-man, and thirty thousand men (where among others, the King of Bohemia, and Charles Count of Alençon the Kings brother) were slaine in the place. Behold the disasters of an ill-governed Passion, which never is well knowne but by the experience of its misery.

Philip of Valois, a great and a generous King loseth a battel, out of a peevish humour of anger.

4. There are other nice and haughty Cholers, which are brought forth in the Curiosities of an imperious life, as it happened to many Emperours who took a glory in being angry, and to make their brutishnesse famous by bloudy effects. Bajazet shewing one day the pleasure of hawking to the Count of Nevers, caused almost two thousand Falconers to be killed, for a hawk which had not flown well. He well deserved to be shut up in a cage (as he was afterward) for sporting with such prodigality with humane blood. It is much more intolerable, when Christian Princes flie out as did Lewis the young, who (being offended by Theobald Count of Champagne) entred into his territory, and made strange spoil, even to the setting of the great Church of Vitry a fire, and therein burning fifteen hundred men, who fled into it as into a Sanctuary. But this enraged passion knew no distinction between sacred and profane, and the confusion of this fancy confounded heaven and earth. Good French men abhorred an act so barbarous, and S. Bernard (who then flourished) made the thunders of Gods judgements to roar in the Kings ear, wherewith he was so terrified, that re-entring into himselfe, he fell into a deep melancholy, which caused his mind to make a divorce from all worldly joyes, wherewith he became so dejected, that he was like to die, had not S. Bernard sought to cure the wound he gave, shewing that the true penitent ought to be sad without discomfort; humble, without sottishnesse; timorous, without despair: and that the grief of his fall should not exclude the hope of his rising again.

Barbarous Anger of Bajazet.

Lewis the Young admonished by S. Bernard, chastiseth himself (for his anger) by sadnesse and penance.

But they are more tolerable who punish themselves with their own choler, as Henry King of England, that bit his lips gnashed his teeth, pulled off his hair, threw his bed and clothes on the ground, eat straw and hay to expresse his impetuous passion.

5. They who are arrogant, and given to contemne and flout others, draw fire and poison on their heads when they assail impatient natures, which have not learnt to feed themselves with affronts and injuries.

Danger of scoffing. Polydor. Virg. l. 9.

A word flying like a spark of fire raiseth flames which are not quenched but with great effusion of bloud. Philip the first, hearing that William the Conquerour, who was very grosse, would not suffer any man to see him, by reason of a corporall infirmity; It is no wonder (saith he) if this big man be in the end brought a bed. This being told to the other, who was of a capricious spirit, he protested he would rise from his child-bed, but with so many torches and lights, that he would carry fire into the bosome of France. And verily he failed not therein, and in this fury so heated himselfe, that he died in proper flames. A man hath little to do to enkindle a War at the charge of so many lives, for a jest, a cold countenance, a letter not written obsequiously enough, for a word inconsiderate.

William the Conquerour of England, very suspicious.

6. The Flemings were to blame, when revolted against Philip of Valois; they out of derision called him The found King, and advanced a great Cock on their principall standard, the device whereof was, that when he should crow, the found King should enter into their city. This so exasperated his great Courage, that he waged them a battel, and with such fury defeated them, that Froissard assureth, that of a huge army of Rebels, there was not one left who became not a victime of his vengeance. Lewis Outre-mer was detained prisoner at Roan, for having in his anger spoken injuriously against Richard, the young Duke of Normandy. And Francis the First ruined all his affairs, for having handled Charles Duke of Bourbon with some manner of indignity, therein complying with the humour of the Queen his Mother.

History of Froissard.

The scoffs of certain rebellious Flemings severely punished by the generosity of Philip of Valois.

7. The Anger of potent women is (above all) dreadfull, when they are not with-held by considerations of conscience, because they have a certain appetite of revenge, which exceedeth all may be imagined. Queen Eleonor, wife of Lewis the Young, who had as violent a spirit as ever animated the body of a woman, seeing her self repudiated by her husband, albeit, upon most just reason, conceived such rage & fury against France, that being afterward remarried to Henry of England, she incessantly stirred up all the powers of that Kingdome to our ruine, and sowed the first seeds of Warre, which, the continuance of three hundred years, which, an infinite number of fights and battels; which, the reverence due to Religion; the knot of mutuall Alliances, and Oath interposed in sixscore Treaties; could not wholly extinguish.

Anger of women.

Queen Eleonor an enemy of France.

Du pleix.

8. There are other angers free and simple, which proceed from an indiscreet goodnesse, but which fail not to occasion much evil to themselves when they assail eminent and vindicative people. It was the misery of poore Enguerrand of Marigny, who having governed the Finances under Philip the Fair (and afterward seeing himself persecuted by Charles of Valois unkle of Lewis Hutin Heir of a Crown) was transported with so much heat, that it cost him his life.

Annals of France.

Anger out of simplicity many times cause hurt for a word to offend, witnesse that of Enguerrand.

For this Prince sharply asking an account of him of the treasures of the deceased King; he freely answered, It is to you (Sir) I have given a good part of them, and the rest hath been employed in the Kings affaires. Whereupon Charles giving him the lie; the other

other transported with passion, had the boldnesse to say unto him, By God, It is you your self, Sir. This reply being of it self very insolent, and spoken at a time when all conspired to his ruine, sent him to the Gallows of Montfaucon, which he had caused to be built in his greatest authority. Men cold, and well acquainted with affairs, who commonly think much, never speak all of them that can hurt them.

9. All these extravagancies which we have produced, have proceeded from fervour; but there are others cold, and malign, as are Avertions and Hatred, which are no other then inveterate and hardened angers, so much the more dangerous as they proceed from a spirit more deep, and are plotted with more time and preparation.

So did Lewis the Eleventh who had many Labyrinths in his heart wherein he kep his revenges, and oftentimes took delight to send them abroad with ceremony and pomp, to take the more pleasure in them. So soon as he was King, he set himself to revenge his injuries, as if power given from heaven ought to be an instrument of passion. He persecuted a good subject (which was the Count of Dunmartin) for no other crime, but for having obeyed and executed the order of Charls the Seventh who had sent him into Daulphine, to stop Lewis who then turmoiled and perplexed the King his father. He prevented this plot, and fled into Flanders; yet ceased he not afterward to hate this good servant: and albeit he prostrated himself at his feet, praying him to forget what was past; yet he caused his processe to be made in Parliament, upon accusations, which did more manifest the Passion of the King, then any crime in the life of the Count. Notwithstanding, the close practise was so great that he was condemned to death: and although Lewis, terrified by his own Conscience and the generall opinion, would not have it to proceed any further; yet he confined him to the Bastile, where he had spent the rest of his dayes if he had not found means to save himself. But whom would he spare who put away and deprived of Office his best servants, for having hindered him during his sickneſſe to come near unto a Window, out of the care they had of his health? This passion was a Devil in the heart of this Prince, which made him odious to many, and filled his whole life with disturbance and acerbity.

Aymonius l. 5. c. 39.

Wicked revenge of an Abbot, and of John Prochytas against the French.

10. A revengefull spirit spares nothing to please it self, and oft-times openeth precipices to fill them with death and ruine. It is a strange thing, that one sole Abbot of Saint German de Prez named Gaulin had almost ruined the whole Kingdome of France, for having been bereaved of an Abbacy. He many years revolved his revenge, and after the death of Lewis le Begue (under whom he had received the injury which he proposed to himself) he went to Lewis the German, whom he enflamed with so much cunning to the conquest of the Kingdome of France, that he set a huge army on foot to surprize the heir of the Crown in the Confusion of his Affairs: and the trouble was so great, that needs must Lorraigne be cut off from the Kingdome of France, to give it to this Conquerour.

So did John Prochytas the Sicilian, who (having been deprived of his estate by Charles of Anjou) conceived a mortall enmity against the French, which made him contrive that bloudy Tragedy of Sicilian Vespres. This unfortunate man, disguising himself in the habit of a Franciscan, went to Peter of Arragon, to shew him the means how to invade Sicily: and seeing that he, and his wife Queen Constance, bent all their endeavour thereto, he ceased not to stir up the Countrey, where he had much credit, and used so many engines, that in the end he caused one of the most horrible massacres which was ever projected. On an Easter-day, in the time of Vespres, the French had all their throats cut throughout the Island of Sicily. No age, sex, condition, nobility, nor religious were spared. The black spirit of the Abysse drew men from the Altar to runne to the sword, which they indifferently thrust into the bosome of their guests: nor were so many cryes and lamentations nor such images of death flying before their eyes able to wound their hearts with one sole touch of compassion which useth to move the most unnaturall. Rage (blown by the breath of the most cruell furies of Hell) made them to open the bellies of women, and to dig into their entrails to tear thence little Infants conceived of French bloud. It caused the most secret sanctuaries of nature to be violated, to put those to death, who had not (as yet) the first taste of life. Shall we not then say, that the passion of revenge, which hath taken root in a soul half damned, is the most fatall instrument that Hell can invent to overthrow the Empire of Christianity?

11. All these accidents well considered are sufficient to moderate the passions which make so much noyse among mankind. But let us consider before we go off this stage, that Anger and Revenge are not creatures invincible to Courtiers who yet retein som Character of Christianity.

Glaber.

Great moderation in Saint (King) Robert.

Robert, one of the greatest Kings that ever ware the Crown of France, saw his two sonnes bandied against him, when (provoked by the practises of the Queen their mother, who ceased not to insult over them) they ran to the field with some tumultuary troops, and began to exercise acts of hostility which made them very guilty. The father (incensed by their rebellion, and forcibly urged by the sting of the mothers revenge) speedily prepares an army, and entreth into Burgundy to surprise and chastise them. Thereupon William Abbot of S. Benigne of Dion goeth to him, and shews that these disorders were an effect of the divine Providence which we should rather appease by penance, then irritate by anger: that, if his Majesty would call to mind, he should find that his youth was not exempt from errours committed by the inconsideration of age, and the practise of evil counsels: that he ought not to revenge with sword and fire that which he had suffered in his own person; and that as he would not any should enterprise upon his hereditary possession; so it was fit, not to meddle with that which was Gods, who had reserved vengeance to himself. This speech had such power that the good King was instantly appeased, caused his children to come, embraced them with paternall affection, and received them into favour, tying their reconciliation with an indissoluble knot. What can one answer to the mildnesse of a King accompanied with so much power and wisdome, but confesse that pardon is not a thing impossible? since this great Prince upon the words of a religious man layes down armes, and dissipateth all his anger, as waves break at the foot of rocks.

Helgaudus in vita Roberti Regis.

12. We must confesse, that Regality was never seen allyed to a spirit more mild and peaceable, and that his actions should rather be matter of admiration then example. He pardoned twelve murtherers (who had a purpose to attempt upon his life) after he had caused them to confesse and communicate; saying, it was not reasonable to condemn those whom the Church had absolved, and to afflict death upon such as had received the bread of life. But, what would not he have done, who, surprising a rogue which had cut away half of his cloke furred with Ermins, said mildely to him, Serve thy self, and leave the rest for another who may have need of it!

13. This mildneſſe is very like to that of Henry the Firſt, afterward King of England, who ſeeing his Fathers body to be ſtayed in open ſtreet (upon the inſtant of his obſequies) and this by a mean Citizen who complained the ſoil of the land where the dead (which was William the Conquerour) was to be interred was his Anceſtours inheritance; he was nothing at all moved, but preſently commanded his Treaſurer to ſatisfie the Creditour, and to proſecute the pomp of his Funerals.

Generous act of Lewis the Eleventh.

14. Lewis the Eleventh did a King-like act, towards the aſhes of the fair Agnes, who had poſſeſſed the heart of his father Charls the Seventh, and had perſecuted him (the ſon) in her life-time. At her death ſhe gave threeſcore thouſand crowns for a foundation to the Cannons of Loches, to pray, and to build a Tomb for her in the midſt of the Church. Theſe men (prudent according to the world) accommodating themſelves to the time, and honouring this riſing Sun (mounted to the throne of the Kingdome, after the death of his father) preſented themſelves before him, asking, they might be permitted to demoliſh the tomb of this woman who had ſo ill uſed him: but he with incredible generoſity anſwered, he made not war againſt the dead, and that ſo far was he from ruining the monuments of Agnes, that he would command his Treaſurer to give them ſix thouſand florins to preſerve them.

Humility and wiſedome of Queen Anne to overcome the paſſion of anger.

15. Sage and devout women, albeit the ſex is too apt for revenge, fail not to re-enter into themſelves, and blame their proceedings, when paſſion hath tranſported them out of the liſts of reaſon. Anne of Brittain ſeeing King Lewis the Twelfth very ſick and in danger of his life (upon the conſideration that he left her no male-child) cauſed a Ship to be rigged out, laden with great riches which ſhe ſent into her dear countrey, of purpoſe to retire thither ſo ſoon as the King were dead.

But, the Marſhall de Gié, who commanded in a City of paſſage, judging that his charge obliged him to let nothing paſſe out of the Kingdome during the Kings ſickneſſe, did without any other order upon this reſolution arreſt all the goods of the poor Queen. She was a Bee which lived in the ſweetneſſe of devotion; but yet had her ſting: ſo that being much provoked by this act, ſhe purſued the Marſhall, and made him come to a triall at the Parliament of Tholoſe, where he was condemned to be baniſhed out of France: But the good Queen calling back reaſon (after the ſtirring of her choler with-held the blow) granted liberty to the delinquent; proteſted he was a worthy Lord, and had proceeded in all he had done according to the rules of ſtate. Whence it appeareth, that thoſe cruell ſouls are moſt unreaſonable which perſiſt in hating, becauſe they have once begun; and never lay down a wicked hatred, for which they have no other reaſon but their own wickedneſſe.

Great and magnanimous goodneſſe of Lewis the Twelfth.

16. Lewis the Twelfth her husband might have taught her this leſſon, who having received ill meaſure under Charls the Eighth his Predeceſſour when he was Duke of Orleans, ſome flatterers counſelling him to ennoble his entry to the Crown by the beating down his adverſaries, anſwered in this memorable manner.

That it was not fit for a King of France to revenge the quarrels of the Duke of Orleans; and for this purpoſe he marked with a croſſe all the names of his enemies written down on paper: Whereat many wondred, thinking this note promiſed them nothing but a pair of gallows; which made them preſently fly, ſo much they were urged by their own conſcience. But he aſſembled them all together, and let them underſtand he had ſigned their names with a Croſſe, that they therein might behold the leſſon which the authour of life dictated unto us on the Croſſe, which was to forgive thoſe who perſecute us. Francis the First, his ſucceſſour following theſe ſteps, pardoned the rebellious Rochellers, moved by the pitifull clamours of a great number of little children who cryed for mercy at his entrance into the City. Our moſt Chriſtian King hath renewed the examples of the like clemency. I ſpeak nothing of the Chriſtian generoſity of Henry the Third, who ſeeing himſelf taken away from Throne and Life by a moſt deteſtable Parracide, left the revenge thereof to God in the ſharpneſſe of his wound. Henry the Fourth had a ſoul infinitely mild, and if we find in his life ſome humane defects, yet therein there are a thouſand divine virtues which ſhadow them by their great lights.

Incomparable mildneſſe of Lewis the ſon of Charlemaigne.

17. But, if we compare goodneſſe with offence; ſcarcely ſhall we find (throughout all the hiſtories of the Chriſtian world) a Prince who in this point hath equalled the virtue of Lewis the milde, ſon of Charlemaigne. This name coſt him an invincible patience, which made it well appear that a nature too eaſie is expoſed to infinite difficulties. His own children (Lotharius, Pepin, and Lewis) rebelled againſt him, and (out of a horrible daring) took Queen Judith from his ſides, whom he in a ſecond wedlock had married, cauſed her by force to take the veil, and holding a dagger at her throat, made her promiſe to perſwade her husband to forſake the world, out of their Ambition to uſurp his Sceptre, and to pull the Diademe from his head with hands of Harpies.

The poor Prince ſaw himſelf in one night abandoned by his army which ſlipt away before his eyes, and went to yield themſelves to his unnaturall ſons: but, ſome honeſt men ſtaying about him; he beſought and conjured them to ſave themſelves and to leave him alone in perill, ſince he was the victime of Expiation, and that his ſins had reduced him to this Calamity: and verily he went like a victime to the Altar accompanied with the Queen his wife and his grand-child Charles, to render himſelf up a priſoner into their hands, to whom he had given both livelyhood, and life. This heart truely-mild ſaid by the way to thoſe who lead him, Let my ſonnes do what they will with me, and all that God ſhall permit: I onely pray you (ſince I have never offended them) not to expoſe me to the fury of the multitude which commonly are very unjuſt to thoſe who are depreſſed, as you now behold me: and above all, I will ask this favour of them, that they abſtain from maiming any member of the Queen my wifes body, whom I know to be moſt innocent; or pulling out the eyes of Charles my grand-child, for that would to me be more bitter then death. In this manner he came to his ſonnes Camp, who hypocritically received him with all reverence, promiſing an uſage worthy his condition: and in the mean time aſſembled a venemous Counſell of maligne ſpirits to degrade him. The ſentence was given contrary to all form of Juſtice, by ſubjects againſt their Sovereign Prince; by children againſt their father; by guilty againſt the innocent, without hearing him, without ſeeing him; and on a ſuddain it was publickly executed at the aſſembly of Compiegne. Duplex.

This King, the beſt in the world, on his knees in the Church, in the preſence of his vaſſals, among an infinite number of people, held a ſcroule in his hand, which conteined the imaginary cauſes of his condemnation; they enforced him to read it himſelf; to open his mouth againſt his own innocency; to ask forgiveneſſe of the Aſſembly which did him an irreparable wrong. Then, to conclude this cruell ſcene; he is conſtrained to take off his belt, and to lay it on the Altar; to deſpoil himſelf of his Royall Robes, and to take from the hands of certain infamous Prelates a habit of pe-penance, with which he was put into the hands of the Guard, and a few dayes after, led along in Lotharius his train.

All Hiſtories mourn in the horrour of this narration, and there is not any who in his thoughts condemns not the Authours of this attempt. But this good King (being re eſtabliſhed by the endeavour of his beſt Subjects) did never purſue his injuries; witneſſing in all occaſions an extream facility to be reconciled to his children: and when, afterward he was upon the point of death, he rallyed together all he had of life, ſpirits, and ſtrength, to forgive them & asked of God that he would not take vengeance upon their crimes. This was to fulfil the whole law, and to do at the Court all that which the moſt perfectly religious can perform in a Cloiſter.

18. I will yet tell you for a concluſion, that there are certain induſtries, which they who are near great ones may uſe to appeaſe their Anger, and to divert the pernicious effects, by ſome delay, which is the beſt Counſellour this furious paſſion can have.

Argentre.

Addreſſe of Bavalon to appeaſe that anger of the Duke of Brittaign

This is to be ſeen in the courſe that Bavalon took with the Duke of Brittaigne. The Prince being offended with the Count of Cliſſon Conſtable of France, reſolved to take him in a ſnare, and undo him. To compaſſe this enterpriſe, he made a great feaſt, whereto he invited all the principall Lords of Brittaigne; courting Cliſſon with incomparable courteſie.

After all, he let him ſee his Caſtle of Lermine, where leading him from ſtory to ſtory, and from chamber to chamber; he brought him to the chief Turret, praying him to conſider the fortifications, to reform the defects, whilſt he ſpake a word to Seigneur Laval, brother in law to Cliſſon. He no ſooner entred in, but he ſaw himſelf arreſted by the Guard, and put into irons, with commandment given to Mounſieur Bavalon Captain of the Caſtle, to throw him (the next night) in a ſack into the water. Bavalon, who perceived his Maſter was very quick, and thought that night might give him better counſel, reſolved to do nothing. In the mean time ſolitude and darkneſſe having recollected the Dukes ſpirits together which had all day been ſcattered by the tempeſt of paſſion; he found his heart infinitely ballanced between the ſatisfaction of revenge, and the apprehenſion of inevitable dangers which would wait on it, imagining the ſhadow of the Conſtable, already drowned (as he thought) would draw fire, bloud, and havock upon his deſolated Countrey. The hideous viſions which already pitched battell in his diſtempered brain, the diſplayed Enſignes, and Armies heaped together from all parts, drew deep ſighs from him which were obſerved by the gentlemen of his chamber. Bavalon about break of day comes into his chamber, and being asked concerning the ſecret execution of his command, he anſwered, It is done, loth to open any more, untill he could clearly look into his maſters mind. The Duke upon this word beginneth his ſobbs again, with beating his hands, which teſtified great deſpair in him. But he inſiſting, and many times demanding whether Cliſſon were drowned; The Captain replyed, He was, and that he about mid-night had buried the body, fearing it might be diſcovered. Then began the Prince afreſh to curſe, and to abhorre his own anger which had tranſported him to this out-rage; and ſaid, Would to God, Bavalon, I had believed thee when thou didſt counſel me to do nothing, or that thou hadſt not believed me, when I ſo paſſionately commanded thee. His truſty ſervant ſeeing he ſpake in good earneſt, and that it was time to declare himſelf, aſſured him Cliſſon was alive; and that he had deferred his commandment, out of this conſideration, that, if he perſiſted in the ſame mind, he ſhould alwayes have means enough to execute him. The Duke (rapt with this prudence) embraced him, and gave him a thouſand florins, for finding out ſo excellent a remedy for his Paſſion.

Obſervations upon ENVY

Which draweth along with it Iealouſie, Hatred, and Sadneſſe.

WE enter into black and Saturnian Paſſions, which are Envie, Jealouſie, Fear, Sadneſſe, and Deſpair, wherein we ſhall obſerve a venemous malignity which repleniſheth the heart with plagues, the life with furies, and the world with Tragedies. I will begin this order with two Court-Monks who in their time made a great noyſe: one of which being born for cruelty, and bred in maſſacres; his life was a continuall crime, and his memory a perpetually execration.

Lamentable envy and enmity of Ebroin againſt S. Leger.

But the other (profiting by the experience of his evils) opened himſelf a way unto glory, and drew upon him the bleſſings of poſterity. Under the reign of Clotharius the third, Ebroin governed the State in the quality of the Major of the Palace, who was of a ſpirit ambitious, cruell, and ſubtle; valuing nothing above his own ends, and placing conſcience under all things in the world. He entred into this charge like a Fox, and ſwayed therein like a Lion; doing nought elſe but roar againſt ſome, and devour others; there being no power able enough to bend his pride, as if there were not riches enough in all the world to ſatisfie his avarice. God (who often-times ſuffereth not things violent to be long-laſting) gave an end to his tyranny by the death of his Maſter, whoſe reign was ſhort, and life moſt obſcure. He left two ſons, the eldeſt of which bare the name of Childeric, and the youngeſt was called Thierry. Ebroin ſeeing himſelf, like creeping Ivie, (which ſeeks a pillar for ſupport) not to ſtand fair in Childerics mind, whether this Prince were too clear ſighted, to diſcover his jugglings; or whether under the reign of his Father, he had otherwiſe uſed him then his condition deſerved; it made him arrogantly to adhere to Thierries faction, thinking he had power and credit enough to make an alteration both in nature, and State-affairs. He then raiſeth a controverſie in a matter which was ſufficiently decided by birth, and aſſembleth the Eſtates to deliberate upon it; where there were ſo many creatures, whom he accounted to be obliged to follow his liking, that the palm of ſo doubtfull a battell ſeemed to him already abſolutely gained.

There was then in France one Leger, a man of great birth, of an excellent ſpirit, of an eminent virtue, accompanied with grace of body, and other parts which made him fit for the Court.

His Uncle, who was a great Prelate, had very nobly bred him, giving him admittance into the Palace and his affairs; but, the ſweetneſſe of his nature, not born for much trouble, made him addict himſelf to the Church, and become a religious man, but was afterward taken out of his Monaſtery to be Biſhop of Autun.

His degree and merit then obliged him to be present at this Assembly, where it was treated of making a new King: and seeing Ebroin insolently supported the younger to the prejudice of Nature, and the laws of the Kingdome; he undertook to dissolve his busie practise, and to reduce misled minds, unto reason. Notwithstanding this violent Mayor of the palace ceased not openly to declare his design in full Assembly, in favour of Thierry; using many pretexts and colours which put a quite other face upon a businesse so unreasonable. Good men, who more feared his bloudy countenance and his irreconcileable enmities, then approved his reasons; looked one upon another, expecting that some generous soul should stand for truth: and all of them imagined, that having declared themselves with much weakenesse, and small effect; they might not serve so much for a support to Childeric's cause, as for an object of Ebroins revenge. Cruelties and Jealousies often ruine many good affairs; and they took the way to overthrow this, if Leger had not risen up, who spake with so much reason, grace, authority and courage, that he alone gave a countrepoise to Ebroins malice, and drew all the soundest in the Assembly to his side: where Ebroins adherents (seeing Truth carried as in Triumph by hands so courageous) did disband, studying more their own preservation, then to serve his ambition.

Childeric mounts up to the Throne which nature had prepared for him; Ebroin, who knew the main and manifest contradictions he had framed against his right, hath a soul full of affrightments, and already accounts himself for a dead mad; he searcheth for some sanctuary to hide himself, but findeth none more safe then Religion. Necessity makes a Monk, where piety could never make a Christian. He comes and throweth himself at Childeric's feet, offers him his head and life with most humble submission, by which he begged of the young King, that (if his goodnesse permitted him not to moisten the entrance into his Throne with the bloud of the guilty) his Majesty would please to confine him to a Monastery, to bewail his sinnes, and daily to die as many times, as he should call to mind his own Ingratiude. Childeric (who was not born to bloud, and who at that time had his heart busied enough with the joy of his victory (which is a time when Mildnesse costs him least) permitted him to retire into the Monastery of Luxeuil in Burgundy. Mean time, Leger (who had given such testimonies of his capacity, Courage, and fidelity) is put into Ebroins place, and undertaketh the absolute government of all the affairs of the Kingdome.

His virtue should have dispensed with him at this time, not to give others occasion to think that he had beaten down Ebroins tyranny, of purpose to raise himself upon his ruines. But there are certain chains of Adamant in charges, and Court-dignities, which oftentimes captive the most austere. His Rivall bursts with anger to see him lifted up to this dignity, when his calamity enforced him to be tyed to a Coul, which is a piece he never had thought was for his purpose. He was a strange Hermit, like to Nicephorus (Gregoras his fox) who, being blacked over with ink, counterfeited the Monk, and told the poultrey, he much repented him to have used them so ill, but that hereafter they might confidently converse with him, since his habit and condition permitted him not to live otherwise then innocently. This miserable man had no other repentance, but that he had not prospered in his ambition; no other poverty, then the impotency of taking away others mens goods; no other obedience, then the hypocrisie of his submission; no other singing, then the sorrows of his fortune; and no other Religion, but his habite. All his prayers tended to nothing else but to demand some change of State, that he might change his fortune; whereas Leger (taking wayes quite contrary in his government) made Religion, Justice, and Peace to flourish.

His zeal opposed impiety; his equity, injustice; his sweetnesse, violence; and his authority carried all that was reasonable. But, there is a certain unhappinesse in the mannage of state-affairs which makes a man hate his own quiet; and virtue too regular, is often troublesome even to those it intends to oblige.

Leger is offensive to some, because he makes them more honest then they would be: to others, because his lights manifest their darknesse; whilst others think that, in the newnesse and change of a Minister of State, they shall better make up their own reckoning. Childeric himself takes a distaste against the faithfullest of his servant; and whether that Ebroins faction breathed this passion into him, or whether it proceeded from his licentious youth, or whether his humour felt too much constraint in the innocent severity of the manners of his Mayor of the Palace; he shewed him not so pleasing a look as he had accustomed. He, desirous more efficatiously to sound the Kings opinion, most humbly besought him to give him leave to passe the Feast of Easter in the city whereof he was Bishop, which Childeric easily assented to. But perverse souls (who enkindled the fire of division, under colour of friendship) told the good Prelate, that the easinesse his Prince had witnessed in this late occasion, was but a bait to undo him, and that he had resolved to cause his person be seized on, of purpose to murder him. One fears all from a power that taketh the liberty to do all; which was the cause that Leger entred into great affrightments upon this news, and resolved to leave the Court, to free himself from Envy and the dangers which threatned him. He communicateth his intention with his greatest confidents, who are nothing of his opinion, and they shewed him he must not yield to a little stormy gust, but rather die in the midst of the waves (holding the helm in his hand) then to forsake the vessel: that his flight would give matter of suspicion to the King; of advantage to his enemies; and of confusion to his own friends: and that (hitherto) there was not any sign of disgrace which might make him to begin, where the onely extremity of evils might constrain him to end. Notwithstanding, whether fear had taken too much hold upon this good Prelates mind, or whether his conscience reduced into his imagination the repose of those innocent dayes he had spent in the Monastery; he takes a sudden resolution, not to forsake the world by halves; but by laying down the government of the affairs of the Kingdome, to rid himself also of his Bishoprick. The conclusion of this businesse is followed by a speedy dispatch; which made the King wonder, who sent trusty persons to invite him to return, and to give him assurance of his good affection towards him; but his zeal had its ear in heaven, not to hearken to the perswasions of the earth. He goes to the Monastery of Luxeuil, where he sees Ebroin, who was there held as a fettered beast, and not in a condition to bite. The Abbot, who knew the differences that were in Court, fearing, lest hatred might hatch its egg by the help of a religious habit, caused them to be reconciled, and to talk together, although he had separated their abode, fearing that too frequent conversation might in them awaken their former aversions. Time slideth away very quietly with them, untill the arrivall of a very unexpected accident. Childeric (after the departure of S. Leger) uſeth the greatneſſe of his power licentiouſly, and ſoileth both his Name and Dignity with inconſiderate actions; which quickly made this great Miniſter of State to be deplored, and all the Envy to be caſt upon the King, for having ſo eaſily diſmiſſed him. The contempt of his perſon began ſo to creep into the minds of his ſubjects, that defamatory Libels went abroad upon his Paſſions and Government, which ſeemed to have no other aim, but the weakning of his Authority. He thought to quench a coal with flames, and entreth into outrageous anger againſt thoſe whom he ſuſpected to raiſe any queſtion upon his actions.

useth

He cauſeth a gentleman named Bodil to be taken, and having cauſed him to be tyed to a poſt, he commandeth him to be ignominiouſly whipped, contrary to the manner of ordinary puniſhments; which occaſioned ſo much acerbity in the Nobility, that all in an inſtant rebelled againſt him. Bodil, tranſported by the fury of his Paſſion, and encouraged by the number of his Complices, out of a horrible attempt, kills Childeric whilſt he was a hunting: and paſſing on to the Palace, extendeth his revenge (like a devil fleſhed in maſſacres) to the perſon of the Queen (great with child) whom he murdered. The Court is drenched in deep deſolation; the pillars of the State totter; there is need of able men to free them from this danger. The friends of Ebroin and S. Leger (who ſought their own ends in the employment of theſe two) invited them with urgent reaſons (covered with the good of the State) to return to the world; aſſuring them that all France went to ruine, if they ſupported it not. Ebroin (to whom South-ſayers promiſed wonders, and who, under hope he had to forſake the Monks Coul, had already ſuffered his hair to grow, to be the better diſpoſed for all occaſions) ſhewed himſelf nothing hard to be perſwaded.

S. Leger therein uſed more reſiſtance; but in the end ſuffered himſelf to be overcome, leaving the ſweetneſſe of Solitude to enter again into the troubles of the world; which never paſſeth unpuniſhed, but in ſuch as do it by the Laws of pure Obedience. He is received into his Biſhoprick as an Angel, and his friends do all they can to bring him to the Court, and to gain him a good eſteem in the Kings mind, who ſeemed to ſtand in need of ſuch a ſervant, to purchaſe the more authority among the people who with much ſatisfaction had taſted the ſweetneſſe of his Government. Ebroin (on the other ſide) ſeeing Thierry (Childeric's brother) had taken poſſeſſion of the Kingdome, was very confident of his return; having formerly been of the faction of the young King: But he being neglected; Leudegeſillus, an antient favourite of Thierry's, had undertaken the government of affairs. The furious Monk ſtorms like a madman for the dignity of Maſter of the Palace which he had poſſeſſed; and being unable to creep into it by mildneſſe, he entreth thereinto by open violence. He rallieth together all his antient friends; in this new change of State, he gathereth a tumultuary army, and flyeth into the field with ſo much ſpeed, that he almoſt ſurprized the King with his Favourite, to uſe them at his diſcretion. Neceſſity enforceth to offer candles and incenſe to this devil; he is ſought unto for peace; great recompences are propoſed to his crimes: his ambition takes no ſatisfaction but in the object of his deſign. He draweth Leudegeſillus to a Conference under ſhew of accommodation; and (being a man without Faith or Soul) he killeth him, emptying his place by a murder, to repleniſh it by a Treachery. Notwithſtanding, he lets Thierry know, his arms were not taken but for his ſervice, and that he had no other purpoſe, but to reduce all powers under his Sceptre. The other was in a condition of inability to defend himſelf; which made him reſolve rather to take him for a ſervant, then to have him for a maſter. In the end; this horrible fury (hidden under the habit of a Monk) never ceaſed until it carried him to the neareſt place of a Royall Throne. So ſoon as he was poſſeſſed of his former dignity, he bent all his powers to vengeance, and thought upon nothing but of ridding his hands of ſuch as had croſſed his fortune. S. Leger was the very firſt he aimed at in his wicked plots; he diſpatcheth troops to make havock about the city of Autun, and gives commands to murderers, (executioners of his revenge) to lay hold of his perſon.

The good Prelate (who heard the lamentable cryes of the people) afflicted by the deteſtation of theſe hoſtilities, went forth, and preſents himſelf before theſe barbarians, as a victime of expiation, to deliver himſelf over to death, and to ſtay the ſtream of the miſeries which overflowed his dioceſſe. He was prepated to make an Oration, but (they as Tygres, which had no commerce with muſick) preſently fell upon him; and having taken him, they pulled out his eyes, to lead him in triumph to Ebroin. He had already poiſoned the ear of the young King, having ſet forth this ſage Biſhop, as the moſt execrable man on earth, and the moſt capitall enemy he had in the world. There remained nothing (but to produce him in this ſtate) fully to accompliſh the contentment his bruitiſhneſſe did aim at.

He at the ſame time cauſed Guerin (S. Legers brother) to be taken; doubly to torment him in that he moſt loved: and having preſented them both before the King; he beginneth to charge them with injuries and ſcorns; the Saints eclipſed eyes, and faces covered all over with bloud nothing mollifyed the heart of this Polyphemus. Captivity tyed not the tongues of the two brothers, nor exceſſe of miſeries dejected their courages. They ſpake with all liberty what might be expected from their conſtancy; rendering thanks to God, that he in this world had chaſtiſed them with temporall puniſhments, as true children; and menacing Ebroin with an eternity of torments, which, the anger of God reſerved for the exorbitancy of his wickedneſſe. This cruel creature, who expected ſome more pliantneſſe in ſo great a miſery, was immeaſurably offended, and inſtantly commanded them to be ſeparated, and Guerin to be ſpeedily put to death.

He received the ſentence of death with great fortitude, embracing his blind brother with all unexpreſſible tenderneſſe, and encouraging him to the laſt conflict, with words full of the ſpirit of God. After this, he is bound to a pillar, and knocked down with ſtones. Ebroin, who would reliſh his revenge by long draughts, found out in his heart inventions of a hangman, to torment Saint Leger, cauſing him to walk on ſtones as ſharp as razours, and appointing his face to be disfigured, by cutting out his tongue, his noſe, and lips, to ſend him from thence a priſoner to the Monaſtery of Fecan. All this was executed, yet the patience of this incomparable man (by ſo hideous torments) no whit ſhaken, bleſſing God for all theſe things, and inceſſantly praying, and forming ſome ſtuttering inarticulate ſounds, to inſtruct and exhort thoſe who viſited him.

A while after, he is called again before this Tyrant, who made a ſport of his pains, and ſought to make him end his life by deſpair, to kill the ſoul with the body. But when he perceived his heart was of ſo ſtrong a temper, and that the dreadfull horrour of a poor body (carried up and down among ſo many tortures) made nothing for his reputation, he gave order to Chrodobert to put him to death; and inſtantly he was delivered to four executioners who led him forth into a forreſt, which retaineth the name of S. Leger. The bleſſed blind man perceiving his hour approached, ſaid to them, I ſee what you go about to do; Trouble not your ſelves, I am more ready to die, then you to execute me. Thereupon, three of the murderers relenting, proſtrated themſelves at his feet, and craved pardon, which he very freely granted, and putting himſelf upon his knees prayed for his perſecutours, recommending his ſoul to the Father of ſouls; at which time one of theſe four executioners perſiſting in his obdurateneſſe cut off his head. The wife of Chrodobert took the body, and interred it in a little Chappel, where it did great miracles which have deſerved the veneration of people. Some time after, the deteſtable Ebroin (continuing the wickedneſſe of his bloudy life) was ſlain in his bed like another Holophernes, and ſuddenly taken out of the world, not ſhewing any ſign of repentance; to be reſerved for an eternall torment.

Behold all which Envy, Jealouſie, and the Rage of a man abandoned by God can do; which letteth us manifeſtly ſee, that there are not any men in the world worſe then thoſe, who, degenerating from a religious profeſſion, return to the vices of the world. And on the other ſide, we may behold in the perſon of S. Leger, that there is not any Paſſion which may not be overcome; nor honour which may not be trodden underfoot; nor torments which a man is not able to ſet at naught, when he with ſtrong confidence throws himſelf between the arms of the Croſſe, there to find thoſe of Jeſus Chriſt.

LAUS DEO.

FINIS.

THE HOLY COURT.

VVritten in French by N. CAUSSIN, S. J.

The Fifth Tome,

Containing the Lives and Elogies of Persons of the COURT most Illustrious, both of the Old and New Testament, &c. divided into five ORDERS:

Monarchs and Princes. Queens and Ladies.
Souldiers. States-men.
Religious men.

Printed M. D C. L.

To the Reader.

Having employed my first Volumn in pious and profitable discourses, I have purposed to set forth in this fifth Tome a sufficient large Court to serve for example. Which I have done by uniting to the Histories which I have already published these which I have here added a new, which are almost all taken out of the holy Scriptures, and handled in a style more solid and contract, then specious and enlarged.

If this Work hath somewhat delayed its coming forth into the light, it hath been businesses other wayes coming upon me, that hath staid it. We have had adversaries to deal with, very well known, that have by their Requests and by their Libels exceedingly troubled themselves to molest us. I have answered them in two Books after a long silence, for that the necessity did seem so to require, and Authority therein did expresly command my obedience. I have done it with the greatest modesty and sincerity that I was able; and I may with confidence say, that it hath been to the satisfaction of people of quality and desert.

Since, as I understand, they have continued their Replies, where they largely witnesse their sharpnesse, against me. But what offence have I committed, if in a Cause so good, and by order from my Superiours I have undertaken the Defence in generall of a Society, in which I have lived near these fourty years, and have never learned any thing therein but Wisdome and Virtue? They have so little matter, that they are compelled to use old News-books against me, which have spoken nothing, but what hath been interpreted to my honour. I have served God, the King, the Queen, and all France, without ever offending any person, they might be ashamed to reproach me with that which hath been so much for my credit, and to imitate those people that threw their Gods at the heads of their enemies for want of arrows.

God keep me from losing so much time as to reade their Writings, or any desire to answer them. I should seem to have lost my understanding, if I should busie my self in fighting against Shadows and Lies put into Rhetorick, so fully refuted by our Justifications, and so manifestly condemned by the judgement of the Queen Regent, and the rest of the Powers that have acknowledged and maintained the Innocency of this Society against all Accusations.

These Books of evil Language are intolerable to all honest people, and even odious to those that are rationall of their own party, in so much, that I pity their Authours, to whom the pains of so great a Volumn with so little successe hath already served for a large punishment.

Instead of Replies to all those slanders, I do sincerely offer up Prayers to God for our Persecutours, that he may please to kindle in their hearts his holy Love, which may purge out this gall of bitternesse, this carnall wisdome, and cause them to bring forth the fruits of Truth, Justice, and Charity.

The which I have endeavoured to do in this Work wherein I conceive that I have acquitted my self of the promises that I made to the Publick by treating on the true Histories of great Personages, and especially those whom the holy Scripture hath honoured by its style, for the edification of all the world.

It is in these illustrious Representations that the mind contents it self; it is here that it contemplates the Virtues of famous Persons, like the beams of the first Magnitude; it is here that it quickens it self to the imitation of their glorious deeds, and that it fore-stalls the delights of its own immortality. It is here that it learns to endure adversities without departing from the duties of its Calling, and firmly to keep its Constancy like the shadow in the Quadrant, that remains immoveable under the blasts of the most furious winds, not forsaking the measures of the Sunne.

Receive therefore (courteous Reader) the fruits of this my labour sprung up in the midst of a tempest, that it may find calmnesse in thy favourable acceptance.

THE MONARCHS.

THE wiſeſt of Monarchs ſpeaking in the holy Scripture unto the Princes of his age, and proceeding at large to give a full warning to all thoſe that ſhould bear part in their honour, and imitate their lives, delivereth theſe words by way of Oracle. Hearken O Kings, not onely with an ear of fleſh, but attend with that of the underſtanding and heart, to give entrance thereby to the Spirit of God. If you eſteem it a moſt glorious honour to govern innumerable people, and to behold from the throne of your Magnificence, Nations bending under your Sceptres; Know ye, that this Power which lifts you ſo high above the reſt of mortals, is borrowed from Heaven, and is a gift which hath its originall from God, who is the Sovereign of all Monarchs of the World. It is He that will examine all your works, and ſearch into the ſecreteſt of your thoughts. You forget, that notwithſtanding all the ſervices that men render to you, you are but the Servants and Attendants of this powerfull King: You have not judged ſincerely; you have not kept the laws which your ſelves have preſcribed, nor rendred juſtice to your Subjects, nor walked according to the commands of Him whoſe perſon you repreſent. This is the reaſon, why He will appear to you ſuddainly and terribly, ſeparating your ſoul from your bodies. You ſhall ſee Him on His Throne of Juſtice, compaſſed with terrours, and you ſhall know that He exerciſes moſt ſevere judgment over thoſe that bear Rule over men. All thoſe poor people, which tremble under your power, ſhall be lovingly and mercifully dealt with by God; but the mighty ſhall be mightily tormented, if they behave not themſelves as they ought; and ſhall know that the greatneſſe of their Sovereign Authority ſhall avail them nothing, but to ſerve to augment their juſt puniſhments.

The words of the wiſeman directed to the Kings of his time. Sap. 6.

There are no plagues more fatall to the deſtruction of Princes, then thoſe, who (under colour of raiſing their authority,) would make themſelves great by power to commit (and that without puniſhment) all kind of enormities. Royalty is an Invention of God, appointed not for the benefit of the Kings, but of the Common-wealth. It was not inſtituted for the vain-glory of men, but for the ſafety of the World; and Princes are more for the peoples ſake, then the people for theirs.

The end of Royalty.

All the great things were made to ſerve the leſſer. The Sun (the Prince of Lights, and the heart of Nature,) ſerves as well for the eyes of a little fly, as for thoſe of a Monarch. The Ocean within that its monſtrous extent of Seas and wonders, tenders its ſervice to the little Fiſh encloſed in a ſmall ſhell, which cannot ſubſiſt without its attendance: The one poſſeſſes not the leaſt beam, nor the other the leaſt drop of water, which it employes not for the Commune.

Great things were made for the leſſer.

The Eternall Father would not that the great things ſhould be great in vain; but that they pay for their greatneſſe, by the favours and cares they are to take for the little ones. Thus God commanded Moſes to carry all that great people that he had brought out of Egypt, to ſerve them all as a mother: and (if we will believe Saint Baſil of Seleucia) Kings are made to bear the World.

Orat. 2. in Adam.

In antient time they were lifted up upon Bucklers on the day of their Conſecration, to cauſe them to underſtand, that they ought to ſerve for a Buckler for their whole Realm. Nature hath made neither King nor Subject amongſt Men. Kings are not born Kings, but by the conſent of thoſe people which have made themſelves a Law to obey him whom God ſhould declare to them by his birth, or whom themſelves ſhould make by Election. Royalty is a power of all the particulars united together in one man, to be applyed and exerciſed according to the Law.

The practice of Romulus to be noted. Navar. l. 1. c. 9.

When Romulus founded the Monarchy of Rome, compoſed of divers people that offered themſelves to him, he expreſly ordained that every one ſhould bring to him ſome of the earth and fruits of his countrey, whereof he compoſed a maſſe, and cauſed it to be buried in a great pit which he called the Word: intending to ſhew by this ceremony, that Royalty is a heap of Wills, of Powers, of Riches united in one onely Power. This is a borrowing which Kings make without obligation to reſtore again, but with obligement to render it better. They ought to do as the Bees, which take of the flowers, to make Honey thereof. They ought to temper and bring to perfection the Virtues and Qualities of the whole Communalty in their own perſon, to compoſe thereof the publick happineſſe.

Targum & Navarinus. l. 4.

Wherefore do you think that the antient Hebrews planted trees at the birth of the children of their Kings, which they held as ſacred, and dreſſed them with careſull diligence, to make thereof one day thrones for thoſe little Monarchs, when they were come to the Crown; but onely to teach them, that they ought to cover the people with their protection, and to enrich them with goods; as the tree defends men from the tempeſt with its leaves, and nouriſheth them with its fruit? They are not properly Maſters in a ſtrict ſenſe, for that the Maſter may do whatſoever he will with his goods without giving account thereof: But a King cannot uſe his ſubjects, but according to the law: he muſt entreat them, as the Goods of God, for that he is accomptable therefore to the Sovereign Judge of Heaven and Earth, whose Stewart he is for a certain time, and not proprietary for ever. If he abuse this truft, although the people cannot recall the authority, which they have given to him, and which hath been eſtabliſhed of it ſelf by a long preſcription; nevertheleſſe he is anſwerable to the Divine Majeſty for all that he doth.

Navarrus in Manual. The Divines hold that a King which ſhould reign onely for his own honour and pleaſure, would ſin grievouſly, and put himſelf upon hazard of looſing his ſalvation.

Royalty a glorious ſervitude. To ſpeak then the very truth, Royaltie is a very great obligement, and a glorious ſervitude, and he that ſhall well conſider all its burthens, would not ſo much as ſtoop to take up a Diadem lying on the ground,

Doctor Navarrus and other Divines, that treat of the duty of Princes, ſay, That to be a King, is to be the peoples man, who is charged before God upon the perill of his ſoul; to take care of their affairs, and to maintein them in peace, as far as ſhall be lawfull and poſſible: to defend them from their enemies, to render juſtice to them by himſelf or his officers. That is, to chooſe men of ability and virtuous, to undertake thoſe charges; to watch over their actions and their behaviour, to chaſtiſe the evil ones that trouble the publick quiet, and to recompence the good ones: That is, to keep the Laws, to root out abuſes, to cauſe piety and good manners to flouriſh, to ſtop all injuſtice, corruptions and exactions. As alſo to facilitate tradeing, to order the conducts for Souldiers, to take care for the reparations of publick Buildings, for Ammunition and proviſion, for the health and conveniency of his Subjects, and to exact nothing of them above their ability: and that which is exacted, to husband it for their benefit, to employ the cuſtomes with the greateſt fidelity, as the bloud of men redeemed by the blood of Jeſus Chriſt: This is, to take order for the Education of Youth, to honour the Church, and perſons of deſert, to Authorize good Magiſtrates, to have a particular care of acknowledging the good ſervices of men at Arms, which do ſacrifice themſelves in a thouſand occaſions for the Common-weal. It is to have great compaſſion on the poor, eſpecially Widows and Orphans, to hear willingly the Petitions of thoſe that are afflicted and oppreſſed, to take thought for all, watch for all; to do that in his Realm, that the ſoul infuſed doth in the Body.

Royalty a mervellous profeſſion. It is too much power to ſay that which Nero ſaid by the tongue of Seneca, Among ſo many mortals, I am the onely one choſen in heaven to performe the office of God upon earth: I am the Arbitratour both of life and death, I am the diſtributer of fortunes, the favours that come from above are not beſtowed but by my mouth: I cauſe the rejoycings of cities and countreys, nothing flouriſheth but by my favour. If I ſpeak but a word I make a million of ſwords to come forth of the ſcabberd, and if I command, I cauſe them to be put up again. It is I that give, and take away liberty, which make and unmake Kings, which remove nations, which lay waſte rebellious towns, which hold the happineſſe or unhappineſſe of men in mine hands.

What other thing is this that he vaunts, and ſo proudly boaſts himſelf of? but onely to confeſſe himſelf reſponſible to God for ſo great an account: whereof this miſerable Emperour acquitted himſelf ſo ill, that having lived like a beaſt, he dyed like a mad-man. There is no man worthy to reign, but he that can tremble at the very ſhadow of Royalty.

Great Princes the workmanſhip of God. Great Princes are not made by the ſuffrages of men alone, but by the finger of God: they are born in Heaven by the Divine Decrees, before they appear upon earth by humane birth. To ſpeak the truth, there are wonderfull qualities required to make a well-accompliſhed King; and this is a thing more hard to find then the Phenix neſt. When the children of Iſrael had this conceit that Moſes was loſt, they repair to his brother Aaron, and intreat him to make them a God, to ſit in the place of their Conductour, as if they meant to ſay; after Moſes, no leſſe will ſerve them then a Deity. Nevertheleſſe, God hath never ſuffered that there ſhould be a perfect Monarch in the World, in whom nothing hath been wanting; for there would have been a hazard, leſt he ſhould have been taken for a God, and thereby have cauſed a perpetuall Idolatry. Very rare.

The Heathens have made Gods of ſome Emperours vicious enough; what would they not have made of perfect ones, ſeeing that men naturally do bear a certain reverence towards virtue? Look a little narrowly into the life of the greateſt Monarchs of the World, as of David, Cyrus, Alexander, Julius Ceſar, Auguſtus, Conſtantine, Charlemagne; and you ſhall find that all thoſe beauties, which have ſo dazled the eyes of the World, have had their ſpots, and the moſt part of the reſt have inherited a Renown but little commendable; that is, To be none of the worſt amongſt many bad ones.

Whatſoever excellency the moſt famous of them had, proceeded from the eſpeciall gift of God: and whatſoever meanneſſe was in them, proceeded from themſelves; who alwayes mingled ſomewhat of Man with the work of the great Work-maſter. Nevertheleſſe, good Inſtructions are very uſefull for Princes, to rouſe up and make active the endowments they have from above: yet it is not in thoſe Panegyricks ſo well compoſed that they learn their duty; for, there they may ſooner learn to forget it (when being puft up by thoſe flatteries) they think themſelves to be in deed, that, which they are there, but in flouriſh.

It is not my intent here to diſcourſe at large how Princes ought to govern themſelves, but to contract in a few words that which is neceſſary for their direction, and I am perſwaded that the Scripture, Saint Lewis in his Teſtament, and Lewis the eleventh in that Treatiſe which he compoſed himſelf for the inſtruction of the King his ſonne, have ſaid hereto ſufficient, and that the rules of reigning well cannot be drawn better from any then thoſe that have been of the ſame profeſſion.

The perfection of a Prince may be comprehended within theſe five Qualities, Piety, Wiſdome, Juſtice, Goodneſſe, and Valour. Piety fits him for God: Wiſdome, for himſelf: Juſtice, for the Law: Valour, for Arms: and Goodneſſe, for the whole World.

Piety, or (to ſpeak more properly with Saint Thomas) Religion is a virtue, that appropriates Man to God, and makes him to render that honour that is due to him as firſt Originall, and chief Lord of the whole frame of Nature. Syneſius in that excellent Treatiſe that he made for the Emperour Arcadius concerning government, ſayes, That this is the foundation on the which all firmneſſe ſubſiſts. This is that ſpirit of life, which Kings do breathe from heaven which fills their underſtanding with enlightning, their heart with Divine love and confidence, their Palace with holineſſe, and their Kingdome with a Bleſſing.

It belongs to a King above all, to be Pious and Devout towards God, even by the Title of Royalty it ſelf. Who ſhould honour that higheſt Majeſty, more then his Vicegerent here on Earth? Who ſhould repreſent his virtues, more then his image here below? Who ſhould render greateſt thanks for his favours, more then he that receives them in the moſt abundance? beſides the the obligement that binds the Prince unto this virtue; he finds the chiefeſt intereſt there. Proſperity for the moſt part is found on their ſide, which honour the Deity, ſaith Titus Livius in his Hiſtory. And Ariſtotle who proceeds by way of Policy onely, counſels a Monarch to be exceedingly religious, for that thereby he will be more beloved and reverenced by his ſubjects, which expect leſſe evil, and more good from a Prince which is joyned to God by Religion. This alſo procures him an aſſurance in his affairs; and makes his proſperity the ſweeter, and adverſities the leſſe afflicting.

God who is the Maſter and Teacher of Princes, doth ſo ſtrictly recommend this virtue to thoſe Kings, that were made more eſpecially by his own election, that he commands them to receive from the Prieſts a copy of the Law of God, or elſe to tranſcribe it with their own hand, to carry it alwayes with them, and to reade it all the dayes of their life, to learn thereby to fear the higheſt King, and to keep his inſtructions.

Now the Piety of a Prince ought not to be ordinary, but it ought to excell in three things chiefly, in an inward ſence of the Deity, in his worſhip, and zealous affection. An Antient ſaid, That he which believes the Gods, makes them, and that they have no need of our Sacrifices, but that they would have our Heart. The King ought to acknowledge God with a very deep ſenſe of Piety, as the chiefeſt eſſence, the chiefeſt light, a Trinity within an Unity infinite, an Eternall Spirit, whoſe Power is Almightineſſe, whoſe Will is the higheſt Reaſon, and whoſe Nature is nothing but Holineſſe: That he is a Myſterious Silence, a Lovely Terribleneſſe, an Immenſneſſe of Glory, which Sees all, and Knows all, from whom all Beings have their riſing, which gives and takes away Empires, before whom the World, and all its Kingdomes, and all its Monarchs, are but as it were ſmall atoms moving within that immovable Beam. This ſenſe will cauſe the Prince to tender his Crown and Perſon at the feet of God with a perfect humility, and whole dependance on him in all things: he will learn the myſteries of our faith, and all the great maximes of Religion, not for diſputation, but to believe and adore them.

The ſervice of God. In proſecution of this deep ſenſe, it behooves him to profeſſe the outward worſhip and ſervice for the performance of his duty, and the example of his people: as by his aſſiſting at divine Service with great reverence; honouring the holy Sacrament, ſhewing himſelf exceeding devout towards the moſt holy mother of God, towards the Angels and Saints; frequenting confeſſion and the Euchariſt, hearkening willingly to the word of God, and regulating his prayers and daily devotions, by the advice of thoſe that direct his conſcience, and above all accounting it the chiefeſt devotion to be carefull of his people, juſt in his Government, and full of compaſſion towards the afflicted.

It is alſo expedient to take heed that the Prince in this do neither too much, nor too little; it is not fitting that he take upon him the devotion of a Prieſt or Religious man, which might a little diminiſh the credit of his profeſſion, nor that he ſhould likewiſe become too careleſſe and negligent in Divine matters, for fear leſt he fall into Libertiniſm which is the gulf of all misfortunes.

Zeal. True Piety in a Monarch ſhineth forth moſt of all in zeal, which is a moſt ardent love of the honour of God; and to attein to this, he ought above all to keep the Law of God, avoiding all grievous and ſcandalous ſins, and he ought continually to take care, that God be ſerved in his own houſe, and throughout his whole Realm.

That Blaſphemies, Sacriledges, Hereſies, Simonie, and all impieties be ſcattered and vaniſh by the beams of his power: That the Pope, which is the Father, and chief Shepheard of all Chriſtendome, be reſpected with a holy Reverence. That the Biſhops be honoured and mainteined. That the Church be provided of good Paſtours: That the Clergy live under Rule and comelineſſe, and that it be mainteined in its rights. That Hoſpitals, Monaſteries, and Religious-houſes be protected and preſerved in their eſtates. He ought not to ſuffer in any manner whatſoever, according to the order of Lewis, that ſacred placed be violated in the Warrs which may happen between Chriſtian Princes. He ought to have an earneſt zeal and indefatigable for the advancement of the Faith and Religion, and according as the times and occaſions ſhall permit, to employ his arms and perſon to ſubdue the pride of Infidels and ſet up the Standard of the Croſſe. This is the portion which God reſerves for Chriſtian Princes, which ſhould never partake of true honour, but that which is encloſed within the glory of Jeſus Chriſt (ſaith Julius Firmicus to the children of Conſtantine) Nevertheleſſe in deſigns of war againſt the Infidels, nothing ſhould be too fervently haſted, under pretence of zeal, to the prejudice of the Realm; but to attend the coming in of God, which knowes the times and opportunities, and that ſometimes gives in without much labour, which men at other times undertake without good advice, and with little ſucceſſe.

Wiſedome doth very excellently agree with Piety, as being a ſcience of Divine and Humane things, not idle, but with an active reliſh and skill for the directing of our life. If a Prince do not ſtudy to get this wiſedome, he is ignorant of his profeſſion, and makes himſelf contemptible to his ſubjects. He is given by God to his Kingdome, as the Soul to the Body, and how can he then ſubſiſt without underſtanding? He is given as the Eye, what can he do without Light? He ought himſelf to be the Light, and would it not be a ſhame for him to be covered with perpetuall darkneſſe? The King ſhall reign and ſhall be wiſe, ſaith the holy Scripture: this is the onely thing that Solomon deſired of God at the beginning of his reign: and he gave him this requeſt in ſuch a manner, that he repleniſht him with a wonderfull ability. Jer. 23. 5.

The greatneſſe of Wiſdome. Wiſedome maketh a man more worth then a thouſand, it multiplies it ſelf into many heads, and gathers together the riches of the Univerſe into one onely heart. The Wiſeman draws an harmleſſe Tribute from the Learning of all ages, he learns the lives of all, for to husband well his own; he enters into thoſe great labyrinths of time paſt, as into his own houſe, he makes uſe of ſo many rare inventions of the beſt wits of the World, as of his own Patrimony. You may ſay that the Soul of a learned Prince hath run through many Ages in divers Bodies. Wiſedome maketh him to paſſe through long wayes with ſmall charges, and to diſcover the whole World without going out of his Cloſet: He learns, he diſcourſeth, he judgeth, he approveth, he condemneth; that which is paſt, makes him profit by that which is to come: Good Counſels do enlighten him, and even the follyes of others erect him a Theatre for Wiſdome.

What the wiſdome of a Prince ſhould be. Yet he muſt take heed, leſt of a Prince becoming a Philoſopher, he ceaſe not to be a King: he ought not to ſtudy onely to know and diſpute, but to have the knowledge and practiſe of Excellent things: To think to become wiſe by the reading of Books onely, is like thinking to be hot by the remembrance of fire. He muſt of neceſſity traffick with his own underſtanding, with his own experience: and that he may profit by Teachers, he muſt be a teacher to himself. I would not that all Princes should be such Philosophers as Marcus Aurelius the Emperour, nor so Eloquent as Julian the Apostate, nor so curious in every Art as Hadrian. It is a Science which comes very near to ignorance, to studie for that which will profit nothing, and to take the pains to learn that which would be better unlearned.

Hielel. Autor. Hebræus excercetse in Coronat. 1. Lege.

Seeing that the Scripture is the Book of books, and that the Antients called the Bible the Crown; a King ought not to be ignorant thereof; yet not to make himself a Divine, but thereby to learn his duty. Naturall Phylosophy (which sets before us the great spectacle of the Creatures, thereby to ascend to the Creatour) is not unprofitable for a good understanding: that which teaches to reason and discourse is good for every occasion: but the Morall, Politicall, and History make up the best part of a Kings Library; and if hee make a little digression, into Musick and Painting; it cannot but be commendable.

Promote that knowledge that puffs not up vain spirits; but that rather, which humbles the solid ones: for, by learning that which we know not, we understand our Ignorance; and know by experience, that one might make a great Library of that which is beyond the knowledge of the most learned in the World. There are none but those that know little, and which know ill, who take upon them to have a sufficiency of knowledge: they crackle like little Rivulets, whereas the greater Rivers run quietly. That Prince, which by reason that he hath studied will carry all his counsell in his own head, shews that he hath little profited by his study: for in this mortall life, a man is so far wise, as he seeks still to become so: but, after that he thinks that he hath atteined it, and hath no more need of others help; then he begins to be out of the way. The use of wisedome is to become wise, as that of the eye, is to see.

The wisedome of a King may be seen by a reasonable tincture of Learning, by the knowledge that he hath of himself, and the frail flourishing of all humane things, by the discreetnesse of his words, by his modesty in prosperity, by his constancy in adversity. It will shew it self by a Greatnesse, without Affectation; a Majesty, without Pride; an Humimity, without Contempt; a Comelinesse, without Striving: where every thing declares a King, without any shew of making him seem so: it will shew it self by its Temperance, by the moderating of his passions, and by Prudence in the government of his life and estate.

This is to have deeply studied; to be able to overcome his Anger, to disarm Revenge, to moderate a Victory, to overcome Concupiscence, to regulate his Affection, to keep under Ambition, to restrain his Tongue, to over-rule his Delights, to asswage his Discontents, to live like a Saint, and speak like an Oracle. This is exceedingly to have profited in wisedome: to be able to proceed in all affairs according to the laws of true prudence, But, the false maketh that its principall which is but the accessary: it takes Greatnesse and Pleasures for the chief ayme of a Kings life, it consults little, it judgeth ill, it decreeth nothing. But the true Prudence can look unto the end, can take a right mark in all businesses, it doth all things with advice, it brings Judgement without Passion in all occurrences, and gives an effectuall order for the performance of all that which hath been wisely concluded: the remembrance of that past, the understanding of the present, and foreseeing of that to come, makes up its whole perfection: a quick apprehension prepares, an accuteneſſe works it, good advice orders, foreseeing confirms, and performance crowns it. It is by these steps that a Prince ascends to the Throne of wisdome, which is an unestimable Gift, and the true favour of the Deity.

Saint Lewis, whose life might have been the school of the ablest Philosophers, although he bore in his mind the best maximes of Empires, yet ceased not to reade good Books, and as he had seen in the time of his imprisonment in the East, that a Sarazen Prince had a Library of the Books of his Law, he caused the like to be made at his return in his Palace, where he spent many hours, and would converse freely with men of learning and desert. Demetrius Phalereus advised Kings to instruct themselves often by reading, for that there one may learn of the dead, which they cannot know by the living.

The next to Wisedome followeth Justice, which performs in a manner the chief duty that is required of a Prince: and Royalty, seems to be nothing else but an excellent science of Justice; as Justice is taken for that habit of virtue, by which we render to every one the right that belongs to him. Tertullian said, That Goodnesse had created the World, but that Justice had made the Concords thereof. This wise mother of Harmonies ceaseth not to open an ear to the dissents that are made in the World, to correct the disagreeing Voices by its own love, and to bring all to its own end: Ambition inventeth extravagant sounds, Covetousnesse sends forth enraged cries, tyranny makes an infernall Musick: but Justice corrects all these excesses, and if it meet with valiant and incorrupt souls to serve it as an instrument, it sends forth incomparable Melodies which delight the ears of God, and rejoyce the whole fabrick of Nature.

There are two great Virtues which make all the equalities of mans life, Truth equals the understanding to all the objects; and Justice, the hearts to that which is right.

Lying and Injustice make every where great inequalities which fill Kingdomes with Disorder: Consciences with Crimes, and the World with Confusion. But Truth and Justice render light to dark things, strength to feeble, certainty to doubtfull, and order to the confused.

We naturally take a delight to behold the fair bow in heaven, which compasseth the air with a crown of glory: but Alcuin the School-master of Charlemagne writes, That that which makes it the more admired is, for that amongst its other beauties, it carrieth the ensigns of Justice. It shews the fire and the water, in its red and blew colours, to instruct us that Justice holds the fire in its power to consume the wicked, and the water to bring refreshment to those scorching heats of calamities that trouble the miserable.

Justice is Gods profession, and an Antient said, that his continuall exercise was to weigh the hearts and the works of men, and to distribute rewards, and ordain chastisements according to the good and ill deserving of every one in particular. The Scripture saith, that he is glorious and magnificent, but that these magnificences are chiefly seen upon the mountains of wounds and robberies, when he beats down with an invincible arm the great ones of the earth, loaden with the spoils of iniquitie. The Hebrews said, that God took such delight in Justice, that he had bestowed even the Saphires of his own Throne to engrave the Law thereon.

The Saviour of the world is named the Just by the holy Ghost in the writings of his Apostles, not in dissimulation, but by his Essence. All the great Imitatours of God have honoured this quality, and have held it in the number of their deareſt delights. Job maketh it his crown and his garment: David, his virtue: Solomon, his wiſdome: Joſias his love: Auguſtus, his exerciſe: and Trajan, his honour. The memory of ſo many Conflicts, Sieges, Battels, Conqueſts, Triumphs, whereby the life of this great Emperour was ſo famous, are found but in the record of a few lines: but that which remaineth engraven in the memory of all Ages, is an Act of Juſtice which he performed even then when marching forth of Rome in great ſtate to go to the warres (as I have related in the firſt Volumn) he hearkned to a poor widow-woman which deſired Juſtice of him; he alighted from his horſe to underſtand her buſineſſe at large, and reſtored her to her right before he departed thence. Which thing did ſo wonderfully aſtoniſh S. Gregory, that he prayed, as they ſay, for the Soul of Trajan, and ſaved it: the which the Doctour Alphonſus Ciaconius juſtifies in a learned Treatiſe, although the Cardinall Baronius be of another opinion.

of

By all this, it is apparent and manifeſt, that a Prince ought to have eſpeciall care above all things, not onely to be juſt, but to make it appear both by his words and deeds that which he bears in his heart. He is the greateſt King, according to the Philoſopher Diogenes, which is the juſteſt; and if he be without Juſtice, he is nothing but an empty Name, and a ſhadow of Royalty. The moſt excellent thing that a King can do in that his Dignity (ſaid the ſame Wiſe-man) is to worſhip the Deitie; to ordain Laws; to conduct Armies; and all this is to be done Legally, according to the rule of Juſtice. The people feel it not if he be devout, if he be ſober, if he be diſcreet, if he be chaſte; but if he be unjuſt this is a publick miſchief: this all preſently feel, as if the Sunne ſhould go out of his bounds, or if ſome malign Conſtellation ſhould cauſe burning or flouds to happen upon the earth. King Nebuchadonozor is repreſented in the Prophet Daniel, by a Tree, under the which the fowls made their neſts; and under the which, the other living creatures remained under covert; to give us to underſtand, that Princes ought to ſtretch forth their Power, even like branches, to protect their Subjects by rendring them Juſtice.

A true Prince (to ſpeak as Caſiodore doth) ought to ſerve for a Temple to Innocency: for a Sanctuary to Temperance: for an Altar to Juſtice. You therefore (O Monarchs!) that take delight in the glittering of your Crown, know ye, that it is given you from above, to be Gods Vicegerent, rendring to every one that which belongs to him. You ought to watch like an Angel over your whole Eſtate, and not to ſuffer at any time that the ſmalleſt things ſhould be deſtitute of your tendereſt cares. Hearken to that which God ſpeaks to you by his Apoſtle: Maſters, render that which is juſt and right to your ſervants; ſeeing that you cannot be ignorant, that you have a great Maſter in heaven to whom you muſt give an account of your actions. Hearken to that which he commands you by his Prophet: Do Judgement and Juſtice, deliver thoſe that are oppreſſed from the hand of the perſecutours: Take good heed you afflict not the ſtranger, the orphan, nor the widow. The Juſtice of private perſons is manifeſt in their particular commerce, but that of a King hath other kind of beams to make it appear and be beheld in its glory.

Jer. 21.

Acts of Juſtice in puniſhment and reward.

If you be a true King, as Nature hath not given you an hundred mouthes to ſpeak, nor a hundred hands to do all that is neceſſary with your Government; it is fitting that you make a good choice of thoſe to whom you commit the managing of your Arms, of your Revenues, and of your Laws. Never ſuffer you, that your Name which is ſacred, and your Authority which is inviolable, ſhould ſerve for a pretence to wicked ones to oppreſſe your Subjects. The huntings of men are for the wild Boar, the Wolves, and the Foxes; thoſe of Princes ought to be after the Outrageous, the Robbers, and Tyrants.

All offences are but the overflowings of Injuſtice: there can be nothing chaſte (ſaith S. Auguſtine) where adulterers are; nothing ſafe, where robbers; nothing out of danger, where murderers. If the ſword of the Prince, the revenger of iniquities, do not ſtop the audacious, cities become forreſts, and forreſts everlaſting terrours; if there be not Laws for men and puniſhment for offences. Corrupt nature would never make an end of offending, if Gooemment reſtrained not its enterprizes. The chiefeſt care of him that is ſet over people, is to take away the evil and the evil-doers, that honeſt people may live in ſafety: for this cauſe are Kingdomes, Magiſtrates, Arms, Laws; the world would be nothing but robbery, and the life of man confuſion, if Juſtice did not ſuppreſſe the violence of diſordered affections. But to ſpeak the truth, the Prince that ſhould be ſevere in puniſhments, and ſhould have an heart lockt up at rewards, would be as it were lame of one arm: he ought equally to be ready to chaſtiſe offences, and to recompence well-doing. When the Government of Kings is ſo looſe, that vices come in requeſt and thoſe that commit them, it is almoſt a kind of ſin, then to do well: and when virtues are ſo unhappy as to be deprived of the honour which is due to them, it is a ſcandal of that age, and the ſhame of Crowns.

It is not ſufficient to appoint Judges to hear and determine of ſuits, he muſt be well informed of their proceedings and their actions, he muſt ſometimes imitate S. Lewis, which gave judgement under an Elm about the differences of his Subjects, and conſecrated the Woods and the Fields by the ſincerity of the Oracles that went forth of his mouth.

The Emperours of Conſtantinople heard likewiſe the controverſies of their people; and as Codin ſaith, when one party pleaded, they held one ear uncovered, and covered the other; to ſignifie, that they kept it for the adverſe party.

It is a weakneſſe of judgement to go about to decide a buſineſſe, having heard but one party; one ought to have an ear ſomewhat hard at ſuch diverſity of reports, which are made by parties diverſly intereſſed in a buſineſſe, otherwiſe it is to be feared, that a long repentance will quickly follow a ſhort determination.

Civil Juſtice is exerciſed within Bars, and on Judgement-ſeats; but the Military hath been oft very much neglected by ſome former Princes in its time, when having loſt the opportunity of making a good Peace, they have afterwaids made an unhappy Warre.

Thoſe Judges that buy Juſtice, it is a very great chance if they do not ſell it; and thoſe Souldiers which are not paid by the Taxes levied for that end, are as it were authoriſed to pay themſelves by the permiſſion of ſpoils and plunderings. Our Laws and our Age may bluſh, when the Roman hiſtories tell us, that one Scaurus, conducting an Army, oftentimes lodged in the fields, where there were trees loaden with fruit, and yet the ſouldiers durſt not lift up the hand to gather one onely: the paſſing by of a great army left every thing in the ſame order in which it had found them. And amongſt Chriſtians, one Regiment onely of Souldiers hath often made a deſolation in the Countrey, and affrightment in the towns, and as many ſackings, as quarterings. Thoſe which ſit at the Stern of Empires and Common-wealths, are greatly accountable to God for that which hath paſt in this buſineſſe. Kings ought not onely to maintain Juſtice by their Arms, but to teach it by their behaviour, and to conſecrate it by their examples. The Doctour Navarrus hath ſet down divers ſins againſt Juſtice, by the which Princes, Common-wealths, and Lords may offend againſt God mortally; as, to take unlawfully the goods that belong not to them, and to keep them without reſtitution. To govern looſely and negligently their Kingdomes and Principalities. To ſuffer their Countreys to be unprovided of victualls and defence neceſſary, which may bring their Subjects in danger of being ſpoiled. To waſt and conſume in charges, either evil or unneceſſary, the goods which are for the defence of their eſtates. To burden exceſſively their ſubjects with Impoſts and Subſidies, without propounding any good intent therefore, and without having any neceſſity (not pretended, but) true and reall. To ſuffer the poor to die with famine, and not to ſuſtain them with their Revenues in that extremity. Not to hearken to reaſonable conditions for a juſt Peace, and to give occaſion to the enemies of the Chriſtian name, to invade their Lands and root out our Religion. To diſpenſe either with the Law of God or Nature. To give judgement in the ſuits of their Subjects according to their own affection. To deceive their creditours, to ſuppreſſe the Liberty and Rights of the people, to compell them by threatnings or importunate intreaties to give their goods, or to make marriages againſt their wills, or to their diſadvantage. To make unjuſt Wars; to hinder the ſervice of the Church; to ſell offices and places of Charge ſo dear, that they give occaſion to thoſe that buy them to make ill uſe thereof. To preſent to Benefices with Cure of Souls, perſons unworthy and ſcandalous. To give Commiſſions and Offices to corrupt and unfit officers. To tolerate and permit vices, filthineſſe, and robberies by their ſervants, and to condemne to death, and cauſe to be ſlain unjuſtly without due order of Law, and to violate the marriage-beds of their Subjects.

All theſe things and others which this Doctour hath noted, cauſe great ſins of Injuſtice in the perſons of great ones, unto which they ought eſpecially to take heed: and to prevent the ſame, it is moſt neceſſary that they be inſtructed in the duties of their charge, and in the eſtate of their affairs, bending themſelves thereto as the moſt important point of their ſafety: and ſeeing that the paſſion of Hatred or Love, which one may bear to ſome perſon, will trouble the judgement and pervert Juſtice; S. Lewis counſelled the King his ſon ſtrongly to keep his heart in quiet, and in the uncertainty of any differences, alwayes to reſtrain his owa affection, and to keep under all movings of the ſpirit, as the moſt capitall enemy to Reaſon.

Many Princes have often loſt both their life and Sceptre for giving themſelves to ſome unjuſt action; and there is no cauſe more ordinary, for which God tranſlates Kingdomes from one hand to another, then Injuſtice; as on the contrary, thoſe Princes which have been great Juſticiaries do ſhine as the ſtars of the firſt magnitude within Gods Eternity, and even their aſhes do ſeem as yet to exhale from their Tombs a certain ſavour, which rejoyceth people, and keeps their memory for ever bleſſed.

Goodneſſe, its Excellency.

But one cannot believe the rare mixture that Juſtice and Goodneſſe make joyned together: Goodneſſe is an eſſence profitable and helpfull, which ſerves as a Nurſe to Love; it hath its originall in the Deity, and from thence diſperſeth it ſelf by little veins into all created Beings, and mixeth it ſelf with every object, as the light with every Colour. It drives away, and ſtops up evil on every ſide, and there is no place, even to the loweſt hell, where it cauſeth not ſome beam of its brightneſſe to ſhine. Beauty which amazeth all mortall eyes, is but the flower of its eſſence; but Goodneſſe is the fruit thereof, and its ſavour is the ſavour of God which all creatures do taſte and reliſh. God, which as Caſſiodore ſaith, is the cauſe of all Beings, the life of the ſenſes, the wiſdome of underſtandings, the love and glory of Angels, having from all eternity his happineſſe complete in his own boſome, hath created man, that he might have to whom to do good, as Gregory Nyſſen writes: and S. Cyprian ſaith, that this eternall Spirit did move upon the waters from the beginning of the world, to unite and appropriate the Creature to its ſelf, and to diſpoſe it for the loving inſpirations of its Goodneſſe.

The Prince, which according to the obligement of his Charge, would make himſelf an imitatour of God, ought to be exceedingly good, with four ſorts of Goodneſſe; of Behaviour, of Affability, of Bounty, and of Clemency. I ſay, firſt of Behaviour, for that there is ſmall hope of any great one, which is not good towards God; which keeps not his Law, and rules not his life thereby: if he have any virtues, they are all ſophiſticate, and if he do any good, it is by ebbing and flowing, by fits, and for ſome ends. No perſon can be truly good towards others, which doth not begin with himſelf; he muſt needs have Chriſtian Love, without which, no man ſhall ever ſee God: if he poſſeſſe this virtue, he will firſt have a love of honour to thoſe which have begot him, a conjugall love for his wife, a cordiall love to thoſe of his bloud, and all his kindred: from thence it will ſpread it ſelf over his whole houſe, and through all his eſtate, and will cauſe him to love his Subjects with a certain tenderneſſe, as his own goods, and as the good ſhepherd cheriſheth his flocks. He will imitate our Lord, which looked from the top of the mountain upon the poor people of Judea that followed him, and his heart melted for them; with ſingular compaſſion. Herein doth truly conſiſt the virtue of Piety which gives ſo great a luſtre to the life of Princes.

Now, according to the Goodneſſe that is in his heart, he muſt needs pour it forth upon all his, by theſe three conduit-pipes that I have ſaid, of Affability, of Liberality, and of Clemency: Affability, which is a well ordered ſweetneſſe both in words and converſe, ought to increaſe together with a Prince from his tender age. This is a virtue which coſteth nothing, and yet brings forth great fruit; it procures treaſuries of hearts and wills, which do aſſiſt great ones, when need requires.

A good word that cometh forth of the mouth of a King, is like the Manna that came from heaven, and fell upon the deſert. It nouriſheth and delighteth his Subjects: it hath hands to frame and faſhion their hearts as it pleaſeth him: it carrieth with it chains of gold ſweetly to captivate their wills. The command that cometh with ſweetneſs, is performed with ſtrength invincible, and every one naturally delights more to obey him, that ſeemeth to entreat in commanding, then a power that cometh with an armed hand, and threatens to root out that which refuſeth it.

It is fitting, nevertheleſſe, that the Prince diſpenſe his favours, according to the deſerts of his Subjects, for it would be a great inequality to be alike to all the world. Affectation oftentimes ſpoils the profeſſion of courteſie, and when one gives too many words at too cheap a price, and almoſt indifferently to every one, it maketh one think, that they are none of the ſincereſt: falſe gold is too high in colour, and a diſſembling courteſie is too glorious in appearance: this deceiveth ſome which are not accuſtomed to it, and have no great skill in discerning, carrying it self like the Ivy as fairly over crackt pillars as sound ones; but those which are better advised are quickly wary of empty courtesies, when they with good reason expect better effects. Kings, although they are great, are not able to enrich the whole world, there are very many which must be contented with good words, but to think alwayes to escape paying with this coin, is to deceive himself and the whole world.

skill

There are so many hungry ones, which cannot feed upon flowers, which expect gifts and rewards, after they have been at great charges, and run through great hazards for the glory of the Prince and the good of the State, that it is necessary, really, to acknowledge their services.

The Prince which thinks himself bound to give nothing or very little, betraies his birth, shews himself to be lowly minded, and of as low a fortune, having little reason to expect a great harvest from that field where he sowed nothing; he declares his too much greedinesse after temporall goods, and if he knoweth little what the love of his Subjects is worth, he heaps up the Indian Clay, and neglects that patrimony of hearts, wherewith God, as rich as he is, contents himself: it happens oft that he finds himself afterwards in the midst of thorny affairs, where his silver without friends serves for nothing but to lose.

But although it behoveth him to give, one can hardly say how difficult this profession is to do it rightly, there can be no greater losse then to give away all, and to give unadvisedly to those which deserve least. He that gives too much and above his ability, destroyes his liberality intending to confirm it, for that by giving too much, he taketh the way to be able no more to give any thing. John Michel in his Anatomy of a Body Politick saith, that the Doctour Bricot in an Oration which he made to King Francis the Just, shewed him that he was like to S. Francis, whose name he bore; that his hands were pierced, and could hold nothing, as it were, which he gave not away; and if that he took not heed, this would consume all his Revenues, and that thereby he would make more poor in his Kingdome then Saint Francis had drawn to his Religion.

Those Sovereigns that starve their people to nourish the unsatiable greedinesse of some particular, are like those mountains that bear fruit, not for the use of men, but for the birds of prey; they give to a few, that which they take from the whole, and oftentimes fatten full monsters and abominable ones with the bloud of the Publick, that they make the ground to tremble under their feet, and the heaven to thunder upon their heads. Others give that which they can hold no longer; as, Manuel Comnenus, which offered his silver to his souldiers then, when he was in the hand of the Sarazens. Others give after an evil manner, more for that they are not able any longer to deny, then with intent to gratifie. Others give slowly and little, in such a fashion, as after they have long time fed mens hopes with wind, they pay them at length almost with smoke. Others repent themselves presently for having given that which they could hold no longer, and have no other content by their liberality, then to repent of their hastinesse. He that would be truly liberall and magnificent, will avoid all these rocks, he will give with good advice according to his ability, and with a comely grace, to the poor Gentry, to the Souldiery maimed by his service, to Churches, to Religious Persons, to people of Virtue, Knowledge, and Desert, which do shew themselves profitable for the Publick.

But to say truth, it is a great gift to pardon that by Clemency, which one might justly punish by Justice: this is that admirable quality that Kings have, and neareſt approaching to God; they cannot create, they cannot raise men from the dead, and yet to give safety and life to a man, is to give him, as it were, a second Creation, it is to give him a being without a not being, and to bestow on him a Resurrection without causing him to taste of death.

What would a man do which should suddenly be made an half-God, and which should be transported amongst the stars? what would he dream of? in what businesse would he take most pleasure, unlesse it were to do good; and amongst all good, to give and preserve the foundation of all the rest, which is life? There is nothing more glorious then to be able and not willing to revenge an injury; the power makes the greatnesse of Majesty, but the good will giveth its perfection.

The Hebrews said, that the chiefest work of God was Mercy, that he dwelt in his Tabernacle from the beginning of the world unto the day of judgement, and that giving all the rest of the time to Clemency, he reserved but one day for Justice.

Away with those Kings of the Macedonians, that would appear in their statelieſt walks with the head of of a lion; this was not to shew their greatnesse, but to testifie their brutishnesse. The heart of the King (saith the Scripture) is in the hand of the Lord: within that hand that doth nothing but open it self to fill every creature with a blessing from heaven to earth; how can it take then there any thought into it self of rage, of killing, or of sacking? It ought to be mercifull even in punishing, taking great heed to do nothing by way of revenge, but doing all by Goodnesse.

Clemency doth not exclude Justice, but moderate it, and if it suffer the life to be taken away from one that is faulty, it is to preserve a thousand Innocents. It is a cruelty to pardon nothing, but it is a double cruelty to pardon all, seeing that one cannot equall the evill to the good, in so great an inequality of lives and manners, unlesse one overthrow a whole State. It behoves him wisely and with good advice to discern, that which is worthy of pardon, and that which is worthy of punishment; there are pestilent crimes, scandalous, and which draw great consequences with them, which the Prince cannot leave unpunished without condemning himself. There are other faults committed by errour, by frailnesse, by surprize, by strong inducements, mighty temptations, and those that have yielded once thereto, have done a thousand other worthy actions, to blot out the memory of one ill. If Clemency hath no place in such occasions, it will have nothing to do about a Prince, and if it find no employment with him, it is to be feared that the vengeance of God will find work there to busie it self.

The wisest of Kings is of opinion, that this virtue is the foundation of thrones; whence it follows, that that Prince which is unprovided thereof, puts his own person in danger, and his estate into shaking.

It is to deceive ones self to think, that a Prince may be secure there, where there is nothing secure against the violence of the Prince. Despair of Mercy hath often caused horrible cruelties to ensue, and it is needfull alwayes to take heed of the force of a last necessity. There are some things which ought to be pardoned, by the contempt of punishing them; others by the profit, and others by the glory, and it is alwayes to be remembred, that we have a Judge over our heads, which suffers us to live by his onely goodnesse, being able every moment to punish us by his Justice.

At last, to conclude this little Treatise, Valour procures an high reputation to a Monarch, making him terrible to his Enemies, and amiable to his Subjects. Greatnesse maintains it self by the same means which gave it its beginning; and it renews new vigour by those qualities which have been the Authours of its originall. Our first Kings attained to this dignity by their valour; and by that stoutnesse which they had to expose their courageous persons to very many hazards for the safety of the publick: this made them admired, and lifted them up at last upon the Target to be shewed throughout the whole Army, and chosen by generall consent to command over others by the title of their deserts.

gave

The fame of Valour doth so easily run through, and with such approbation, the minds of people and valiant men, that it sufficing not it to make Kings upon earth; it hath made amongst the Heathens Gods in Heaven. They have deified an Hercules, and a Theseus, for having cut off the head of Hydra's, and overcome Minotaures; and not contenting themselves to have consecrated their persons, they have put wild beasts and monsters amongst the Constellations, for having served as objects of their victories, chusing rather to eternize beasts amongst the Stars, then to diminish any thing of the eternall glory of those valiant men.

Alexander being crowned King by his father Philip, before he took possession of the Kingdome that fell to him by the decease of his Predecessour, assembled together all the great ones of his Kingdome, and said to them, that he would counsel them to chuse such a one as should be most obedient to God, which should have the best thoughts for the Publick Good, which should be most compassionate towards the Poor, which should best defend the right of the weak ones against the strong; but above all, that should be the most Valiant, and should adventure himself most boldly for the safety of his Countrey. And when they had all confirmed to him that which his birth had given him, he took an Oath, that he would keep all he had propounded, as he did, testifying in all his actions his Goodnesse and Valour above all the Kings that had gone before him.

A Monarch shall give some proof of himself, by diligently studying the art of Warre; in often frequenting the exercises thereof, in being able to judge of places and Armies, of Captains, of Souldiers, of Defences, of On-sets, of Policies and Stratagems, of Fortifications, of Arms, of Provision, of Munition, and giving exact order for every thing that belongs to Military affairs. He must often shew himself in the Army, by exhorting, encouraging, consulting, resolving, giving orders, and causing them to be executed, by shewing readinesse of courage in dangers, and an invincible heart in the midst of bad successe. But he ought not at any time to mix himself therein without great necessity, seeing that the hand of one man can do very little, and the losse of a King brings a dammage unrecoverable.

The young King Ladislaus thrust himself into danger at the Battel of Varna, against Bajazet the Turk when he had there lost himself, and that they had taken away his head, and put it upon the end of a spear, as a sad spectacle to the Christians: This caused their whole Army to be routed, which before was half victorious, and gave the victory to the Infidell.

Warre is a long and difficult profession, and one of the most dangerous, which never ought to be undertaken but upon necessity. I cannot, neither ought I here to teach it by words, reserving that to the skill of the more understanding, and to the experience of perfect ones.

I am onely obliged to advertise, that great heed is to be taken, lest any one take rashnesse, or salvage rage instead of true valiantnesse. Those are no Bravado's nor terrible looks that give the most valiant blows in Armies. It pleaseth not God, that a Virtue that doth such wonders upon earth, and places the Hero's in the heaven, should be accomplished by such feeble means. This is no effect of boasting, nor of ignorance, nor of fury: this is a branch of generousnesse, which teacheth the contempt of dangers, and of death it self, for the glory of God, for the defence of ones Countrey, for the subduing of the impious Infidels and wicked ones, for the exaltation of the true Faith, of Religion, and the glory of ones Nation.

Oh the excellency of this divine Virtue, which protects so many people with the shadow of its branches and laurels; which causes a calm to be found in a tempest; safety in the midst of dangers; comfort in disastres; an upholding in the midst of weaknesse! Happy are the wounds of the valiant, whence flows more honour then bloud. Happy their immortall Souls which flie hence into heaven, carried upon the purple of so generous bloud, and which flying hence, leave to posterity an eternall memory of their prowesse.

Time hath no sythe for them; Death is unprovided with darts; Calumny loseth its teeth there, and Glory spreads (throughout) the Enfigns of their Immortality.

DAVID.

THE MONARCHS.

DAVID. SOLOMON.

David is a great mixture of divers adventures, of Good, of Evils, of Joyes, of Griefs, of Contempts, of Glories, of Vices, of Virtues, of Actions, of Passions, of un-thought-of Successes, of strange Accidents and Marvels. It is not my purpose to set forth his Life here, which is exactly contained in the holy Scripture, but to make some reflexions on the principall things therein that concern the Court. We will consider him in a two-fold estate, of a Servant, and of a Master, and will observe with what wisdome he preserved himself in the one, and with what Majesty he behaved himself in the other.

The whole beginning of his History is a continuall combate against an horrid monster, which is the jealousie of Saul, which torments him a thousand wayes, for to adorn him with as many Crowns. An Antient said very well, That the greatest secret of ones life was to undergo destiny, and endure patiently the ordinance of God concerning our lives and estates; for by learning Patience, we learn to forget our misery; but by bearing the Divine appointment with Impatience, we row all our life against a torrent which swallows us up.

A great secret of life.

Anthолog. φέρε τὸ φέρον ἢ φέρε.

David was at the heart of God, but he was not at the heart of Saul: God had made him for to command, and Saul would not allow any wayes that he should be obeyed: He sought his life, when as God had appointed his Crown for him: He desired his death, and procured for him immortality.

God and man did strive, who should exalt or depresse this man; but the counsels of the one were immoveable, and the endeavours of the other were violent in their on-sets, and feeble in their effects.

The qualities of David.

Assoon as David was seen, one might see some Divine thing; a little body well made, enlivened with a great spirit; a comelinesse which could not be learned at school, but which was a gift from above; a mildnesse without weakenesse; a behaviour without affectation; a valiantnesse without ostentation; a gallantnesse without vanity; a virtue that was made to be admired by all, and imitated but by few.

Men of God.

All flowers have their being from the earth by their roots, but they have influences from heaven much different. Men also are all of Adams clay, but the gifts of God do manifest themselves in some so visibly, that it is wisdome to give them place, and but headinesse to fight against them. This little boy neglected, which fed the sheep, and whom the father would not so much as reckon amongst the number of his sonnes, this is He, whom Samuel chose for King by Gods direction, who commands not to measure Kings any more by their stature, but by their endowments from heaven.

Davids entrance into the Court.

He comes first to the Court under the quality of a player on instruments, there he makes himself known for a good Souldier; admired, as Commander of an Army; and crowned, as a Conquerour. Saul was tormented with an evil spirit, which was maintained by his melancholick Humour, and nourished by his passion. They seek out for him a fair young man, which withall was skilfull in playing on the Harp for to make him merry. One of his servants said, that David the sonne of Jesse would be very fit for that employment; he is sent for in the Kings Name, he comes, he pleaseth while he played on the instruments, but he displeases while he handled his weapons, when as Envy begins to cause his valour to be reputed for a faule. Such kind of enraged asps never sleep at the sound of Musick, his Devil is offended at this complaisance, is incensed by those gallant actions, and even vomits its poison against those which cast flowers at it. Saul knew not that God prepared him this little Musician for to be his heir, if hee had known that which heaven intended to do with this child, that would have sufficed to have troubled all the Musick.

Envy never sleepeth.

He was at that time happy in his blindnesse, and his first mischance was to have eyes which could not endure the lustre of anothers virtues. This young shepherd, which in his apprenticeship had learned to fight with Lions and Bears, would go to the warres as well as his brethren, who do blame that his curiosity, and despise his person.

There must alwayes be some famous exploit for to put a man at first in great credit at the Court, all that which is humane goes on very slowly; and an ability is not gotten but by long experience. But when God will put to his hand, he gives to a man in one happy moment, that which thirty years pains could not obtain. The combate with Goliah was that that raised David; Heaven had prepared this giant for to serve for a triall of his valour, and for an ornament of his prowesse. One man alone, which had affrighted a whole army, nine foot high, and armed with five hundred pound weight of iron, continues for the space of fourty dayes his stately bravado's, challenging the stoutest of the Israelites to combate.

Goliah.

All their hearts are frozen at the sound of his terrible voyce; there is not his like in the world which dares come forth against him. The King propounds great riches, and his daughter in mariage to him, which would take away this blemish from the people of God printed on the face of the whole army by this Philistim.

David hereupon presents himself, and goes forth to fight with him, not with the guilded Arms of Saul, but with a Sling.

The Giant scoffs at him, and finding him sufficiently armed to defend himself from dogs, but not for to set upon men, he looks now upon this little body as a fit prey for some bird of rapine. But this Champion of the Lord of Hosts, reads a lesson first to him of Religion, before he shews him his skill in fencing. Thou comest to me (saith he) with a spear, a sword, and a buckler, but I come to thee in the name of the God of armies; of the God of the hosts of Israel, at which thou this day hast scoffed with so great insolence.

It is written in heaven, that this great God will deliver thee into mine hands, and that I shall take away thy head from off thy shoulders, and that I shall make a great feast for all beasts of prey with the flesh of this monstrous body, and this shall be the means for thee to learn that there is a God in Israel. He saith it, he doth it, he strikes his adversary with a blow of the sling in the midst of his fore-head, and makes this mighty tower of flesh to fall in a moment, this terrible giant, cutting off his head with his own sword; which put the whole army of the Philistims to confusion, and lifted up the glory of the chosen people to an incomparable heighth.

Behold the fountain of all great evils that David sufficed afterwards; all the laurels that he gathered in the field of the battel, carried an evil tincture of Sauls envy. The great ones admire him, the people applaud him, he is the subject of the Songs of the daughters of Jerusalem, which set him above Saul.

It is this musick that enraged his evil spirit, and would not give him any rest: Goliah overcome in the opinion of all the world, is still upon his legs to torment him: here is the cause of his rage, as it was before of his fear. David must be destroyed, because he hath saved the Nation, he must be put to death because he hath restored the people to life, he must be dishonoured for having upheld the honour of the King, he is sufficiently faulty; because he is too virtuous.

The horrible Envy of Saul.

They say, that Love and Tears are learned without any master, and I may say, that there is no great need of studying at the Court, to learn Envy and Revenge. It is a strange thing that Saul of a simple countrey-fellow, should become so malicious and subtil a Courtier, as to practise the most refined dissimulations of the Court. He had resolved to destroy David, and yet conceived that this duel with Goliah had set him in too high an esteem in the opinion of the people, and that if he should openly attempt against his life, he should bring his own into danger. He thought best to bestow on him a chief place in the Army, under pretence of honour, which might be most subject to the violence of the Philistims, believing that his courage would carry him into dangers, and that the Philistims being incensed by the death of their countrey-man, would no wayes spare him, and that by this means his death would be imputed to his Destiny, and not to the Envy of Saul.

Envy is easily learned at the Court.

But after that he saw that he returned from the manifest dangers, with a crowned head, with the applause of the people, and that he behaved himself within the Kingdom with very great wisdome, he began to suspect him more then before: he took heed of bestowing great riches on him, and married his eldest daughter which he had promised to him, to another, using him by this means injuriously.

Nevertheless, for that his honour was engaged therein, and that one might justly complain of his faithlessnesse, he took advice to marry him to his younger, which was Michol, with very harsh and dangerous conditions, making him to buy a thing that was due to him, by the death of 200. Philistims, conceiving that by so great a number of men and so many fights re-iterated, he might be entangled in some mischance; or if he should escape that, the best that could hap was onely to gain a woman of a costly humour which would be to him but for a reproach, and much discontent.

Humane wisdome overthrown by the power of heaven

Behold how mans reasoning doth propound: but God which catches the subtil in their devices, and overthrows the designs of the malicious to establish his own counsels upon their ruines, caused the victories and the marriage of David to succeed to his good content, together with the good will and admiration of all the Court. Jonathan the eldest son of Saul was so astonished with his valiant exploits, his rare virtues, and his incomparable brave carriage, that he loved him as his own heart, and bereft himself of the most precious things that he had, to adorn him withall. David likewise swears unto him reciprocally an immortal friendship.

The love of David and Jonathan.

These two souls, to speak according to the phrase of the Scripture, were united together with an indissoluble affection. Their hearts were two fornaces which continually breathed forth flames of sacred love, and might sooner be found without any thoughts, then to be without thinking one of the other. Their separations were as so many dyings, and their meetings again did prevent their paradise. The longest dayes were but as a small moment while they lovingly conversed together, then they never perceived that the time ran away, and they were departed from each other, but with promise to visit again as soon as may be. Each of them in their absence seemed to it ſelf a wandring ſoul without habitation, and without a body; their ſpirits made wonderful tranſpirations for to joyn themſelves together, and talk to each other as in an Idea, when Saul hindred their viſits.

to

The good offices of Jonathan.

Poor Jonathan, which was of an incomparable mildneſſe, declared to his father, as much as he could, the Innocency of David, and the great ſervices that he had done for the Crown; and when he ſaw his ſpirit moved againſt him, he was almoſt ready to die therefore, he ceaſed not to repreſent to him with horrour of mind the monſtrous impiety that it would be to ſacrifice ſuch a perſonage as he, which had ſo often devoted himſelf for the ſafety of his Countrey, the out-cry of the people, and the vengeance of God. At other times he dealt with him with ſweet and perſvvaſive language, cauſing him (as it were) to touch with his fingers the brave carriage and excellencies of David, and aſſuring him, that there was not a man in his whole Kingdome which was of a more harmleſſe and pleaſing a converſation, and that it was the joy of his heart, and his onely ſafety to have him alwayes at his ſide.

Saul cleared for a while, again returns to his evil ſpirit.

Saul ſuffered himſelf to be overcome with theſe his diſcourſes, whether it were indeed that he was perſwaded, or whether he feigned himſelf to be appeaſed, and ſuffered David, whom he had driven farre of, to return again near his perſon. But this mad-man, upon a day when he played on the Harp in his preſence, took his launce, and endeavoured to ſtrike him through therewith, which he dad done, if David by his nimbleneſſe had not avoided that evil blovv; and leſt that any ſhould charge him vvith this perfidiouſneſſe, he excuſed it by the diſtemper of his ſpirit. Jonathan endeavoured yet another time this reconciliation, but having been repelled by Saul by pricking words, and vvith threatnings to kill him, if he did not give over this his frienſhip with David; he ſaw clearly that there was no more ſafety for his friend, and gave him the counſel which was for himſelf the ſharpeſt of all, cauſing him to retire.

David goes from the Court, and makes a ſad departure from his friend, for to avoid the unmercifull fury of his father.

Theſe two dear ſouls on the day of this ſad departure were pierced with a thouſand darts of grief, and were a thouſand times upon their eyes and lips for to fly from thence, and to mingle themſelves one with the other. The time paſt cauſed them to remember that which they had loſt; the preſent, that which they were to loſe; and that to come, was unto them a bottomleſſe pit of terrour and affrightment. They apprehended the one for the other, as many dangers as there are upon the earth and ſea, and they could not promiſe themſelves any thing but dayes without comforts, and nights full of terrible dreams and torments. They poured out ſo many tears, and fetched ſo many ſighs, having no other eloquence but that of their hearts mutually wounded in their lodging, that it was a thing vvorthy of compaſſion, even of Saul himſelf.

David is purſued, and eſcapes.

This mad-man ſeeing that he vvas eſcaped out of his bloudy hands, vvould have cauſed him to be taken, and ſent forth ſouldiers for to bring him back. But his vvife Michol having deſcryed the evil intent of her father, advertiſed her husband of it, and made him depart ſuddenly in the deep ſilence of the night, putting in his place an image in his bed. The houſe failed not to be ſet upon the next morning, and the Guard of Saul entring by force, paſſed on unto the bed and found there the counterfeit. Michol vvas accuſed hereof and chidden by Saul, but ſhe excuſed her ſelf, ſaying, That her husband had compelled her to do this, threatning to kill her, if ſhe would not obey, and that the preſence of ſo manifeſt a danger had forced her to procure this invention. He ceaſed not to encreaſe his anger, and to invent every day new means to deſtroy him, whom he ought to have preſerved above all men.

The life of David in baniſhment.

In the mean time David knew not whither to retire himſelf, and ſaw himſelf every day, amongſt the nets, hunted like a poor beaſt, which cauſed him to paſſe a life ſo worthy to be eſteemed by the whole world in very many bitterneſſes. He would have taken the boldneſſe to have gone to Samuel, who was yet alive, but this his interview would have been prejudicial both to the one and the other, in the the mind of Saul, which turned all its ſuſpicions into fury.

His arrivall at Nob cauſeth great diſaſtre to the high Prieſt.

He removed himſelf from thence unto the town of Nob, to the high Prieſt Ahimelech; who ſeeing him in very ſmall equipage, was ſomewhat amazed at his arrivall: but David for to confirm him, told him, that he went about a certain urgent buſineſſe, which the King had given him in charge, and that it was neceſſary that it ſhould be done without noiſe: the which had compelled him to take but few people with him, which were come forth very ſuddenly, without having leaſure to take order for neceſſary things for their journey; whereby, he ſhould do him a great pleaſure to give him ſome bread, and to help him to ſome weapons, which the haſte of the buſineſſe would not ſuffer him to take.

The Prieſt anſwered, that he had no other loaves then thoſe of the ſhew-bread which were conſecrated, but that they might make uſe of them, if they were purified, and eſpecially if they abſtained from all converſe with women: of which David having aſſured him, he gave them thoſe, and having no other ſword then that of Goliah, which was kept in the Tabernacle for a Monument, he preſented it to him, wherewith he was very well contented, judging it the beſt of all, and ſo went forward in his way.

Saul having heard a report that David had appeared, entred into great forreſts, and going through a wood with a lance in his hand, being compaſſed by his Captains and Officers, ſharply complained of the unfaithfulneſſe of his ſervants, asking them with reproach, What it was that David had promiſed them, and whether he would give them every one Lordſhips, or make them Captains, or Camp-maſters, that they had thus forſaken their Prince? That it was a pitifull thing to behold him betrayed of his own children for to uphold a rebel, which ſought nothing but an occaſion to get his Crown from him.

Doeg accuſeth the high Prieſt being innocent.

Hereupon, Doeg, maſter of the ſhepherds of Saul, an Idumean by nation, and of barbarous behaviour, having been at Nob when David paſſed by there, and deſirous to get favour with his Maſter, accuſed Ahimelech the Prieſt, with all his company, for having helped David with weapons and Proviſion, and having teſtified a good affection to his party: which cauſed Saul to ſend for him preſently, and handle him with great anger, reproaching him with villany, and ſuſpecting him of treaſon. The other anſwered very wiſely, That he being retired from the knowledge of buſineſs at the Court, and of the Bed-chamber, he could not know the intents of David, but knowing very aſſuredly the good-will that the King had teſtified towards him, the great charges and commiſſions wherewith he had honoured him, the favour that he had ſhewed to him by ſo neerly allying him to his houſe, he could not, nor he ought not to drive him away from his lodging, having received no command from the King, and not being able to underſtand by any the offence that David had incurred.

Bloudy effects of the jealouſie of Saul.

This excuſe was very juſt and lawful. But the violent are never contented with reaſons, intending to be maſters of the Laws, although they are ſlaves to their brutiſh paſſions. Saul commanded without any other form of proceedings to kill him with those of his company, which the souldiers did very much abhorre, and there was not found one that durst lift up his hand against those sacred persons. But Doeg that villanous butcher, wch had a long time been bred up in slaying beasts, having gathered together the small rable of his servants, set upon the high Priest and the Priests which accompanied him, to the number of 85. which were all murdered in one day, and this cursed servant stretching further yet the command of his master, drave on his murderers to the sacking of the town of Nob, which they filled with fire and bloud.

What will not the jealousie of State do? what will not tyranny, rage, and fury, when they are seconded by evil servants which blow the coal able to devour both men and towns? Saul, the plain countrey-fellow, the cordiall man, the child of one year, after he had suckt the breath of this serpent, kills the high Priest and the Priests, buries the smoking towns in the bloud of the miserable citizens. A thousand poor bloudy sacrifices stretched out upon the cart, pleaded sufficiently before God with the voyce of their bloud, for to pull down this inhumane Tyrant, for whom all the furies prepared their pincers and torches.

Poor David having understood by Abiathar the son of the high Priest all that was past, was pierced with a most bitter grief, accusing himself as the cause of the death of those unhappy ones, and took along with him, him that brought him this sad news, using him as his own brother. He perceived well, that the spirit of Saul was wholly envenomed, and in despair of remedy, he saved himself in the cave of Adulla, where he thought he had been hid from the eyes of the whole world. But his father and his brethren flying the persecution, ceased not till they had found him therein, and did wonderfully pierce his tender heart, lamenting for the change of his fortune, because they perceive not any more in him a David triumphant the object of all the thoughts and discourses of all tongues. But he comforted them, promising not to forsake them, and recommended all that was deareſt unto him, which was the person of his father with that of his mother, to the King of Moab, until that he knew what it would please God to do with him.

David saves himself in the caves of the desert, whither father and mother go to seek him.

His piety towards them.

At the same time, all the banished, all that fled for safety, & all the miserable betook themselves unto him, unto the number of 400. men, which entrenched themselves in a fortresse, going forth every day for to rob, to maintain themselves thereby. In the midst of all these misfortunes, the good Prince kept alwayes in his heart a true love of his countrey, and knowing that the Philistims had laid siege before Keilah, he failed not to go to help it, and to deliver it, although this ungratefull city was intened to deliver him to Saul, if he had enclosed himself therein; the which he would not do, having consulted with the Oracle of God, but retired himself to the desert of Ziph, whither Jonathan that burned with a great desire to see him, came to find him secretly, and they were for some time together with unspeakable expansions of heart. This good friend comforted him, and assured him, that he should be King after his father, and for himself he would be content to be his second; which sufficiently witnessed the wonderfull modesty of this Prince, and the incomparable love that he bore to David.

Banished men repaired to him.

The visit of Jonathan, secret and and very profitable to David.

But the Ziphims, men for the time that would provide for their own safety, sent their deputies to Saul, to advertise him, that David was retired into their quarters, and if it pleased him to follow him, they would deliver him into his hands. At the which Saul was exceeding joyful, and entred the chase to entrap him, compassing him on every side, and hunting him like a poor deer chased by men and dogs with great outcries. The danger was very manifest, and David in great hazard to be taken, had it not been for a happy message, it may be, procured by Jonathan, that advertised Saul, that the Philistims had taken the field, and made great waste upon his lands, at which he returned to bring remedy thereto, deferring his former design till another occasion.

In the mean while, David ran from desert to desert, with his troops, and was hardly able to live, which made him have recourse to Nabal a rich man, and that had great means, entreating him for some courtesie for to maintain his people, which had used him with very great respect, defending his house, his flocks, and all his family against the spoilings of robbers. This Nabal, that was clownish and covetous, answered the deputies of David, that he knew not the son of Jesse, but that he was not ignorant, that there were evil servants enough, which were fled from their masters, and that he was not in case to take the bread from his hired servants for to give it to high-way men. This word being told to David, incensed him so much, that he was going to set upon his house for to rob and sack it. But Abagail the wife of Nabal, better behaved, and wiser, without busying her self to discourse with her husband, that was a fool and drunk, caused presently mules to be loaden with provision necessary for the men of war, and went to meet David, to whom she spake with so great wisdome, comelinesse, and humility, that she turned away the tempest, and stayed the swords already drawn out of the scabbards for to make a great slaughter in her house. David admiring the wisdom and goodnesse of this spirit of the woman, married her after the death of her husband. It is so true, that a good deed bestowed on a high person in time of his affliction, and when he hath most leasure to consider it, is a seed-sowing which in its time brings forth and bears fruits of blessednesse.

The rudenesse of Nabal towards David.

The wisdome of Abigail his wife.

A good deed done to a great one afflicted is of much value.

After that Saul had driven back the Philistims, he returns to the pursuit of David, accompanied with three thousand men, with a purpose to take him, although he should hide himself under ground, or should fly through the air. And indeed he crept up rocks unaccessible, which were not frequented by any but by wild goats; and as he passed that way, he entred into a cave for some naturall necessity, where David was hid, with a small number of his faithfullest servants, which failed not to tell him, that this was the hand of God, which had this day delivered his deadly enemy into his hands, and that he should not now lose time, but to cut him off quickly, whilst that he gave him so fair play, and this would be the means to end all those bitternesses, wherewith his life was filled by the rage of this barbarous Persecutour.

David furiously pursued by Saul

This was a strong temptation to a man so violently persecuted, and whose life was sought by so many outrages. Nevertheless, David stopping all those motions of revenge, resolved in his heart, by a strong inspiration of God, never to lay his hands upon him which was consecrated King, and contenting himself with cutting off the skirts of his coat, he went out of the cave after Saul, and crying with a loud voice, he worshipped him prostrate on the earth, holding in his hand the piece of his casock, and saying to him, Behold my Lord, my Father, and my King, the innocence of my hands, and do not believe them any more which filled you with suspicions of poor David: you cannot be ignorant at this time, that God hath put you into my power, and that I could have handled you ill, & by taking away your life have saved mine own. But God hath kept me by his holy grace from this thought, and hath preserved you from all evil. I never yet had any intent to hurt your Majesty, having alwayes reverenced and served it, as your most humble servant and subject; whiles that you cease not to persecute me,

His generousnesse in pardoning his enemy, very admirable.

me, and to torment my poor life with a thousand afflictions: Alas, my Lord, what is it that you desire? Against whom are you come forth with so great furniture of Arms and Horses? against a poor dead Dog, a miserable little beast? I beseech the living God to judge between us two, and to make you to know the goodnesse of my cause.

The greatnesse and benefit of clemency.

One may avouch, that great and glorious actions of Clemency do never hurt Princes, but that often they do place or keep the Crown upon their heads, God and Men concurring to favour that goodnesse that approches so near to the highest. Saul was so amazed with this action, that he ran to him, and embraced him weeping, and said to him, This is a sure sign, O David, which I acknowledge at the present, and whereby I know for certain that you must reign after me, so great a goodnesse not being able to be rewarded but by an Empire. I do pray and conjure you onely to have pity on my poor children after my death, and not to revenge your injuries upon them: hereupon he swore to him, to deal with him afterwards peaceably.

David goes out of the kingdome, and retires himself among strangers.

But as this spirit was unequall, and did oftentimes easily depart from reason for long seasons; David resolved to go out of the Kingdome, and to betake himself to Achish King of the Philistims: Some may seek occasion to blame his behaviour in this matter, and may think it strange, that he should retire himself to the Philistims, the sworn enemies of the people of Israel, especially after this reconciliation and oath passed between him and Saul. But it must be considered, that his life was no wayes assured within the Kingdome, and that Saul at another time having given so solemn a promise to Jonathan for the safety of his friend, yet would have kill'd him with his own hand: and further that he was every day in danger to be set upon by arms from the other party, with effusion of bloud both of the one and other, and that it seemed better to him to avoid the occasion, then to see himself perpetually obliged by so miserable a necessity to defend himself.

Further he considered, that he brought his chiefest friends into danger, not being able to retire himself amongst them, without making them guilty of treason, and exposing them to slaughter: lastly he found not so much security amongst other Kings, which having no war with Saul, would have made some difficulty in entertaining him, or might have delivered him up, after they had received him, for their own commodity.

This made him resolve to take his refuge amongst a Nation, that bore an irreconcileable hatred against Saul. But forasmuch as some have thought, that he bore arms for Achish against the people of God, this is manifestly convinced of falshood, by the Text of the Scripture, where it is expresly said, that David did invade the Amalekites, and other people Infidels, although that Achish perswaded himself, that he would do the like to the Israelites, after he had been so evilly used by his own Nation. But he used dissimulation herein, for to maintein himself in good favour with the King, as the Doctour Tostatus hath very well noted: And this was the cause that the great ones of the Kingdome, which perceived this dissembling of David, would never suffer him to be in the Army-Royall, in the day that the battell joyned against the people of Israel, saying openly to the King, that he would betray the party, and would reconcile himself with his own men by the price of the lives of the Philistims, unto the great disadvantage of the whole Realm; which was the cause that Achish gave him leave to depart fairly, excusing it upon the suspicions which the Noble-men had taken of him.

1 King. 27.

At the last, the fatall day of Saul drew near, and he saw the Philistims which came thick and threefold upon him with the chiefest forces of their Empire, he felt the remorse of conscience, and the blood of so many Innocents undeservedly shed, ceased not to leap up against his faulty head. In these confusions of a troubled spirit, by the representation of his crimes, he sought unto the Divine Oracles, to learn what he should do in so pressing a necessity. But this unhappy Prince, that had used Samuel so unworthily in his life, and driven away as farre as he could all honest men from his councels, for to let loose the raines of his fury, sought after the dead in vain, having trod under feet the admonitions of the living.

Saul being in great perplexitie consults with the soul of Samuel.

I have declared in the Maxime concerning the Immortality of the soul, the whole discourse about his consulting with the Witch at Endor, and it is not my purpose here to trouble again my Reader with the rehearsall of those things. We may onely note, that the soul of Samuel, having appeared before that the Sorceresse could employ the charms of her profession, rebuked Saul for having disquieted it, and foretold him the routing of his Army, his Death, with that of his Children, at which he was so affrighted, that he fell down in a swound, having eaten nothing all that day. Whereat the Sorceresse having pity, and having prepared somewhat to eat, was urgent with him to take some little refreshment, which he did, and condescended to her intreaties, and those of his servants.

He marches against the Philistims in battell and is overthrown.

After he went from her table, he marched all night, that he might come to the Army, whether it were that he did not firmly believe that his last mishap, or whether he would willingly sacrifice himself, without any contrarying Gods appointment. The next morning he perceived the Army of the Philistims wonderfully increased, and with full resolution to fight, and on the contrary the Israelites exceedingly weakned and which seemed already to carry the picture of their disastre printed in their faces. The enemies gave the onset with very great violence, and overthrew the van-gard, in which Jonathan was with his two brethren, all which sealed the last proofs of their valour with their blood and death. The miserable father saw carryed away before he dyed, all that might have obliged him to live; and presently perceived that the whole body of the Army of the Philistims was falln upon him, and yet for all that he had no desire to retire, not willing to overlive those his misfortunes. He was ill handled by those of the forlorn hope, which ceased not to let fly their arrows very thick upon the Troops where he was, and which fell with such violence and multitude, that they seemed to imitate the hail in a great tempest, which furiously beats down the hopes of a poor husbandman. He saw his bravest Captains dy before his eyes, which sacrificed themselves with despair of better fortune, and although he were wounded with many wounds, and that he had lost almost all his blood, yet he stoutly upheld himself, desiring nothing so much as to dye in the bed of honour. But as forces failed him, and the violence of his adversaries redoubled, fearing lest they had a purpose to take him alive, he commanded his Target-bearer to make an end of him, and to give him his deaths-blow, before he should fall into the hands of the Philistims. The other excused himself wisely, saying, That he would never undertake that against his Majesty, and upon so sacred a person, and that one ought to expect the destiny and not to prevent it. Then Saul seeing that he could not dye so soon as he desired, neither by the hands of his friends nor of his enemies, suffered himself to fall upon his sword, and made it enter into him, vomiting forth both his soul and blood, with ragings and griefs unspeakable. The Philistims having found his body amongst the dead corps, took off his armour, and cut off his head, which they carried through the towns of Paleſtina, for a pittifull ſpectacle, making many thankſgivings in the Temple of their Idol for this victory. And not content herewith, they took the body of the King, with thoſe of his three children, and hung them upon the walls of Bethſhan, where they were ſeen, untill the time, that certain valiant men of his party took them away by night, and gave them buriall. Such was the end of this unhappy Prince, whom impiety, diſobedience, love of himſelf, and the jealouſie of State accompanied with his ordinary ragings, threw head-long into a gulf of calamities.

The end of Saul.

David receives the news thereof.

At the ſame time that this unhappy battell was fought, David was purſuing the Amalekites, which in his abſence had ſacked the town of Ziklag, which was the place of his retireing that Achiſh the King of the Philiſtims had beſtowed upon him. He was ſo happy that he overtook thoſe robbers loaden with their prey, and took out of their hands his two wives Ahinoam and Abigail, whom they had taken away. As he came from this battell, a young Amalekite preſents himſelf, and brings him the news of the death of Saul, of Jonathan, and of his other ſons, affirming that he himſelf had ſtood by at the death of the King, and had helped him to dye, by order which he had received from him, cutting off the thread of his life, and delivering him from thoſe deadly pains that cauſed him to languiſh: and for a proof hereof he ſhewed him his Crown and his bracelet, which he preſented to David, hoping for a great reward from him.

But this virtuous and wiſe Prince, aſwell for conſcience ſake, as his reputation, took great heed of receiving or manifeſting any joy at this accident, but on the contrary, being moved with extream grief, he tore his garments, and put all his court in mourning, he wept, he faſted, he made funerall Orations for the honour of Saul and Jonathan, and ſet forth lamentations which cauſed as great eſteem of his virtue, as they moved pity to his countrey. Not content herewith, he cauſed the Amalekite that brought him the news of the death of Saul, to dye by Juſtice, which he himſelf had helped to confirm (according as he had avouched) by obedience and by compaſſion, not enduring that he ſhould lay hands upon a King, for to take away his life from him, by any pretence whatſoever that he could alledge.

It ſeemed that after the death of this unhappy Prince, David ſhould forthwith have taken poſſeſſion of all his eſtates, but wiſdome hindred him from proceeding herein ſo haſtily: They knew that he had not aſſiſted at the the battell for to help his people, that he had retired himſelf into the hands of the capitall enemies of Iſrael, and many might very juſtly think, that he had born arms for Achiſh, which might diminiſh much the great opinion that they had of his virtue. Further alſo, although that Saul was not ſo much loved in his life-time, yet his death might very well have defaced that blemiſh of hatred that many had conceived againſt him. They conſidered that he had ſacrificed himſelf with his three ſons for the publick ſafety, and had ſpared nothing for his countrey. They had pity on the evil uſage that the Philiſtims had done unto his body; his former good actions in time paſt, the dignity of a King, his laborious life, and tragicall death, did quell all the envie that any could have at his fortunes.

Hence it was that Abner his chief Captain, who was a man ſufficiently upright, would not loſe any time, but ſeeing there remained yet a ſon of Saul named Iſhboſheth, aged fourty years, although he was but of little courage, and as little underſtanding, he made him preſently to come into the Camp, and cauſed him to be declared the true and lawfull ſucceſſour of the eſtates of Saul, not ſo much for the eſteem that he had of his ſufficiency, or for the love that he bore him, as intending to reign by him, and over him. All the people gave unto him the oath of Allegiance, except the kindred of Juda, from which David was ſprung, which gathered together in favour of him, and crowned him King in Hebron, where he reigned about ſeven years, before he poſſeſſed the whole power of the Empire.

The kingdome divided by the ambition of the favourites.

The Kingdome of Judah was then one body with two heads, the houſe of Saul and David claſhing againſt each other, not ſo much by the inclination of the Maſters, as by the ambition of the Favourites and Servants which would reign at their coſts.

Joab and Abner do ſeek for the government

Abner was high and courageous; Joab alſo the chief Captain of David, ſtern and violent, which would gain the favour of his Maſter by devouring him, in the which he did not ſucceed well, for that the ſpirit of David was not ſo feeble as to comply with ſuch behaviour; and it was nothing but neceſſity which cauſed him to paſſe by many things.

Their combat.

Theſe two chief Captains full of jealouſie the one over the other, meeting together at the Fiſh-pond of Gibeon with the chief of the Nobility, Abner began firſt and demanded a combat under pretence of play; unto whom Joab which had no need of a ſpur, eaſily conſented. Preſently one might ſee the young men of each ſide nimbly to beſtir themſelves, whoſe fingers did itch to be at it, and did not fail quickly to ſurpriſe one another. The ſport growing hot by little and little came to a full combat, and at laſt to a battell where many remained upon the place.

Joabs party was the ſtronger, and that for twenty which he loſt, he killed three hundred and ſixty of Abners men who was conſtrained to retire himſelf.

The death of Azael by his raſhneſſe.

But Azael the brother of Joab a nimble runner followed him lively with his ſword at every turn ready to wound him, the other which had no deſire to ſlay him, being not ignorant that if it ſhould come to that, it would prove the ſeed of an irreconcileable enmity between him and Joab his brother, prayed him twice to depart from him, and to content himſelf with the ſpoil of ſome other, without being ambitious of his. Azael would not hearken unto him, but deſired to make himſelf famous by getting the better of the Captain of the Army. At laſt he ſeeing him inſolent unto that extremity, turned back and ſtruck him through with his Launce. Joab and Abiſhai his two brethren incenſed with that his ſlaughter, followed Abner with all their force, who ſaved himſelf upon a hill, where a great ſquadron of the family of Banjamin encompaſſed him, and cryed with a loud voice unto Joab, ſaying, ſhall the ſword devour for ever? and would he make of a ſport ſo deadly a tragedy, as if he were ignorant that it was dangerous to drive them to deſpair? Joab cauſed a retrait to be ſounded, making a ſhew to do that for courteſie, which he agreed to for neceſſity.

The diſagreeing of Abner and Iſhboſheth.

Abner laying aſide his warlike humour, fell in love with a Concubine of Saul named Rizpah, which was a woman well bred and of good courage. Iſhboſheth was offended thereat, for that he had done this without telling him of it. But Abner for one poore word ſpoken to in a very mild manner, entred into a rage againſt his King, and ſaid that it was to uſe him like a dog, to quarrel with him for a woman, after ſo great ſervices as he had done for the Crown, reproching his Maſter, for that he held both his life and his Kingdome of him. But ſeeing that he uſed him in this manner, he would take a courſe with him, and would tranſlate the government from the houſe of Saul to that of David.

The inſolence of Abner.

Maſters ſhould not give too much authority to their ſubjects.

The poor Prince held his peace, and durſt not anſwer one word onely to this bold fellow, which was a pitifull thing to ſee him thus devoured by his own ſervant vant. The houſes of Great ones are very often filled with ſuch ſervants, who having been honoured with an eſpeciall confidence of their Maſter in the adminiſtration of their affairs, whether they be their Receivers or Stewards of their families, take upon them authority, and not contenting themſelves to govern the goods, enter upon the right of their Lords, leaving them nothing, but a name and ſhadow of the Power, which is due unto them.

He treateth with David

Abner grew ſo hot with anger, that he diſpatched his Meſſengers to David to deſire his friendſhip, and promiſeth him to bring the whole Kingdome of Iſhboſheth into his hands. David anſwered, that he was content to make peace with him, ſo that he would cauſe his wife Michol to be reſtored him, whom they had married to another after his departure, which was readily agreed to for him, for they took her away from the hands of her husband that followed her weeping; this woman with her lofty ſpirit had ſome pleaſing behaviour, wherewith Davids affection was taken.

In the mean while Abner powerfully ſollicits the people of Iſrael to betake themſelves on Davids ſide, ſhewing them that God had committed their ſafety and reſt into his hands, and that it was he which ſhould unite together all the families under his obedience, for to compoſe a Monarchy, which ſhould become happy to his people, helpfull to his friends, and terrible to his enemies. This diſcourſe did very much ſhake the principall ones of the Nation, which were not ignorant of the ſmall hopes that were in the perſon of Iſhboſheth, which was diſparaged both by nature and fortune. This ſtout Captain following the buſineſſe, came to meet with David in Hebron, who made him a feaſt, hearkened unto his propoſitions, and conducted him back with honour.

Joabs jealouſie over Abner.

Joab who was at that time abſent, at his return quickly underſtood of the coming of Abner, whereat he entred into a furious jealouſie, fearing leſt David ſhould be of the humour of thoſe, which delight more in making of friends, then keeping of thoſe that are made, and that the friendſhip of a man which ſeemed to draw a whole Kingdome after him, might much prejudice his fortunes. He enters roughly into his Kings chamber, telling him that this was but a deceiver, which came but to ſpy out his ſecrets, and to do him ſome ill turn, that he ſhould lay hold of him, ſeeing he was come under his power. And for that David anſwered him nothing, ſeeing him in a hot anger, he went out furiouſly, and without authority ſent a meſſage to the chief Captain Abner, to intreat him to return to Hebron, under colour of treating more fully with David.

The death of Abner.

He lightly believed it, and came back the ſame way, when as Joab that lay in wait for him, took him treaſonably and killed him at the gate of the city.

David tolerates Joab in his fault upon neceſſitie.

David was indeed very much perplexed hereat, and uttered grievous curſes againſt Joab, and his whole race: nevertheleſſe, as the wiſeſt did judge, that there was a great intereſt in this death, and that his chief Captain had become the executour thereof, this made ſome to think, that there was ſome deſign, and though that ſuſpicion was falſe, David did all that he could to deface the blemiſh thereof, aſſiſting at the funeralls of Abner, very near to the corps, proteſting againſt the cruelty of thoſe that had taken his life from him, and highly ſetting forth the praiſes of the dead: yet he cauſed not proceſſe to be made againſt Joab, conceiving that he was not able to deſtroy him, in ſuch a time, when it was dangerous to provoke him. Nevertheleſſe, he kept the reſolution to puniſh him even to his death, but Joab contemned all upon the confidence that he had that none could go beyond him, and meaſured his own greatneſſe by the impunity of his great offences.

It is hard to excuſe David upon this treaty that he projected with Abner, traytour to his Maſter, if one have not recourſe to the ſecret and over-ruling will of God, or to the right that he pretended to have to the Crown, in conſideration of his firſt anointment made by Samuel. He knew that the Edicts of his royall dignity were written in heaven, and for this cauſe, without endeavouring by any criminall way, he expected the work of Providence, and applyed himſelf to the events, for without any thought of his, Iſhboſheth King of Iſrael was ſlain by two murtherers Rechab and Baana, which killd him as he ſlept upon his bed at noonday, and brought his head to him, at which this great King was ſo highly incenſed, abhorring this barbarous act, that he condemned them preſently to death, and after he had cauſed their heads and feet to be cut off, he made them to be hanged at the fiſh-pond of Hebron.

David cannot be excuſed upon the treaty made with Abner, if one have not recourſe to the ſecret and over-ruling will of God.

David abſolute by the death of Iſhboſheth ſon of Saul.

The death of Iſhboſheth the ſon of Saul, ended the difference which was between the two Royall houſes, and the other families yielded themſelves to David, by an univerſall conſentment. It was then that he began to reign abſolutely, and to make to appear, as in a glorious light, the admirable qualities, and Royall virtues, wherewith he was adorned. And it is certain, that of all the Kings of Juda, there was none hath equalled him in all kind of perfections. He was one that feared God without ſuperſtition, religious without hypocriſie, valiant without any ſternneſſe, liberall without reproching it to any one, a good husband without covetouſneſſe, ſtout without inſolency, vigilant without unquietneſſe, wiſe without ſubtilty, courteous without looſneſſe, humble without cowardlineſſe, chearfull without too much familiarity, grave without fierceneſſe, and kind without any complements.

The Royal qualities of David.

His zeal to religion.

He united all thoſe things together which ordinarily make Princes great, and proved in each of them to advantageous, as if he had been endowed with that onely quality. Above all, he ſhewed himſelf all his life very zealous for religion, and wonderfully affected towards divine things. He removeth the Ark of the Covenant with great and ſtately Ceremonies, he prepared infinite treaſure to build the Houſe of God, he compoſeth Hymns for his people, which have aſtoniſhed all ages, and which ſerve for perpetuall ſprings of devotion in the Church. He ordained the Quyres of Muſick and ſingers, which have preſcribed the law of prayſes in conſort for all Nations. He perfectly honoured the Prophets and Prieſts, mainteining a very great intelligence with and amongſt them.

His valour and his wars

All theſe exerciſes no wayes diminiſhed in him actions of valour, he overthrew the Philiſtims in two great battels: he made war on every ſide; in the Eaſt againſt the Moabites and Ammonites; in the Weſt againſt the Phœnicians; on the South againſt the Amalekites, the Arabians, and Idumeans; in the North againſt the Syrians, the Sabeans and Meſopotamians, and was happy in all his enterpriſes. Beſides this he made leagues with the Kings his neighbours for the benefit of commerce, gaining them all either by friendſhip or ſubduing them by force.

His juſtice and good husbandry.

He rendred Juſtice exactly to his Subjects, he favoured Arts, he enriched and fortified the Towns, he made himſelf ſtately Palaces, and drew the Kingdome of Juda out of ſervility, which had not yet known what magnificence was, he was honoured by the great ones, beloved by the Prieſts, admired by the wiſeſt, and as it were adored by all his people.

His vices. The love of Bathſheba.

But as all light in moſtall things hath its ſhadow; God ſuffred him to fall into a great offence, which ſerved to humble him, and cauſed very much trouble in his houſe. His mind being looſed from the cares of war, and buſineſſes, had too much inclination to the fleſh,

more

The love of Bathsheba.

more then it used. He was sleeping upon his bed, and being awaked in the afternoon, he walked on the top of his house upon the covering made in platform, and delighted in the fair prospects that he had from his Palace, from whence he descried a woman that bathed her self in her garden, he enquired of her name, her kindred, and her qualities, and became in love thereby, sends for her to his house, and had company with her.

How dear did this unhappy cast of his eye cost him! and, how many damned are there, that shall one day bewail with eyes of fire the concupiscence of their fleshly eyes! This Fountain where Bathsheba washt her self ran with flames and poyson, which entring by the senses of a Prophet empoysoned his heart, blinded his reason, infected his thoughts, and overthrew his whole soul. This Creature was neither Bear, nor Lyon, nor Goliah, nor Philistim, and yet she overthrew in a moment, him that made but a sport of Bears, which conquered Lyons, subdued Goliahs, and marched over the heads of Philistims. All conspired unto the mishap of poore David, the season, the hour, the sleep, the solitarinesse, the prospect, the object, a woman very fair, and smoothly composed: for it seemed that this unlucky one did lye in ambush, and made it her glory to triumph over a Saint, and one of the valianteſt men that was at that time upon the earth. Perhaps she would onely have given an occasion of love, but not have taken; had she been like the Sun, that scorches all here below, and yet remains untoucht in the midst of his flames. When one doth more then he ought in this blind passion, he goes further then he thought.

Paulus Orosius. l. 3. Concubitus regnum ab Alexandro redemit.

It is a great temptation to a woman to be beloved of a King. Cleophis by this means gained a Kingdome in a night. Bathsheba looked more upon the greatnesse, then the pleasure. When love and ambition blow at the same time in the head of a woman, she hath two great Devils to fight with. She might honestly have refused this visit, she might have deferred it, have gained time, and turned aside the occasion. There is no need sometimes but of a spiders web, to beat back the darts of love, that at other times the Ramparts of Semyramis are not strong enough against it. But she was ready to sell, and to yield, that had already laid aside her honour, with her attire. She failed not speedily to send news to David that she had conceived, and that her husband having not seen her, might very easily conceive that that was none of his doing.

The death of Uriah.

The honour of this lost creature must now have a cover: the King sends for her husband, under some other pretence, he comes from the Army, he is very kindly entertained, they are earnest with him to go take his ease at his house, and to go to see his wife: But the good man refuseth it, saying that it was not fitting for him to lye in a bed, when the Ark of God, and his Captain Joab were under Tents. He lyes upon the ground before the door of Davids chamber, and so passeth the night, having no other desire then to return speedily to the army.

The blindnesse of David.

Alas poor Uriah! a harmlesse sacrifice, thou wast but too faithful to faithlesnesse, and therefore thou must water with thy blood the loves of thy master! David takes the pen, and love dictates to him a bloody letter, by which he sends to Joab, that he should place Uriah amongst the forlorn-hope, that they might so fairly be rid of him, for such was his pleasure. Uriah carrieth this deadly packet, Joab without enquiring any further, obeys, the innocent is massacred, and the false liberty of these two lovers thinks it is now in surety enough. David remains nine moneths covered with this filth, and this blood, without coming to the knowledge of himself, untill that Nathan takes away the veil that thus blinded him.

The carriage of truth costs dear at the court

Truth is one of the excellenteſt commodities that is in all nature, but the carryage thereof costs dear, which makes that many will not take it up to bear, especially when there is any question about carrying it into a Kings Palace: one saith that it is not yet time; another, that it will not be usefull; others, that it is of no great force obliging. One will daub over businesses, another seems to make a conscience, one studies for reasons, where little is to be found, for to please the humours of great ones, but there is danger, that those that would preserve themselves by fair-speaking, do not ruine themselves by flattery.

The Prophet Nathan sheweth himself courageous in this point, for although he was not ignorant, that it was a thing dangerous enough to speak freely to a King, and to a lover, of that which he least did love to hear: yet he resolved to shew David his sin, and took a very right course therein, preventing him with a Parable of a rich man having great store of sheep, that had violently taken one onely Ewe from a poore man, which David finding very strange, judged him worthy to dye.

The other hits him home, and tells him that it was himself, that had caused poor Uriah to be slain, after he had taken his Bathsheba from him. He brought to his memory the good things that he had received from the Divine Bountie, even from his infancy, and how by this action he had ill rewarded them, with so great ingratitude. Whereupon he declared to him the mischances that should happen to him, to his house and posterity. David awaking, as it were, out of a dead sleep, acknowledged his sin, with a true humility, and submitted himself to all the chastisements which it would please that great Judge to draw forth for his unfaithfullnesse.

Davids repentance.

He entred at that very present into great grief for the fault committed, not so much for the punishment that he should receive therefore, as for the love of his so good master, accounting it the greatest punishment of sinnes, to have offended. He was presently changed into another man, he was no more that amorous David, but a Penitent exceedingly humbled, a heart bleeding, eyes weeping, a sad and disfigured face, a body made thin, sighings redoubled one upon another, joynts pined away with fastings and austereneſſe, a continuall avoiding of all Society, of the light and day which reproched him with his offence, and a fixed love of solitarinesse and tears: His Harp hanging up knew no more what songs of Triumphs meant, and was wholly employed in expressing his griefs. This heart dying to all mortall things of the earth, was upon the coasts of the sea of Repentance, which he made to eccho with his groanings, and swell continually with his weepings: whereby he fell into a great sickneſſe, and God beginning the punishments of a sinne pardoned, caused the child conceived in adultery to dye, and suffered him not to bring up any young one of Bathsheba, before he had espoused her by lawfull marriage.

Punishment upon the house of David.

A year after, those pittifull Tragedies of his house began, which covered it with horrour, and filled his heart with terrours. Amnon the eldest son of David fell in love with his sister Thamar, a very fair Princesse, and which was of the mothers side as well as of the fathers, of the blood Royall. The more hindrances that he saw in that his love, both by his quality, and virginity, and kindred, and the inclination of the maid, the more was his concupiscence enflamed. This kind of passion ordinarily covets that which it should least of all desire, and that which it can least bring to passe. This was a subtle poyson breathed forth by the contagion of the fathers example, which had possessed the brains of this miserable one. His burning lust was that which tormented him moſt. The King his Father goes to ſee him, to take order for his health. There is but one medicine, ſaith he, that could heal him, which is, that his ſiſter Thamar, who hath the skill of making excellent broth, may prepare ſome with her own hand, for to cauſe him to have an appetite. This is very readyly granted to him. The poor maid which ſuſpected nothing is ready to give him content, for the better recovery of his perſon, he cauſes all others to avoid the place, and prayes her to ſtay in the chamber for to give him to eat, but without any other counterfeits he takes away the Mask, and declares to her his deteſtable paſſion, at which Thamar, who was a Maid of Honour conceived as great horrour as could be, alledging unto him, that this was a deed unheard of amongſt the people of God.

His

But this barbarous one proceeded on to force her, and deflowred her body, without getting the conſent of her minde. The paſſion was no ſooner evaporated, but that he entred into as furious a repentance, not enduring to behold her with his eyes, which cauſed him to remember his heinous crime. He drives her out of his houſe with reproch, where ſhe would have left her life with her honour: her mourning attire, and head covered with aſhes, teſtified the funerall of her virginity.

At laſt ſhe caſt her ſelf under the protection of her brother Abſolon, who was born of the ſame mother, and rehearſed to him the diſaſtre that had happened unto her. Her brother comforts her, and injoyns her ſilence, having in the mean while no vein in his body that did not ſwell to revenge this diſhonour. The report thereof came to the knowledge of the father, who remembring his own offence, durſt not cenſure that of his ſonne, beſides that he loved him with too tender an indulgency, and feared to grieve him, the which made him ſeem to wink at all that had paſſed, wherein he cannot be excuſed from having committed a great fault, which proceeded from a vicious mildneſſe.

Abſolon ſeeing that David ſaid nothing, continued in great diſſimulation, never complaining of Amnon, but reſolved to do himſelf juſtice with his own hands. And having kept two years his deſign faſt lock'd up in his breaſt, to avoid all ſuſpition thereof, he prepares a Royall Feaſt, to which he invites the King his Father, and all his brethren: David excuſes himſelf, and the other earneſtly entreats that his eldeſt brother Amnon, might ſupply his place, unto which the father conſents.

The brethren enter joyfully into the Hall where the Banquet was, where the Furies had prepared a bloody ſpectacle, and horrible ſacrifice. Abſolon gives the word to his ſervants to take the time, wherein his brother Amnon had already drank plentifully, and to kill him in the middle of the Feaſt, without any fail, ſaying that it was ſufficient, that it was he which had ſo appointed it, and that he would provide for their ſafety. The Wine, the good Chear, and heat, did let looſe their tongues to merryment, when as Swords drawn out of the Scabberds glittered before the eyes of the Gueſts: fear came upon all, but the danger was onely to Amnon, who was ſuddenly maſſacred, his blood leaping on his brothers table for a juſt revenge of his ſhamefull luſt.

The brethren affrighted get up upon their Mules, and get to the Town, the report mixing falſe with true, brings ſad news to David, and gives him to underſtand that Abſolon had ſlain all his brethren. The poor King caſts himſelf on his face upon the ground weeping, and all the Court tear their clothes, and put on mourning. Jonadab in the mean while certifies, that there was none but Amnon that remained upon the place, in revenge of the offence committed againſt Thamar. David returns a little to himſelf, and his other children preſent themſelves before him, affrighted and weeping for that which had paſſed. Abſolon ſaves himſelf in the houſe of his Grand-father by the mother the King of Geſher, where he remains three years, without daring to ſee the King his father, who would no wayes pardon that his enterprize.

Abſolon out of favour.

Joab labours very adviſedly to reconcile the ſon to the father, by the mediation of a very diſcreet woman of Tecoah, which came with a counterfeit pretence, and complained to the King, that ſhe being mother of two ſons, the one in a hot quarrell had ſlain his brother, and that they would conſtrain her to deliver up the other to juſtice, that proceſſe might be maid againſt him, to the end to extinguiſh all her race. And therefore ſhe entreated his Majeſty to be gracious to ſave her ſon that remained, and not wholly to deprive her of all comfort in the would. The which David having agreed to, ſhe declared to him, that he ought to practice the ſame towards his own ſon, which he would have done for one of his ſubjects: that we were all mortall and that we paſſe away here below as the current of a ſtream, that we ſhould imitate the goodneſſe of God, which loves our ſouls, and would not that they ſhould periſh.

His reconciliation by the means of Joab.

As this woman ſpoke with ſo much diſcretion, David was in doubt that Joab had inſtructed her, and made her under-hand to act this fine play, the which ſhe affirmed, and ſo much gained the heart of David, that he gave full permiſſion to Joab, to fetch back the baniſhed to his houſe, although it was for the ſpace of two years without ſeeing him. Abſolon grew ſo melancholick, by his being ſo far from the court, without ſeeing the king his father, that having oftentimes ſent to Joab to put an end to his buſineſſe, ſeeing that he would not come to him for friendſhip, he cauſed his corn to be ſet on fire, to make him come for anger, for the which he excuſed himſelf, and entreated him to ask of David in his behalf, either that he might dye, or that he might have leave to ſee him.

This good father could no longer diſſemble the movings of nature, but having ſent for him, he embraced him, and gave the kiſſe of peace, and re-eſtabliſhes him in the court. The ſpirit of this Prince was lofty, tempeſtuous, movable, which could not contain it ſelf any longer within the bounds of obedience. For the ſpace of the five years of his removall from the court he had leiſure enough to bite the bridle, and as it is credible, he had projected already the deſign of reigning, his ambition ſeemed to him ſufficiently well founded: Amnon his eldeſt brother was dead, Celeab the ſon of Abigail the ſecond of his brethren made no great noiſe, he ſaw himſelf underpropt on his mothers ſide, by the King of Geſher his grand-father: This was a Prince well made, upright, pleaſing, courteous, liberall, ſecret, courageous, and capable of great undertakeings. He ſaw his father upon the declining of his age who had loſt very much of that vigour teſtified ſo many times in his battels. Adonija was too much a fondling, and Solomon yet a childe and not able to oppoſe him. He conceived that the Empire could not ſlipp out of his hands: And indeed there was great hopes for him, if he had had ſo much patience to ſtay for it, as deſire to command.

Abſolons revolt.

His deſigns.

He made too ſoon to appear what was in his mind, cauſing himſelf to be encompaſſed when he marched forth with ſouldiers, and a guard, which was a ſign of Royalty. Further alſo he ceaſed not to gain the hearts, and ſecretly to get the good will of all his fa-fathers subjects. He was up betimes in the morning, and set himself at the entrance of the Palace to take notice of all those that had any businesse to propound to the King. One never saw Prince more prodigall in courtesies, he call'd them to him, he embraced them, he kissed them, he enquired of their countrey, of their condition, of their suit, and of that their negotiation. He did justice to all the world, and said that there was no other mishap, but that the King was old and tyred with businesses, and had not a man to hear the complaints of his subjects, and to render them justice, and that if one day he had the charge which his birth deserved, he would give full satisfaction to every one.

His ambition.

By this meanes he made himself conquerour of hearts, and traced out great intelligence throughout the Provinces, guiding himself by the counsels of Achitophel, who was the most refined spirit, the best dissembler, and most pernicious that was in the whole Kingdome: David did not sufficiently watch over the actions of his sonne, and the secret workings of this evil Counsellour, the evil increased, and their party was already framed, Absolon asketh leave of the King his father to go to Hebron under pretence of performing a vow, but with an intent to proclaim himself King. That which he desired was granted to him, he marches under this coverture with a train and splendour, carrying many people with him, and Sacrifices to offer. He gives order in the mean while to all his confederates, that at the first sound of the Trumpet, they should march forth into the field to go to meet him, and to bring him all the Troops that they could gather together.

Absolon caused himself to be proclaimed King.

All this was readily performed, and without further dissimulation he declared himself, and caused himself to be crowned in Hebron: the news came quickly to David, which brought him word that his son Absolon was revolted against him, and had got possession of Hebron, and that all the forces of the Kingdome run to him.

A great example of the weaknesse of mans spirit when it is left by God.

Here one may see a great example of the judgement of God, of the weaknesse of a man left to himself, as also, the beams of an high and profound humility. To speak according to man, all that David did in this encounter of affairs, was low and feeble. He might have taken the field with the Regiments which he had, which amounted at least to six or seven thousand men, and have unwoven this web of conspiracy, at its springing forth. And if he had not perceived himself strong enough, he had sufficient means to maintein himself in Jerusalem, to entrench and fortifie himself there, and to tyre out those spirits of his Rebels. He might have entertained him with good hopes, promises, and treaties, and have cooled this first heat, by rallying by little and little the affections of his subjects to his own party. And if he had conceived his affairs to be in ill plight, he should have been the last that had taken notice of it, after the manner of those great Captains which carry hope in their faces, even then when they have despair in their heart, to keep together their Troopes in their duty.

But this poor Prince at the newes of this rebellion, talked of nothing but flying, and leaving his chief City, and saving himself in the by-paths of the wildernesses: he is the first that goes forth without a horse to ride on, on his bare feet, his head uncovered, with teares in his eyes, affrighting all the world, and left ten Concubines to keep his palace, which was very ill advice according to the world, for what could these women do being forsaken by men, and strength, but onely to prostitute themselves to the souldiers, and yield up all the honour they had left, as a prey to them?

Whence this small courage came, when David proceeded.

Further also he sent back the Ark of the Covenant which Zadock and Abiathar had brought into his camp, which might have put very much courage into his army, and obliged it to defend a thing so honourable and so precious to this nation. Whence do we think then that this ordering himself, in a king, to whom neither valour was wanting, nor wisdome, nor experience, but onely that he saw clearly that this calamity was an ordinance of God, which had been foretold by the Prophet Nathan? and in pursuit whereof, this virtuous Prince had no other thought then to suffer the work of providence, and to submit his whole heart, in the full extention thereof, to the chastisement of his judge, and to kisse the rods which beat him. He marched like a Penitent and not like a Captain, he adored the judgments of God upon him, he enlarged his pains going a foot, and that bare-foot, to exalt the justice of his Soveraign Master: He esteemed himself unworthy to look upon the Ark of the Covenant, and used himself with all kind of rigour, to honour the design of Heaven for his abasement. This is the cause that he endured all, and complains of nothing, bearing with a deep patience the enraged tongue of Shemei, who seeing him in this estate, in which the most barbarous would have pitied him, persecuted him with bloody injuries, and went about to have stoned him: Abishai offred himself to have cut him in pieces at the present, but David sharply reproved him for it, and would that they should suffer him to exercise his rage at his pleasure, not being ignorant that all which happened to him was design'd from above. He contented himself with saying, If God will be mercifull to me, he will call me back, and make me to see again his Ark and his Tabernacle; But if he cause me to know that I am not fitting any more to please him, nor to serve in the estate of a King, I am ready to obey all his pleasure, seeing it belongs to him to do whatsoever he will with me. These words alone were more worth then all crowns, and brought him again into the favour of God, by bearing that his affliction with so great humility.

The patience of David towards Shemei.

His great humility and humble words.

The pernicious counsel of Achitophel.

In the mean while Absolon entered into Jerusalem without resistance, with his pestilent Councell of State, Achitophel, which, the surer to engage him in the war, and an irreconcileable hatred against his father, gave him most detestable counsell, and which could not have been inspired but from the blackest of the bottomlesse pits; he perswades him to abuse all the concubines that his father had left in the palace, the which this disloyall son would execute, most erroneously, causing a pavillion to be set up in the sight of all the people, and going publickly thereinto to accomplish all his incests. Behold the politick wisdome of this mischievous servant, whom they esteemed as a god in counsels; who is there that saw not that this action, besides that it drew upon Absolon the wrath and vengeance of God, made him odious and abominable to all his people, and to all those which had any feeling of Religion or publick honesty?

The wisdome of Chushi the servant of David in the counsel of Absolon.

After he had begun so villanously, he assembled his counsell, for to give order for the affairs of the warre. Achitophel counselled him to take twelve thousand men of the best exercised, to pursue his father the same night, and to take him in that disorder and wearinesse, and to make him away, assuring him, that if that one man alone were down, all the kingdome would be for him. In this private councell there was by good chance one wise man named Chushi a secret friend of David, and his confident, which was come to joyn himself in appearance to Absolon's party, closely to counterpoise the counsells and authority of Achitophel. He saw well that if God had permitted the execution of this first advice, that David had been lost without any recovery: this was the reason, that after he had insinuated himself ſelf into the heart and friendſhip of Abſolon, teſtifying that from henceforth he would ſerve him with the ſame fidelity that he had done to his predeceſſour; he declared unto him, That they ſhould do nothing haſtily, for, that his father was an old Captain which knew all pollicy in warre, and that he had ſtill in his Army men full of counſell and valour, that he ſhould not rouſe up the Bear in her wood after he had robbed her of her young ones, and that deſpair is a valiant piece in warre, that it ſtood not with his honour to give battell, unleſſe he were aſſured of the victory, for that, If at his firſt encountre he ſhould have the worſt, yet diſadvantage would be of dangerous conſequence, able to abate the courages, and put the whole Army to a rout. But if he would ſtay awhile, the people would gather together about him in a great number, as the ſand on the Sea-ſhore, and that he being in the midſt of ſo mighty an Army might overthrow the Cedars, and pull up Towns by the roots, without any body being able to reſiſt him.

This Counſell was relliſhed and preferred before the firſt, whereat Achitophel entred into ſuch a rage, that he ſuddenly went forth of the chamber, and retired himſelf to his houſe, where, after he had diſpoſed of the eſtate of his family-affairs, he took unto himſelf an unlucky cord and ſtrangled himſelf, by the moſt manifeſt juſtice of God.

After which, Abſolon ſeeing himſelf ſufficiently well accompanied, paſſes over Jordan, takes Amaſa for his chief Captain, and intends to give battel to his father. David which had had a little leaſure to recollect and fortifie himſelf, takes courage again, divides his Army into three parts, names Lieutenants and Captains, and appoints three for Chief, Joab, Abiſhai, and Ittai. He would alſo have been himſelf in the encountre, but his Counſell beſeeched him to retire, which he did after he had encouraged his people to do their duty well: but above all, that in caſe they ſhould gain the Victory, that they ſhould guard his ſon Abſolon without doing him any hurt.

Abſolon gives battel to his father, where he is overthrown and killed.

This being done; the Trumpets ſound, and the Armies approch, Davids people enter into the field of the Battel, as Lyons, their Maſters good cauſe gave them ſuch confidence. It ſeemed that the victory that day had taken a pledge to follow their Colours, and that it was enough if they did but ſhew themſelves to conquer. The Rebels tormented with the affrightments of their conſcience, and which had not ſuch entertainment as they were promiſed, firſt were put into diſorder, after to flight, and then to a rout. It ſeemed that on the one part, there were men that came to kill, and on the other, ſheep that came to be ſlain. As ſoon as they were mingled the one amongſt the other; the ſword on the one ſide made great Maſſacres, on the other, the falls and tumblings headlong carried them away, in ſuch manner, that there remained twenty thouſand upon the place.

The death of Abſolon.

Abſolon taken with a great aſtoniſhment, is left by all the world, and betaking himſelf to flight, gets up upon a Mule. It hapned that paſſing through a Forreſt, his head was catched, and wreathed within the branches of a Tree, inſomuch that his carryer having left him, he remained hanging between heaven and earth, where he made a very fitting amends both to the juſtice of God, and the goodneſſe of his Father: Joab had notice thereof, who nevertheleſſe although David had forbidden it, ſtroke him through with three Darts, and when as yet he ſeemed to have life, ten young ſouldiers of the Troups of Joab ran to make an end of him; he feared ſo much that if he ſhould return into favour and authority, leſt he ſhould take vengeance upon him, becauſe he would not follow his party. The body was interred in a pit under a great heap of ſtones, for to convince the vanity of him which had cauſed a ſtately monument to be built for himſelf, which he called Abſolons hand. Behold an horrible end of an evil ſonne and a rebellious ſubject, which is ſufficient to make poſterity afraid throughout the revolution of all ages.

While all this was doing, David incloſed in a little Town, expected the event of the battell, and when as the Poſts brought him the news of the Victory, he ſhewed not ſo much rejoycing as fear: asking every moment, in what eſtate his ſonne Abſolon was, which cauſed that divers durſt not bring him the news of his death, ſeeing the trouble of his mind. At laſt Cuſhi uttered the word, and ſaid, That they ſhould deſire Abſolon's end to all the Kings enemies. He underſtood well what he would ſay, and was pierced with ſo violent a grief, that he could not be comforted, loſing all courage, and crying every moment, Abſolon my ſonne, my ſonne Abſolon, Oh that this favour had been done for me, that I might have dyed for thee! Every one caſt down his eyes for pitty, and the whole victory was turned into ſorrow, the Palms and Laurels were changed into Cypreſſe.

Joabs inſoleney.

Joab alwayes bold and inſolent towards his Maſter, inſtead of receiving reproches for his fault, caſts them upon David, and thinks that the means to juſtifie himſelf, was to ſpeak the more ſtoutly. He enters into the Chamber of his King, and reproves him ſharply, ſaying to him That he would put to confuſion all his good ſervants that had that day ſaved his life, his houſe, and all his eſtate: That he was of a ſtrange nature, and ſeemed to have been made for nothing but to hate thoſe that loved him, and to love thoſe that hated him: That it was very clear, that he bore no good affection to his Captains, and good Souldiers, and if they all had periſhed to ſave the life of one rebellious ſonne, he would have been very well ſatisfied. Further, he ſwore to him by the living God, that if he did not riſe and go forth to ſee and entertein thoſe that returned from the battell, that there ſhould not remain one man onely with him before the morning, which would prove a greater diſpleaſure to him, then ever he received in all his life. He preſſed him ſo vehemently, that the King without daring to anſwer him one word, roſe up, and did all that he would have him.

This great grief diminiſhed by little and little, and the rejoycings of thoſe that came on every ſide to carry him back to Jeruſalem in Triumph gave him no leaſure to think upon his loſſe. He endeavoured to draw to him again all thoſe that had ſeparated themſelves, pardoning all the world with an unſpeakable meekneſſe, being ready even to give Joabs place to Amaſa that was chief Captain for Abſolon.

Davids mildeneſſe very great.

But Joab quickly hindred this, and kild with his own hand him that they had purpoſed for his ſucceſſour. After that he began to purſue one Sheba a Captain of the Rebels, who was retyred into Abela, with ſome remainder of the mutinous, and as he was about to beſiege it, and deſtroy the City for to take him, a woman, of diſcretion and great in credit amongſt her people, which had made compoſition with Joab, cauſed him to be ſlain, and threw his head over the walls, to put an end to this whole bloodie warre.

The last acts of Davids life.

After this re-eſtabliſhment of his Eſtate, David reigned about eleven years in full peace in continuall exerciſes of Piety, of Devotion, of Juſtice, and cauſed a generall Aſſembly of the States of his Realme, where he made his ſonne Solomon which he had choſen to be confirmed, and encouraged him to build that great Temple, which ſhould be the marvell of the World, whereof he ſhewed him the plat-form, the beautifying and the orders, in the Idea.

Two things do a little aſtoniſh thoſe which do ſeek an exact ſanctity in this Prince: the firſt, that he dyed having unto the laſt hour a maid of rare beauty by him; and the other, that he recommended to his ſon Solomon puniſhments and deaths by his Teſtament.

But there are that anſwer to thoſe that may be offended with theſe actions: That God hath permitted this to make us the better to reliſh and admire the perfections of his Evangelicall law, whereof the Word Incarnate was made the Law-giver, and bringer, above all the excellencies of the preſents and virtues of the Moſaicall law. And that one ought not to expect from David the chaſtity of a Saint Lewis, nor of a Caſimire, but that one ought to meaſure things according to the manner of the time, according to the law and cuſtome. Nevertheleſſe I ſhould rather ſay, that the plurality of women was not an offence, ſeeing that it was approved of God, ſo that it cauſed not a weakning of the vigour of the ſpirits, and mortifying their divine functions by too much commerce with the fleſh. David ſinned not in cauſing the Shunamite to lye beſides him, ſeeing that ſhe was in the place of a ſpouſe, and approched unto him not for the pleaſure which his great age had totally extinguiſhed, but for the entertainment of his Royall perſon. Laſtly, there are other actions that do ſet forth his virtue, beſides this which is more worthy of excuſe then blame.

And foraſmuch as he ordained by his teſtament, the death of Joab and of Shimei, this doth ſomething trouble thoſe ſpirits which have an inclination to mildneſſe; they ſay that Joab was his kinſman, his faithfull ſervant, the beſt of his Captains, the chief Commander that had followed him from his youth, accompanied him through infinite dangers, and upheld the Crown a thouſand times ſhaking upon his head. He never medled in the factions that were raiſed againſt the King, he was alwayes the firſt that diſſipated them by the vigour of his ſpirit, reſolution, counſell, of his Arms, and of his Sword. If he ſlew Abner, it was in revenge of his Brother which the other had ſlain. If he ſtabbed Amaſa, it was the chief Captain of the Rebell Abſolon, whom they would have put in his place; for to lay then great faults of the State upon him. If he ſpoke freely to David, it was alwayes for his good, and for his glory; in the mean time at his Death he recommended him to be puniſhed, after that in effect he had pardoned him all his life.

But to all this I ſay, that the laſt actions of ſo great a King, are more worthy of honour then cenſure. The puniſhment of Joab proceeded, not from a Paſſion, but from a Juſtice inſpired by God, which would ſatisfie the voyce of blood, the which cryed ſtill againſt the murders committed by this Captain. Further alſo there was a ſecret of State, as ſaith Theodoret, which is, that this Joab ſhewed himſelf againſt the re-election of Solomon, and was ready to trouble the peace of the Realm.

And as concerning Shimei to whom he had ſworn that he would not cauſe him to dye, he kept his promiſe to him faithfully, abſtaining from doing him any evil while he lived, although he was in abſolute power for to hurt him, but as his oath was perſonall, he would not extend it upon his ſonne, and tye his hands, contenting himſelf to recommend unto him that he ſhould do juſtice, according as his wiſedome and diſcretion ſhould direct him. It is very fitting that we ſhould think highly of this Prophet, and that we ſhould rather ſearch out the reaſon of many of his actions, from the ſecret inſpiration of God, then from the weakneſſe of humane judgement.

He lived near upon three-ſcore and twelve years, reigned fourty, and dyed a thouſand and thirty two years before the birth of our Saviour, leaving infinite treaſures for the building of the Temple, and eternall monuments of his devotion and underſtanding. It was a ſpeciall favour to him, that the Saviour would be born of his blood, and that his birth was revealed to him ſo many dayes before it was known to the world; He hath often ſet it down upon the title of his Pſalmes, and was in an extaſie, in this contemplation, by the fore-taſte of that his happineſſe. Men are accuſtomed to take their nobility, and their names from their Anceſtours that go before them. But David drew it from a Son which is the Father of Glory, and Authour of Eternity. The induſtrious hands of men have taken pains in vain, to carve him out a Tomb, Death hath no power over him, ſeeing that he is the Primogenitour of life. All things are great in his perſon; but the heighth of all his greatneſſe is, that he hath given us a Jeſus.

SOLOMON

SOLOMON.

Solomons entry into the Realm full of troubles.

Solomon was he that ordered the holineſſe of the Temple, and yet he can hardly find place in the Holy Court. The love which gave him the Crown by the means of his mother Bathſheba, hath taken from him his innocency. The Gentiles might have made him one of their Gods, if Women had not made him leſſe then a man. His entrance into the Throne of his father was bloudy, his Reign peaceable, his Life variable, and his End uncertain. One may obſerve great weakneſſes at the Court at his coming to the Crown, confuſed deſigns, deſperate hopes, a Prophet upright at the Court, a woman full of invention, an old Courtier overthrown, and little brotherhood where there is diſpute of Royalty.

David was upon the fading of his Age, and his Throne looked at by his Children, which expected the diſſolution of their father. He had taken the authority upon him to decide this queſtion by his commands, not willing to be ruled therein by nature, nor to preferre him whom ſhe had firſt brought into the world, but him which ſhould be appointed by God, and beſt fitted thereto by his favours. Bathſheba a ſubtil woman that had carried him away by violence of a great affection, kept her ſelf in her poſſeſſion, and had more power over the mind of the King, then all his other aſſociates. Amidſt the kindneſſes of an affectionate husband, which is not willing to deny any thing to her whom he loves; ſhe drew this promiſe from David, that he would take her ſonne Solomon to be ſucceſſour in his Eſtates.

Bathſheba ſtily inſinuates her ſelf and procures the Crown for her ſon Solomon.]

Solomons infancy pleaſing.

This was a little miracle of Nature in his Infancy, and it ſeemed that all the Graces had ſtrove together to make a work ſo curiouſly poliſht. His mother loved him with infinite tenderneſſe, and his father could not look upon him without amazedneſſe. He was married at the age of nineteen years; and David before he departed from the world, ſaw himſelf multiplied by his ſon in a ſecond, which was Roboam.

Ariſtotle hath obſerved well, that children which are married ſo young do ſeldome bring forth great men; and this obſervation was verified in Roboam, who cauſed as many confuſions in his life, as he had made rejoycings at his birth. This ſtrengthened Solomon at the beginning in his own and his mothers pretences.

But Adonijah his brother, which immediately followed Abſolon, was before him in the right of Elderſhip, and promiſed himſelf to have a good part of the Empire.

Adonijah competitor of the Crown and his faction.

The example of that unfortunate brother, which had expired his life in the deſpair of his fortune, was not ſtrong enough for to ſtay him, which treading (as it were) in the ſame ſteps, went on infallibly unto his laſt miſchance. David endured too long for him, and it ſeems to him that the greateſt kindneſſes that a rich father could do for his ſonne, when he is come to die, is to ſuffer himſelf to die.

He had ſufficiently well knitted his party together, binding himſelf cloſely to the chief Prieſt Abiathar, and to Joab; It ſeemed to him, that having on his ſide the Altars and Arms he was invincible.

The fault of Adonijah in his Counſel of State.

But in that burning deſire that he had to reign, he committed very great faults which put an end to his life by an event very tragicall. He did not ſufficiently conſider the power of his father, who governed himſelf by the orders of them in the diſpoſition of their Royalty, and ſaw not, that to undertake to ſucceed him without his good will, was to deſire to climb to the top of the houſe without going up by the ſtairs. His experience might have made him weigh, what the jealouſie of an old man may do; who deſires the more honour and life, the nearer he ſees them to their ſetting. His reaſon might have taught him to judge, what the artifices were of a woman beloved, how imperious over a husband. He thought of nothing but climbing, without endeavouring to take away the hinderances which he had about his feet.

Other wayes alſo he contented himſelf to have the favour of ſome without ſeeking that of others, which, it may be, had no great deſire to ſet him forward, but were of a reall power to hinder him. There are ſome which hold themſelves offended, becauſe they are not intreated, and which endeavour to hinder a buſineſſe without having any other reaſon, but that they were not employed in it. Adonijah contented himſelf to have Abiathar and Joab for him, but he conſidered not that Nathan the Prophet, and Zadok the Prieſt, and Benaiah the Captain, whom he contemned, were mighty, and able to trouble his pretenſions.

Further, for fear leſt he ſhould fail in the buſineſſe, he made too much haſte of it, taking into his company ſouldiers, and a guard, in imitation of Abſolon. And when as he ſhould have kept himſelf, retired, and recollected within himſelf, he opened himſelf too much, and publiſhed his deſigns, which were like to thoſe pearls, that inſtead of a good ſubſtance, had nothing but an outward rind.

He made a great feaſt, to which he invited all his brethren without ſpeaking of Solomon; he called Abiathar and Joab, without making mention of Nathan and Zadok. The one made great cheer, and created a King amongſt their pots and glaſſes, whilſt that Nathan and Zadok vented all their ſecrets, and countremined all their deſigns.

Nathan and Bathſheba's advice.

Amongſt theſe exceſſive joyes of Adonijah, Nathan plotted together with Bathſheba, declared to her the news of the pretenſions of the imaginary King; exhorted her ſtrongly to oppoſe him, and ſhewed her the means thereto. They take their counſels together, with a reſolution to make the proceedings of Adonijah to ſound aloud in the ears of David. It is agreed that Bathſheba ſhould enter into the chamber of the King firſt, and that Nathan, without underſtanding any thing of their conference, ſhould wind in, as it were, upon a ſudden, and as it were to ſtrike up the buſineſſe, when as ſhe already had well proceeded in the diſcourſe.

All this was artificially executed, Bathſheba, with many honied words cauſeth David to remember his promiſe, repreſented to him the enterpriſe of his ſonne Adonijah, and ſets forth before him the pitifull handling that ſhe with her dear ſon muſt expect, in caſe that the deſign of the Rebel ſhould take effect.

Nathan, an eloquent ſpeaker comes in, as if he were amazed, and without ſhewing that he bore any affection to any party, he laid chief hold on the authority and pleaſure of the King, which he comes to underſtand, as the true oracle of the Realm, to conform himſelf thereto, and without falling into paſſion againſt Adonijah, he cauſed him to ſend his ſecret intelligences and carriages, avouching, that if he had undertaken that, without communicating it to him, he makes his proceedings very ſtrange.

This was to intereſt David in the buſineſſe in ſuch a manner, as he failed not preſently to command Nathan than and Zadok, to set Solomon upon his mule, to cause his guard and his old Regiments to accompany him unto Gibeon, and there without any delay to consecrate him King, and to give the people to understand, that he had chosen him for his lawfull successour.

Solomon is declared King.

All this was executed with vigorousnesse incredible, when as a woman so ardent had taken it in hand. And while Adonijah was yet drinking with his confidents, the trumpet sounded through the town, with great outcryes of joy, and unspeakable clapping of hands. He had thought that all this had been done for him, but Jonathan the son of the high Priest Abiathar put them all beside this belief, and told them with lamentation, together, for their overthrow, what that was which was done, and that Solomon was coming presently to be consecrated.

All their hearts failed upon the news of this chance, and they separated themselves as much as they could from each other, to take away the suspicion of a conspiracy, which was but too manifest. Solomon is brought back to the Palace with strong acclamations, and all the officers and servants entring into the chamber of David, gave him a thousand benedictions for the choice that he had made, wishing to the new King all the greatnesse and all the prosperity of his father.

Adonijah saw well that he was gone too farre, and fearing left Solomon might make the first triall of his power at the cost of his life, he fled unto the ordinary refuge, taking hold of the horns of the Altar, and entreating Solomon for his life, who gave it him upon such condition, that he should keep himself within his duty, and would not spot a day so glorious for him by shedding the bloud of his miserable brother. Joab and Abiathar dissembling their intelligence with Adonijah, ran to worship as well as others, him, whom willingly they would have devoured, seeing that their safety consisted at that time in hiding their intention.

The death of David, and the bloudy entrance of Solomon.

But after that David had his eyes closed up, and that Solomon saw himself confirmed by the generall consentment of all orders; those waves of the Court, which as yet had made but little frizlings, began to raise a great tempest.

Adonijah desired the Shunamite which completed his misfortune.

Adonijah after he had lost a Kingdome, endeavoured to get a woman, and goes directly to Bathsheba the Queen-mother, to uphold his request. She was not unwilling to see him, fearing that he had still retained some bitternesse in his heart, upon the things that had passed: behold wherefore, she presently asked him whether he came as a friend; to which he answered, that all was quiet, but that he had one request to make to her, knowing well the credit in which she was with the King her son. The Queen having shewed him a good countenance, and a free willingnesse to serve him, he opens the matter to her, and saith, That she was not ignorant that the Kingdome did appertain to him by the right of Eldership, but seeing that God had otherwise disposed of it, that he did willingly acquiesce, and desired nothing of the King, but that it would please his Majesty, to give him Abishag in marriage, that maid which served David his father in his old age.

It is clear that this Prince was good, and of an easie nature, that could content himself with so small a thing, and his request was not uncivil, seeing that she was but a servant, and never the wife of his father, which had no other commerce with her, then to receive the service and assistance necessary for his health.

Bathsheba was very glad that his ambition did here bound it self, and promised to speak to the King thereof very willingly, which she did, going expressly to visit him. Solomon went forth to meet her, made her very great reverence, received her with most courteous entertainment, and having ascended his Throne, he caused another to be set at his right hand for his mother, which said to him, That she came to make a very little request unto him, upon which it would be a displeasure to her to receive any deniall.

The son assured her, and said, That she might boldly demand, and that he was no wayes intended to give her any discontent. As soon as she had opened the businesse, and named Abishag's name, Solomon entred into great anger, and said, she might have added thereto the Kingdome, seeing that he was his eldest brother, and that he had Joab and Abiathar on his side; and without giving any other answer, he swore, that he would make Adonijah die before it was night: whereupon, presently he gave order to Benaiah, who supplied the office of Captain of the Guard, which failed not to slay this young Prince.

Solomons rigour.

He cannot well be justified for the murder of his brother.

Those that think that Solomon might do this in conscience, and that one may conjecture that God had revealed it unto him, take very small reasons to excuse great crimes, and see not that whosoever would have recourse to imaginary Revelations, might justifie all the most wicked actions of Princes. There is not one word alone in the Scripture, that witnesses, that after the establishment of Solomon, this poor Prince did make the least trouble in the State, he acknowledged Solomon for King, he lived peaceable, he was contented with the order that God permitted: for the comfort of the losse of a Kingdome, which according to the Law of Nations did belong to him, he desired but a maid servant in marriage, and he is put to death for it.

The just punishment of God upon Solomon

Who could excuse this? I am of opinion of the Dr Cajetan, who saith, that this command was not onely severe, but unjust; and I believe that hence came the misfortune of Solomon, for that having shewed himself so little courteous towards his mother, and so cruel towards his brother, for the love of a woman; God to punish him, hath suffered, that he should be lost by all that which he loved most. After this murder, he sent for Abiathar the chief Priest, and gave him to understand, that he was worthy to die, but forasmuch as he had carried the Ark of the living God, and had done infinite services for the King his father, even from his youth, he gave him his life, upon such condition, that he should be deprived of the dignity of the high Priest, and should retire himself to his house. The Scripture saith, that this was to fulfill the word of the Lord, which had been pronounced against the house of Eli; but yet it follows not for all that, that this depriving was very just on Solomon's side, being done without mature consideration. And although God ordains sometimes temporall afflictions upon children for the punishment of the fathers, yet one cannot nevertheless inferre from this, that those which torment and persecute them, without any other reason then their own satisfaction, should not any wayes be faulty; for otherwise one might avouch, that the death of our Lord having come to passe by the ordinance of God, Pilate and Caiaphas that did co-operate unto this order without any knowledge thereof, should be without offence. As for those that think that the Levites were accusers in those proceedings, it is a conjecture of their own invention; and if indeed it were so, one might yet further reason, by what Law could the Levites bring accusation against their chief Priest? This jealousie of Government is a marvellous beast, and those that would excuse it, find, for the most part, that there is no stronger reasons, then swords, and prisons, and banishments.

Abiathar the high Priest deprived of his dignity by a very violent action.

In the mean time the news comes to Joab, that he was

was in great danger for having followed the party of Adonijah, and as he saw himself on the sudden forsaken, and faln from the great credit that he had in the Militia, he had recourse to the Tabernacle, which was the common refuge, and taking hold of the Altar, he asked mercy and his life. Benaiah the executour of the murder, goes to him, by Solomons order, and commands him to come forth, for which he excuses himself, protesting that he would rather die then forsake his refuge, which was related to King Solomon, who without regard to the holy place, caused him to be massacred at the foot of the Altar, to mingle his bloud with that of the sacrifices. Behold what he got from the Court after fourty years services, and one may affirm, that if it had been sometimes a good mother to him, now it acted a cruel step-mother at the last period of his life.

The death of Joab.

There remained no more but Shimei to make up the last Act of the Tragedy, and although David had given commandment for his death, Solomon seemed yet to make some scruple upon the promise of impunity that was made to him: and this was the cause that he appointed him the city of Jerusalem for a prison, with threatning, that if he should go forth thence, and onely go over the brook of Cedron, he would put him to death. The other that expected nothing but a bloudy death, willingly received the condition, and kept it three years, until the time that on a day having received news of his servants that were fled to the Philistims, it came into his mind to follow them, without taking heed to that which was commanded him, which caused, that at his return, he was murdered by the commandment of Solomon, by the hand of Benaiah.

Behold the beginning of a reign tempestuous, and one must not think to find Saints so easily at the Court, especially in those which have liberty to do what they please; many things slip from them, which may better be justified by repentance, then by any other apology. That which follows in this history of Solomon is all peaceable and pleasing, even unto his fall, which may give cause of affrightment.

A wonderfull Dream of Solomon.

The third year of his reign, he had an admirable Dream, after the manner of those that are called Oracles: It seemed to him that God appeared to him, and spoke to him: at the which he was in an extasie, and seeing himself so near to him that could do all, he desired of him with incredible ardency, the gift of Wisdome to govern his people; the which pleased so much the Sovereign Majesty, that not onely he gave him a very great understanding above all the men of the world, but further also added thereto, Riches and Glory in so high an eminence, that none should equall him.

His Knowledge.

There are those that dispute here, though beyond their sight, concerning the Learning of Solomon, and would prove that he composed Comedies and Satyrs; but although we cannot deny that he was filled with abundance of Learning, yet we must affirm, that his Politicall Science had the chiefest place, and that all his knowledge of Naturall things tended but to that intent, seeing that he specified it in his Prayer, that the desire of Wisdome that he professed was onely for the Government of his Kingdome.

Whether learning be profitable for Princes.

And hence we may gather, that Learning is an Instrument very necessary for the accomplishment of great Princes, although that the ignorant may conceive otherwise. They say, that this makes them too lofty, curious, and self-conceited, and that hence they take the boldnesse to rest upon their own belief, and deifie all their opinions; a great Authority being sufficiently able to raise up a little sufficiency. They bring the examples of Nero, and Julian the Apostate, both which, having so well studied, they governed ill, and came to an unhappy end.

But I shall avouch to them, that knowledge and judgement without piety is an unprofitable commodity, and sometimes pernicious to Kings. Hence it is that they take occasion to move extravagant questions, to undertake dangerous businesses, to authorize their faults by apparent reasons, and to be pricked forward with a conceit which causes them to despise all counsels. Nevertheless, it is an insupportable abuse to blame good things in those, which either have but the counterfeit thereof, or which make an evil use of them. I esteem not Nero nor Julian to have been very learned men, because they had skill in Poetry and Rhetorick, without ever well attaining the kowledge of their principall profession: and if they having learned good precepts among humane Writers, have abused them, shall one say for that, that they are naught and dangerous for a Prince?

The learning of a Prince defended.

By the same reason we might condemne the Sunne, because that Phaeton burnt himself in those heats: And take away the Water from amongst the Elements, because that Aristotle, as they say, was drowned therein.

Lastly, we might bring an accusation against Nature in generall, and so find nothing to be good of all that God made, because it may be corrupted by the wickednesse of men. But for two or three Princes somwhat learned, which have used their skill evilly, how many ignorant ones shall we find which have done farre more cruel and barbarous things then these: as, Diocletian, Licinius, Maximian, Bajazet, and Selim?

Nature hath placed all the Senses, which are the principles of our Knowledge, in the Head, to give us to understand, that all the lights ought to be in a Prince, which is the Head of his Realm. The Soul is not more necessary for the Body, then Understanding for a King. He is (as Philo reports) to his people, that which God is to the creature.

And what doth God, but onely shed forth his clearnesse throughout the whole world, visible and invisible? and what ought a Monarch to do, but to make himself the fountain of good counsels that should maintain his estate?

What can a Prince do which sees not but with others eyes; which speaks not, but by the mouth of another; which hears not, but with borrowed ears; but onely lose his estimation in the minds of his Subjects, and yield up his Authority as a prey unto those, that knowing his insufficiency take the boldnesse to enterprise any thing without punishment?

I confesse there are those, which having not studied, have a very good understanding, which they have polished by the experience of things in the world, and by conversing with great personages; but how can we say that those are ignorant which know as much as the books, and might serve for examples to Philosophers? their modesty doth yet make them affirm and acknowledge, that if they had received a deeper tincture of good learning, they should have drawn therefrom the more grace and advantage.

Knowledge ought to be moderate.

I would in no wise that a Prince should be like to the Emperour Michael Paripanatius, which had alwayes Table-books in his hand, and a pen, composing of Verses, or making Periods to run smooth.

I do not so much esteem such petty shews of superfluous knowledge, and ill ordered in a great one; but to see a man at the government of people, which hath laid a deep foundation of true piety, knows the secrets of Philosophy, the best purified, is no wayes ignorant of Divine and Humane Laws, is skilfull in the Histories of all Nations, with very diligent Observations and particular applications to his own government. A man that can judge, ſpeak, and act, that can expreſſe himſelf with clearneſſe and majeſty of words, fitting to his eſtate; this is it which makes him appear as a God amongſt men; which gives him authority amongſt his people; which makes him eſteemed by his equalls; feared by his inferiours; terrible to his enemies; and honoured by all the world. It is by theſe means that Auguſtus Ceſar, Trajan, Veſpatian, Marcus Aurelius, Antoninus, and ſo man others, whereof Tiraquel reckons up eight and thirty very famous in his Book of Nobility, have attained to that heighth of reverence which hath made them honoured throughout all ages.

that

The judgement of Solomon on the contention of the two women

For a proof of this, we ſee the great reputation that Solomon got in judging of the two women, which diſputed whoſe the little infant ſhould be. Both of them ſaid equally, that ſhe was the true mother; the one acted it cunningly, the other proceeded therein with truth. It was needfull to know which ſpoke from the heart, and which from the tongue onely. There are counterfeits ſo well ſtuft out and neatly coloured, that many able men cannot know, nor are able to diſtinguiſh the true from the falſe. Parmeno counterfeited ſo perfectly the cry of a young chicken, that one would have thought that nature could not have ſet out out any thing better in compariſon of him. So many skilfull men, ſo many gray heads were at that time in the Court of Solomon, which loſt themſelves in this counterfeit, without being able to diſcover it; and when he commanded a ſword to be brought, and to divide the little infant, all the world was amazed: ſome thought his judgement was groſſe, that it was cruel and bloudy; but Solomon had ſtudied in the boſome of nature the affections of a true mother. When he underſtood that the one approved of this command, and was urgent that the infant ſhould be divided in two, he drove her away as an impudent one; but when he ſaw that the other was moved and wounded deeply at her heart, and that ſhe cryed with a pitifull voyce, that they ſhould rather give the infant all whole to that wicked one, then to make two pieces of it. When he conſidered the affrightment on her face, and all the veins of her body ſwelling at this deſign, he pronounced with the voyce of an Oracle, that ſhe was the true mother, which was avouched and acknowledged publickly. All the aſſiſtants were ſo taken with this expedient that their King had invented, that they extoll'd him to heaven, and promiſed themſelves all, ſuch a diſcerning, and equity, ſemblable in their differences. Who doth not ſee then that Underſtanding is the Eye of a Prince, and the light of his people? This reputation of underſtanding, and lofty knowledge of Solomon, was ſpread abroad amongſt ſtrange Nations, and drew the Queen of Sheba unto Jeruſalem. This is a ſtory which hath afforded recreation to divers, that have exerciſed their pens thereupon, and curioſity, throughout the whole world. Every one would baptize her and give her a name; one calls her name Nicaula, another Nitocriſſe, another Maſſeda, and others will have her name to be Candaeſſe. There is nothing more certain in all this then uncertainty, and it is very hard to give her a name without making a lie thereby.

The Queen of Sheba.

And yet can one leſſe know that of her husband, nor whether ſhe were a maid or a widow, or a married woman. There is ſome appearance that if ſhe were within the bonds of marriage, ſhe was like unto thoſe Dames that bear rule over their Husbands, and do all that pleaſe them in their own houſe. Her husband was very patient, if it be true which Pineda ſaith, that ſhe ſtayed a whole year at Jeruſalem in Paſtimes, and to propound Riddles. But Claudian that aſſures us, that the Sabeans are governed by women, will make us rather believe that ſhe was free, and without ſubjection. She came from the countrey of the Sabeans, which make a part of Arabia, and are very rich in gold and perfumes. This is the reaſon that ſhe entred into Jeruſalem with a great train, and ſpared not the riches of her countrey for Solomon. She propounded many queſtions, whereof the Scripture doth not touch one, which hath given occaſion to many to invent at their pleaſure; and divers have ſet down ſo ridiculous ones, that if the Queen of Sheba ſhould have come ſo farre to have learned ſo little, there might be an appearance, that coming loaden with ſo great riches, ſhe had forgot to put in a little Judgement amongſt them.

Her qualities.

Claudian, in Eutrop.

Levibúſque Sabæis imperat hic ſexus. Women amongſt the Sabeans command over men.

The queſtions of the Queen of Sheba.

That which Baronius ſaith is ſomewhat more credible; that ſhe was of a countrey where ſhe might learn the prophecie of Balaam touching the birth of the Meſſias, and that underſtanding afterwards the greatneſſe of Solomon, ſhe had a deſire to know if this were not he, whom that prediction looked at. And it is very true that ſhe found the ſhadow of him in Solomon, but not the body; yet ſhe was ſo much amazed beholding onely his figure, and viewing the Temple of God which was now built after five and twenty years; in conſidering the Palace, the Officers, and the order of the whole houſe of Solomon, that ſhe thought to leave her whole ſpirit behind her in Jeruſalem, having nothing elſewhere able to content her.

Thoſe which do judge of the inclinations of Solomon, do conceive, that all theſe great diſcourſes with a woman, could not paſſe without ſtrains of love, and produced him a child by the Queen of Sheba named David, from whom Preſtor John is deſcended; but they ſhould have conſidered that Solomon was not yet ſo inclined to women, and it was not likely that he ſhould begin with her, cauſing her to return as one forlorn, which came thither with honeſt behaviour, and of whom the Goſpel ſpeaks honourably.

There are many things in which the Scripture would not content our curioſity, thoſe which would learn more from thence then it hath taught them, are like to thoſe Painters, which account themſelves very brave men, when they have the skill to go beyond nature.

His zeal to the building of the Temple.

And ſo much for that concerns the Wiſdome of Solomon, which cauſed a great part of his miracles. But one cannot ſufficiently commend the Zeal which he bore, from the firſt year of his reign, to the building of the houſe of God. Herein it is that he hath teſtified a ſingular Piety, and a great Wiſdome of a Statesman; for to ſay the truth, and to ſpeak according unto the mind of Ariſtotle, it doth much import that a Prince be religious, for that he is thereby the more loved and feared by his people, which do not ſo eaſily offend him, whom they think to be under Gods protection.

Further alſo, he was to content a Nation more religious then any other, and greatly ceremonious, which he could not better do, then in cauſing them to behold ſo beautifull a Temple, which ſhould be the marvel of the whole univerſe.

All men are naturally ſtirred up with a reſentment of a Divinity, and they think that the means to teſtifie their affection and ſervice thereto, is to erect Temples and offer Sacrifice unto it.

Emulation doth often mingle it ſelf with Religion, and great ones do find their glory, in lifting up that of the Divinity. Pliny makes mention of the Temple of Diana at Epheſus, whoſe length was 425. foot, and the bredth 220. with 137. Pillars made by as many Kings; and ſaith, that all Aſia joyned together to build it, and ſpent thereupon the ſpace of two hundred hundred and twenty years before it was fully finiſhed. Whatſoeve he ſaith of this Temple, we are obliged to believe thatt was not of value with this of Solomons, which is recommended to us by him to whom it was dedicated, the Living God; which had not then upon earth any buſe but this where he was acknowledged. Further alſ it is to be priſed, by reaſon of its founders, whicl were two great Princes: for, its greatneſſe (which is ompared in the Scripture to a city, the number of offtes was ſo great; Allies, Porches, Houſes, and Diviſons) was very great there; and above all, the numbr of the attendants, which did amount ſometime: between ſeven and eight hundred miniſters. Adde hereunto the heighth, which was upon the top of two high mountains; the beauty, and the riches which was found there, you will avouch, that it was greater then it is reported. It is a prodigious thing which David ſaith of himſelf, in the firſt of the Chronicles, that he offer'd for this deſign out of his poverty, a hundred thouſand talents of gold, and a thouſand thouſand talents of ſilver, which make in all, according to the ſupputation of our Villalpand, two thouſand one hundred twenty and three millions of gold, without comprehending therein that which the people offered freely of their own, which amounted to ſeventy one millions of gold, eight hundred and fourſcore thouſand crowns; and the two ſums taken together, make one thouſand one hundred ninety four millions of gold, eight hundred fourſcore thouſand crowns, and all this but to ſerve for that which ſhould be wrought in gold and ſilver for the uſe of the Temple.

Plin. l. 36. c. 14. The Temple of Epheſus.

Villalp. in Ezekiel. 3. apparat. Paral. 1. 22. Tyrinus bis mille quingentos & 50 aureorum ex eodem Vallalpando.

Joſephus alſo in the eighth Book of his Antiquities ſaith, That there was numbred there fourſcore thouſand cups, and as many plates of gold, twenty thouſand cencers of the ſame materiall, two hundred thouſand trumpets of ſilver, and fourty thouſand inſtruments of muſick, faſhioned of gold and ſilver; garments of linnen and ſurplaſſes, to the number of ten thouſand. Laſtly, the whole Temple, from the top to the bottome, and the pavement it ſelf, was covered with plates of gold, faſtned together with nails of gold which weighed every one five and twenty ounces.

Joſep. 18. cap. 3.

To ſay the truth, ſome Interpreters of the Scripture have taken that very high, making the value of their moneys according as they will, in this great obſcurity of thoſe that have written of the diverſity of their values, according to the diverſity of their Ages and Nations: but one may not doubt of the truth of the Scripture, which raiſes this Temple to a heighth of magnificence, which exceeds all other works.

After that the Houſe of God was eſtabliſhed, Solomon made a ſolemne Dedication thereof, for the which he ſacrificed 2200. oxen, and 20000. ſheep. He prayed to God aloud before all the people with a wiſdome and zeal unparallel'd. He bleſſed all his Subjects with an uncredible joy, ſo that the face of Jeruſalem that day ſeemed an anticipated Paradiſe. He buſied himſelf after in building for himſelf; he made himſelf a palace, wherein he ſpared nothing for glorioufneſſe, with the moſt ſumptuous Kings of the earth. When as the Scripture relates this with a plainneſſe of its ſtyle, it ceaſeth not to fill our ſpirits with amazement: and if we had not recourſe to the ſovereign power of God, which doth all which pleaſeth him; we ſhould ſcarce be able to believe, that the Kingdome of Judea having begun but in Saul, by ſo miſerable beginnings that there was hardly found any iron to make ſwords of, and that at ſometimes there was but two to be found in a whole Army, that it ſhould on a ſudden riſe to ſo great an increaſe, that ſilver was there as common as ſtones.

This gives a large entry to all ſorts of delights and pleaſures of ſtately Princes of the earth, which Solomon ſoon cauſed to enter into his palace; and which ruined him by a farre greater diſaſtre, then ever the armies of the Philiſtims, Ammonites and Moabites could have done. And as Juvenal ſaid, That luxury had taken room, and had reſerved unto it ſelf the vengeance for all the evil uſage wherewith the Romans had handled ſo many Kings and People of the habitable world: So we may ſay, That the Licencioufneſſe of Solomon did revenge all the injuries of the Nations ſtirred up againſt the people of the Jews.

The fall of Solomon.

He which ſhould ſee a ſtarre fall from heaven into the dirt, for to be trodden upon by the feet of men and beaſts, after it had ſhined amongſt the celeſtial globes; would he be more affrighted and amazed, then in conſidering Solomon thrown down from the beautiful firmament of glory where the hand of God had placed him, into thoſe opprobrious paſſions, labirynths of errours, and unexplicable confuſions?

Solomon that was as high lifted up above other Kings, as Kings are above common men, this man of wonders and miracles, the well-beloved of God, which had wiſdome for his ſpouſe, virtue for his delight, happineſſe for his companion, and glory for the aſſiſtant of his throne; to diſgrace, by a deteſtable old age, all the comelineſſe of his life, to deface all the rare inventions of his mind, to eclipſe all the weak lights of his underſtanding.

O women, alwayes fatal to the ruine of great men! who will hereafter think it ſtrange that you have changed the Gods of the heathens into beaſts, ſeeing that you have tranſported Solomon into a monſter? It is not almoſt imaginable into what a gulf of deſtruction Love plunged this miſerable Prince: and that Philoſopher Antiſthenes ſaid true, that if there were ſuch a Venus as the Poets have made, he would be her hang-man: If there were ſuch a Cupid as they have painted out, he would pull off his wings, and throw him down from the Heaven of heavens, where they had placed him, into the deepeſt of the bottomleſſe pits, for that this is the frenzy of the underſtanding, the poiſon of the heart, the corruption of the manners, and the deſolation of our life. O true God! how ought all good underſtandings, and all perſons that make profeſſion of knowledge, of honour and virtue, look upon Solomon, as a maſt broken on the top of a mountain, which God hath placed there above to make them take heed of the ſhipwracks of Love!

The beginning of his debauchednesse.

One doth ſeldome begin wickedneſſes at the top: vices have their degrees as well as virtues; Solomon at firſt began to grow cool in the worſhip of the true God, his converſations with him were not ſo often nor ſo pleaſing, the pleaſures of the world invited him, the delights of the Court charmed him; actions that are too free, ſoon become evill, and evil ones turn themſelves into cuſtome, and cuſtome into an habit. This child of God ſaw the daughters of men, theſe ſtrange beauties which pricked him by their novelty; he became man, and made of them his Goddeſſes. The daughters of the Amorites, and of the Moabites, thoſe of Egypt, of Sidon, of Idumea, and ſo many others, whereof God had forbidden him any alliance, were the Idols of his heart, after they had been the plague and poiſon of his underſtanding.

He which had pronounced ſo many excellent parables againſt love, which had ſo many times advertiſed youth, that the lips of an unchaſte woman diſtilled honey at the beginning, but at the end they gave a potion of wormwood; was taken by the eyes, enchained with infinite affections. His love was pompous; his luxury, ſumptuous; he loved as much for glory as for concupiſcence;

cupiſcence; he would act the King in his unchaſteneſſe, as ſtately as in the furniture of his Temple. He had about ſeven hundred women which were as his Queens; and with that three hundred Concubines, which is according to the account of the Scripture a thouſand wives, which he had ſhut up in a Seraglio, for the pleaſures of his eyes and of his fleſh; and of ſo many loves there is but one ſonne to be found, Reboboam, void of wiſdome and underſtanding.

What could a Prince do amongſt ſo many delights, ſo many allurements, ſo many charms, and ſo many bewitchings! A man is oft-times much hindered by the troubleſome brain of one woman onely; what ſerious buſineſſe then could he ſet himſelf to, that had them multiplied by hundreds! Theſe ſtrangers came each of them with all the inventions of their Nation, for to ſurprize him; there was one that would gain him to her; another that would keep him; another that would draw him from one ſin to another, even unto the bottome of hell. It is farre more eaſie to become a fool with a woman, then to make her wiſe; he had endeavoured perhaps to convert them to his Religion, but they perverted him, and drew him to theirs. He took their loves, and afterward their behaviour, and at laſt their Superſtition.

Their artifice.

He is perverted in Religion.

Every one of theſe women would bring her God into eſteem, and thought not her ſelf to have any credit in her love, if ſhe did not make her falſe Deity to partake thereof: they made ſuch Gods, as had no honeſter Title then the ſinnes of debauched women. As ſoon as he had made an Idol for one, he muſt do the like for another; all there went by the Emulation of their brains, weak in reaſon, and ardent in their paſſions. They reckon about ſix Temples built round about Jeruſalem to the Gods of ſix principall Nations. But it was not ſufficient to make theſe Gods, they muſt be adored, and preſented with Sacrifices and Incenſe, to content his Loves. And he did not all this in ſhews onely, nor diſſimulation, but his heart (as the Scripture ſaith) was wholly turned aſide from the true God; and fell (as S. Auſtin ſaith) into the depth of the gulf of Idolatry. What might the admirers of his great Temple have ſaid; or rather the true worſhippers of the great God? What diſcourſe might ſo many Kings and Queens have held, that had had in ſo high eſteem the wiſdome of Solomon? The report of his Loves and his Superſtitions ran throughout all Kingdomes as a ſtory unheard of, which cauſed laughter enough to wicked ones, as tears to good people, and aſtoniſhment to the whole world.

The diſſipation of his eſtate.

How art thou faln from heaven, O fair ſtarre of the morning! Thou faithfull fore-runner of the King of Lamps, which wert adorned with the pureſt and moſt innocent flames of the firmament; who hath made thee to become a coal? and who could bury thy lights in a dung-hill?

This lamentable King loſt that great wiſdome that made him eſteemed over the whole world, and became ſtupid, leaving the care of all the affairs of his Kingdome. All thoſe great riches were exhauſted, and caſt, as it were, into the gulf of Luxury. He began to over-charge his people to maintain his infamous pleaſures, which made all their minds revolt againſt him. The Prophets and Prieſts could not reliſh with him, by reaſon of his changing Religion. All the underſtanding Nobility did abhorre him, ſeeing him ſo plunged in his filth. The Commons deſired nothing but to ſhake off the yoke that they could no longer bear. God raiſed him up Rebellions on every ſide, which prepared themſelves to overthrow his Empire. But no man took it ſo much to heart, as Jeroboam, an able and ſubtil man whom he had advanced, and employed in gathering his Tributes for him. It was he to whom the Prophet Ahaziah gave ten pieces of his garmet, fore-telling him, that he ſhould reign over ten Tribes of Iſrael; and that was the cauſe that the King would have put him to death, but he fled into Egypt, and returned under weak Reboboam the ſucceſſour of Solomon; who, deſpiſing the counſels of the Antients, that exhorted him to give his people content, truſted to that of the young ons without brains, which perſwaded him to hold his own, and that the people would not be brought under but by rigour. Which made him to be forſaken by ten Tribes at once, which caſt themſelves into the arms of Jeroboam, who made a change of Religion and State in Samaria, without ever being able, either himſelf or his ſucceſſours to bring them unto obedience again. See here how Kingdomes change their Maſters for the ſins of laſciviouſneſſe, impiety, and oppreſſions of the people, which are then greatly to be feared when deſpair hath brought them to fear nothing.

One may aſk, for a concluſion, what became of this wife Solomon? Whether he died in his ſinne? or whether he repented? Whether he were ſaved, or damned? This is a Common place that hath exerciſed many excellent pens which have handled this ſubject curiouſly and eloquently. I love not to do things done already: I ſhall ſay onely, that we may alwayes take the moſt favourable opinions, which can with any likelihood defend themſelves in favour of the ſafety of great perſons. There are ſome number of the holy Fathers which ſpeak very openly thereof, and perſwade themſelves that he repented. S. Jerome upon the Prophet Ezekiel ſaith, That although the founder of this great Temple ſinned, yet he was converted to God by a true repentance, and for proof hereof, he alledges the Book of the Proverbs, in the four and twentieth Chapter, that ſaith, Noviſſimè ego egi pœnitentiam & reſpexi, ut eligerem diſciplinam: that is, At the laſt I repented and looked back, that I might chuſe inſtruction. Although theſe words are not found in our Bible; as he alſo draws them from the Septuagint, and to uphold his opinion, he will have Solomon to have written the Book of the Proverbs after his fall, which is very hard to verifie.

The eſtate of Solomon in the other world.

And elſewhere alſo, the ſame Authour upon the firſt Chapter of Eccleſiaſtes ſaith, That this Book is the repentance of Solomon, according to the Hebrews. S. Ambroſe in the ſecond book of the Apology of David, Chap. 3. puts Samſon, David, and Solomon in the number of ſinners converted: Erraverunt tamen ut homines, ſed peccata ſua, tanquam juſti agnoverunt. Behold here that which is moſt formall, without collecting many ambiguous paſſages. S. Gregory the Great, in the ſecond book of his Morals, Chap. 2. S. Proſper, S. Eucherius, and amongſt the Modern, Toſtat. Bellarmine, and Muldonat condemne him. Tertullian, Auguſtine, Cyril of Alexandria, Gregory Nyſſen, Iſidore, Bernard, Chryſoſtome, and Rupert, leave this queſtion doubtfull and undecided. And to ſay truly, this is all which can be ſaid modeſtly and humanely, and alſo the trueſt in a matter where there is nothing more certain then incertainty.

Proſp. lib. 2. de prædict. cap. 27. Solomon elatus in ſenio, fornicatus animo & corpore Domino ipſum deſerente malè obiit.

For to ſay that he hath compoſed the Book of Eccleſiaſtes after that he was deprived of his Kingdome, dome, and of all the Vanities, is a ſtory of the Rabbins which are little to be believed; further alſo, this Book is properly a Dialogue of divers men that diſpute one againſt the other, and bring forth good and bad ſentences, although the Authour of the Book doth take the good part. To ſay that which Bonaventure ſaith, That not one of the ſacred Authours was damned; if it be true, the reaſon is, becauſe they lived well, and not becauſe they have written well. For the kingdome of God (ſaith Saint Paul) doth not conſiſt in words. To build upon the 1 Par. 2. 9. Promiſes which were made to Dauid concerning Solomon, if there be ſome favourable, there are alſo others that ſay, That if he leave God, he ſhall be caſt away by God for ever. To alledge that he was buried in the Sepulchre of his father, how many of the damned have had a quiet death, and a ſtately buriall? To bring forth all the kindneſſes and favours of God towards him, are but ſo many reproaches of his unthankfulneſſe.

The argument which is drawn from the negative which they eſteem ordinarily very weak, is here too ſtrong for his condemnation. For whence comes it that Nathan his Maſter, and Partizan, who wrote the Books of the Kings, or cauſed them to be continued by Aziah and Haddo his diſciples; whence comes it, I ſay, that Authours ſo affectionate to Solomon, ſo zealous for the honour of their Nation, having undertaken to give us his ſtory, and having forgotten nothing of the leaſt things, even to the numbering of Solomons horſes, after they have ſo expreſly ſpoken of his ſinne, have not added his repentance? This thing was too much important for the glory of God, for the reputation of their Maſter, for the edification of their people, for the example of other Kings, to paſſe it over in ſilence. Surely we might well accuſe them either of great malice, or of groſſe ſtupidity, a thing which cannot happen to Prophets which write by the inſpiration of God.

Further, who knows not, that repentance ought to be followed by outward actions, and conformable to the movings of the heart? Who will not avouch that it ought to be teſtified by a renouncing of ſins, and all things that have drawn us to offend? Where is it then ſpoken that Solomon had diſmiſſed one onely of his thouſand women, which were thoſe nets of his deſtruction? Where is it written that he deſtroyed the Temples, and beat down the Images which he had erected at the ſolicitations of his Miſtreſſes? We know all the contrary, that theſe Abominations remained ſtanding untill King Joſiah who cauſed them to be overthrown. That which cauſes the more fear, is, that by how much the more a man comes near the great underſtanding which they attribute to the Devils, by ſo much alſo he takes the greater part in their puniſhment, when he falls into any grievous ſinne. The great lights of theſe rare Spirits, turned themſelves into the flames of their puniſhments, and their knowledge ſerves for nothing but to nouriſh the more the worm of Conſcience.

Now as Solomon was advantaged by underſtanding and wiſdome aboue other men, and that he fell into the ſinne of Apoſtacie, and turning from God, there is great danger leſt God turned from him his Mercy, which is uſed more ordinarily towards thoſe that ſinne by ignorance, although culpable.

Adde unto all this, that thoſe which in their old age continue in the ſins of unthankfulneſſe which they have contracted by long habits, are very hard to cure, becauſe that old men become more hardned in evil, more deſpiſing all admonitions which are made to them, by preſuming on the authority which they think is due to their age. Further alſo, their luxury is not onely a ſinne of the fleſh, which then leſſe feels the violence of great temptations, but a ſpirituall ſinne, which proceeds from a ſpirituall and enraged concupiſcence, which makes them offered profeſſedly rather then by frailty. He that ſhall well weigh this, ſhall find that it is better to leave to the ſecret mercy of God, that which one cannot attain by reaſon, and to fear every thing in this life, even to the gifts of heaven and ones own ſureneſſe thereby. The concluſion touching Solomons ſalvation.

JUSTINIAN. CHARLEMAGNE.

Or, CHARLES the Great.

PRovidence is an excellent work-woman, which renews yet every day in the world that which God did in the terrestriall Paradise. He took clay to make a Man the most excellent piece of all the Creatures, and she takes some men of the earth to make them Soveraigns and Demi-gods in the Universe.

This Emperour that hath filled the world with his brave Deeds, and the Ages with his memory, was of a very base extraction, which served to him as a cloud of glory, and caused a marvellous day to spring out of the deep of his obscurity. The beginning of his Nobility came from his uncle Justine, who having been born a Cow-herd, mounted by the stairs of Virtue and of Valour even to the Throne of the Emperours of Constantinople. Nature had furnished him with a good understanding, with a body well made and robustuous, and God had inspired into him from his most tender years a particular grace of Devotion, which rendered him good, officious, and charitable towards all the world. As he was keeping the Cows he saw passing by some men of warre, who were going in an expedition against the Infidels: he perswaded himself that he was very fit for that employment, and stout enough to give good strokes to the enemies of God and his Religion. Upon this thought, he sold a cow that was his own, buyes a sword, and the rest of the small equipage of a Souldier; bids adieu to his kindred, goes and lists himself, and suddenly (of a peasant) becomes a man of war. Yet Procopius makes him so poor, that he gives him nothing but a little bread in a scrip when he entred into Constantinople. He passed through all the proofs of a long and laborious warfare, in which, he behaved himself with an exact discipline, a great dexterity, a courage invincible, and above all, with a discretion that made him lovely, and gained the hearts of all the world. He came to the office of an Ensign, of a Lieutenant, of a Captain of the Guard, of a Collonel, of a Generall, and in the end was put amongst the Counts of the Court that were the greatest Lords of the Imperiall house.

Anastasius at that time was Emperour, happening to die, Amantius his high Chamberlain, who was a very rich, and a great monied man, had a very earnest desire to make himself Emperour. But he was disfavoured by nature, having not been born a perfect man; he thought therefore that he should never be liked by the Militia, in so high a dignity, and would needs make it fall upon Theocritus who was his creature, that he might reign in him, and by him, with a full satisfaction of his whole desires. To this end he opened his treasures, and resolved to make great distributions of money to the souldiers, committing the managery of the horse-men to the Earl Justin, who he knew was well affected by all the world, and very capable to favour his canvasing. But the men of warre looking upon the hand that gave the gold, and not upon the coffer from whence it came, nor the design of him that did it, unexpectedly proclaimed Justin Emperour; whereto, the Senate and the People shewed a strong inclination, forasmuch as he was most Catholick, and that they feared, lest the Chamberlain and his favourite held yet some of the leven of Anastasius that was an Heretick.

The Cow-herd being then set upon the Throne of Constantine, Amantius, that had merchandized the Empire, seeing himself so shamefully faln from his pretensions, plotted a mischievous conspiracy against the new Emperour, but he succeeded in it so ill, that his design being discovered, he lost his life together with his complices, after he had lost his honour and his money. Justin, that was endowed with a great goodnesse, did not grow proud and scornful when he was arrived to the top of honours, but having married a woman very mean in her first condition, he caused her suddenly to be crowned Empresse, changing her salvage name of Lupicia into Euphenica. He consecrated the beginning of his reign by the voices of the Bishops, and of all the honest men which he caus'd to be call'd back from the exile to which the Heretick Emperour had condemn'd them. He caus'd Religion to flourish again on all sides, and expres'd a most ardent zeal to render justice to his people, without sparing himself in the toyles of war, though he was already very aged. He enjoy'd the Empire eight or nine years, and being a man extreamly humble, he lov'd his kindred though of base condition; and seeing he had no children of his own, he chose his sisters son to make him his Successour, and gave him even the Crown, before he quitted the Sceptre and the world, after a reign of nine years.

by

Behold the originall of our Justinian, of whom Histories speak very diversly, seeing that the admirers of his actions give him high commendations, and the envyers of his great fortune (who might perhaps have experimented the effects of his severity) have scatter'd imputations on him in their reviling Histories, that have pass'd even to this age. But the most understanding men having well examin'd every thing, put him in the rank of the most illustrious Monarchs of all Christendome.

And indeed, it is a wonder how a spirit extracted from the life and condition of a Shepherds took, so high a flight in the Temple of glory, that having taken in hand all the great designs that may fall into the spirit of a Monarch, he prospered in all with a mervailous successe. He maintein'd his dignity against the most horrible conspiracies that ever set upon an Empire in the revolution of so many Kingdomes. He made wars in Asia, in Europe, and in Africa, which he ended by most eminent victories. He recovered Africa out of the hands of the Vandals, he powerfully pluck'd the Capitall City of the World out of the tyranny of the Gothes, he publish'd eternall Books, he erected buildings that remain yet, after they have passed more then ten ages. He encountred the greatest Captains, and the most able States-men that have been ever in the world, in the person of Belisarius and Tribonian. And although that when he took the government of the Empire, he was five and fourty years of age, yet he reigned thirty nine years, God crowning all his good actions with a long continuance, which serves infinitely for the accomplishment of all great designs.

I will tell you in few words his Nature, and his Manners, before I come to his deeds of valour, according to the most true relation that I have been able to extract out of Histories, without passion, and not according to the Idea's of Procopius, who hath horribly disfigur'd him, by a manifest hatred in his railing History.

This Prince was a man that feared God, and firm in the faith of Christianity, and although he was at certain times surpriz'd with some errours by the artifices of his wife the Empresse, yet the Learned men of the West, and Pastours of the East, that have so highly praised him, after his death testifie sufficiently that his spirit was purged of all the wicked beliefs that his Doctours had endeavoured to infuse into his soul, and which he had approved by an excesse of a too credulove zeal. Hereticks and Libertines were the object of his hatred and his choler; but good Churchmen caus'd in his soul a certain veneration, and he studied by all wayes to assist and protect the Churches and the Hospitalls: his Liberalities were extended every where in works of piety by great buildings, and magnificent alms.

He was most chast, contenting himself all his life with her that God had given him for a companion: and his most violent enemies have not been able to tell us one onely womans name that hath possessed his heart to the prejudice of his Bed. He could not endure wantonnesse, and especially that, that brings a shame to nature, which he chastised with most rigorous punishments. He detested and punished by his laws, all those that laid snares to the modesty of Virgins and of Women to corrupt them.

His manner of life was extream austere, and Procopius himself, the most cruell of his revilers, acknowledges, that he was most sober, and that he would cause the table to be taken away when he had scarce touched the victuals, seeking nothing exquisite therein, but denying oftentimes to nature even her necessities. He hath seen him, he sayes, fast the Lents with such an austerity, that the devouteſt of all his people could not reach it, for he would be eight and fourty hours without eating or drinking, and at the end of that he drank nothing but water, contenting himself with a little bread and a sallade; yet he was endowed with a body so well composed, and so happily temper'd, that after his long abstinencies, he appear'd yet ruddy; from whence it came, that that Calumniatour instead of acknowledging the blessing that God gives in this extraordinarily to some of his servants, said, That he was a Devil and not a Man.

Further yet, he slept very little, and the same man adds, that often an hours repose sufficed him, and that he bewailed the time that he allowed his body. He made long prayers night and day, and employed the rest of his time in his affairs, without admitting any other recreation. Those that have publish'd that he could neither write nor reade, have abus'd the belief of men taking the name of Justinian for that of his Uncle Justine, for the Historian his persecutour confesses, that he wrote his Breviats, and all his dispatches, without troubling his Secretaries. He was of a most easie accesse to all the world, and was not offended at the importunities, no nor at the incivilities, that those that were ignorant of the fashions of the Court committed in his presence. He heard willingly the differences of his people, and he himself pronounced the sentence to determine them: his patience was extream, he never was mov'd in handling any businesses, and decreed even the most rigourous punishments with a cold visage, and a tone of a moderated voyce.

He was a true observer of order, who manag'd in his closet with incomparable justice, what ere should be produc'd in the whole Univers. When he undertook any businesse of importance, he fasted and prayed extraordinarily, and caused it to be recommended to the devotions of the good servants of God; and when he had a good issue of it, his thanksgivings were seen in all places on all occasions. He neglected nothing, and when men thought him overwhelm'd with the greatest businesses of war, they were astonish'd that amidst them he took his time for some petty Ordinance of Policy.

He lov'd Learning, especially Divinity and Law. This was it that made him conceive a magnificent design to leave monuments of it to posterity, that should last longer then the Temples and the Pyramids of Egypt. And for this purpose, being a man very judicious, he made choyce of the most able men in the whole Empire, to collect all the laws of the Emperours his predecessours, which he augmented and enriched with his own, so that this book was called Justinians Code. Afterward he gave a charge to Tribonian, who was accomplish'd in that profession, to compile all the Resolves of the antient Lawyers, which he did with a most exact diligence, and at length compos'd those famous Pandects or Digests divided into fifty Books. He caus'd also the Institutions which contein the Principles of Law, and are as it were the elements of that excellent doctrine, to be added to them. And for what concerns Divinity, he publiſhed a certain work of the Incarnation, and abundance of Ordinances for the government of Eccleſiaſticall perſons, wherein Baronius finds fault, that he entred ſometimes a little too far into the Sanctuary.

He was not much advanced in the years of his reign, when an horrible conſpiracy was raiſed againſt him, which was on the point to ruine all his affairs; and although I have already touch'd it in my firſt volumn in the Hiſtory of Eulogius, yet I will decipher here more particularly the reaſons and the remedies of it.

Many have attributed the totall cauſe of it to the new Subſidies that the Emperour impoſed upon the people to maintein the war that he had already enterpriſed, but there was yet more poyſon and which ſprang from an higher ſource, which was, that the houſe of the Emperour Anaſtaſius (which had preceded Juſtine the Unkle of our Juſtinian, and which cheriſhed alwayes the moſt violent paſſion to continue themſelves in that Empire) was not quite extinct, but had two principall Chieftains Pompey and Hypatius, who thought they had heads well enough made to wear a Diademe. Theſe men when they ſaw that the affairs of State were diſpoſed to a commotion, and that the Malignant Vapours were gathered together on all ſides to make up clouds, did as the Sorcerers do, who mix the work of the Devil to aſſiſt the effects of nature. They knew that the Emperour began to be ill-belov'd, both for the impoſts, and for the rigid and inflexible ſeverity that he uſed in the government of his Empire; which ſeemed inſupportable to the ſpirits of ſo many Libertines, who would live according to their own diſcretion in the permiſſion of all crimes. They fail'd not to lay hold on this opportunity, and underhand to ſowe in the ſpirits of men the ſeeds of Diviſion. There was then in Conſtantinople two popular factions of men belonging to the Theatre which were called the Green and the Blew, by reaſon of the Liveries by which they were diſtinguiſhed. State-Policy ſuffer'd them, and choſe rather to foment the one againſt the other, then to extinguiſh them. But the conſpiratours for that time united them by artifices and by money to bandy them againſt Juſtinian. The Chieftains ceas'd not to ſcatter venemous ſpeeches amongſt the people, and to ſay,

What? are we then made to ſuffer eternally the Empire of theſe Cow-keepers? the Unkle is dead, and the Nephue hath ſucceeded him, which is a Crow hatched of an evil Egg. Was it not enough that he learned in governing beaſts to handle us as a Shepheard, but he muſt become a Butcher, and be pleas'd with nothing, but with the fleaing and the maſſacring of his people? What have we any more to hope for under him, ſince he hath put us in a condition of fearing every thing? Do we expect that the Empreſſe, which is the worſt of Furies, ſhould give him counſels of mildneſſe for us, or that Belliſarius which is the fatall inſtrument of his cruelty ſhould deliver us out of his hands? All our ſafety is in our ſelves, all our good is in our reſiſtance. Shall we doubt to obey neceſſity which conſtrains us, and the juſtice of our cauſe which is our guide? We ought to ſet upon this goodly Emperour while his ſtate is yet tottering and ill-ſettled, without ſtaying till he fortifie himſelf to our ruine. We have amongſt us the blood of the true Ceſars, Pompey and Hypatius, the Protectours of the people, and the moſt accompliſh'd of all Princes, it is thoſe that we ought to reverence, and that we ought to carry upon our ſhoulders to the Empire.

Theſe words at length enflamed the ſedition which began by a ſmall handfull of Mutiners, which a Provoſt of the City endeavoured to ſuppreſſe, and apprehended three that were the ringleaders of the Rebellion, but the people ran ſuddenly in an huddle and plucked them out of his hands by violence. The Alarm was given to the Palace, and the Emperour diſpatch'd inſtantly ſome ſouldiers to quell the Mutiners, but they were beaten back, for the number of the ſeditious grew greater every moment as a Ball of ſnow that rouls from the top of a mountain. Behold in a little time the whole City in arms, with a rage ſo violent, and a ſight ſo hideous, that it ſeemed that Hell had opened it ſelf that day to vomit out all its Furies upon the earth. The men ran to fire and ſword, the women with their hair about their ears, and howling like ſo many Megera's made themſelves arms of what ere they met with. There was not any, even to the children that did not ſeem to be little devils flying athwart the flames. The Regiments of the Herules, (which the King a little before had converted to Chriſtianity) were at that time quartered in the City of Conſtantinople who failed not, according to the Orders of the Emperour, to oppoſe themſelves againſt the fury of the people. Theſe having been barbarous ſouldiers without all compaſſion made at firſt a great maſſacre. The incenſed Citizens fall upon them on all parts to beat them out; their courts of Guard are burned by the hands of the ſeditious, and their companies much worſted, ſome were run through with Partiſans, others knock'd on the head with Leavers: the affrighted women from the tops of the houſes, make themſelves parties in the quarrell, and ceaſe not to throw down boyling water, and ſtones upon them. Theſe wild-Boars thus chaffed ſeeing the blood of their companions run in rivers through the ſtreets, rally all their forces, and take Torches to fire the Churches and houſes, which they performed with ſo much violence, that one might ſee in an inſtant the whole city in flames. The Temples were burned with the moſt ſumptuous ſtructures, the pictures, the ſtatues, and the moſt beautifull works of the Antient Maſters crackled in the fiery coals which none extinguiſhed but by humane blood. The moſt religious of the Clergy being come forth to appeaſe the tumult, in ſhewing them the books of the Goſpels, the images of the Saints, and the Shrines of their reliques, although they marched at that time in a Proceſſion were trod under foot, and in part murdered by the Herules. This redoubled the fury of the people, who had yet ſome good ſenſe of their Religion, and could not endure the contempt of ſacred things. The Maſſacres began afreſh on both ſides, and the images of death fly up and down on all parts.

The Emperour was for that time ſhut up within his Palace, with his wife the Empreſſe accompanied with Belliſarius, who was newly returned from Africa, with Narſes and with Mundus, and the Regiments of his Guards. His heart bled within him to ſee thoſe horrours, and he was ſo courageous, as to be willing to go forth and preſent himſelf to make an Oration to his people, and to pacifie the ſedition. But the Empreſſe throwing her ſelf at his feet laid hold on him, and conjured him by all that he had moſt dear not to commit himſelf to an evident Butchery, which cauſed him to be contented to ſound the Ford, and to ſend Meſſengers to the people to promiſe them all ſatisfaction if they would aſſemble themſelves peaceably in the Theatre to hear their Prince. The factious began to cry that it was a ſnare to intrap them, and that they had no reaſon to hearken to a Tyrant that had ſold their skins to the Barbarians, that there was no more ſafety now remaining for them but in deſperateneſſe. Thereupon they take Hypatius, and having lifted him upon a great Buckler, carry him a croſſe the multitude, place him upon a Throne in the midſt of the great Market-place, and proclaim him Emperour. He was as it were altogether astonish'd between hope and fear, when he spake these words with a feeble voyce.

and

Friends, I am your work, I come to live and dye with you. I know well what ye have made me be, but I know not what I shall be, if ye bring not as much force to preserve me, as ye have testified affection to elect me: In a word, the life of Justinian is incompatible with mine, and your arms must decide this day which of the two you will keep, either the Prince that ye have chosen, or the Tyrant that ye have sworn to destroy. The Assembly answered confusedly with great clamours, Let Hypatius live, Let Justinian dye; and the stoutest men amongst them take a resolution to assail him in his Palace. But this Prince after he had call'd upon the name of God, the Protectour of Kings, took this perillous businesse into deliberation. Narses was of opinion, that it was best to fortifie the Royall Palace, to damme up the entrances, to prepare themselves for assaults within, and not to trust themselves without. That all rebellions were strong and invincible in their first heat, and that time ought to be given to some to think upon their fault, and to others to declare their good affection.

Belizarius lik'd not this opinion, and desired nothing but to march and to fall upon the Rebels. The Empresse Theodora who held the upper end in all the counsells of Justinian intermeddled very far in this businesse as Historians observe, and spake with a loud voyce.

What? seek security in dishonour? Endure a siege of our subjects, and of the dreggs of the people without taking other arms then those of walls? It is a counsell that will give boldnesse to Hypatius, and fear to all those that are yet for us. I assure my self, that the Tyrant wholly trembling in this novelty, and that there is not a more sovereign remedy then to prevent him. Let us rather dye then leave a blot upon our reputation. The name of Emperor and of Empresse sound well in an Epitaph, and ought never to be quitted, but with life.

She animated the whole company by her discourses: The Emperour himself had a mind to go out amongst them but it was concluded that he should suffer Belizarius to advance with the most resolute Regiments, which he did very courageously and removed himself into the place where was the hottest of the combate. The Herules, that had puissantly sustained the first furies of the enemies, took new forces and joyned themselves to the Emperours Court of Guard. They began altogether to charge the Rebels with such an Impetuousnesse, that they seemed Lyons and not Men. The Faction was no longer equall, the heart of the Revolted failed them, and they let themselves be killed as Sheep, whilst the fury of the Souldiers fleshed in blood slackened nothing of its vehemence.

Justinian touched with pity, commanded that they should spare the rest, and to perswade them more efficaciously to their good and safety, endeavoured to gain the faction of the Blew-coats, and to divide it from the Green, by force of Courtesie and of Money.

This being done Hypatius found himself much astonished, and wished then, that he had rather put his hand on Thorns, then on the Pearls of a Diademe. He fights now no more for honour, but for his life; he seeks out holes to hide himself, but those that knew that their security consisted in nothing, but in producing him, seize upon his person, and deliver him into the hands of the Emperour, who caused suddenly the law to proceed against him, together with Pompey and other great Lords that were their Complices, who were all put to death. After which the Emperour endeavoured with all his might to Rally his people, and to declare to them the pernicious effects of sedition, which were but too visible. The City being all wasted by the fire, and fourty thousand men (as Zonoras tells us) dead upon the place.

Behold one of the most hidious Histories that I find in all Antiquity, and which ought to teach people to adhere firmly to their Sovereign, and never to lend an ear to wicked counsels that cause so lamentable Tragedies. It admonishes also great men to enterprise no thing against their lawfull Princes, and to place alwayes their Principall Honour in Obedience.

This Monarch seeing himself settled in his Kingdome by so sensible a protection, gave all the thanks of it to God, and bent the vigour of his cares to the advancement of his glory. An hundred years had already passed, since the Vandals, a barbarous people, and Heretick Arrians had possessed themselves of Africa; after they had torn it from the Roman Empire. Three Kings were already dead, and the fourth that then reigned was a Tyrant named Gilimer, revolted from the true King Hilderic his Lord and Kinsman, whom he left in a close prison after he had put himself into possession of his Sceptre. Justinian that was a friend and Protectour of him that had been Deposed, demands an account of that action, and resolved to re-establish the true King in his right, because that, besides that justice would have it so, he was much more favourable to the Catholicks. The other answered that he had dispossessed a Sit-still, and a Traitour to the Religion of the Arrians, and that the Greek ought to look to his own businesse without intermedling with the Kingdoms of another.

This Arrogance netled more the Emperour, who now saw himself perswaded by all reasons to enterprise a Warre against an Heretick for Religion, against a Tyrant for Justice, against an Adversary for his Goods. He ordered all this businesse with a marvellous prudence, for he sowed first division in Gilimer's Kingdome, interessing as much as possible every man to his party; the Catholicks for his protection, the Kinsmen of Hilderic for Revenge, the Zealous men for Piety, the Understanding for Reason, the Souldiers for the Booty, and all the world for the sweetnesse of the tranquility under his Government.

He chose Belizarius Generall, to whom he gave an Army more Valiant then numerous, of Souldiers well tried, and charged him to use the Africans as his own people, and as his children. One cannot believe the effect that this moderation wrought: The People began to look upon the Armies of that brave Captain, not as upon those of an enemie, but father of a Liberatour. Tripolis rendred it self quickly to him, and the Isle of Sardynia revolted against the Tyrant. He dismantled all the strong Holds that might defend him from the Enemie, as if he had been assured to live in perpetuall peace; which caused that Belizarius in a short time marched even to the gates of Carthage. The Usurper as fearfull in Warre, as he was bold in wickednesse, was astonished and surprised, having not had so much leisure as to fortifie the place of his abode. He suddenly dispatches his brother Amaras to cut off all the Avenues from the Greeks, but he was encountred by John the Armenian who led the Van-guard of the Imperialists, and who hotly gave him battell, in which the African lost the Victory and his life.

The Tyrant, whether out of rage or out of fear, caused Hilderic his Master, which he kept in prison, to be murther'd, and went out with his beſt Troops to meet Belizarius, all dip'd as he yet was in innocent blood, and troubled with the image of his crimes. He met with the Grecian Generall a little ſcattered from the reſt of his Army, and might have defeated him, if art and activeneſſe, or rather happineſſe had accompanied his deſigns. But while he ranges his ill-traind ſouldiers, Belizarius ſurpriſes him, kills his beſt troops, and conſtrains him to put himſelf in flight. He ſeeing his army much leſſened, ſends for his brother Zaron who led ſome troops near the coaſts of Sardynia to come and joyn with him, which he did readily; but in the mean time, Belizarius following the paths that good fortune trod out for him, enters Carthage, which cryes for quarter to him without reſiſtance. The two brothers rallyed together made as though they would retake it, but ſeeing themſelves vigorouſly repulſed by the Imperialiſts, they more thought of a Retreat then an Aſſault. This cauſed all the People to deſpair of their party, ſeeing they themſelves had forſaken the ſeat of Empire. They withdrew themſelves to a place called Tricamerum about eight Leagues from Carthage, whither Belizarius after he had taken order for the ſecurity of the conquered countrey ſoon followed them, and commanded John the Armenian to paſſe the River, for whoſe advantage they were encamped there, and to charge them: He obeyed and executed very courageouſly his Generals commands; But Zaron Gilimer's brother ſuſteins his onſet, and twice beat him back, till ſuch time as Belizarius re-enforced his Van-guard with new Troops, who defeated the enemie, and killed the chief Commander in the combat. His head was cut off, and ſhewed the Affricanes, who fell into a great deſpair of their affairs. Ah, my brother, ſayes Gilimer, the moſt valiant man on earth, could I not be miſerable without loſing you, and without ſacrificing you to my fortune? It is now that I perceive the diſaſtre of my Nation; It is now that the blood of Hilderic rebounds againſt me. In the mean time Belizarius, who lead up the battalio, paſſed alſo the River which was fordable, and aſſaults Gilimer who made but a ſmall reſiſtance, but taking with him his domeſticks ſaved himſelf by abandoning his Camp, where nothing was heard but the cryes and ſighs of the Captives that lamented their Misfortune. The unhappy King ſaved himſelf in Rocks ſituated upon high mountains; where there was a Fortreſſe almoſt inacceſſible, but unfurniſhed of Victuals and Munition, whither Pharas had order to follow him, in the place of John the Armenian who was unhappily killed by accident by a Captain that ſhot at a Bird. Gilimer that now thought that there was no greater enemy in the world then Hunger, was quickly weary of the place to which he was retired, and ſeeing himſelf ſollicited every day by his friends to render up himſelf, he ſends to Pharas to demand three things for the capitulation of the Treaty, which were, ſome Bread, a Sponge, and a Lute; ſome Bread, becauſe he now knew not what it was to Eat; a Sponge, to wipe off the tears that he continually powred out upon the Tombes of his brothers and the Funeralls of his Countrey; a Lute, to give ſome truce to his anguiſh by its Muſick. This diſaſtrous man, which had never well played the King, would now play the Philoſopher at the end of his dayes, and expreſſe a contempt of all things. Pharas eaſily granted him what he demanded, and having taken him, conducted him to Belizarius who was retired to Carthage.

to

This Generall contemplated the principall object of his Conqueſt with delight, and had a great curioſitie to entertein him, but he did nothing but laugh with a forced and unpleaſing laughter. All his treaſures fell into the hands of the Conquerour, who ſuddenly carryed him to Conſtantinople.

A Triumph after the manner of the Antients was ordained in honour of Belizarius, who entered in great pomp into the City with all his ſouldiery, cauſing the proud ſpoiles of Africa to be born before him, and dragging after him the priſoners, among which was Gilimer in chains, who was brought before the Emperour and the Empereſſe ſeated upon their Thrones on an high Theatre with an unparrelel'd magnificence.

Gilimer, as ſoon as he ſaw afarre off this pompous ſplendour, cryed out, Vanity of Vanities, and every thing is vanity: afterward began again his laughings, which he did, in my opinion, that he might paſſe for a Fool, and ſo have his life. He did obeyſance to Juſtinian with moſt humble ſubmiſſions, who uſed him with much clemency, giving him a Place in the Lands of the Empire, to finiſh there the reſt of his dayes.

The Booty was divided with much equity, and the rich Veſſels of the Temple of Jeruſalem that the Vandalls had heretofore found, and pillaged in Rome, were ſent back again to the Place from whence they had been tranſported by Titus Veſpatian.

This warre was finiſhed in three moneths with an Army of ſix thouſand men, ſo eaſie it is to row when God conducts the veſſell.

But that of the Weſt was very long in its continuance, Obſtinate in its Reſiſtance, Malignant in its Deſignes, and Lamentable in its Effects. Theodoric King of the Goths (as I have ſaid in the life of Boetius) had made himſelf Maſter of Rome, and of all Italy, where he reigned with great authority. He left for Succeſſour Athanaric, ſonne of his daughter Amalazunta (at that time but nine years old) under the Protection of his Mother. She was the moſt accompliſh'd Princeſſe of her age, and moſt worthy to govern an Empire. Nevertheleſſe ſince ſhe ſaw her ſelf invironed with thoſe Goth Princes that were of an humour ſufficiently cruell, and that did not eaſily brook her domination; She honoured with her confidence Theodate one of the principall of them, becauſe he was of the blood Royall, and appeared the moſt moderate of all the reſt, playing rather the Philoſopher then the Captain. This ungratefull man, after the death of the little Athanaric who was not of a long life, was moved with ſo furious a Statejealouſie, that by the baſeſt of Treaſons he cauſed that poor Princeſſe to be ſtrangled in a Bath, fearing leſt ſhe (as being farre more able then he in the managing of affairs, and he holding the Sceptre onely by her favour) might take too great a ſhare in the Government. But this unnaturall man that thought to ſettle his Crown by the death of that innocent Queen totally ruin'd his affairs, and could not avoid the vengeance of God that purſues Traytours even to the gates of hell.

The Emperour Juſtinian that had already projected to recover his City of Rome and all Italy out of the hand of the Goths, hearing the rehearſall of that horrible baſeneſſe committed againſt the perſon of Amalazunta that had ſought Alliance with him, failed not to take the occaſion, and to declare a warre againſt Theodate, thinking that it was then a good time to ſet upon an Empire, when he that governs it begins to be forſaken of God for the enormity of his Crimes.

This cowardly King was ſo much aſtoniſhed at this news, that at firſt he humbled himſelf by very great great submissions, offering the Sovereignty to the Emperour of the East, and contenting himself to reign under him.

But the other seeing him so wicked and so weak, despised him, and caused Belizarius to advance with his Army into his Territories, who suddenly possessed himself of Sicily.

Theodate although an Arrian Heretick, had recourse to the Pope, and invited him, as well by Intreaties as by Menaces, to make a Voyage to Constantinople, to Treat a Peace between the two Crowns. Agapetus, who was then seated on Saint Peters Chair, was so Poor and Indigent, that he had not wherewith to furnish himself with Provision for the Journey, that he was fain to pawn the Sacred Vessels of Saint Peters Church to bear his charges by the way; He failed not to transport himself into the East, and was received by Justinian with all the respects due to so high a Dignity; but when he came to touch upon the point of Peace, the Emperour told him, That the businesse was already too farre advanced, That that Warre was an Holy Warre against the Enemies of God and his Church, which ought not to be hindered by the Counsells of a Pope, and that he need fear nothing that Theodate could do, who was more able to threated then to hurt.

The Pope suffered himself easily to be perswaded, and quitting the Interests of that King, busied himself about the Government of his Church. It is a wonder, that he had so much Authority, as to depose Anthimus Patriarch of Constantinople, who had been brought in by Faction, and to substitute Menas in his Place, in spight of the Empresse Theodora, who had not at that time all the power that is attributed to her over the spirit of her Husband.

The Good Shepheard, after he had Courageously done the duty of his Charge, dyed in Constantinople, where he left a most sweet odour of his sanctity.

In the mean while, Belizarius pursues the Conquest, enters into Pou, and takes Naples by night, using a Stratagem of Warre, that made him put on three hundred men through subterraneous places, where there passed nothing but water. The taking of so flourishing a City gave astonishment and rage to the Goths, who Conspired against their King Theodate, and substituted by Election Vitiges in his place, who was not of so Noble a Family, but who seemed to them Bold and Generous to repair the Ruines of the State.

As soon as he was chosen, he suddenly caused Theodate to be slain, who was surprised in his flight, and washed away by his blood the murther of Amalazunta.

This Prince was agitated with two contrary Passions, with the desire of solitude, and with the motion of his ambition; the one counselled him to quit the Empire, the other to retain it; while that he would content them both, he contents no body, and was surprised in his irresolution.

In this conjuncture of affairs, the Grecian Generall advances, and marches straight to Rome, which receives him with open Arms, some through love, and others through impotence.

Vitiges desirous to make his Crown renowned by some illustrious Act, and to confirm by his Valour the judgement of those that had chosen him, assembles from all parts the Goths, spurring them on both with the Glory of their Nation, and the necessity of their affairs, in such a manner that in a small time he lay siege to Rome, with an Army of an hundred and fifty thousand men.

It is in this occasion that the Valour of Belizarius was made visible in all its advantages, for with an Army of six thousand men he sustained that prodigious number of Barbarians, amidst sickness, hunger. and a thousand other incommodities, and when the Romans wanted Arms and Ammunitions of Warre, he made Arrowes of the Statues of the Gods and of the Cesars, to throw at the head of his enemies.

In the end having sollicited with diligence, and expected with constancy the succours that came to him from the East, he raised the siege, and scattered all that thick Cloud of Armies that environed him.

Vitiges is constrained to retire into Ravenna, where he besieges him, and presses him so strictly, that he forces him to deliver to him his City, and even his own Person.

He was carried away Prisoner, with his Wife, and abundance of Lords to Constantinople, presented to Justinian, and served for a Pompous object in the Triumph of Belizarius, who was received with the full satisfaction of all the Nobles, with the admiration of the wisest, and with the generall acclamation of all the World: The Emperour alone began to be pricked with jealousie, and to entertein him with coldnesse.

In the mean space, the Goths make Elections of two Kings, one after the other, who lived but a while, and did nothing, but the third named Totilas was endowed with so eminent and lovely qualities, that he raised up all their hopes: and his coming to the Crown of the Gothes was as the infusion of a new soul into a dead body.

He puts himself suddenly into the field, with all that he could rally of the wrack of Vitiges, and at first he was so happy that he defeated Bessa and Vitalius, The two Generals of Justinian left by Belizarius for the Guard of all the Countrey of Italy.

After that, he took Spoletum, dismantled Beneventum, planted a Siege before Naples, and wan it by valour and by patience.

But besides, he shewed so many proofs of his Moderation, and of his Goodnesse toward the Conquered, that with all their hearts they wished for nothing more then his Government. He gave great order for the comfort of the people, that were at that time oppressed with a cruell famine, he provided for the security of the Goods of his Subjects, chastising rigorously the thieveries of the Souldiers, he preserved the modesty of Women and Maids with so much severity, that he caused his Generall to be beheaded for having violated a Gentlewoman.

By these so commendable wayes he rendered himself Master of all Pou, and from thence transported himself to Rome, which he held a long time besieged, and which was at last delivered to him, by the treachery of a Court of Guard of Isaurian and Cilician Souldiers.

He used his Victory with so much clemency, that he caused to be proclaimed that the Churches should serve for a Sanctuary, forbidding expressly to touch those that should retire themselves thither: He used the Pope Pelagius, and all the sacred persons with great respect, the Ladies with Honour, the Citizens with Courtesie, contenting himself onely to demolish the Walls of Rome, without hurting any thing within. He rendered himself ſo abſolute a Maſter of the City, and peoples hearts, that every one confeſſed they had never ſeen the like, and publiſhed him worthy of the Empire of the World.

The Emperour Juſtinian fortifies his Courage againſt this ebb of bad ſucceſſes, and with draws Belizarius from the warre with the Perſians to ſend him back to Italy, believing that all the happineſſe of his Arms ſubſiſted wholly in his hands.

But it ſeems that Felicity was weary to follow alwayes the Standarts of that valourous Captain; the affairs of Warre quite changed their face; all good Succeſſes now are onely for the Goths, and misfortune ſeemed to be faſtned to all the enterpriſes of the Romans.

Belizarius was as a man forlorn in the hands of an evil deſtiny, that darkened his Prudence, froze his Courage, weakned the ſtrength of his Arms, and made him unprofitable to all things, ſo that hee ſeemed to have paſſed back into Italy for nothing, but to be the ſpectatour of his own diſaſters. At laſt, he was called home again, and Narſes the Eunuch was ſent in his place, who mended the buſineſſe, and defeated Totilas in a pitched Battell, who dyed ſuddenly of his wounds.

Providence, (if it be permitted here to lift up the veil, and to enter into your ſecrets) whence could this change proceed? We know that Belizarius was the moſt accompliſhed of all the Generals of Armies that were at that time under Heaven; He was endowed with a lively and luminous ſpirit, with an inventive underſtanding, with a profound judgement, that had nothing like it, but his Courage. Providence for the future, and Activeneſſe for the preſent, contended in him which ſhould carry away the Palm; his Valour was incomparable, and his Experience compleat in all ſorts of buſineſſe, his Proſperity without Inſolence, and his Adverſity without Diſcouragement. He was Prudent, Sober, Chaſte, even to a wonder, Affable, Gracious, Liberall, Charitable, Juſt, Mercifull, Happy. Not onely the Souldiers reſpected him, but even the Labourers looked upon him as their Protectour, and the Father of their Quiet. From whence then came it, that he made a wrack at the end of his Life, and that he ſaw all the eminent luſtre of his Glory bleaked even in his hands?

Here may Great ones learne a wiſe Inſtruction for the governance of their Actions, and have cauſe to admire the Judgements of God. And for that purpoſe, I ſhall enlarge my ſelf upon the cauſes of the miſeries that happened to the fortunes of the higheſt Lords of the earth, and the more curiouſly ſearch into this Hiſtory in its ſource.

I confeſſe that the Secret one of Procopius is too rayling in many places, where it ſpeaks things incredible, but it is not deceived when it tells us, that two women Theodora the Empreſſe, and Antonina the wife of Belizarius, were the two Helen's of the Empire, and the Torches that conſumed mankind by their flames.

Behold (ſaith he) from whence began the Miſery of Belizarius, that ruined his braveſt Enterpriſes, and plunged him deep into great diſpleaſures.

He had in his houſe a young Gentleman named Theodoſius, whom he loved with a ſincere affection, having converted him from Hereſie, and procured him to be Baptized at Conſtantinople, whoſe God-father he himſelf would be. He put him ſo farre in the good eſteems of his wife, that they having no children of their Marriage, reſolved both of them to Adopt him. Theodoſius conquered by ſo great a courteſie, rendred himſelfe obedient to Belizarius, and above all obſervant to the humours of Antonina. She loved him at firſt with a tender affection, but honeſt enough, which gave occaſion to the more curious ſort of people to think, but permitted not the wiſer ſort to ſpeak.

At laſt, as the beſt Wine degenerates into Vineegre, ſo the chaſteſt Love of the ſpirit (if heed be not taken) changes it ſelf to fleſh.

The converſation of the young Theodoſius in the African voyage, the graces that ſmiled upon his face, the ſweetneſſe of his ſpeech, the wittineſſe of his diſcourſes, his good offices, his obſervances, his confidence, and the ſecrecy of the place, kindled ſo great a fire in the heart of Antonina, that ſhe cheriſhed no more that object as a Mother, but loved him as a frontleſſe woman, that ſells her proſtitution.

Happy are the women that reject the firſt thoughts of ſuch miſerable deſigns, as the ſparkles of the fire of Hell.

She gave at firſt too much command to her paſſion, and too much overture to her unhappineſſe. Her Careſſes ſeemed already too ſoft to the young man that ſtrived to pay them with reſpect, feigning himſelf not to underſtand that language of Love, for fear he ſhould make her faulty in his thoughts. But ſhe ceaſed not to purſue him, and kindled continually her flames by the liberty of her life. Conſcience, Honour, the fear of an Husband, contended for a time in her heart, but in the end quitted the place. She forgot all Divine and Humane Laws, and abandoned her ſelf to her paſſion, and openly ſollicited Theodoſius to ſin.

She acted the part of Potiphars wife, but ſhe met not with a Joſeph. He was not yet wicked, but capable to become ſo; he went not to ſeek ſinne, but ſinne ſought him, and he wanted ſtrength to reſiſt it; the reſpect of a woman took from him that of God; he conſented to evil that he might not offend her, and betrayed his ſoule to content the heart of a woman paſt all regard of her honour and ſalvation.

A man ows not obedience in this caſe to the moſt qualified and the moſt beneficiall perſonages; he ought to fly from them, he ought to break off with them, he muſt not think upon pleaſing them, in a thing that may diſpleaſe God.

Both of them at laſt habituated themſelves in their crime, and at firſt acted it ſecretly enough: but the impudence of Antonina, and the great confidence ſhe had of her husbands love, took from her her ſhame, and diſcovered her diſhonour.

Belizarius began to be doubtfull of it, but he feared his own thoughts, and that he might not render his wife criminall, he made himſelf ſtupid. Behold! at length a poore maid-ſervant, a Macedonian by Nation comes to him and tells him, My Maſter, I put my life into your hands, I have great things to tell you, but I am a dead woman if you ever open your mouth of them: Promiſe me upon your oath to keep my counſell, and I wil tell you that which concerns the honour of your houſe. The Maſter ſwears, the ſervant ſpeaks, and accuſes her Miſtreſſe of an infamous converſation with Theodoſius.

Belizarius that would not believe his ſhame and miſery, asked her if there were any other witneſſes, ſhe produces two Grooms of the houſe that depoſe the ſame.

It is too much (ſayes he) Ah Theodoſius, unfaithfull Theodoſius, Have I then made thee my ſonne, to become now my Torturer? Have I put

Thee

Thee into my houſe to defile my Bed? Have I given thee Life to take away my Honour? Deceitfull Man! Where is that Modeſty that was painted upon thy Countenance? Where are thoſe Artificiall words that thou haſt ſo oft employed to ſeduce my Goodneſſe? Thou ſhalt now receive a Reward worthy of thy Wickedneſſe. What do I ſay? Kill my ſonne of Adoption? It is to condemn mine own Judgement, and to tear out my heart. But it is his Crimes that deſtroyes him, and not I; He muſt dye, and there is no pardon for him.

Conſtantine his intimate friend perceived his ſadneſſe, knew the cauſe of it, and counſelled him rather to rid himſelf of his wife, that had ſeduced Theodoſius, and which was the Plague and fury of his Houſe; but he loved her paſſionately, and would by no means hearken to it. He called inſtantly a ſouldier of thoſe that were moſt engaged, and having greatly obliged him to ſecreſie, commanded him to kill Theodoſius. He knowing how well he was beloved of the Lady, asked counſell of the buſineſſe of a friend of his, that told him that Belizarius was mutable in that matter, and that Antonina was the Miſtreſſe, that it might happen that ſhe might regain the ſpirit of her husband, and might be a very bad enemy to him that ſhould undertake to kill her Minion. The Souldier was afraid, and inſtead of doing the Act, gave ſecret notice of it to Theodoſius, who fled to the City of Epheſus.

Troubles are in the Houſe; The Husband ſad and penſive, believing that the buſineſſe commanded was already executed: The Wife in fears, and paſſions impoſſible to be related: yet her pain was ſomewhat mitigated when ſhe knew that Theodoſius was yet alive.

But Belizarius that thought him dead, and knew no way to content his wife, endured a torment unſpeakable. Where is then your ſonne? (ſaith ſhe) Where is mine? Whence comes it that he is ſo long without appearing? They are your ſuſpicions that have deſtroyed him. Is it This then that I have merited of you, for having loved you more then my own ſelf! He trembled every joynt, and durſt not come to the point of the command that he had given: To deny it appeared to him impoſſible, and to confeſſe it ſeemed to him worſe then Death. The Lady takes up the diſcourſe again: Tell me, What is become of him? If you have cauſed him to be murthered, let me cauſe his Body to be ſought for, to give it Buriall. The poor Innocent is no longer in the World, you have ſacrificed him to your jealouſie, well knowing, that the ſword that paſſed through his Body, hath brought a mortall wound into my Heart. What advantage have I got by being faithfull to you, if I have not been able to eſcape your ſuſpicions which you have ſprinkled with the blood of your dear Adopted? But I will pardon you all, on condition, that you will tell me thoſe that have brought this unhappineſſe upon you, either by their falſe reports, or by their damnable counſells.

This wicked woman gave the Rack without ceaſing to the ſpirit of her husband who with all Sampſons ſtrength could not keep in a ſecret, no more then he. He named the Macedonian wench, and the two Grooms: Whereupon ſhe had ſport enough, by reaſon of the perſons, ſaying, That it was an horrible thing to put her honour to an arbitration upon the report of Slaves, and uſed rectimination ſo cunningly, that ſhe made all their accuſation paſſe for a calumny.

She ſeized inſtantly upon the poore maid and the two men, which ſhe delivered up to her Hangman, and after ſhe had cauſed their tongues to be cut off, ſhe commanded that they ſhould be thrown in a ſack into the water, where they finiſhed their life by the deteſtable hatred of that Megera. She found out alſo the Counſel that Conſtantine had given, and ſtreightway cauſed him to be aſſaſſinated, ſo great a deſire had ſhe and ſo much power to purſue her vengeance.

Soon thereupon after it was publiſhed every where abroad, that Theodoſius was alive, and he was ſuddenly called back to Court, but he ſeemed to be cold in it, making the wicked deſignes that ſome had undertaken to deſtroy him, his excuſe; and feigning himſelf ignorant of the ſecret command that Belizarius had given of his death, he layes all upon the head of Photius. He was the ſonne of Antonina, born of her firſt bed, a brave man and very accompliſh'd, who was in the chiefeſt offices of the Empire, and had conceived an extream diſpleaſure at the debaucheries of his mother, not being able to endure that Amoretto, to whom ſhe made a profeſſion of her goods and honour.

This unnaturall woman forgetting both her bloud and duty, ceaſed not to raiſe calumnies and troubles againſt her own ſonne in the favour of her Adulterer, and to make uſe even of the moſt deteſtable inventions, to take him out of the World, in ſuch a manner, as that he not thinking his life ſafe enough againſt the ſword and poyſon, was conſtrained to chooſe a voluntary exile, to give place to Theodoſius. Belizarius by a moſt infamous obſervance that he rendred to his wife, employed his credit and his Letters to compaſſe his return. He comes now to ſeek his Miſtreſſe in Italy, where ſhe was with her husband, and from thence they all returned to Conſtantinople, where this crafty artificious woman had the leiſure to ſatiate her ſelf with the ſimplicity of the one, and the love of the other.

But it is a ſtrange thing, yet true, that That kind of Love is nouriſhed with Oppoſition, whereas the full enjoyment renders the ſeeds of Iniquity leſſe Active and more Languiſhing.

Theodoſius now began to feel a great remorſe of Conſcience, for his infamous Life. He was fully perſwaded that he could not eſcape the diſaſtre of ſome violent death, if he continued that debauchery, that the patience of an husband ſo many times provoked would break out at length in ſome evill end, and that, happen what would, he could not eſcape the judgements of God neither Alive nor Dead. Upon theſe thoughts, he ſteals away ſecretly from the Court, tranſports himſelf to Epheſus, enters into a Monaſtery, and makes himſelf a Monk, cauſing thoſe handſome locks to be ſhaven off, that were the ſtrings that tyed Antoninas affection.

This unhappy woman hearing the news of it, put on mourning as for a publick diſaſtre, deprived her ſelf of all company, perſecuted her own life by a horrour of eating and drinking, and not contenting her ſelf with weeping for her Beloved, ſhe howled and ſent out cryes that affrighted the whole World.

It is a thing ſufficiently remarkable, that Love encamped in that Friars Cowle, darted more ſubtle fires, and ſharpened his Arrows with the Aſhes of Repentance, Imitating the Sorceters that employ the Maſſe and Bible to fortifie their Enchantments.

The Paſſion of Antonina was ſo deſperate, that Belizarius pitied her, and ſo wrought, that by the Authority of the Empreſſe, Theodoſius was fetched back again from the Monaſtery, and brought unto her house. It is true that he made a great resistance before he would come forth, whether it was feignedly, or really, it is doubtfull, but he yielded to the violent pursutes that were made for him, and quitting the Altar of Jesus, made himself again of a Monk an Adonis to sacrifice himself to his Venus.

One would have thought that the flames of that cursed passion would have been totally extinguished, and that there had been no danger to be feared in such a conversation. But, O God, who knowes not that the presence of Lovers, especially after a long absence makes love arise again out of its own ashes, and extracts sparks of fire even out of ice and snow? Belizarius marches in an expedition towards the coasts of Persia, where Photius his son in law comes to seek him, who resenting in his heart the bitter displeasures that the persecution of his mother caused him, was resolved to pluck out her Minion from between her armes, or to dye in the attempt. He disposes his Spyes at Constantinople, to observe diligently what should passe in their Conversation. He hath news sent him from all parts that the fire is again kindled, and that Triclaresses continue to the scandall of the whole City. He causes a very understanding man and most faithfull to the service of Belizarius to go to him, and tell him from point to point that which he least desired to hear.

His displeasure was so greatly kindled that the very same moment, he goes to seek out Photius, and sayes to him, My son, it is now that you must succour your miserable father, if you would not have grief send him to the grave; you are not my sonne by nature, but you are by love and by election. I have given you goods and honour, I have not ceased to oblige you all my life-time; yet I desire to passe by whatever I have done hitherto, on condition that you will revenge me upon that disloyall Theodosius who hath placed again dishonour in my bed. Photius, who desired nothing more then that discourse, comforts him, and promises him quickly to dispatch him of his enemy. They both of them swear upon the Gospels, mutually to keep close the secret. The other to acquit himself of his promise takes his time, learns by his Spyes the day wherein Theodosius was to make a Voyage to Ephesus, and transport himself thither with a company of resolute souldiers. The Adulterer doubting that all that commotion was against him, saved himself in Saint Johns Church, as in a secure Sanctuary. But he was drawn out from thence by a Trick, and delivered by the Bishop himself of the Place, into the hands of Photius, who being of a very sweet Nature would not kill him, but contented himself to send him away into Cilicia, to the utmost bounds of the Empire, and to keep him in close prison, under the guard of men, very much engaged to him, in such a manner as he should be never heard of any more.

He was seasoned a sufficient time in this Prison-hole, which worked an enraged sadnesse in his Antonina, who found no better remedy then to implore the assistance of the Empresse, with whom she was so familiar, that shee deposed even her loves, and immodesties in her bosome. She makes an horrible perquition of Theodosius's businesse, and by misfortune it happened that one Caligonius (who was the Confident of Belizarius his wife, having been taken and ill used by Photius, to make him disclose to him all the secrets of his Mistresse) made an escape and came secretly to Constantinople, where he charged the sonne of having attempted something upon the friend of the Mother. Theodora suffers him to come to Court privately, and when he dreamed not of it, causes him to be apprehended, confines him into a secret place, and unknown to all the world, where he was put to the Rack without having any regard to his Great Quality or even to the infirmities of his Body. He kept Belizarius his counsell in his sharpest torments, but he told them the place where Theodosius was deteined, from whence the Empresse caused him secretly to be fetched, and commanded that he should be brought to Constantinople, without noyse, to drown in a sudden and unhoped for joy the spirit of her Confident. She kept him some dayes in her Palace to put him in better liking, and told her dear Antonina (who was very curious in her pearls) that she had a rare Jewell to shew her, which made her haste to the Palace with a great desire to see what it was.

The Empresse, after she had a long time suspended her hopes, causes Theodosius to come forth out of the chamber of one of her Eunuches, and casts the whole Sun into her eyes. She fell down in a swoune at that sight, and was like to dye, but at length when she had been succoured, and was come to her self again, she had so much slayednesse, as not to cast her selfe hastily upon her friends neck, before she had kissed Theodoras feet, to whom she said with transports of an unparalell'd joy; Madame, You have been hitherto my Empresse and my Mistresse, but I shall now in time to come esteem you as the Goddesse of my safety, seeing you have withdrawn my Sonne out of the bottomelesse pit of Hell, whither his enemy had precipitated him. There were nothing then but Caresses, but Dalliances and discourses upon the adventures of Theodosius.

But God, whose just anger followes alwayes sinners at the heels, waited till the Offering was fat to sacrifice it.

He permitted them to make so many Banquets, so many Dancings, and so many youthfull debaucheries for the return of that Minion, that he suffering himself to be carryed to excesses above the ability of his body, fell sick of the Bloody-flux, by which he was carried within few dayes into the other World, to render an account to the Soveteign Judge, of his Unfaithfulnesse and Diffolute Life.

Antonina remained near the Corps, as the Ghost of the Body, but a Damned Ghost and deprived eternally of all she loved most. God gave her a life long enough, and prolonged her Hell among the living, to anticipate that of the other life, seeing that we know her crimes, and know nothing of her Repentance.

In the mean while poor Photius was three years in a black Dungeon, out of which having twice escaped and saved himself in Churches which served for a Sanctuary, he was taken again, and shut up close, without being ever able to get forth but by a Miracle, which discovered to him in a Vision the Prophet Zachary, who drew him out of that deep pit wherein he was, and conducted him to Jerusalem, whither indeed he went and made himself a perfect Votary to accomplish the Vow that he had made, if ever he did obtein his dear liberty.

Behold here the springs of Belizarius his misery, which Procopius hath observed in his secret History.

It is believed, that it is but a Fable to say, that he had his eyes put out by the command of Justinian, and was reduced to beggery, but it is true that the Emperour had a jealousie of him, as if he had aspired to the Empire, and that Theodora who had a mind to perſecute him to favour his wives wicked humour, who yet cheriſhed in her heart ſome poiſon againſt him for the buſineſſe of Theodoſius, made him to be diſgraced, his offices were taken from him, his goods confiſcate; the ſouldiers that he had trained up given to other Captains; his friends interdicted with a prohibition to ſpeak to him. This brave Generall, who before drew the whole world in throngs after him, was forſaken, and walked through the ſtreets of Conſtantinople with two or three poor ſervants, as a man that had outlived his Funerals to ſerve for a ſpectacle of Pity.

who

One day as he went to do his Courtſhip at the palace, the Empreſſe ſhewed him a bad countenance, whereat he was ſo affrighted, that at his coming forth he expected nothing every hour but murderers to aſſaſſinate him. He returns into his lodging, being diſmayed above all that can be imagined of ſo generous a man. He preſently throws himſelf upon his bed trembling and ſweating with fear. One comes to tell him that a Gentleman is at the gate with a meſſage from Theodora; he prepared himſelf already for death, when the man gave him a Billet from the Empreſſe which imported thus: Belizarius, thy conſcience tells thee that thou haſt offended me, and that thou deſerveſt to be puniſhed, but I give thee to thy wife to whom I am obliged. It is from her that in time to come thou ſhalt hold thy life, thy goods and thy honour. I ſhall know how thou ſhalt behave thy ſelf towards her, and with what ſubmiſſions thou ſhalt acknowledge and thank her for her benefits. He inſtantly kiſſes the Letter, and in the preſence of him that brought it to him, enters into his wives chamber, throws himſelf down at her feet, kiſſes ſometimes one, ſometimes the other; profeſſes that he ows to her his life, and that he will no longer hold the rank of an Husband but of a Slave. The Lady receives him into favour, and goes and thanks the Empreſſe.

But is it poſſible, that Belizarius, that thunder-bolt of warre, that had made the Eaſt, the Weſt, and the South to tremble; that had led two Kings in triumph; that ſhaked not before armies of an hundred and fifty thouſand men, having but a little handfull; Belizarius, before whom the mighty Powers of the earth crawled along in duſt, was ſo baſely ſubjugated by women! Procopius aſſures us that it was a Charm that cauſed that perturbation of his mind, and ſtole him from himſelf, and needs muſt it be a work of the Devil, that could quite change upſide down, and beſot ſo great a perſonage.

Yet may we affirm, that it was not onely the wicked ſpirit of Antonina that made that Tragedy, but that the perſon of the Popes violated by that General, who was too baſely obedient to the Empreſſe, brought on him an infinite number of miſeries, that broke out at laſt upon Juſtinian, and upon the whole Empire.

Here is a great Theatre of Providence, where Princes may learn, that it is very dangerous to be obſervant to womens wicked humours, and to ſeize even on ſacred perſons to ſatisfie their Revenge.

Behold then the Prime and moſt capitall fury of the Empire; Theodora, who made her husband fall into Hereſie, who made the Popes be plucked out of their Sees to put therein her ſervants, that turned topſie turvie all Divine and Humane Laws to content her Paſſion.

Procopius ſpeaks ſhamefully of the originall of this woman, and ſaith, that ſhe was the daughter of a Bear-keeper, a Comedian by her trade, a Proſtitute by her publick profeſſion, and abandoned even to the little boyes of the Theatre from her infancy. He addes alſo, that ſhe had a very good grace in puffing up her cheeks to receive boxes on them, and to gain money by that paſtime; and that in her little youth, ſhe was debauched by one Ecebolus who kept her for a time, and afterward was weary of her, which made her, having now nothing whereon to live, run from place to place through the whole Eaſt in that ſhamefull proſtitution; and afterward returning to Conſtantinople, Juſtinian made love to her as to a famous Courtiſan, and finding her to his liking, married her, in the life time of the Emperour his uncle.

It appears clearly that this Authour enraged againſt the memory of Juſtinian, invented execrable lies that paſſe in the approbation of thoſe that nouriſh themſelves willingly with poiſon, and that think, that one cannot ſpeak too much ill of great ones, and that thoſe are the beſt Hiſtorians that relate their moſt abominable vices.

But we ought to conſider that this wicked man (who appeared more a Pagan in his Writings then a Chriſtian) after he had highly praiſed his Maſter in publick, when he had not the recompence he expected, and was perhaps puniſhed for his looſeneſſe, and his demerits, ſets himſelf to write a ſecret Hiſtory wherein he ſpeaks fearfull things which never came into the thought of ſo many other Hiſtorians that wrote after him, and in a time when they had a full liberty, who would not have omitted ſo many remarkable things, if they had had any foundation in truth.

That man muſt be of a belief either ſimple or malicious, that can perſwade himſelf that Juſtinian who was a cold Prince, conſiderate in all his actions, extremely ambitious of glory, and carefull of his reputation, who never was tainted with the vices of youth, ſhould marry a caytiff-wench, cry'd out upon by the whole world, when he reigned already with his uncle, and governed the whole buſineſſe of the Empire. It was he that before his marriage publiſhed a Law, by which it was forbidden to the Senatours to allie themſelves with mean and diſhoneſt women. Who can believe that he ſhould teach the tranſgreſſion of his ordinances by his own example, without fearing the ſevere honeſty of the Emperour his uncle, the reproaches of the Senate, the advantage that he might give to his competitours by ſo ill an action?

All that can be ſaid moſt truly, is, that Theodora was the daughter of the great Huntſman of the Emperours, whoſe office was to cauſe wild beaſts to be taken and kept for the ſpectacles of the Amphitheatre, which was not a mean or diſhonourable employment. It is not read in all other Hiſtorians, that ſhe had any ſtain of immodeſty in her converſation, but quite contrary, that ſhe was ſuch a capitall enemy to women and maids of an ill life, that at one time ſhe cauſed five hundred of them to be ſhut up, to take from them the occaſion of doing ill, and to be trained up in the exerciſes of honeſty: which is a thing that Procopius himſelf could not conceal, not conſidering, that if ſhe had been in former time ſtained with the ſame vice, ſhe ſhould have expoſed her ſelf to the laughter of all the world; ſome blaming her cares, and others her rigours, which would have renewed the memory of her infamy, whereas ſhe ſhould have endeavoured to have buried it in ſilence.

She was certainly too ſtately to be a Proſtitute; thoſe that have ſeen her, ſay, That ſhe was a little woman, that had a face full of Majeſty, eyes burning, and caſting out lightning in their anger, a lively and piercing wit, a ſolid judgement, an expediteneſſe in buſineſſe, and the activity of fire. She was ſo diſcreet, that ſeeing that Juſtinian could not be gained by the fleſh, ſhe took him by the ſpirit, which ſhe adorned carefully with excellent and ſublime knowledges, cauſing her ſelf ſecretly to be inſtructed in State affairs, which gave her a facility to ſuggeſt advices to the Emperour her husband, which he reliſhed wonderfully, and did nothing in all the buſineſſe of the Empire without communicating it to her, calling her, even in ſome ordinances, his Venerable Spouſe, the aſſiſtant and companion of all his Counſels.

It is then the poiſon of the Serpent that ſerves for ink to Procopius's pen, when he writes extravagant fables of the birth of Theodora, and when he ſayes that Juſtinian was the ſonne of an Incubus, a true Devil in an humane ſhape; that the ſervants of his chamber have ſeen him often in the figure of a Devil; that ſometimes his head hath been perceived ſeparated from his body with mounting it ſelf up to the cieling of his chamber, and the ſame body walking on another place without an head; and that a certain Frier coming to ſalute him, was altogether aſtoniſhed, for that he ſaw Lucifer in his Throne. After this, he makes him the murderer of a great number of millions of men; he attributes to him the Comets, the Conflagrations, the Deluges, the Plagues, and the Sterilities of the earth. He complains that he would have reduced all ſorts of ſpirits to the union of the Catholick Belief; that he tormented Hereticks and Jews; that he cauſed ſumptuous Churches to be built; that he took too much care for the protection of Biſhops, Prieſts, and Monks.

This Authour ſpitting out his gall, even againſt the Light it ſelf, with ſo much impudence, and inſerting in his writings ſuch enormous tales, ſhews ſufficiently, that he was altogether filled with the curſed fury of Revenge: a man without Faith, and without Religion, a bloudy ſcoffer, which was more fit to write a Romance of the Cyclops, then the Life of our Juſtinian. He is ſo contrary to himſelf, that having made him the moſt ſubtil, and the craftieſt of all men, he ſayes in another place, that there was nothing ſo eaſie to be deceived, and abundance of other contradictions that deſtroy his credit. We need not then wonder if a famous Hiſtorian of theſe times, who takes many pieces out of Euagrius, who hath tranſcribed a part of this Calumniatour, deals ſometimes ſeverely with the memory of this Monarch, without regarding the great virtues that might counterpoiſe his faults.

That which Procopius ſpeaks moſt probably of Juſtinian's imperfections, is, that he was an extreme diſſembler, crafty in his actions, cloſe in his hatred, the maſter of his countenance, and even of his tears; inconſtant to his friends, inexorable to his enemies (had not Chriſtian Piety made him flexible) covetous of money, and more inclining to rigour then to clemency; obſtinate in his reſolutions, and not conſtant enough in his promiſes when there intervened reaſons of State. Theſe are ſpots ordinary enough to Great ones, which, it is good to correct by the counterpoiſe of Gods Law. As for Theodora, it cannot be denied but that ſhe was ſcornfull, proud, revengefull, an intermedler, ſevere, even to the exceſſe, and flitting in matters of Religion, which cauſed much trouble to the conſcience of them both.

I have ſaid before, that Pope Agapetus, after he had depoſed Anthimus the Patriarch of Conſtantinople, died in the ſame city. The news of it being carried to Rome, an aſſembly was made to proceed to the election of a new high Prieſt. Theodate King of the Gothes, partly by intreaties, and partly by threats, cauſed Sylverius to be choſen, that was the ſonne of Pope Hormiſdas by a lawfull marriage before his Prieſthood. As ſoon as he was choſen, the Empreſſe Theodora commanded him by an expreſſe letter to reeſtabliſh Anthimus, and to put Menas out of his Chair that had been ſubſtituted in his place. As ſoon as the Pope had opened that letter, he ſaid ſighing that it was the fore-runner of his death, and anſwered, that the depoſition of Anthimus, having been made Canonically by his predeceſſour, he could not in conſcience change any thing in that buſineſſe. Theodora was furiouſly provoked at his refuſall, and gave charge to Belizarius, who was then in Rome with his wife Antonina, to ſeize upon the Pope, and to ſend him to the Eaſt. Belizarius was very ſcrupulous at firſt, but being encouraged by that wicked woman, he reſolved himſelf, ſaying That it was their duty that commanded, to render an account of their actions to God, and as for him, he pretended to no other thing but to the glory of Obedience.

There was at that time at Rome a Deacon named Vigilius, an ambitious and factious man, who knowing that the Popedome of Sylverius was tottering, and no way ſettled, offered himſelf to that wicked Antonina, deſiring to be introduced into the favour of the Empreſſe, promiſing that he would do nothing in the exerciſe of his charge but by her orders; that he would put Anthimus again into his Chair; and beſides all this, would make a preſent to Theodora and to Antinina of a good ſumme of money. The Lady, paſt all reſpect of Conſcience or Honour, cauſes his offers to be accepted, and urges her husband (as much as ſhe could) to the execution of that attempt. Vigilius keeps the buſineſſe warm as much as poſſible, and produces two witneſſes, the one a Lawyer, and the other a Souldier, that accuſe Sylverius of having endeavoured to betray the city of Rome, and to deliver a gate to the Gothes. Belizarius was very doubtfull that there was ſome calumny in all thoſe Proceedings, nevertheleſſe, fearing that if he ſhould uphold the lawfull Pope, he might be involved in a crime of State, as having been a favourer of the party of the Gothes, he ſends for him to his palace to hear him, with promiſe to ſend him back unto his houſe, which was performed after he had been pleaſed with his Defence.

But he was called for the ſecond time and brought into the chamber of Antonina, who was ſeated on her Pallat, and Belizarius at her feet. The proud woman uſing this holy man as a groom, ſayes to him with a diſdain, and the guiſe of a Proſtitute, Ha, Sylverius, what have we done that we ſhould be ſold to the enemy? It is time that you ſhould be puniſhed for your treaſon. Thereupon ſhe makes him paſſe into another chamber, where ſhe commands that he ſhould be ſtript of his habit, and cloathed with a Monks gown, and ſent to the Eaſt, from whence he was baniſhed to Patura. The Biſhop of the place knowing the innocence of this Pope, went out to meet him, and received him with all the ſubmiſſions due to his dignity: furthermore, being lamed, with a great zeal, he had the boldneſſe to tranſport himſelf to Conſtantinople, and ſtoutly to tell the Emperour of the oppreſſion of the Head of the Church, which would pull down the vengeance of God upon him, if he did not remedy it. Juſtinian was much aſtoniſhed at this diſcourſe, and gave command, that the Pope ſhould be carried back again to Italy, and preſerved in his dignity, with this reſervation, that if he ſhould be convicted of having intelligence with the Gothes, he ſhould not live in Rome, but ſhould chuſe ſome other dwelling; which ſufficiently teſtified the moderation of the Emperour in that buſineſſe, when he acted according to the juſtice of his own thought.

But Theodora, who would not ſtop there, knowing that the Pope was re-conducted into the Weſt, writes to her confident that he ſhould not do a buſineſſe by halfs. On the other ſide Vigilius ardently ſolicites, ſaying saying, that he could not perform his promise if he did not mount up to S. Peters Throne. He presses so violently, that the Pope was delivered into his hands, whom he instantly caused to be carried away into the Isle of Palmes, which was an Augury of his Martyrdome. This sacred high Priest had so much vigour in the extremity of miseries, that having assembled as many Bishops that lived thereabout, as he could get together, he excommunicated Vigilius and all his adherents. He having a mind to revenge himself upon him, and to make sure his Chair, made an end of him with hunger, with vexations, and with torments in that desert Island, where he quickly gave up his victorious spirit to God, gaining the Crown of Martyrdome.

Vigilius his persecutour, who had entred into S. Peters Chair like a Lion, transformed himself into a Lamb, changing totally his wicked manners, so that he was confirmed by the Romans, and held for lawfull Pope. God, that would not destroy him, gave him for a punishment, the accomplishment of his desires, and caused that all that he had most passionately sought for, was the source of all his torments. Theodora the Empresse failed not to challenge him of his promise, for the re-establishment of the false Patriarch Anthimus; but he answered, that he had committed a sinne in promising, and that he should commit two if he should perform what he had promised. This furious woman provoked with that answer, declares him an usurper of the Apostolick See, and follows the Law against him, accusing him of the murther of Sylverius; whereupon, she causes him to be seized on by the violences of one Anthimus, and to be brought in chains to Constantinople, where she presses again very earnestly the restitution of Anthimus. Vigilius was so generous and constant, that he protested, that he would rather suffer a thousand deaths then do it: and when he was violated with injurious words and armed commands, he spake aloud, I thought I had been come to Justinian's Court, but I well perceive that I am in Diocletian's.

That speech cost him full dear, for Theodora's Ministers, who held him not for lawfull Pope, beat him so cruelly, that he was almost dead upon the place; yet he scaped out of their hands, and saved himself in S. Euphemia's Church, from whence he was suddenly plucked out, and led through the streets of Constantinople with an halter about his neck as a thief, then put in prison, and entertained with bread and water, forsaken of all his Clergy, some of which were banished, and others constrained to labour in the mines. All this was done by a just judgement of God, to expiate the stain of Sylverius his bloud; but yet the Empresse that ordained these violences (in part) to content her passion, should have clearly informed her self upon the point of his character before she should have proceeded to such indignities.

The Romans, that at his departure from their city, when he was carried away prisoner, loaded him with injuries, so farre, as even to throw stones and sticks at him, were touched with repentance, after they had heard of all the usage that he had at Constantinople, with the admirable patience that he expressed in his pains, sought for him again, avowing him for the true Pastour of the Universall Church: which coming to the knowledge of Justinian, he suddenly commanded that he should be delivered, and the spirit of Theodora her self was appeased and reconciled with him. All the Priests and Deacons that had followed him, were rallied together, and so he was sent back to Italy with honour. But the poor Pope, after he had surmounted a million of torments and inconveniences, dyed of the stone in Sicily, before he arrived at Rome. O phantasmes of Honour, how painfull are ye to those that sue for you! How traitorous are ye to those that possesse you, and dolorous to those that leave you! Unhappy are those that prize you through errour, that court you through vain glory, and obtain you by iniquity. It were better to put ones hand in flames then to lay it upon Tiara's or on Crowns covered with Injustice and with bloud.

Theodora dyed about the same time, carrying into the other world a great account to give to God, for having embroiled the estate of the Church; for having behaved her self imperiously; and for having alway sought with ardency the satisfaction of her Revenge. It is probable that she passed out of this life in the Catholick Belief, and in Repentance. But as concerning the death of Antonina her confident, it is buried in a great obsurity, and it is to be feared, that her life extremely dissolute even to her old age, and her damnable practices have cast her headlong into an eternall misery.

Justinian languished a long time after Theodora's death; having seen all his designs of Warre, of Law, and of Buildings perfected, bestowed his whole time afterwards in serving God, and expired the rest of his life in Devotion, to which he ever had a very strong inclination.

It is held, that about the end of his dayes, he fell into two errours; the former whereof was, That he should not die, and indeed it seemed to all the world that death had passed him, since he had already attained to the age of fourscore and four years, which is very rare in an Emperour, and not conformable to the Scripture, which sayes, That the life of Mighty men is ordinarily short enough; nevertheless, it is not probable, that in the solidity of his judgement which endured even to his end, he should suffer himself to be perswaded with such a vanity. The other fault which he committed is more true, which is, That by a zeal not discreet enough, that he had conceived for the humanity of our Lord, he would believe that it was not subject to our miseries, but impassible and incorruptible, even before his Resurrection. He was near of publishing this opinion, and authorising it by his ordinances, but yet he never did it, and repented of it at his last hour; calling back in his Will the Patriarch Eutichius that he had driven away for opposing this his errour. So Nicephorus writes manifestly; and every equitable judgement will conclude with him for the salvation of this Emperour. We have very considerable proofs of it; first, his name hath never been blotted out of the Ecclesiasticall Tables, out of which it was a custome to deface the memory of Heretick Emperours. Secondly, S. Gregory the Great, who speaks alwayes very correctly, calls him Emperour of pious Memory. In the third place, Pope Agathon, writing after his death, saith, That he was an Emulatour of the sincere and Apostolick faith. Finally, he was commended in the sixth universall Counsel with an Elogy worthy of a most Catholick Prince. Even some Patriarchs of Constantinople have caused his memoty to be yearly celebrated with acclamations of happinesse, and publick Orations in his praise. His great Austerities, his magnificent Almes, his Churches, his Devotions, his Laws, his indefatigable pains for the Publick, have defaced the spots that so easily slide into the lives of great ones. Let us not rashly condemne that which we may excuse with Justice, and let us not be evil with Ours, if God will be good with His.

I confesse that this end somewhat troubles me, seeing my self constrained to follow an opinion different from that of a great modern Historian which handles this this Emperour with much ſeverity. It is true that I have alwayes had a venerable eſteem of that Authour, knowing well, that by the rayes of his virtues, and of his learning, he hath ſurpaſſed the luſtre of the moſt glorious purples. Yet the reſpect which I bear to Truth, and the honour which I owe to the memory of great men that have ſo much obliged the Publick, give me permiſſion to ſay here, that Juſtinian hath never been ſo black as he hath painted him, being ill informed by the writings of Procopius and of Euagrius his enemies, or following opinions that by a falſe intention and manifeſt equivocation are inſinuated into the ſpirits of men many Ages ſince. Fables eaſily ſurpriſe us, and when they are authoriſed by a long time, and by the belief of many perſons, they paſſe oftentimes for truths.

That which I ſay is manifeſt in that which Baronius himſelf writes touching the opinion which he had of the groſſe ignorance of Juſtinian, whom he reproaches often in his Hiſtory, that he could neither write nor read; and yet it is now more then viſible, that it is an errour crept in by an equivocation of Names, and a fault in Printing, which hath cauſed the name of Juſtinian in the text of Suidas, to be taken for that of Juſtin as I have already ſaid. This is ſo clear, that the Commentatour of Procopius (an enemy to Juſtinian as well as his Authour) hath not been able to diſſemble it, but confeſſes that he hath obſerved in hiſtory, that oftentimes the name of Juſtinian hath paſſed for that of Juſtin; and that by this means, the ignorance that agreed to his uncle Juſtin hath been attributed to this Monarch; and farther yet, the accident of the troubles of mind that befell his nephew Juſtin. That which I ſay is proved after an excellent manner by the great Caſſiodore (who might have ſeen Juſtinian when being young he came into Italy) who calls him aloud The Learned Prince, and moſt wiſe Emperour. And that grave Authour Agapetus, who dedicated to him the Treatiſe of Reigning well, which Baronius highly commends, ſayes openly, that he was created Emperour Philoſophizing, and that in the Empire he ceaſed not from Philoſophy. And Procopius his Calumniatour avouches, that he ſpent ordinarily a good part of the night in his cloſet, to ſtudy upon the ſublimeſt Sciences; and that he could diſcourſe of them pertinently with the ableſt Scholars of his age. After this, judge if there be any reaſon to ſet him forth as a Peaſant, without Learning, and without Letters. Now, as this illuſtrious Authour was overtaken in that which he ſpake concerning the wit and the capacity of Juſtinian, ſo (as being a man) might he be miſtaken in that which he hath written of his manners, following ſome pieces of the ſlanderous hiſtory of Procopius, which he had read in Euagrius, and in others like him.

But I intreat my Reader yet once more to ſee and conſider, whether it be reaſonable to believe that obſcure Libel of an Authour enraged againſt the memory of that Prince, to the prejudice of ſo many grave and judicious perſons that have quite contrary opinions of him. It is evident, that this Procopius was a Libertine, and a true Atheiſt, who hath ſpoken and written in his firſt book of the Hiſtory of the Gothes, That it is a folly to trouble ones ſelf about the belief of Divine things, and that it ſhould be left to every one, whether Prieſt or Lay, to believe all that ſhall ſeem good to him, rather then diſturb the Common-wealth, being extreme angry that Juſtinian tormented the Pagans, the Jews, the Samaritans, and endeavoured to reduce the whole world to the Chriſtian and Catholick Belief. Judge (my Reader) hereupon what faith a man deſerves to have, that making a ſhew to be a Chriſtian, acknowledges not their God. Further yet, being a Philiſtim by Nation, a Sophiſter by Profeſſion, an Impoſtour by Artifice, he hath been able eaſily to make ſome of the pranks of his trade ſlip into his Hiſtory. Adde to this, that being but a mean fellow, he was advanced firſt by Juſtin, and afterwards by Juſtinian to great offices, yet being a man extremely jealous and ambitious, he thought himſelf not high enough, and bore a mortall hatred to John the ſuperintendent of Juſtice; to Tribonian the great favorite of Juſtinian; and not content with tearing them in his Hiſtory, he falls upon the Emperour that had honoured them with his favours.

Every one that hath the common ſenſe of a reaſonable man, ſees plainly that it is a moſt unworthy thing, that a ſervant, a domeſtick, taken from the duſt of the earth, raiſed even to the great Offices of the Empire, ſhould leave a Railing Hiſtory to poſterity, written in an hole, and by a ſingular treaſon, againſt his Lord and Maſter, of whom he held his life and honour. And beyond all this, that he ſhould ſpeak things in his Book, that muſt needs have been very publick and viſible to all the world, that ſo many other Hiſtorians who were near that time, and might ſpeak with all freedom, do not ſo much as mention.

To this it will be anſwered, that it is not onely a Procopius that condemnes Juſtinian, but that he himſelf hath black'd himſelf eternally by the ill uſage which he ſhewed the Pope Vigilius, and by the hereſie which he fomented and authoriſed about the period of his life. To ſpeak truth, there being nothing to be preferred before the fidelity which we owe to our Religion, the honour which we ought to render to the common Father of all Chriſtendome, and to the Apoſtolick See; if this Emperour were directly convinced of theſe two crimes, and dyed without Repentance, I ſhould be the firſt man that would ſubſcribe to his condemnation: But there is a notable difference between that which eſcapes by errour and by ſurprize, and that which is practiſed by deſign and obſtinacy.

It is true that the Pope Vigilius was at firſt hardly uſed at Conſtantinople by the Empreſſe Theodora, but his Election being not held at the beginning for Canonicall, he being one whom the Romans had chaſed away with ſtones, and whom he himſelf had depoſed and baniſhed from the uſurpation which he had made upon Sylverius his Predeceſſour by a bold attempt, cauſing himſelf afterward to be Canonically choſen; it is no wonder if in this doubt of his dignity, and certainty of his crime committed againſt the perſon of a lawfull Pope, he was not honoured as high Prieſt, but accuſed as guilty. It ſuffices, that as ſoon as Juſtinian knew that he had been afterward declared the ſovereign Paſtour of the Church by the ordinary Forms, he rendred to him the reſpects due to his Character, and permitted him to exerciſe his Functions with all liberty in Conſtantinople. It is true that he had alſo ſome difference with him about the condemnation of three Articles, or rather of three perſons, Theodore, Ibas, and Theodoret, but in the end the Emperour yielded, and permitted all to the diſcretion of the Pope.

As for the Hereſie which is objected to him, it hath rather been an errour of ſupriſe then a reſolute opinion with obſtinacy againſt the deciſions of the Church without which it cannot be a formall Hereſie. There aroſe in his time an Opinion that held, That the body of our Saviour was incorruptible even before the Reſurrection, and that he was not ſubject to the naturall and irreprehenſible paſſions of other men. Many Biſhops, many great learned Friars, and abundance of illuſtrious perſons profeſſe that Belief, and Juſtinian, deceived by a zeal not well regulated, which he had to the perſon of our Lord, fell into it, not that he doubted but the two Natures were in Jeſus Chriſt, and that his body was conſubſtantiall with ours, but he could not endure the word Corruptible, when the fleſh of our Lord was ſpoken of. If he had onely meant an exemption from the corruption and rottenneſſe to which our bodies are reduced, his opinion had been but commendable; but to intend to take away from the Sonne of God the naturall paſſions of hunger, thirſt, wearineſſe, and other like, is to be farre wide from the Catholick Faith. Yet ſince that that Opinion had not been yet by name, and expreſſly decided by the preceding Councels, and that many Biſhops had the ſame thought, and that the Pope very much buſied by the warres of the Gothes, had not yet interpoſed thereon, it is not credible that it was an Hereſie framed in the ſpirit of the Emperour, but rather an errour. And ſince that he abſtained from promulgating it as he had projected, and ordained by Will that the Patriarch Eutychus that had been baniſhed for oppoſing this Opinion ſhould be called back by Juſtin his Succeſſour; It is evident that he repented at the laſt period of his life, and that Evagrius who had a ſtrong tincture of the venom of Procopius did him wrong to condemne him to hell: for I leave it to every judicious man to weigh, which we ought rather to believe, a mean Hiſtorian angered, or the voyce of a generall Councel aſſembled after Juſtinians death. No man certainly can call it into doubt but that the authority of a Councel infinitely paſſes the opinion of one onely man. Now it is ſo, that beſides the teſtimonies of S. Gregory and Pope Agathon heretofore alledged; The ſixth Councel ſpeaking of the Emperour Juſtinian calls him alwayes Moſt Chriſtian Prince, Emperour of pious Memory, And in the end, Holy Monarch, and who is in the number of the Bleſſed. The German that hath Commented upon the railing Hiſtory of Procopius is conſtrained to confeſſe that he hath read even in the beſt Copies of that Councel, Ἰουστινιανὸς ὁ ἐν ἁγίοις, Juſtinian that is among the Saints. But he being an enemy of his memory eludes that Epithite and ſayes that it hath been attributed to moſt wicked Emperours, pretending by this means to diminiſh the luſtre of Juſtinian. I acknowledg that the word ἅγιος, Holy, or Sacred, ſometimes ſignifies that which is Inviolable, and that in this manner it was given to all the Emperours, but I defie him to find one ſole Text that ſaies of a dead Emperour, ὁ ἐν ἁγίοις, He that is in the company of the Saints who is not reckoned amongſt the Bleſſed that live in heaven.

the

This onely is enough to ſtop the mouth of all thoſe that are of a contrary opinion, and to maintain this great Monarch in the poſſeſſion of an high and happy renown, which he hath ſo juſtly purchaſed.

It is he that above all the Emperours hath expreſſed a moſt ardent Zeal towards the perſon of our Lord, to whom he dedicated the ſtatelieſt Church which was at that time in the whole Univerſe. It is he that conſecrated an Altar to him compoſed of all the moſt glittering ſtones, and of all the moſt magnificent rich materials that were then to be found in all the world. It is he that had a moſt tender care of all the Churches of his Empire. He that every where enriched the houſe of God. The Purveyour for the Hoſpitals; the refuge of all neceſſitous perſons, and the Sanctuary of the afflicted. It is he that governed the whole world by moſt holy Laws; who hath revenged, perſecuted, and puniſhed thoſe crimes that tended to the infection of the Publick. It is he that warred all his life time againſt Hereticks, and that upheld the Glory of the Roman Empire, which ſince Conſtantine was faln into an horrible decay. It is he that diſplayed his Enſigns in Aſia, Europe, and Africa, under the Name of Jeſus Chriſt with a force incomparable, and ſucceſſes that could not but come from heaven. It is he that baniſhed from Chriſtian ſociety Sorcerers, Immodeſt, and Infamous perſons, and that planted every where good manners. It is he that made Learning flouriſh, that rewarded men of Merit, that eternized Laws, that bore Arms to the heighth of Reputation. It is he, that alwayes ſhewed himſelf a moſt ardent adminiſtratour of the Juſtice of God, giving audience very often in perſon to parties with an indefatigable toil. It is he that pardon'd injuries, and received even into Grace thoſe that had attempted upon his life. He, that God preſerved from a thouſand dangers, and a thouſand ambuſhes. He, whom God crowned with great age, and an infinite number of bleſſings.

CHARLEMAGNE, OR,
CHARES the GREAT.

IT is not flattery that hath given to our Charles the name of Great, since that truth it self may attribute to him the title of three-times-thrice Great, for his Piety, for his Arms, and for his Laws. All that Persia respected in Cyrus, all that Greece vaunted in Alexander, all that Rome honoured in Augustus and in Trajan, all that Christians have commended in the persons of Constantine and Theodosius, is found included in our Charlemagne.

Ptolomie said that great Personages are never born into the world without a conspiration of the Heavens which collect their best Constellations and most favourable Influences to salute them, as soon as they salute the day. We cannot know the quality of the stars that ruled over this happy birth, but we know that Providence which infinitely out-passes the effects of all the celestiall Globes hath taken the care of forming this incomparable Prince, and of making him a Master-piece of her hands to shew him to all Ages. Nature was employed to build him a Body capable to sustain the Impressions of that divine Spirit that God would lodge therein. She made him a stature so advantageous, limbs so well composed, so handsome, and so strong; she engraved so much Majesty upon his countenance; she sowed so much lightning and attraction in his eyes, that they triumphed over hearts, before his valour had laid hand upon the Empire. It is not alwayes that Felicity is so prodigall of her benefits; she contents her self in some to adorn the house with troubling her self for the inhabitant; and if there be a fair appearance on the out-side, there is little Sense within. But in our Charles, every thing was Great, and his Soul never belyed the beautifull spectacle of his Body. His understanding was quick and piercing; his memory most happy; his judgement clean and solid, that discerned exactly good from evill, and truth from falshood. He that saw him in Letters, thought that they were made for none but him; and he that contemplated him in Arms, perceived that he would be one day the chief of Conquerours. He studied Grammar, Rhetorick, Poetry, Philosophy, Law, Astrology, and the rest of the Mathematicks. He learned the Latine, the Greek, the Hebrew, the Syriack. He had some taste even of Divinity it self, and succeeded in all Sciences so advantageously, that he might have held the Empire of Letters, if God had not destined to him that of the World. He respected his Tutours all his life time as the Fathers of his soul; he made his Master of Peter the Deacon, when the Law of Arms might have made him his Slave. He drew Alcuin out of England, to learn of him the secret of the Arts, honoured him with great benefits, and at last founded by his Counsel the University of Paris. His meals were seasoned with the reading of some good book, or with the conference of the ablest men of his whole kingdome, loving to refresh himself from businesse in their discourses without taking any other directions in his pains then the change of one labour into another.

That which spoils many great ones, is, that they cannot endure any serious thing for a long time, and yet this King made his Recreations even of that whereof others might have made an hard study; and the grace of it was, that he did all this without pain, and that his spirit was no more disquietted with Sciences, then the eye with the most delightfull colours. This occupation that he took in Letters by the orders of the King his father, served extremely to the fashioning of his manners, because he saw in Books, and especially in History, as in a true mirrour, all the staines that flattery dissembles unto Princes that heed not to be in a resolution to wash them off, since they are not in a condition to know them.

It is a marveilous thing to see how nature seemed to sport her self in reproducing Martel and Pepin in the person of Charles; she moderated the fierce valour of the Grandsire by the sweetnesse of the father, and made in him an heavenly temper by the happiest of mixtures. His Devotion was not soft nor feminine, neither was it large or lukewarm, but it gently spread its divine Lights in the soul of this Monarch without deading the fire of his courage.

He had most sublime knowledges of God and apprehensions very Religious; he offered to him his duties both in publick and in private, with a very sincere Piety. He burnt with a great zeal to carry his name into all places whither he could extend his Arms. He was ardently affectionate to the holy See, to which he gave respects and incomparable protections; he honoured the Prelates, and filled the Church with Benefits.

He held that Justice was the Rampart of Kingdomes, the Peace of the people, the policy of manners, the joy of hearts, and that neither the gentle temperature of the air, nor the serenity of the sea, nor the fruitfulnesse of the earth, were any way equall to its sweetnesse. He made a manifest profession of it in the inviolable verity of his words, in the sincerity of his proceedings, in the duties which he gendered to God, to the authours of his birth, to his kindred, to his countrey, and universally to all the world. He gave audience often in person to the differences of his people, and even at his rising out of his bed, he caused the Provost of his house to enter into his chamber with the parties that pleaded, to terminate their Law-suits by his Verdict. His principal care was to commit Justice unto innocent hands; but the horrour of his thoughts was perpetually against the unjust, and against the violent; thinking that his Authority and his Arms could have no better employment then in the destruction of tyrants.

But on the contrary he had goodnesses of heart inexhaustible for honest men, and a wonderful care of the quiet and commodity of his people; his access was easie, his words gracious, his caresses full of attractions, his command sweet, his answers judicious, his orders so just that they seemed all consorted in heaven. He denyed with sweetnesse, and gave with measure, although his hands were seas of Liberality and Magnificence that were never dry. He had all his life time the possession of his soul by a singular moderation that retained his mouth, his tongue, and his anger; but it could not pluck back Love by the wings, which caused some spots to be seen

ſeen in this Sun, although they were afterward waſhed away again by a ſtrong Repentance.

That which was moſt reſplendent in all the parts of his life, was an high generoſity that never forſook his heart, and that found exerciſe continually in all his actions. He contented not himſelf with middle Virtues, but he carried them all even up to the altitude of their Glory. He had a ſpirit inceſſantly bent to great deſigns, and a ſoul alwayes filled with a ſtrong confidence, which he had ſeated totally in God, of whom he thought himſelf to be beloved. He never was kept back by any obſtacles from generous enterpriſes; he expoſed himſelf to all dangers, even to the moſt terrible, for the glory of his ſovereign Maſter. Proſperity had no charms upon him, and adverſity found not any darts that were able to abate his reſolution.

All theſe virtues marched in him under the conduct of a great Reaſon, and failed not to be followed with an happineſſe that had no equal but his Prudence. God having ennobled him with ſo eminent qualities ceaſed not to furniſh him with Objects to put them in practiſe, as well by the condition of his Birth, as by the divers occurrences of Affairs.

It ſeems that Providence made him be born on purpoſe at Ingeheim upon the river of Rhine, and on the Borders of France and Germany, as the man that ſhould unite thoſe two Eſtates under one Sceptre. He found a Monarchy at his birth, which his Grandfather touched upon, and which his father openly poſſeſſed, that had much need of being ſettled by his power, and husbanded by his cares. He enterpriſed for this purpoſe divers warres, but he never waged any one that he was not led to by ſtrong reaſons of Piety and Juſtice. His firſt Arms were employed againſt the Saxons, who were at that time Infidels and Pagans, and who, beſides, rebelled againſt the lawfull Power that ruled them. One may ſay truly, that that Nation was the Hydra of our Hercules whoſe heads continually were born again, and whoſe bloud ſo often ſhed was but the ſeed of a new Warre even to infinite. Never did the Arms of the Romans dare to attempt any thing upon this people which they deſired rather not to know then fight with. Their Standards had never reſolution enough to ſee, that which Charlemagne had power enough to beat. They were warlike even to a wonder, and obſtinate even to all extremity. The buſineſſe was not onely to conquer the Lands, and to gain the men, but to overcome their Superſtition, and to diſarm the furies of deſpair. This is that which our Charles performed in nine Warres, as cruel as poſſible, and in the ſpace of three and thirty years; ſo much Conſtancy had he againſt ſtubbornneſſe, and ſo much Power againſt madneſſe. He defeated them in many battels; he ſubdued their cities, and took their principall fortreſſes; he demoliſhed the Altars of the pernicious Irminſul, ſo many times beſprinkled with humane bloud; he plucked all the other Idols alſo out of their demoliſhed Temples, and at laſt, conſtrained the brave Vitiguinde their King to yield to the happineſſe of France, which made him find the kingdome of God in Baptiſme, by the loſſe of that of the Barbarians.

But it is true that this magnificent Conquerour found not any where a Theatre of his deeds more famous then that of Italy, whither, the Church groaning under the chains of the Lombards, called for him inceſſantly. Above all, Pope Adrian the firſt, whom Charlemagne loved afterwards as his brother, conjured him to help him ſpeedily, and to recover the Patrimony of Jeſus out of the hands of ſo many unjuſt uſurpers. He tranſported over into Italy with an Eagles wings and a lions ſtrength, marching upon his fathers ſteps that exhaled yet the odour of his generous piety. He took at firſt the city of Verona, then that of Pavia, after a long tedious ſiege, and appeared victorious with an Army of fire in the champains of his enemies. Didier King of the Lombards, that was more ready to do an injury to a diſarmed power, then to ward the blows of an adverſary was ſeen, conquered, and taken priſoner, rendering the Church her liberty by his captivity.

It was a ſight fill'd with Magnificence and Piety, to ſee him arrive at Rome, where the heavens ſeemed to be all in Bleſſings over his head, and the earth all in reſpect under his feet. He would have marched with a little noiſe, and prevented the Pope, not deſiring to make his entrance with great pomp. But Adrian that watched over his march perceived it, and ſent out very farre to meet him abundance of the Nobility and Officers for a Convoy; and when he was near enough to Rome, the Souldiery, with all the Citizens appeared in Arms; but that which was moſt delightfull was a Proceſſion of little Children, well choſen out, that carried boughs and ſang Benedictus qui venit in nomine Domini: Bleſſed be he that comes in the name of God. The Pope deſiring to honour the lively image of the ſaviour by ſome kind of honours that had been heretofore rendred to the originall. When the King ſaw the Croſſes of the Senatours, and that came alſo out to meet him, he alighted off his horſe, and walked afoot as farre as S. Peters Church, where the holy Father was at the door to receive him, with his Cardinalls, and all his Chair. Charlemagne by a Ceremonious devotion, and great reſpect that he bare to S. Peter and his ſucceſſour, would kiſſe every ſtair of the aſcent of the Portall, before he would cloſe with Adrian that received and embraced him with extaſies of joyes, and the King kiſſed his hand amongſt a thouſand acclamations of cheerfulneſſe and happineſſe which the people ceaſed not to redouble. They went both of them into the Church to render thanks for the favours that God had done them on that great day, which was an holy Saturday, and which gave not place for that time to the triumphs of the Reſurrection. The Feaſts of the Paſſeover were ſpent amidſt powerfull Devotions, pretty Ceremonies, and infinite merriments. The King not contenting himſelf with having broken the chains of the capitall city of the world, made great preſents to her Church, and after he had been crowned King of Lombardy by the hands of that great Pope, who offered him alſo the dignity of a Senatour, the fore-runner of the Imperiall; He returned to France, leaving to all Italy an approbation of his deeds, and a great deſire of his Domination.

On the other ſide, the Chriſtians of Spain that ſuffered an Age ſince inſupportable outrages under the Tyranny of the Sarazens, had alſo recourſe to this invincible Monarch, who, as one alwayes ready to exalt the Standard of the Faith, and to ſuccour the afflicted, paſſes happily over the Pyrenean mountains, takes the city of Pampelona, croſſes the river Ebro, ſeizes himſelf of Sarragoſſa, and afterwards of Barcelona, plucks the Mahumetans out of the fortreſſes that they poſſeſſed, and re-eſtabliſhed the Chriſtian Faith in all the places from whence the fury of that Barbarian had baniſhed it. His zeal alwayes burning carried him by the ſame means to the Converſion of the Infidels, of which he cauſed innumerable multitudes to be baptized, ſo true it is, that every thing gave way to the Arms and to the perſwaſions of that incomparable Prince, whom God ſeemed to lead by the hand to the Poſſeſſion of the Roman Empire.

Here is the great work of the Providence of God upon his well-beloved Charles, that he did him this favour to wear the first of all the Diadem of the Cesars in the house of France, and to have transmitted it to a sufficient long posterity.

I pray you Reader, to observe here the sacred traces of that wise governesse of Empires, and to consider how she insensibly collected all dispositions necessary to set this great King upon the Throne of the Emperours. The conquest of Kingdomes resemble often that golden bough of Virgil, which one could not pluck off from its tree by main force, but might easily be taken off by an hand that had good fortune on his side. There are many Princes that to take Cities and Provinces by violence, have covered the earth with Arms, and the sea with Vessels, with a noise that astonished the whole world, without ever compassing their designs, whereas others have come to Crowns with as much haste as easinesse, without troubling themselves, and almost without stirring because the hand of God was in the mingling of their affairs.

This is the proceeding which we visibly discover in the advancement of our Charles, whilst he dream'd of nothing but on the means of exalting the Glory of God and succouring afflicted Nations. Heaven labours for him in the East, in the West, and raises him occasions, which without his thinking of it, set the Diadem upon his head.

It was already a long time since the Eagle of the Roman Emperours clapt but with one wing; Italy having been so many times pillaged by the Gothes, the Huns, the Vandals, and the Lombards. The courageous wisdome of Justinian, that thought he had freed it from oppression, did but change, not break its chains. The East had enough to do to defend it self against the incursions of the Barbarians, and could no more contribute any thing to the West but unprofitable compassions and griefs, to lose that which it could no longer keep. It happened, that to aggravate the evils of the successours of Constantine, there sprang up an Heresie of the Iconoclasts, or Image-breakers, which was worse then a plague of Egypt, and which being fomented even by those that were upon the Throne, caused innumerable disastres, and shook the Pillars of the State.

The beginning of this unhappinesse came from Leo the Isaurit, who being of a very base extraction, took in hand the Sceptre of Constantinople, which he soil'd much more by his furious deportments, then by his shamefull originall. He had in his Privy Councel a pernicious Jew that perswaded him to abolish the holy Images, promising him the Empire when he was yet but a private man, as the recompence of that Sacrilledge; and for this reason, he afterward employed himself about it with fury, and cast out the roarings of a Lion which were heard from East to West. The Patriarch S. Germain opposed his Edicts, who was for that businesse deprived of his Dignity, and many great personages horribly persecuted for the same cause, sealed with their bloud the Belief of the Church.

Gregory the Second thundred from S. Peters Chair against that Lion, although he was under the captivity of the Lombards, and declared him not onely Excommunicated, but had also forfeited his Imperial Dignity, and all the Demesnes he pretended to in Italy. The rage of his Revenge caused a Fleet to be prepared to go down to Italy, and to put this generous Pope in chains; but it was cast away, and death strangled his designs, so that he could never root out of the hearts of men the worshipping of Images.

Constantine, Copronymus his sonne, that defiled in the day of his Baptisme the waters that purifie all the world, continued Leo's furies, and made himself the most abominable of all men; a professed enemy of the most holy Virgin the mother of God, and of all the Saints, till such time as he was consumed by the leprosie. He left an heir of his Sceptre and Impiety, which was called by his Grandfathers name Leo; a profane and unhappy Prince, who being much in love with pearls and precious stones, took away from the treasures of the Church a magnificent Crown that the Emperour Maurice had dedicated to God: but his crime was followed suddenly with vengeance, for scarce had he set it upon his head but it was covered with impostems and sores, accompanied with a violent fever that took him away in few dayes, after a reign of four years and a half.

He had a sonne named Constantine who began his Reign at the age of ten years, under the protection of his mother Irene who was declared Regent of the Empire by her condition, and because she was a woman of great discretion and courage, the daughter of a King, skilfull in holy learning, endowed with a perfect beauty, and accomplished in many graces and virtues that rendred her Government pleasing to all world. She gave the direction of her affairs to Stauratius, a man of a sublime capacity, and an equall reputation, that seconded all her good intentions, so that she governed ten years with her sonne in great peace, and in the approbation of all honest men. Her Regency was greatly remarkable for the Zeal which she testified to the Catholick Faith, following the good counsels of Pope Adrian, and of Tarasius Patriarch of Constantinople, who perswaded her to cause a generall Councel to be held at Nice, where the memory of the preceding Emperours that had authorised the Heresie of the Iconoclasts was condemned, the Images re-established, and the Devotions of the people enflamed to their veneration. This Councel gave a thousand benedictions to the Empresse, even so farre as to name her The Revengeresse of the Cause of God, The Conquerresse of Impiety; and the Protectresse of the Catholick Faith. All businesses took a very happy course, and the State prospered visibly in the hands of that great Princesse.

But it seems that disorder is fatall to the Courts of great Ones, and that virtue can never reign there without contradiction. The ambition that every one hath to promote his fortune, the impatience of good, the desire of novelty, the envy that alwayes follows the happy, cease not secretly to contrive wicked plots which are hatched at last into pernicious effects. The passages to the spirit of the Emperour could not be so well stopped up, but that he had about his person some young men, the most venomous pestilences of the court, who by giving him suspicions of the Empress his mother, involved his Dignity and his Life in a misery that causes horrour to my thoughts. They cease not to insinuate into his heart by cursed flatteries that gave him the taste of wine, and the love of a faulty liberty, that would no longer measure his Powers but by the impunity of all vices. They call'd him the perpetuall Pupil, the shadow of Stauratius, and told him that the age of twenty years might have made him proceed Master of his affairs and of himself; that it was an insufferable shame to him to endure servitude in a birth that gave him the Empire of the World; that his mother loved his Sceptre and not his Person, and that she was so much used to Reign, that she would never quit the Sovereign Authority, if he did not expresse Vigour and Resolution to be that which God was pleased he should be born, without dependence on any one; that the Pedagogie of Stauratius was infamous to a Monarch that had thrice seven years over his head, and that he ought no more to play the child in a time wherein ſo many other Princes had played the Conquerours.

in

They talk to him of it ſo much, that he reſolved to take away all Authory from the State-Officer, and to put his Mother out of the Government, and direction of his affairs, which he began to manage after a ſtrange faſhion, favouring the hereſie of the Iconoclaſts and all diſorders, following the advice of that pernicious counſell of the youth that had began his ruine. Irene had an intention at firſt to marry him to the Princeſſe Rotrude daughter of our Charlemagne, but ſome Greeks diverted that reſolution, telling her, that that alliance would give too great a prop to his naturall diſpoſition that ſeemed already bad enough, and that if the French began to ſet a foot in the Empire, they would one day carry the Crown upon their head. This cauſed his mother to marry him to Mary the Armenian, who wanted not good qualities, but whether it was that the Emperour found her not to his liking, or whether it was to ſpite the Empreſſe his mother that had given her to him, he made a very ſcandalous divorce from that Princeſſe after he had lawfully wedded her, and married with a Chamber-maid of his Mothers, through the irregularneſſe of his ſenſuality.

The Patriarch Tarafius had a good mind to oppoſe himſelf againſt it, but ſeeing that this Prince enraged with love and choler threatned to open the Temples of the Idols, if one croſſed the phrenſie of his paſſion, he held his peace, and let a buſineſſe ſhamefull to Chriſtianity paſſe by diſſimulation. But Plato and Theodore who were then the two greateſt lights of Greece in holineſſe and learning, much blamed his proceedings, and ſeparated themſelves from his communion, which made a great rent in the Eaſtern Church.

Conſtantine ſullying alſo his Loves with humane blood, cauſed the eyes to be put out of his Uhkle Nicephorus, and of the Generall Alexius greatly renowned by his proweſſe, which drew much hatred upon the perſon and government of this Prince, yet he left not off for all that to continue, even ſo far as to take pleaſure in cutting off the tongues of many that diſapproved of the inſolency of his manners.

Eight years were already paſſed in theſe diſorders, and his mother retired into her private condition, was ſecretly ſollicited by many to take again the Managing of the affairs to ſtop the Riots of her ſon. She hearkened to it and with the aſſiſtance of Staurarius plotted an horrible conſpiracy againſt the Emperour, whom ſhe cauſed to be apprehended, impriſoned, and made blind, whereat he conceived ſo much deſpight and ſadneſſe, that in few dayes he quitted the Sceptre with his life. The wicked deportments of Conſtantine, and the good reputation in which Irene had lived till then, cauſed many even amongſt the Church-men, to find out reaſons not onely to excuſe, but alſo to approve this bold attempt: yet I find it ſo enormous, ſo contrary to the law of nature, ſo injurious to the inviolable Majeſty of Kings, that my pen paſſes over it with horrour and cannot chooſe but condemn it, not onely with the Law of God that deteſts it, but with the heavens themſelves which hid the Sun ſeventeen dayes together, veiled themſelves with darkneſſe, and wept for the inhumanity of that crime. Yet I rather believe that which Cardinall Baronius hath written, that his mother never conſented to the making of him blind, although ſhe had given command to ſeize upon him, but that thoſe who feared the danger of that Commiſſion, wiſhed rather the death of him then the impriſonment.

But howſoever it came to paſſe, the Empreſſe took again the Government in hand, and ſeeing that in that great confuſion of affairs ſhe had need of a ſtrong prop, ſhe ſought for, by an expreſſe embaſſage, allyance and a marriage with Charlemagne, which was not any way diſreliſhed, ſeeing all that had paſſed failed not to be coloured with fair pretences, and for that purpoſe ſent back Embaſſadours to her to end the buſineſſe; but when they arrived at Conſtantinople, they found that Nicephorus one of the Grandees of the Eaſt an hypocrite and a traytor to the miſerable Irene, had already ſeized upon the Empire, and baniſhed her into the Iſle of Lesbos, where ſhe dyed ſoon after with the teſtimonies of a ſtrong repentance, and a perfect diſengagement from all worldly things. Yet this new Uſurper knowing that our Charles had already been Proclaimed Emperour in the Weſt, treated him with great ſubmiſſions, not for the love of his perſon, but for the fear of his credit, and of his Arms.

Behold how Providence diſpoſed buſineſſes in the Eaſt to make him mount upon the Throne of the Ceſars, ſhe permitted alſo in the Weſt ſtrange revolutions, and abominable accidents, out of which by her extream wiſdome and goodneſſe ſhe extracted good for the advancement of this Monarch. After the death of Adrian the Pope, Leo the Third was ſet in Saint Peters chair, but his Predeceſſours Nephews, that ſaw that the Pontificate had taken another viſage ſince the city of Rome had been delivered from the chains of the Lombard, and that it began to be protected, and courted even by Kings themſelves, were very liquorous after it, ſo that bearing an enraged envie to the promotion of Leo, they did in the heart of Chriſtianity that which one would have horrour to commit in the ſalvage deſerts of the Scythians and Tartarians. The arms of the City being in their hands, they take an infamous band of murtherous Souldiers, ſet upon the Pope in Rome, in full day, in the middeſt of a Proceſſion, they ſeize themſelves of his perſon, in an aſtoniſhment that put all the world to flight, and after they had laden him with wounds, and covered him with bloud, they put out his eyes, and cut off his tongue, ſhutting him up in cloſe priſon.

But God having heard him by miracle, inſpired alſo a generous reſolution into ſome brave Cavaliers to pluck him out of that Captivity, which they did by an happy and magnanimous attempt, ſo that Leo got him to the City of Spoletum, and in time recovered France the ordinary refuge of the afflicted Popes. The King with all his Kingdome bearing as much compaſſion to his miſery, as veneration to his Dignity, cauſed him every where to be received with great honours, and when he was arrived near his perſon, he rendred him all reſpects and favours poſſible ſo far as to enterprife an expedition to Rome to re-eſtabliſh him in his ſeat. The Parricides that had ſo ill uſed him, fail'd not to colour with Reaſon, that which they had done with fury, and accuſed the Pope Leo of divers crimes upon which they deſired that one ſhould hear a Councell. But the Biſhops aſſembled ſpake aloud, that the higheſt throne could not be judged by any one, and that this buſineſſe of neceſſity ought to be left to the judgement of God alone.

Whereupon the Pope mounting into an high and eminent Place, to be perceived of the King that was preſent, and of the whole Aſſembly, ſaid, that of his own good will, without any obligation, and without prejudice to his dignity, he was come to juſtifie himſelf, and thereupon called the living God with his holy Angels, and all the Hoſt of Heaven for witneſſes of his innocence which he confirmed by a ſolemn oath, terrible even to the moſt ſhameleſſe of perjured men. Every one ſaw that ſincerity and innocence ſpake by his mouth, and all the ſtanders by threw themſelves down and proſtrated themſelves before him, with cryes of joy and incomparable approbations of his Holineſſe, a-vouching him for the true and lawfull ſucceſſour of Saint Peter. There was nothing now remaining as it ſhould ſeem, but to cut in pieces the Homicides that had ſo outrageouſly dealt with him; but he inſtantly begged their pardon of the King, which was the cauſe that men were contented with their baniſhment that they might not trouble any more the publick quiet.

The Pope inſpired powerfully by God, and being not ignorant of the conſent of the Eaſt and Weſt for the Imperiall Dignity, which had been to our Charlemagne many years ſince, cauſed ſecretly a magnificent Diadem to be made, and taking the occaſion of a ſolemn day of Chriſtmas, and of a great Ceremony put it upon the head of the King, who was praying upon his knees, when he dream't not of it, and before a great aſſembly of all the parts of Chriſtendome proclaimed him Emperour. This action was approved with an univerſall conſent, and followed with ſo ſtrong acclamations of the people, that it ſeemed that the letters of that Election had been ſent from Heaven. Nicephorus who reigned in the Eaſt, oppoſed not himſelf againſt it, but being contented to poſſeſſe that which he had uſurped, abandoned willingly to Charles's pleaſure the Empire of the Weſt. And there was no doubt but that if Charles his moderation had not at that time planted limits to his happineſſe, he might with one hand have held the Weſt, and extended the other over the Eaſt, it being moſt eaſie for him to put by an uſurper, fearfull, and ſhaking, and yet troubled with the image of his crime.

In fine, our Charles entred into ſo high a point of veneration, that he ſeemed to be amongſt Kings that which Kings are amongſt private men. There was none amongſt the ſovereign Powers on Earth that did not deſire his friendſhip or his Protection. Aaron King of Perſia ſent him his Embaſſadours, and rich preſents, offering him the Keyes of the City of Jeruſalem, and of the holy Sepulchre to diſpoſe of them according to his will. Amyras King of the Sarrazins of Fez in Africa, and Idnabala King of Sarragoſſa in Spain, ſought in like manner the honour of his favour; Cagan King of the Avares put himſelf under his protection. Eardulph King of the Northumbrians was re-eſtabliſhed by him in his Dominion. Hemingue King of Denmark rendred to him his homages. Achaic king of Scots ſubmitted himſelf unto him. All Nations repoſed themſelves under the ſhadow of his Sceptre, whileſt this great Monarch was as the compaſſe, which keeps one foot firm in the Centre, and with the other runs the round of the Circumference. He watched perpetually at home over his Empire, and provided abroad that nothing ſhould ariſe to trouble his repoſe.

He was not ſo attentive to the affairs of war as not to give continuall order to that which concerned the Government of the State, and as not to make divers Rules for the good of Eccleſiaſticall and Secular buſineſſes. He cauſed five Councels to be held in the Cities of Mayence, of Reims, of Chalons, of Tours, and of Arles. He cauſed the Hereſie of Felix Biſhop of Urgel in Spain to be condemned. He wrote himſelf in the Latine tongue moſt excellent ordinances which he intituled the Capitularies. He cauſed great care and induſtry to be had in the correction of the Holy Writ that had been altered by ignorance or by Hereſie.

He ceaſed not to ſet times apart for pious works, giving great alms in all places, and keeping a ſecond Table for twelve poor people near his own, which he enterteined with the victuals as his own Perſon. He founded many Monaſteries, and built as many Churches as there are letters in the Alphabet.

God that would accompliſh in all points the happineſſe of this Monarch gave him a great age in a ſtrong Body, and a ſound health, Bleſſed him alſo with a numerous poſterity, and let him ſee his children in a maturity that rendred them already capable of the Government of Empires. So he cauſed his ſon Lewis to be Crowned after a generall conſent of his Eſtates, and appeared on that day like a Phenix which is ſaid to receive a new life from his own aſhes. He walked to the Church in an high Equipage held up by his ſon, and followed by all the Aſſembly, and having prepared upon the high Altar a Crown, after he had made a long and fervent prayer, proſtrated before God with his dear Lewis, he put the Crown upon his head, and ſaid to him,

My dear ſon, It is to day that I dye to the Empires of the World, and that Heaven makes me be born again in your Perſon. If you will reign happily, fear God which is the ſource of Empires, and the Sovereign Father of all Dominions; keep his Commandments, and cauſe them to be obſerved with an inviolable fidelity. Take the care and the Protection of his Church. Love your young brothers and your ſiſters, rendring your ſelf good and officious to your Kindred. Honour the Church-men as your Fathers, cheriſh tenderly your ſubjects, as your children, and be all your life time the comforter and the Protectour of the Poor. Chaſtiſe the vicious, and recompenſe the men of merit. Eſtabliſh not Governments, Judges, and Officers which are not capable and without reproch, and when you have eſtabliſhed them, deprive them not of their charges without a moſt juſt cauſe. Serve firſt of all for an example to all the world, and lead before God and Man a life irreprochable.

After this action he ſtayed about a year longer in the world, purifying continually his ſpirit by repentance, by good works, and by the contemplation of heavenly things. And when he ſaw himſelf infected with an extraordinary ſickneſſe, he cauſed immediately the Sacraments to be adminiſtred to him, and dyed with a moſt pious and moſt exemplary death, at the age of ſeventy two years, the fourty ſeventh of his reign, and the fourteenth of his Empire. His Corps were expoſed in publick, clothed after the manner of a King, with a ſword and the Goſpel which he had ſo glorioufly defended. Then he was interred with a ſtately Magnificence in the Church of Aix the Chappell which he had built.

He was univerſally lamented by all the world, as the Father of the Univerſe, and the ſingular ornament of Chriſtianity. The Pagans themſelves wept for him abundance of tears, ſo true it is, that the goodneſſe and ſweetneſſe of a King towards his ſubjects is a ray of God that renders him lovely in his life, and gives ſplendour even to his aſhes after his death. He was afterward Canonized by Paſchal that was not a lawfull Pope, but foraſmuch as the true ſucceſſours of Saint Peter never retracted that action; He is held for a Saint, and honoured publickly in the Church with the approbation of all ages.

Saint LEVVIS.

I Do not forget that I have already spoken of Saint Lewis in the first Tome, but because that was by accident, and by the way, I will here extend my thoughts somewhat more largely, and give you a more compleat Elogium of him.

It is very true that an Antient saith, That great Goodnesse is seldome joyned with great Power; and that well-accomplished Kings are so few in number, that their names might be comprehended all together within the circumference of a Ring. But I may add, that if God did take delight to carry this Ring in very deed, as the Scripture doth attribute it to him in an Allegory, and if he would engrave there the names of all the good Kings, that of great S. Lewis would possesse the first place.

This Monarch was so like unto virtue, that if it should have shewed it self on the one side incarnate to mortall eyes, and Saint Lewis on the other, one should hardly have been able to judge, which had been the Copy, and which the Originall.

It is not my intention to write of his life here, upon which so many excellent pens have laboured very fortunately, but to make a reflexion upon some principall points of his Government. Great things do not alwayes cause themselves to be known by a multitude, or great variety of discourse, but oftentimes by draughts abbreviated. And no man in my opinion ought to conceive amisse of this, seeing that we measure every day the greatnesse of the Sun by the shadow of the earth, and his goings in the Dyals by a little thread. I know that heretofore three lines onely represented upon a Table did set forth an Idea of the perfection of the excellentest Painter in the world, in the understanding of the skilfull; and I will draw here three little draughts for to set before your eyes the beauty and bigneſse of the virtues of S. Lewis.

In one word, he hath done three mervellous things, whereof the first is, that he found out the means to joyn the wisedome of State with that of the Crosse.

The second, that he hath planted humility upon Sceptres, where it hath ordinarily very slippery footing; and hath likewise placed it amongst the Rubies and Diamonds of the Crown, where its lustre is often darkened by the too stately glittering of the World.

A third is, that he hath joyned the devotion of one consecrated to Religion to the courage of the Alexanders and Cesars.

The first marvel, the joyning of the wisdom of State with the Gospel. Tert. Apol.

As for that which concerns the first conjunction, it is so rare that Tertullian, who flourished two hundred years after the Nativity of our Lord, when as yet there had no speech been of any Emperour that had embraced Christianity, said, That if the Cesars should become Christians, they would cease to be Cesars; and if the Christians should become Cesars, they would cease to be Christians. He conceived, that poornesse of spirit could not agree with so high and stately riches, nor humility with a sovereign Empire, or the tears of Repentance with the delights of the Court; that the hungring and thirsting after righteousnesse could not stand with the desire of Conquests; nor pitifulnesse with Arms, nor pureneſse of heart with the conversing with most pleasing beauties, nor peace would consist with the licentiousnesse of warre, and suffering persecutions with an absolute power to revenge one's self: And nevertheleſse Saint Lewis alone hath found means to joyn things together which seem so contrary in the highest degree that ever they were found to be in so Kingly an estate. Amidst the riches of a Kingdome so abundant; he was not rich, but onely towards the poor, and if God had permitted him he would have as willingly covered himself with the habit of Saint Francis, as with his Royall Purple. He did never consider himself otherwise amongst all the goods that he possessed, but as the Steward of Jesus Christ: he left unto God willingly the glory of having given them him, to needy persons the benefit of receiving them, and kept nothing to himself but the pains of distributing them. He assaid a thousand times to enter into Religious Orders, and yet still answer was made him, that God would have him to be King: he wore the Crown by way of obedience he used riches onely for necessity, and had no other thing in his desire then spiritual nakednesse, and a perfect unlooſing himself from all worldly things. In the midst of an Absolute power he was so meek that his heart seemed a Sea, where a calme perpetually reigned. The Scarlet of his attire did never colour his face with the heat of anger. Arrogance did never puff up his words; he made it his glory to communicate himself to the miserablest, and although he was higher then all the Cedars, yet he humbled his eyes even unto the smallest worms of the earth. If he appeared in publick with a splendour agreeable to his Dignity; in his retiring, he made his life a continuall Repentance which equalled the strictnesse of the severest Religious ones. The zeal of justice was so perfect in him, that he would not usurp a fingers breadth of land upon his neighbours, to the prejudice of his conscience, and his generousnesse cauſed him also to refuse the Empire which the Pope and all the Princes of Christendome offered him with a generall consent, after the deposing of the Emperour Frederick. The exercises of War did never stop up in his heart the pitifull bounties that were there towards the poor, not contenting himself to give them most liberally all that they could expect from his condition, but very often being ready at their hand to provide them with necessities for their life. Amidst the great tumults of war he was alwayes peaceable, never making any war but for necessity, or for zeal of the glory of God, but carrying throughout all places peace with an exceeding meekneſſe. His chastity amidst all the delights of so great a Realm was alwayes impenetrable by the darts of love; and his heart was like the bed of the Phenix, which takes no fire but from the Beams of the Sun. He was persecuted by the tongues of slanderers, by the arms of his kindred, by the chains and prisons of Infidels, by the ingratitude of those upon whom he had heaped good turnes, without having one least motion to revenge; rendring alwayes good for evil: and if justice did require of him reasonable punishment of the wicked, he paid the Tribute that Kings owe to the Sovereign Power, without ever altering the quietnesse of his mind, in such manner, as if you will judge rightly of that which I have said, you will find that S. Lewis hath brought the eight Beatitudes to the Court, and hath happily joyned the highest Maximes of the Gospel, to the Policy of a great Kingdome.

way

Nevertheleſſe, some one may make himself believe, that he was not sufficiently refined in the tenets of a great States-man, but that the exceſſiveneſſe of his devotion must needs mollifie somewhat the vigour of his understanding, and that the tenderneſſe of his conscience was incompatible with the Principles of those Politicians that are compleat in the managing of affairs. I entreat my reader to consider here the great errour of the Politick ones of the world, that will be wise without God, and believe that the Empires and Kingdomes of Christendome being founded in Piety and Justice can maintein themselves happily, and encrease by the subtleties and Maximes that are common amongst the Pagans and Mahometans. Let any one compare the Fredericks (Emperours) that flourished in the same age with Saint Lewis the King, let one weigh the Principles of the one and of the other, let him examine their proceedings, and look upon the succeſſe, and they shall find, that the honest wisdome of our King hath surpassed all the subtleties of those great brains, and that these lights have as far excelled those their false glances, as the eyes of the Eagles are far above those of the Owls.

The Fredericks aim was to look at themselves, to bring all to their own ends, to complain against the Pope, to contest with the Princes, to regard nothing but their own greatneſſe, to have nothing in esteem but their own interest, to measure the true and the false by their own profit, to keep Religion under the State, to think that a good conscience was an hindrance to great designs, and that there was nothing unjust of all that was profitable and glorious in appearance for so high a Monarchy, to employ all the subtilties and all rigour that might obtein their purposes, to beat down all that they might raiſe themselves, and to ruine all to make themselves great. Saint Lewis on the contrary cauſed the glory and interest of God to march at the head of his actions, esteemed himself little, prised the benefit of the publick above all things, honoured the Pope with a singular reverence, enterteined as much as he could Peace with the Princes of Christendome, never undertook any thing to the prejudice of his conscience, would not buy a Kingdome with the smallest lye, made every thing serve for Religion, valued nothing great that was not just, nothing glorious that agreed not with equity, and measured all by the law of God, and the benefit of his subjects.

If it be true which our Saviour saith, That we should judge of men by their deeds and by the fruits of their actions; who sees not that those men with their refined politick Maximes did very ill govern themselves, seeing that after so generall a dissipation of bloud, of men and of wealth, they buried their fortunes in the ruines of the publick? And this man with his honesty, which others do take for simplicity, did free himself happily from civill warrs, frustrated the subtleties of the craftiest, brought to the ground the strength of the mightiest, securing his Crown and Sceptre in the hands of a woman against the enterprises of men subtle and interressed. He made forreign warres for the pure glory of God, without oppressing his people. He governed his Kingdome in Peace, in Piety, in Justice, and in the abundance of all things, leaving a large posterity which sits even yet upon the chief thrones of Christendome.

May we not well affirm that this Prince was indued with marvellous wisedome, seeing that he knew God the fountain of all Essences, and judged of all things according to the rules of the eternall Truth? From this fountain there ran down in his soul two Rivulets, which were the great contempt that he had of the world, and the perfect union which he had with God, which poured forth a vigorous influence upon all his undertakings. From hence came that good choise that he took for the ordering of his life, mingling contemplation with action, which were as two sisters mutually helping each other. It happens sometimes to men, that some are carryed away with the world, and others flying from it, carrie it along with them. The one let themselves runne with the torrent of corruptions, the other retiring themselves to solitarineſſe carry with them all their worldly affections which do but sleep, and cast forth still sparkles under the ashes. But Saint Lewis being within the world, was nothing lesse then of the world, seeing that amidst the meeting with so many people which encompassed him every day, he built himself a desart in his heart, and in the midst of a great sea of affairs, he lived as the fishes that are silent in the roarings of the waves, and keep themselves fresh amidst the briny waters.

The sweet familiarity that he had with his Redeemer, did not steal from him the care of his employments, and government of his Kingdome, seeing that alwayes like the beams of the Sun, he touched the earth without leaving heaven.

The second marvell of S. Lewis, is to have lodged humi-humility upon the glittering ſplendour of his Diadem, and to have preſerved this place for it, amongſt all the occaſions which might invite him to make uſe of his greatneſſe. One may avouch that this virtue in what place ſoever it is found, is alwayes great, and S. Paul juſtly calls it, the virtue of Jeſus Chriſt by excelleney: but when it mingles it ſelf with the eſtate of great ones, it carries away the admiration of mankind. We are all born with the deſire of honour, and this appetite deviated from its proper excellence is found even in the loweſt perſons. In the age paſt, there was found in India a people called the Verrais, of ſo groſſe an underſtanding, and uncomely in body, which lived ſo baſely that they ate nothing but roaſted Ants and Crocodiles tails, and nevertheleſſe they were ſo proud, that when they ſpake to them of baptizing them, they asked if they ſhould be baptized in the ſame water with other people, and if they would have no reſpect to their quality. If preſumption doth take ſuch hold on ſuch baſe ſouls, I leave it to you to conſider what effect it might have on thoſe that are lifted up in all qualities above the common ſort. There is no doubt that ambition ruleth over all our actions, and that to ſee a Prince humble amidſt the flatteries of the Court, modeſt with an abſolute power, victorious over vanity in the midſt of the great mortifying of truth, which comes into the cabinet of Kings, like money into their coffers with very much diſguiſing and diminution, is a wonder almoſt as rare as if one ſhould ſee the ſtars to walk on the earth.

The second marvel, the union of humility and royall greatneſſe.

And nevertheleſſe, S. Lewis, as he had very great wiſdome and a perfect knowledge of the life of man, was a ſoul the moſt humble, the moſt meek and moſt amiable that ever converſed amongſt men in the like eſtate. Princes have had at all times a high ambition to carry in their titles great names. There are ſome which have cauſed themſelves to be called the brethren of the Sun, and coſens to the Starrs, others would be the Arms, the Eyes, the Rubies of the World, and ſome the Saviours and the Gods: but our Monarch named himſelf Lewis of Poyſey the humble ſervant of Jeſus, accounting it, that the higheſt greatneſſe of a Sceptre was to ſerve God. Hence he deſired nothing ſo ardently, in all his behaviour, as to humble himſelf before God, by a perfect examination, without retaining any thing more of himſelf then this high point of humility. When he entred into Damiata, the firſt town that he conquered in his voyage to Egypt, he cauſed not himſelf to be carried in a charriot drawn with Lyons or Elephants as the Roman Captains uſe to do, but he cauſed the croſſe to march before him, and followed it with a bare head and naked feet. And when at the Councell of Lyons they ſpoke of giving him the name and quality of an Emperour, he avoided that honour like a tempeſt, and choſe rather the extremity of ſufferings amongſt the Sarazens, then to aſcend into the throne of the Ceſars. He carried his Royalty as it were a mountain on his back, and there was no greater ſervitude in the world to him, then his greatneſſe. When he could free himſelf of the neceſſary ceremonies in publick for a perſon of his quality, and that he had full liberty to converſe with inferiour ones, he was as a fiſh in his water. This wiſe humility cauſed that he entertained the whole world, every one according to his degree with great conſideration. He honoured the Queen his mother all his life time with a reſpect which approched near to reverence. He was wonderfully-kind to all his kindred, and courteous to all thoſe that came to him, which he did without ceremonies, without conſtraint, but with an unparralleld cordialneſſe, for that his humility was rooted in a deep charity which gave all the motions to his ſoul. He walked oftentimes in publick in a plain garment of chamlet, and if he had ſeen the riot that now reigns in our behaviour, he would have taken our converſation for ſome Maſcorade. He converſed not onely with the plaineſt, but abaſed himſelf continually even to the feet of the poor, and that the moſt ill favoured. He was ſeen to bow himſelf, and to make clean the ulcers of the leprous ſo horrible, that people caſt bread to them afar off, not any one daring to come near them. He was ſeen in the champians of Aſia and Africa, to ſeek out the bodies of his poore Subjects all ſtinking with corruption, to bury them with his royall hands. O what a triumph of humility is here! O what ardency of charity! and where is it that God can place the condemnation of our pride and hardneſſe of our hearts more high, then upon the perſon of this great King?

The third marvel his devotion and courage.

Laſtly, the third miracle that we obſerve in the life of S. Lewis, is that he hath joyned the devotion of the moſt perfect religious ones, with the courage of the moſt invincible conquerours. Here it is that I do chalenge all thoſe brave ones in appearance, all thoſe Phantaſmes of valour, for to teſtifie unto them, that S. Lewis was one of the moſt valiant and moſt courageous Princes that ever bore Sceptre in Chriſtendome. For where is valiantneſſe placed, according to Ariſtotle, if it be not conceived in the underſtanding? and if it tend not to virtuous actions, would you that I ſhould account it an action of courage and ability to hew men in pieces, and to fill the world with maſſacres, for to content the rage, for to nouriſh an ambition, or ſatisfie a revenge? God forbid that we ſhould judge ſo baſely of a virtue that makes them demigods. If the intentions thereof be not right, if the actions thereof be not juſtifiable, if its effects be not commendable, it is a ſpirit that ſeduces us, and not a perfection that rectifies us.

The valour of S. Lewis was the effect of a lively faith, of an incomparable wiſedome, of a ſtrong and puiſſant charity; faith filled him with confidence, wiſdome with moderation, and charity with boldneſſe. This valour was enlivened by three loves, which the Divines do obſerve, which are, the love incomparable, the love ardent, and the love indefatigable. The love incomparable, cauſed him to forſake a great and flouriſhing kingdome, (filled with peace, contentments, and delights, where he might have lived under the ſhadow of his Palm-trees in all happineſſe,) to tranſport himſelf into the land of the Sarazens, and there to ſuffer all the inconveniencies of nature. The ſame love cauſed him to carry the Queen his wife young and tender, amongſt ſo many foming rocks, ſo many ſeas, ſo many monſters, and ſo many tempeſts. The ſame love perſwaded him to embark the Princes his children in their tender age in this voyage, conceiving that he ought not to ſpare any thing which the ſervice of God might require. The ardent love cauſed him to expoſe his Royall perſon, not onely to wearineſſe but to the moſt dangerous blows of battels. There is a certain jealous ſtrictneſſe of judgement, in the underſtanding of men, which would not that any one perſon ſhould be excellent in the degree of Sovereignty in two illuſtrious qualities. The reputation of Arms took away the high title of eloquence from Julius Ceſar, and we may ſee that S. Lewis contented himſelf with his rare devotion, without taking that high part that he deſerved in valour. But this is the truth that he was courageous, heroicall, and valiant above all thoſe brave ones whom the opinion of men do often deifie without very much deſert. Together with all his devotion, he ſeemed to have obliged himſelf to take up Arms againſt his enemies, even from his tendereſt infancy. He made wars both by ſea and land in Europe, Aſia, and Africa. He was ſet upon in his minority by the neighbouring Princes, and by the greateſt Lords of his State, from which he freed himſelf, both by wiſedome and valour, marching forth into the field, with the assistance of God, and good counsell of his Mother. He disarmed Philip his Uncle by courtesie, the English by force, he vanquished the inconstancy of Theobald by his stedfastnesse, and the self-conceitednesse of Peter de Drues by his patience. After he had pacified his kingdome, he undertook the Holy War, by a pious generousnesse of heart, in the which he shewed marvellous valiantnesse of his person.

Joinville that was present saith that he stoutly ventured himself into the hotteſt conflicts of the battalions, and fought fiercely with his own hand, scattering and overthrowing the Sarazens that opposed his enterprises. They speak much of the valour of Attila, that visiting a certain place, was set upon by two souldiers that had a purpose to kill him, and escaped both the one and the other by his valour and mention. But S. Lewis on a day having gone aside from the Army, was set upon by six whom he put to flight by a victorious resistance. When they were in some doubt about going a shore in his first voyage to Africa, he was the first that threw himself upon the Coast of the Enemies with his sword in his hand without any amazement, although he was up to the neck in water. When he was seen at the beginning of the battel arrayed in his Royall arms, he appeared like a Sun to the whole Army, but as soon as he began to enter into the fight, he was like a lightning that made a wonderfull flashing upon the Infidels, together with all the misfortune of the time, wherewith he was overborn: he took the great and famous City of Damiata in his first voyage, he discomfited the Sarazens in two battels, he fortified four great places in Syria, he compell'd the Emmiers of Egypt to restore him his prisoners, he provided for the safety of all the Christians that were remaining in Palestine. In his second voyage, he vanquished at the first onset the Africans, which had antiently made Italy, Greece, and Spain to tremble, and had so long time disputed for the Empire of the world with the Romans, and if he had not been hindred by sickneſſe, he had forthwith made himself master of Thunis and Carthage.

Behold what this ardent love did by his hands. But the love indefatigable, the true and faithfull character of a great stoutnesse of courage, caused him not to be amazed at any thing, and that he continued with an invincible magnanimity, under the most burthensome accidents that contraried his enterprises. This love caused him to make tryall of another voyage, after the sad accidents of the first: this love caused that the seas filled with terrours, the Lands with Ant-heaps of Sarazens formed into Batalions, the air that seemed from every part to let fly arrows of pestilence, the wayes which were full of toyles, the wars of terrours and massacres, the encounters of evil successe, and the champions of a million of divers kinds of death, never altered the constancy of his invincible heart. The very day of his captivity, after he had lost a great battel which overthrew all his affairs, when as he saw the wayes covered with the dead bodies of his servants, when he saw the river Nilus smoaking and bubling up the French blood, when as the arrows of the Sarazens did fly round about his head, like the hail on a winters day, when as he was taken and carried to the Aunt of the Sultan, and that he heard the clamours of those outrageous mouths, that he saw so many infernall faces that might shake a soul of the stoutest temper, he remained still in a great tranquility of mind, and asked his page for his book of prayers, which being ready he began to perform the duty of his Orazons, which he presented every day to God, with as quiet a spirit as if he had been returned from taking a walk in his gardens. The very day that he was seased upon by the pestilence, he beheld death coming upon him with a settled countenance, he disposed of the affairs of his kingdome and of his house, with a great judgment, gave very excellent instructions to the princes children, comforted all his good servants, strengthened himself with the Sacraments, entred into extasies of divine love, which drove out of his heart all the cares of this present life. The poor Prince sooner failed of his life then he could fail of his constancy and faithfulnesse to his high virtue.

It is here, O Providence, that you cover with a canopy of the night and darkneſſe the great events of the affairs of the world, it is here that we acknowledge your government. This Prince so wise, so humble, so holy, which deserved that the world should bend under his laws, and to have constrained good fortune to fly no where but about his colours, in the mean while was handled by you, as it seems to many not like to an indulgent mother, but as by a step-mother severe and rigorous. Alas! the Lands have often undertaken the yoke, and the seas have spread their back with coverlids by a pleasing calmneſſe under the arms and vessels of Pirates. Was there none but this Monarch to whom all creatures ought to have served as a defence, that could deserve to be so evil handled at your hands? In the first of his expeditions he lost his liberty, and in the second, his life. What is the meaning of this, O Providence? draw the courtain a little, uncover your secrets, and unceil our eyes to behold them.

She answereth, that the generall truth hath revealed to us in the Gospel his judgements on this point, when he said to the Jewes which were come to take him, behold your hour, and the power of darkneſſe. It is true, that by a certain order of God, and for causes very reasonable, well known to his Providence, the evil spirits have their reign and their time, which good men are not able to hinder, no more then the winter and the night, and that the sovereign Creatour and Governour of all things hath limited their powers and their endurings by certain celestiall periods, which being not yet come to an end, do make all the endeavours which can be used to destroy them unprofitable. This is the cause why there is not taken in hand with such eagreneſſe as might be, wars in the East and Africa, nor that we should undertake great designs against the powers of darkneſſe, if we cannot see by very evident conjectures, that God directs us as by the hand. Nevertheleſſe, as he reveals not alwayes to his Saints the times and seasons of Empires, it happens, that those that with great zeal, and very rationall prudence, do embark themselves in generous designs to advance the glory of God, should not justly alwayes be commended even in the default of good successe. And I may very well say that the most glorious action of S. Lewis was his prison and his death: For, to kill the Sarazens, to make mountains of dead bodies, rivers of bloud, to overthrow Cities all in a smoke; this is that which Chamgy and Tamerlan have done. But to do that which S. Lewis hath done, it is it which hath no compare, it is that which the Angels would do willingly, if they could merit it by a mortall body. God which had drawn him from his Kingdome with the faith of Abraham, which had lead him through so many dangers with the guiding of Moses, gave him in the end to seal up his great actions the patience of Job. And to countreballance that which the world esteems mishap, he would have him to govern a great Kingdome a long time, with an high wisdome, and profound peace, an exact justice for the good and repose of his people, and an incredible sweetneſſe of spirit, which hath made him the most amiable of all Kings on the earth, and a great Saint in Paradise, by the consent of all mortals, and the Universall approbation of the Church.

JUDITH

JUDITH. HESTER.

EXpect nothing Feminine in this Woman, all in her is Male, all in her is Generous, all in her is full of Prodigies. Nature hath put nothing in her but the Sex, she hath left to Virtue to make up the rest, who after she had laboured a long time in this her Master-piece, incorporated her self in her work. Never was beauty better placed then upon this face, which bears a mixture of Terrour and of Love: Lovely in its Graces, Terrible in its Valour. What a Court-Lady is this, that came thither for nothing but to draw the sword? Her hand did much by destroying an 100000 men in one onely head; but her eye did much more then her hand: it was that, that first triumphed over Holophernes, and with a little ray of its flames burnt up a whole army. O what a magnificent employment had Love in this act of hers! and to say truth, he consecrated his arrows; never was he so innocent in his Combats, never was he so glorious in his Triumphs.

Represent to your selves a Nabuchodonozor in the flower of his age, in the vigour of his Conquests, holding a secret Councel wherein he makes a resolution to subdue the World. After a short conclusion of an affair so great, he calls Holophernes, and commands him to march towards the West with an Army of 100000 Foot, and 12000 Horse. All the Captains assemble themselves together, and in all places souldiers swarm. It seems that that brave Generall did nothing but give a stamp with his foot to procreate armed men. Behold him already invironed with Legions all glittering with fire and flames; his Army is on foot with an horrible Artillery of military Engines, and a great preparation of Victuall and Ammunition. It seemed that heaven looked upon this Host with affrightment, and that the earth ecchoed at every step under the clattering of its Arms. The motions of it give terrour to the stoutest sort, and confusion to the weaker; before it marches Noyses, Affrights, and Threats; after it, Weepings, Ruins, and Desolations.

Holophernes is in the middle as a Gyant with an hundred arms, which promises to himself to demolish smoaking Cities, to overthrow Mountains, and to beat all Arms to powder with the lightning of his eyes. Ambassadours of all Nations are seen waiting at his gate, who present unto him Crowns, who offer him Tapers and Incense, desire peace and mercy of him, and beseech him to grant them servitude. But this supercilious Generall would march upon the heads of men, and make himself a river of Bloud to water therewith his Palms.

Fame that publishing with an hundred mouthes the wasts that that Army made on all sides, failed not to fly unto Jerusalem, and to carry that sad newes unto the people of God. Nothing was then heard but the sighs and groans of a scared people, who beholding that furious Tempest coming afar off, had neither heart nor arms to oppose themselves against it. Their courages were dismaied, their hands weak, their tongues mute; they had no other defence but their tears which they powred out in abundance to begin the funeralls of their dear Countrey.

Manasseh reigned at that time in Jerusalem, seven hundred years before the Nativity of our Lord, who seeing no expedient to divert this misery, abandoned himself to silence, and to darknesse. But Joachim the High Priest, executing a Captains office together with a Priests, encouraged his poore people, and wiped off their tears to make them see the first ray of hope which they conceived of their dear Liberty.

He dispatches Posts to all parts, and commands the cities that were menaced with the marches of that army to contribute all that they were able of Money, Iron, Men, and Victuals to beat back the common Enemy, and above all to prepossesse themselves of the streights of the mountains, to stop up the passages, where a few men would be able to do much, rather then to expect them in the champain, where so great forces would swallow up all that could be opposed against them.

After this he commands publick prayers to be made, where the Altar of God was covered with sackcloth, and the Priests with hair-cloth, all the people were at their supplications, tears, and fastings, even the children proſtrated themſelves on the earth, and cryed to implore the mercy of God.

This excellent High-Prieſt not being ignorant that with Piety we ought to move the hand, contented not himſelf onely to weep before the Altar, but viſited in perſon the Cities and the Burghs, conforting the afflicted, ſtirring up the ſlack, ſtrengthening the weak, and doing that which the infuſion of the ſoul doth in the Body, in giving life and vigour to all the members of the State.

The newes comes to Holophernes, that the Jews prepared themſelves to make reſiſtance to his Army, whereat he entred into great fits of choler, and called the Princes of the Ammonites and of the Moabites that were in his army with him, to know what forces that people might have that were diſpoſed to make an oppoſition. Then Achior Prince of the Ammonites roſe up, and made him a long narration of the originall and qualities of the Jews, telling him by piece-meal how that Nation came from the Chaldeans, and ſeparated themſelves from them by reaſon of Religion, deſpiſing all the Gods of the Gentiles, and believing but one God the Maker of Heaven and Earth. He added how they went into Egypt when there was a great famine, and that they were there ſo exceedingly multiplyed, that they began to give terrour to the Egyptians, who ceaſed not to torment them. But that God revenged their injuries by horrible plagues from Heaven, that made havock of all Egypt, ſo that their Land-lords were conſtrained to let them go whitherſoever it ſeemed good unto them.

But Pharaoh the King having made a reſolution to purſue them, and to deſtroy them utterly, was buried with all his Army in the red-Sea, through which that people had paſſed on dry-foot. From thence they journeyed through the barren deſerts of Arabia, where their God miraculouſly nouriſhed them, giving them food from heaven, and commanding the Rocks to open to them ſprings and fountains. Furthermore he adverti-ſed Holophernes that when things were well between their Maſter and them, they were invincible, which viſibly appeared by the victories they obteined over the Amorites, the Jebuſites, and the Pereſites, and other Nations, which they had devoured as fire would do the chaff; poſſeſſing themſelves of their Lands, and eſtates. But if it happened that they were defiled with ſome iniquity, there was nothing more weak then they by reaſon that they were then forſaken of heaven, and left to their own ſelves: and therefore he adviſed him not to hazard any thing againſt them, before he knew the condition wherein they were at preſent, becauſe that if they were well united to the Deity which they worſhiped, he ſhould carry away nothing but confuſion.

Holophernes Captains hearing Achiors diſcourſe, loaded him with reproches, for that he had ſo much as a thought that ſo ſmall an handfull of people, and ill trained, ſhould be able to reſiſt a Royall Army of Nabuchadonoſors. The Generall holds him for a mad man, and commands him to be delivered to the Jews, ſince he was a Jew in heart and affection. And indeed, the ſouldiers having taken him and bound him to a tree, left him to the diſcretion of thoſe of the City of Bethulia, who carryed him away, and having preſented him to the Prieſts that governed, and to all the Aſſembly of the City, enquired of him of all that had paſſed about him. He ſtraightway made them a long diſcourſe, and exalted the Teſtimonies that he had given to the Majeſty of their God, whereat all betook themſelves to weep for joy, and praiſed the Divine Goodneſſe, proſtrating themſelves on the ground, and promiſing all favour to their Priſoner.

In the mean while Holophernes cauſes his Troops to advance to ſurprize the little Bethulia; but he ſaw himſelf combated by men inviſible, hidden in the mountains, that much gauled his Army, being coop'd up in very narrow paſſages. His Captains counſelled him not to torment his ſouldiers unprofitably, but to ſeize onely upon the Channels of the fountains that carryed the water to the City, and that would be a means to take it without putting himſelf to much trouble. This was performed, and it proved very effectuall; for the people ſeeing themſelves deprived of the commodities of thoſe fair ſources that gave them drink, begin to murmur aloud againſt the Prieſts, who by their raſhneſſe had reſiſted ſo prodigious a power, againſt the example of ſo many Nations, and cry out that they were better render themſelves to the Aſſyrians, then ſee their wives and children buried in the ſame tomb. Oziæ in the abſence of Joachim appeaſed them by his tears, and cauſed them to reſolve on a patience of five dayes.

This City of Bethulia had within the circuit of its walls a great Treaſure, whoſe merit it was not yet ſufficiently acquainted with. It was the valorous Judith, in whom Heaven had put rare qualities, and God had choſen her to give ſafety to her countrey. She was of an high extraction, of the Tribe of Reuben, three years and an half a Widow, beautifull even to perfection, of a chaſtity and reputation inviolable, extream rich, but above all, devout and virtuous. Shee had built on the top of her houſe a little Solitude whither ſhe with her maids retired themſelves to be vacant to things Divine; there was her Oratory, there her intercourſes with God, and from thence mounted to Heaven her prayers that carryed up the groans of her people even to the throne of the moſt High.

The holy Lady had her innocent fleſh loaden with a rough hair-cloth, faſted every day, except the Saturdayes, and the ſolemn feaſts that were amongſt the Jews, her heart was inflamed with an incredible zeal of the glory of God, and touched to the quick with the miſeries of her people.

When ſhe underſtood what had been reſolved on at the Aſſembly, and that the City was to be yielded in five dayes, if it had no other relief; ſhe ſpake to Oziæ the Prince of the people, and to the Prieſts that governed, and made them a moſt excellent advertiſement upon what had paſſed at their laſt convention. She told them, That it was to tempt God to preſcribe to him the time of his mercies, and not to expect it of his Providence; that it did not belong to men to diſpoſe of heaven, who are reſerved to the diſpoſall of their Sovereign Maſter; that they ought onely to think upon the performance of an exact repentance for the ſinnes of their life paſt, and imploring the divine clemency with the effuſion of tears, which well knew how to find a remedy to ſo great neceſſities. She made them underſtand that good men are neceſſarily proved by divers Tribulations, and that thoſe that bear them with patience are at laſt glorious before God; But thoſe that diſquiet themſelves and murmure, have no profit by their afflictions, and provoke wrath from on high that redoubles ſcourge upon ſcourge to puniſh their rebellion.

In the end ſhe perſwaded them, that ſeeing they were the Heads of the People, and that ſo many ſouls breathe not but by their breath, they would not fail to exhort them to a further patience. The principall men of the City were raviſhed with a mouth that ſpake ſo divinely, and the words that iſſued from ſo fair a ſource had a grace incomparable to ſubdue the moſt obdurate hearts. They all avowed that ſhe was a woman according to the heart of God, that had ſpoken worthily, and that there was nothing deficient in her discourse. But she submitted her self by a great humility to their judgements, and beseeched them to leave one of the city gates free for her to go out at that very night, accompanied with her servant, for she had some good work in her heart for the safety of her Countrey; and intreated, that it might be recommended to the prayers of the whole Assembly without curiously inquiring what it was that God would do by her means. Ozias answered her that she might go in peace, and that he prayed that her action might succeed to the good of the universall people.

and

Here perhaps may some men be astonished, that a woman should take the boldnesse to go and advise the Magistrates, and the Priests; and the severer sort of censurers will say, that by right Judith should have been sent home to her distaffe. They will alledge, that the Jews give every day thanks to God in their Prayers for that he had not made them be born Women. Antiently, they were placed in the Churches on the North side, from whence the Scripture makes all the evil of the world to come. Chrysologus hath also said, that woman was the Way of Death, the Title of the Sepulchre, and the Gate of Hell.

But this ought to be understood of those that follow the steps of the first of Women, and not the wayes of the chief of Virgins. Those who abandon themselves to luxury, to vanity, and to dissolute pleasures are no way fit for great affairs, being too delicate for labour, and too ambitious of honour. But many others that have taken pains in the regulating of their passions, have rendred great services to Kingdomes and Common-wealths. Rome had never been Rome without the Sabine women. The people of the North, by the report of Tacitus, have been governed in their Warres and in their Polities by women, professing that they perceived in them a certain prophetick and divine spirit. Plato in his Common-wealth hath judged them capable of Offices, their souls being of the same species or kind as men's. Wherefore then should we think it strange that God made use of a virtuous woman to counsel men, and to deliver her countrey?

Before she undertook that great work, she was a long time prostrated before God in her Oratory, with sackcloth upon her back, and ashes upon her head, saying, with an amorous heart,

My God, the God of my Fathers, to whom nothing is impossible, look down now upon the camp of the Assyrians with that eye of lightnings and of thunders that thou heretofore didst cast upon the army of Egyptians when they were buried in the bottom of the Sea. Let the same happen to those here that trust in their chariots of warre, in their spears, and in their swords, and know not that thou art the God of heaven that breakest in pieces the mighty Powers of the earth with one sole look of thine eyes: lift up that same arm that hath made it self renown'd from all antiquity by so many wonders, and tread under-foot all their strength by thine for ever dreadfull forces. Suffer them not to violate thy Temple, and to sack the House where thy Name is from all time invoked. Cause this barbarous Collonel, who promises himself our spoils, to be taken by me through the snares of his eyes, that his own Coutel-ax may divide his soul and body. Strike him with the grace that thy blessing shall make to flow upon my lips, and with the eloquence that it shall give to my speeches; animate my heart, and stiffen my arm to make that great blow that shall be thine, and carry away an eternall honour for having pulled down that Colossus by a woman's hand. Thy strength is not in the multitude of souldiers, nor in the valour of Cavaliers. It is not those proud warriours that ought to expect the succour of thy arm, but it is the Prayer of the humble that gains thy heart, and draws thy forces to their protection. God of the heavens, creatour of the waters, and the God of all nature, hear thy poor servant that presumes nothing but from thy mercy. Remember thy Covenant, give counsel to my heart, words to my mouth, and strength to my hands, for the defence of thy House; and that all the Nations of the habitable world may know, that there is not any other God but thee.

Such were the Arms and Engines of this excellent woman; such was the confidence she had in the God of hosts. After this Prayer, she rises from her Oratory, comes down from her chamber, and calls her maid to dresse her. She puts off the sackcloth, she washes her self, she perfumes her self, and quitting the mouming habit which she wore in her widow-hood, she puts on her gayest cloathing. The tresses of her long haits are combed out with a delicate hand, and her head covered with a stately tyre; her handsome body appeared a little taller by the favour of her patins; she hangs on her pendants at her ears; she puts on her bracelets, her chain of pearls, her rings, certain jewels made in form of flower-de-Lis's, and all her richest ornaments. It seemed that God took a pleasure that day to render her fairer then ever she had been, and that all the graces smiled in her countenance, because she had adorned her self through virtue and not through wantonnesse.

She caused her meat and drink to be carried by her maid, fearing to pollute her body with the viands of the Infidels; and instantly she went out of her house, and betook her self to the city gate where she found Ozias the Prince, together with the Priests, that were ravished with the lustre of her heavenly beauty. Yet no body curiously enquired whither she was going, but were contented to wish that God would make her designs successfull, that she might be one day the honour of Jerusalem, and that her name might be put in the rank of those great and holy souls that had rendred to God most renowned services. She departs out of the city, calling again upon the name of God, and reciting some prayers with her servant.

As she went down the mountain upon the break of day, the souldiers having perceived her, failed not to run to her, and seeing her so excellently beautifull, were at first dazled in their eyes more by the splendour of her visage then by the first rayes of the day that then was upon its birth. They inform themselves of her countrey, of her journey, and of her intentions, whereto she answered, that she was of Bethulia, and that she had that day forsaken that miserable city, that was obstinate in its misery, and that, for having resisted the triumphant legions of the Assyrians, deserved to be destroyed by the thunder-bolts of heaven and earth. That she would have no share in their crime no more then in their disastres; and that her desire was to present her self to Holophernes to reveal to him the secrets of the city, and to teach him the means how to take it without losing any of his men.

These men were ravished at the hearing of these discourses, and assured her that she had taken an excellent course to live in quiet, and in honour, and that she would be very welcome to their master of whom she should receive all possible courtesies.

Some men will marvel at all this proceeding of Judith: A woman so handsome and so capable to tempt men, to go into the midst of Souldiers without fearing to expose her modesty that was so dear to her, not considering that she kindled love, and that she was yet in the fair season of her years capable to admit that which she moved in others: Who had told her that the Assyrians would let her freely passe without attempting any thing upon her honour? What security could there be in a dissolute Militia, that propound to themselves the ravishing of women for a recompence of their toils? And suppose she had promised her self that in case she should be forced, her soul should remain incorruptible in the corruption of her body; yet sure an honest woman would hardly ever expose her body to the least affront, although it were to save a city.

If we consider all this according to man, it cannot be defended: but who should dare so to condemne that which was done by a manifest inspiration of God, and of her good Angel that lead her, as by the hand, and made her walk securely upon the tops of precipices, and kept her alwayes green as the Ivie in the ruines of old decayed walls?

With all this she was skilfull in the art of dissembling, and deceived those souldiers that took a singular pleasure to hear her talk. And who would make a scruple to speak words with two meanings to deceive an enemy in warre, and to save his life, seeing that some Divines and the Lawyers agree that there are deceits that are good and commendable, being done to a good end, and by lawfull means?

She was then conducted to the Generall Holophernes, whom she found seated on his Throne under a pavilion of gold and purple, all bestudded with emeralds, proud as a peacock that spreads in the sunne the mirrours of his tail, for which alone he seems to have been created. She suddenly prostrates her self on the earth, and makes him a reverence of civility, and not of adoration. He failed not to be taken with her at first sight, just as she had plotted, and to make of his eyes the snares of his soul.

Those that were about him began to say with admiration, that the Land that bore so handsome women, deserved to have no labour spared in its conquest. Holophernes caused her instantly to be raised up again, and because she feign'd that she had some fear, and that she was seiz'd with a profound reverence at the aspect of that great Generall of an Army, knowing well that he was vain, and that it would conduce much to surprise him. He speaks to her with an incomparable sweetnesse, assuring her that he was not so terrible as men would make him, and that since that he had had the Arms of that great Monarchy in his hands, he never did hurt to any one that rendred himself to the obedience of his Master; that he bore no ill will to her Nation, but that if they had reduced themselves to their duty, he would not have permitted so much as that a sword should have been lifted up against them. And therefore he desired to know from whence it came that she had forsaken her City and was come to his Camp.

Then that Lady holily-deceitfull began to speak to him after such a winning manner, that an hundred Holophernes's would have had work enough to defend themselves against such batteries of Love. She beseeched him to hear with attention, and to take her speeches in good part by which God would accomplish a great affair.

That she knew well that Nebuchadonozor had been chosen of God to be King of the whole world, and that all the puissance of his Monarchy was included in Holophernes, where it lived and triumphed magnificently for the safety of the good, and the chastisement of the wicked. That she was not so ignorant of humane things, as not to have heard of the Prudence and valour of an Holophernes, who hath the honour to be the onely man in the Kingdome of Nebuchadonozor that is arrived to so high a degree of Power, as that it cannot be equalled by any thing in the world, but by the goodnesse of his disposition: for he desires to be powerfull for nothing but to do good, and all the Provinces well know the good order that he hath put to all the businesses of the Realm. She declared to him, that she had heard of what had passed in Achiors person, and told him, that he truly discovered the weak spirit of her Nation, and that he might do good upon it at the present, now God was provoked against it, and had threatned by his Prophets to destroy it. And therefore they were all seized with an unspeakable affright, besides that hunger and thirst conspired together to their ruine, and they had taken a resolution to kill all the cattle to drink their bloud, and not to spare even the things consecrated to the divine Majesty, which is a sign of a manifest reprobation. And this was the reason that she had left that abominable city, and was come as a messenger from God to give him this advice. She added, that the God which she adored was very great, and that she would not fail to pray him to make known his will, and to tell her the time that he hath determined for the utmost misery of that unfortunate City, with intention to inform him of the news, that at last she might lead him even to the gates of Jerusalem, delivering up to him all that people as sheep without a shepherd, and that there should not be so much as a dog that should bark against him; it being very reasonable that men and beasts should submit themselves under a power so formidable, conducted by the hand of the most High, and by the orders of his Providence.

Holophernes that had already been taken by the Eyes, was now chained by the Ears with the sweetnesse and profit of that discourse. His heart was no more his own; he courts her, and promises her that her God shall be his God, and that he will make her great in the house of Nebuchadonozor, and renowned through all the earth. At the same instant he causes her to enter into the chamber where his treasures were, to shew her his Magnificence, and ordered what should be given her day by day from his own table for her diet. Whereto she answered, that it was not yet permitted her according to her Law to enter into a community of table with those that are of any other Religion but her own, and that providing for it, she had caused what was necessary for her to be brought with her. But when your provision comes to fail (sayes Holophernes) what shall we then do with you? She replyed that she hoped to accomplish the businesse that had brought her thither, before that her ordinary food should be all spent. Thereupon, he commanded that she should be conducted into a fair chamber to repose her self, but before she entred into it she desired a courtesie, which was, that she might go out before day to addresse her Prayers to the God she worshipped, according to her custome, and passe up and down in his Camp with all freedome, which was granted to her.

She went therefore in the silence of the night to wash her self in a secret fountain, that she might purifie her self from the commerce of those Infidels, and prayed God incessantly, that it would please him to prosper her design for the deliverance of her Countrey.

She had now passed four dayes in the Army watching an opportunity to execute that which she had projected, when Holophernes would needs entertain himself with mirth, and make a magnificent feast, to which he resolved to invite his guest, thinking good chear and jollity would dispose her to that which he had a mind to have of her. But because the Assyrians hold it a great dishonour for a man to make love to a woman, woman and not to win her, he would not hazard himſelf ſo much as to make an overture to her of ſuch a diſcourſe himſelf, but gave the Commiſſion of it to Vagoa the chief Gentleman of his chamber, who uſed to ſerve him in ſuch a buſineſſe. He failed not to make her know that ſhe was very farre in the favour of his Maſter, and that that very day he made a banquet, and deſired to ſee her in particular, and that ſhe ſhould take heed of making a ſcruple of obeying, for it was one of the greateſt honours that ſhe could receive in her whole life. He added, that ſhe ought a little to be merry, and paſſe away her time without engendring melancholy; ſhe underſtood well what he meant to ſay, and anſwered, that ſhe was wholly diſpoſed to obey his Lords commands, and would have no other will but his, and ſtraight way adorns and dreſſes her ſelf the moſt pleaſingly ſhe could, to wound him in the eyes, and ſo paſſes into her chamber.

As ſoon as he ſaw her alone and near him, his heart was totally overthrown, and it ſeemed that the lightning that iſſued out of the eyes of that beauty had cruſhed it to powder. His paſſion permitted him not to ſpeak much he was ſo much moved; he contented himſelf onely with inviting her to be merry, and aſſuring her that ſhe had gained his heart. The holy woman prayed him that it might ſeem good in his eyes, that ſhe might entertain her ſelf after her own faſhion, and that ſhe might eat of that which her ſervant had prepared for her, which he conſented to, being willing to leave her in a full liberty that he might not ſcare nor trouble her.

Now behold him the happieſt man in the whole world. He drinks with large draughts, makes himſelf exceeding merry and wonderfully pleaſant, whereat Judith expreſſed that ſhe had a great content to ſee him in ſo good an humour, and ſaid, that ſhe had cauſe to reckon in time to come that day for the happieſt of all her life. The other to pleaſe her drank ſo much the more, ſo that he made himſelf drunk with a dead drunkenneſſe. It appears plainly that this man was an honeſt hog, and took not the way to bring about his deſign, depriving himſelf of reaſon when he had moſt need of it. Vagoa that had the word does his office, brings his Maſter to bed, and gets him gone, ſhutting the door to leave him alone with Judith. All the ſervants had ſo well liquored themſelves that they deſired nothing but repoſe. Judith alone was well awake, and made a ſign to her ſervant to ſtay for her before the door and not to leave her.

She contemplates this brave Generall who was now in a dead ſleep; ſhe ſtands ſtill for a certain time by his beds ſide, praying God ardently in her ſilence that it would pleaſe him to accompliſh by her hand that great ſtroke that ſhe had deſtined. From thence ſhe goes to the pillar where Holophernes's Cimetre was hanged, and draws it boldly out of the ſcabbard, then layes hold of her man by his long hair, ſaying onely in her heart, My God, it is now, ſtrengthen my arm; and inſtantly having turned him for her beſt advantage, ſhe ſtrikes with a maſculine hand, and cuts off his head at two ſtrokes, carries away his pavilion, and tumbled down his body as a log. She gives ſuddenly his head to her waiting-woman, who puts it up in the ſame bag that ſhe had brought her victuals in, and both of them paſſe through the midſt of the Army without being ſtaid by any one by reaſon of the permiſſion that they had from the Generall Holophernes.

They come by night to the gate of the city, and cry afarre off to the Centinels, Open, God is with us that hath done wonders in Iſrael. They run to adverteſe Ozias, and the Prieſts, who come in haſte to receive her. All the city from the higheſt to the loweſt aſſemble themſelves about her, thinking that ſhe had been loſt, and looked upon her as a woman come from the other world. She cauſes inſtantly torches to be lighted, and gets her up into an high place from whence they were wont to make Orations to the people, and after ſhe had made a ſilence ſhe thus ſpake. Sirs, Praiſe God our Lord, who never forſakes his own, and hath through his grace accompliſhed this day by me his moſt humble ſervant the promiſe which he hath made to his choſen people; for this night he hath ſlain by my hands the common enemy of our Nation. And as ſhe was ſaying this, ſhe drew out of the bag that horrible head of Holophernes, pale and bloudy, and ſhewed it to the whole Aſſembly, adding, Behold the head of Holophernes the Generall of the army of the Aſſyrians; and then ſhe ſpread abroad the pavilion, ſaying, Behold the pavilion under which he repoſed himſelf in his drunkenneſſe, and where God ſtruck him by the hand of a woman. I call that living God to witneſſe, that by the protection of his holy Angel, he hath preſerved me pure, going and coming, and in the abode which I made in the Camp, without permitting any one to attempt any thing upon my honour. And now he hath brought me back glad of his victory, of my own ſafety, and of your deliverance. It is to him that we ought to give all the praiſe, becauſe his goodneſſes and mercies are inexhauſtible.

The people felt tranſports of joyes, and ſeeing that head by the help of torches in the ſilence of the night, thought that it was a dream; but the multitude of thoſe that beheld all one and the ſame thing, preſent and reall, made them plainly ſee that it was a truth. They proſtrate themſelves all on the earth, adoring the living God that was the worker of thoſe great wonders, and then turning themſelves to Judith, gave her a thouſand bleſſings with triumphant acclamations, proteſting that ſhe was their Mother and their Deliverer.

Then Ozias the Prince of the people of Iſrael in Bethulia ſaid to her, You are this day bleſſed my daughter, and glorious above all women that are in the habitable world. Praiſed be the Creatour of heaven and earth, who hath ſo well guided your victorious hand to the ruine of the capitall of our enemies, and who by the ſame means hath ſo glorified your name, that he hath rendred your praiſe immortall in the mouth of men that ſhall have any ſenſe of the wonderfull works of God. Every one will remember how you have not ſpared your life to draw your people out of the ruines wherein they were almoſt buried.

Thereupon Achior was called, and Judith ſhewing him the head of Holophernes, ſayes to him, You have loſt nothing by the teſtimonies you give to the power of our God; for behold the head of the Collonel of the Unbelievers which God hath cut off this night by this hand of mine. Behold him that threatned to make you die when he had taken Bethulia, but ſure now he will let you live in great quiet. This man was in ſuch an extaſie at this news that he fell down in a ſwoon, and when he was come to himſelf again, he caſt himſelf at the feet of Judith, and gave her a reverence that was near to adoration. And by her means was converted to the true Religion, and rendred all glory to the God of Jeruſalem.

Judith purſuing this her conqueſt, counſelled her people to make a ſhew of ſallying out of the city in arms at the break of day as if they would give battel, which would make the Aſſyrians haſten to the Pavilion of Holophernes to awake him, and ſo ſeeing what had had paſſed, would be ſeized with ſo great a fear that they would ſell their lives at a cheap rate. This was executed, and the Captains failed not to repair unto the Generall to receive orders. It was already forward dayes, and he was yet aſleep with the ſleep of death, from whence there is no waking, unleſſe by an extraordinary power. Every one was aſtoniſhed that he appeared not, but no body durſt take the boldneſſe to awake him, ſo greatly was he feared. They preſſe Vagoa to enter into the chamber, who refuſes at firſt to trouble the pleaſures of his Maſter: but when the time was drawn out in length, he entred, and made a noiſe, not as by deſign, but accident, and ſeeing that no body ſtirred, he went neer the bed, thinking that he was yet with Judith. At laſt, when one told him that the enemy appeared in arms, he drew the curtain very gently, and ſaw the body of his Maſter weltering in his own bloud.

He therefore became ſo furious, that he rent ſuddenly his clothes, and ran to Judith's chamber to make her ſuffer a thouſand deaths; but when he could not find her, he ſent out frightfull cryes, and ſpake aloud, that that ſtranger-woman had filled the houſe of Nebuchadonozor with confuſion, and that ſhe had aſſaſſinated their Generall, who was now nothing but a trunk without an head plung'd in his own bloud. All ran to this ſpectacle, and the whole Camp was filled with aſtoniſhment, with fears, with deſpair, with tears, and with howlings. At the ſame time appeared the head of Holophernes hanged up upon the walls of Bethulia; and all the army of the Aſſyrians ſurpriz'd with a panick fear, and, as it were ſtruck with a ſcourge from heaven, began to ſcatter themſelves, every one ſeeking his ſafety in his flight.

The Iſraelites purſued them making a great noiſe, as if they had drawn forth numerous troops, and as if their ſquadrons had marched compacted and in good order. It was eaſie for them to vanquiſh run-awayes, who had already delivered up to fear all the hope of their life and fortune. All the neighbouring cities came out to take a ſhare of this glory, and caſt themſelves into the fields on all parts to entrap their routed enemies, of whom they made moſt horrible maſſacre.

All the Camp of Holophernes was pillaged, where was found ſo great a quantity of booty that it was a thing prodigious. The noiſe of this victory was ſpread unto Jeruſalem, the high Prieſt came to Bethulia with his other Prieſts to ſee Judith, to whom every one gave a thouſand bleſſings. One could hear nothing but ſhouts of joy, and acclamations, that publiſhed her The Glory of Jeruſalem, the Joy of Iſrael, the Honour of her People, the gallant Woman, the Chaſte and Valiant Princeſſe, the incomparable Lady, whoſe Reputation ſhould live as long as Eternity it ſelf.

A moneth paſſed wherein there was nothing heard but joyes, but conſorts of muſick, but trophies amongſt the people. They gathered every day ſome new ſpoils, whereof the moſt precious in gold, in ſilver, in purple, in pearls and jewels were preſented to the victorious Judith. She compoſed a ſong of Triumph which was ſung ſolemnly with the admiration of the whole world. After all, they went (as it behoved them) to Jeruſalem, to render to God the Vows of the whole people, and to make great Offerings, where three moneths more were ſpent in an incomparable chearfulneſſe. There was not a day that was not Feſtivall, nor a face that did not wear the lineaments of the joyes of Paradiſe.

Judith offered in the Temple the Pavilion of Holophernes, that the memory of it might never be defaced by oblivion. At laſt, all returned home to their own houſes, and the holy woman remained in her little city of Bethulia, alwayes in her widow-hood, honoured of all the world as the moſt glorious ſoul on earth. She made her ſervant free, and lived even to the age of 105 years amongſt her people in a profound peace. She appeared abroad the Feſtivall dayes in a magnificent glory, ſpending the other dayes in her ſolitude, and living with great examples of Virtues and Devotion. The day of that happineſſe was marked with white, and reckoned in the number of the greateſt Feaſts of the Jews to all poſterity. God, who is the worker of ſo many wonders hath taken a care alſo of this Hiſtory.

It is an eternall monument of the virtue of his arm, that ſhakes the mountains, that cleaves the rocks, and overthrows in a moment thoſe ſons of the Titans who make warre againſt heaven it ſelf, and would walk upon the wings of the winds. A Generall of an Army that vaunted himſelf in the midſt of an hundred thouſand ſouldiers environed all about with ſteel, with fires and lightnings; who ſaid, I will go, I will do, I will level with the ground; who held a fatall councel, where he decreed the firing of Cities, the ſacking of Provinces, where ſo many dragons drank up the tears of Nations without being touched with any ſenſe of pity. A Giant, that heaped mountain upon mountain to aſcend through fire and ſword even to the throne of the moſt High; behold, now conquered, ſlain, maſſacred, tumbled in his bloud by a woman that makes a play-game of his head; and an army that cut their paſſage through the Rocks, that drank up Rivers, that ſhadowed the Sun by the multitude of their flying arrows, overthrown, ſcattered, torn into a thouſand pieces by the enterpriſe of a Jeweſſe. Judith gives not her ſelf the praiſe of this work; it was God that acted in her, who was the direction of her hand, the ſtrength of her arm, the ſpirit of her prudence, the ardour of her courage, and the ſoul of her ſoul. O how great is this God of gods! O how terrible is this Lord of hoſts! and who is there that fears not God, but he that hath none at all? What Coloſſus's of pride have faln, and ſhall yet fall under his hands! What giants beaten down and plunged even into hell, for kindling fiery coals of concupiſcence, ſhall ſmoak in flames by an eternall ſacrifice which their pains ſhall render to the Divine Juſtice!

HESTER.

THe holy Scripture ſets before our eyes in this Hiſtory, Greatneſſe falling into an eclipſe, and the lowneſſe of the earth elevated to the Starres; Humility on the Throne, and Ambition on the Gallows, Might overthrown by Beauty; Love ſanctified, and Revenge ſtrangled by its own hands. It teaches Kings to govern, and People to obey, great Ones not to relie on a fortune of ice, Ladies to cheriſh Piety and Honour, the Happy to fear every thing, and the Miſerable to deſpair of nothing.

All that we have to diſcourſe of here, happened in the Kingdome of Perſia, during the Captivity of the Jews in Babylon, about four hundred and ſixty years before the Nativity of our Lord, and under the Reign of Ahaſuerus. But it is a great Riddle to divine who this Prince was to whom Heſter was married, and which is called here by a name that is not found in the Hiſtory of the Perſian Kings, and which indeed may agree to all thoſe high Monarchs, ſignifying no other thing but The great Lord. Mercator ſayes, that it was Aſtyages grandfather of Cyrus; and Cedrenus, that it was Darius the Mede. Genebrand is for Cambyſes; Scaliger for Xerxes; Serrarius for Ochus; Joſephus and Saillan for Artaxerxes with the long hand. The wiſe Heſter that was ſo much in love with Chaſtity is found to have had fourteen husbands by the conteſtation of Authours, every one would give her one of his own making; ſhe is married to all the Kings of Perſia, ſhe is courſed up and down through all the Empire, and her Eſpouſals made to laſt above two hundred years. But as it is eaſie enough to confute the Opinions of all thoſe that ſpeak of her, ſo is it very hard to ſettle the truth of the Chronology amidſt ſo great obſcurities. The Scripture ſayes, that Mordecai with Heſter was carried away out of Judea into Babylon under the Reign of Nebuchadonozor; and if we are of the opinion that marries her to Artaxerxes, if we reckon well all the years that were between thoſe two Kings, we ſhall find that this young and raviſhing beauty of Heſter, which caught ſo great a Monarch by the eyes, was already an hundred and fifty years old, which is an age too ripe for a maid that one would give for a wife to a King. It is impoſſible to get out of this labyrinth, if we do not ſay that Mordecai and Heſter were not tranſported in their own, but in the perſons of their anceſtours; and that that paſſage means nothing elſe, but that they iſſued from the race of thoſe that were lead captives with King Jechonias, deſtroyed by Nebuchadonozor: ſo we will take Artaxerxes, and not divide that amiable concord of Authours united in this point.

Repreſent then to your ſelves, that from the time that the Jews were diſperſed into Babylon, into Perſia, into Medea, and through all the States of thoſe great Kings, they ceaſed not to multiply in Captivity; and that ſervitude which is wont to ſtifle great ſpirits, produced ſometimes amongſt them gallant men. Amongſt others appeared upon the Theatre the excellent Mordecai, a man of a good underſtanding and of a great courage, who by his dexterity and valour delivered all his Nation from death and total ruine. He then dwelt in Shuſhan, the capitall city of all the Kingdome, and bred up in his houſe a little Niece, the daughter of his brother, an orphan both by father and mother, which was named in her firſt child-hood Ediſla, and after called Heſter.

Now as thoſe great ſpirits that are particularly governed by God have ſome tincture of Prophecie, he had a wonderfull Dream, and ſaw in his ſleep a great tempeſt, with thunderings and lightnings, and an earthquake which was followed with a combate of two dragons who were fighting one againſt the other, and ſent forth horrible hiſſings, whiles divers Nations aſſembled together, ſtood and looked upon them, expecting the iſſue of the combate; thereupon, he perceived a little fountain which became ſuddenly a great river which was changed into a Light, and of a Light transformed it ſelf into a Sun, that both watered and illuminated the earth.

He knew not what his Dream did mean, but he learned the Interpretation of it in the great combates he had with Haman, and in the exaltation of his little Niece that was promoted to ſo high a ſplendour, as to give both evidence and refreſhment to all the people of her Nation.

This Mordecai being a man of good behaviour and quality, found means to advance himſelf to Court, and to make his beginnings there in ſome inferiour office, expecting ſome good occaſion to make himſelf be known. He had an eye alwayes open to diſcover all that paſſed without any bragging of it. He conſidered the approaches of divers Nations that lived in that Court; the humours, the capacities, the buſineſſes, the obligations, the intricacies, the credit, the induſtry of every one; omitting nothing of all that might advance the benefit of his Countrey-men.

He quickly diſcovered the ſpirit of Haman, who was at that time a mean Cavalier of fortune, but ambitious, cloſe, crafty, revengefull, bloudy, and capable to embroil a State. He had an averſation from him, although he had not yet been offended by him, and began to diſtruſt him, fearing leſt he be one day fatall to his people. Nevertheleſſe, Haman with the times took an high aſcendant, and Mordecai feared his greatneſſe as one would do the apparition of a Comet.

It happened that two perfidious Subjects, Thares and Bagathan, uſhers of the door made an abominable conſpiracy againſt King Artaxerxes, which Mordecai, who was not a drowſie ſpirit, ſoon perceived, and began carefully to watch them, obſerving their goings out and comings in, their words and their countenances, their plottings and their practices. He gave notice of it very opportunely, ſo that being taken, arreſted, and put to the rack, they acknowledged the crime, and were led away to puniſhment. The King gave hearty thanks to Mordecai, commanded him to live in his Palace in a certain office which he beſtowed upon him, and cauſed the day to be ſet down in writing, wherein he had been preſerved from the conſpiracy of thoſe unhappy ſervants, to recompence, as opportunity ſhould be offered, the good ſervices of his Deliverer.

It is credible that Haman had an hand in that execrable deſign, ſeeing that he gave ſo little thanks to Mordecai for having been the diſcoverer of it; but the diſſimulation that he brought to cover his fact, and his mighty power that rendred him ſo terrible, ſuffered him not to be involved in the ruine of thoſe wretched men. Theſe two Courtiers had an eye to one another, and ſought nothing but each others ruine; the power of the one being alwayes ſuſpected by the other, when God, without Mordecai's thinking of it, ſent him a great ſuccour by the choice which was made of his Niece to be the Kings wife.

The Hiſtory ſayes, that Ahaſuerus would ſhew his magnificence, and made great feaſts for the ſpace of an hundred and fourſcore dayes, in which he entertained the Princes, the governors of Provinces, and all the Nobles of the Realm. He would have the people too to have their ſhare, and for that purpoſe, he cauſed to be ſet up at the entrance of his gardens (which he was wont to dreſſe with his own hands) abundance of great Pavilions of Sky-colour, born up with marble pillars, and tyed together with ribands of red ſilk, and rings of ivory. He cauſed alſo certain beds of gold and ſilver to be ſet up upon a pavement of emerald and other precious ſtones, ranged by a proportion made after the Moſaicall faſhion, which had a very fine grace. Thither he invited all the people of that great city of Shuſhan, and cauſed them to be ſerved in veſſels of gold and of ſilver, with moſt exquiſite viands, and delicious wine, and left every one to drink according to his ability, without conſtraining any one.

Vaſthi the Queen, on the other ſide, made a banquet for the women in the Royall palace, wherein ſhe forgot nothing to equall the ſtately Grandeurs of the King her husband. This merry life laſted the ſpace of ſeven dayes, in the laſt of which the King being very jolly and inflamed with wine, commanded the Eunuchs that were about him to cauſe the Queen to come with the Crown upon her head in her moſt gorgeous attire, to make a ſhew of her beauty in the preſence of all the people. The Queen took no pleaſure in this command, and refuſed to go; in which, ſayes Sulpicius, the wife was wiſer then the husband, in that ſhe was not willing to make a ſpectacle of the beauty of her body to men full of meats and wine, and deſerved ſo much the more commendation as ſhe was more conſtant to keep the Laws of modeſty and comelineſſe.

But this was not taken that way as that ſacred Hiſtorian preſents it; they imagined that ſhe had ſome of the diſpoſition of beautifull women, that ſhe was a little proud and ſcornfull, which cauſed that ſhe was not ſo well beloved of the Grandees of the Court, who, as it is credible, having long ſince a deſire to do her ſome ill office, laid hold on this occaſion. They cauſed that refuſall to be reported very harſhly by the Eunuchs to the King when it might have been ſweetned and moderated; they made uſe of his wine, as of an inſtrument of their iniquity, and exaſperated him alſo by the diminution of his Authority, whereof Princes are very jealous if they have not much ſtupidity.

Aſſoon as the anſwer of the Queen was publiſhed, the King turned himſelf about to the ſeven principall Councellours of his State who were alwayes by his ſide, and governed the Kingdome, and demanded their advice, what he ſhould do to repreſſe his wives pride. Memuchan, which was the laſt and the raſheſt, made of this deniall a crime of State, and ſaid, That it tended to the diſorder of all the other women, becauſe, that other women, every one in her condition, framed themſelves after the example of the Queen, and would draw a licentious advantage over their husbands, founded upon that affront done to his Royall Majeſty, and that every where they would domineer, which would overthrow the order of Nature, and cauſe great troubles in all houſes; and therefore he was of the opinion that the Queen ſhould be divorced by the King her husband, and that an Edict ſhould be made to be ſent through all his Kingdomes touching the obedience that women owe to thoſe that are their heads.

The man perhaps was ill dealt with in his lodging by his wife, and under ſhadow of Policy would revenge his wrongs. It is very true that the Law of God ſtrictly recommends the ſubmiſſion of the wife towards the husband: but it ought to be underſtood in things good and reaſonable; for if a wife were bound to render a blind obedience to all the extravagances of a husband that hath but little wit and much paſſion, ſhe ſhould be the moſt miſerable of all ſlaves. There were many reaſons that might make Vaſthi's action be excuſed; but becauſe they ſaw that Memuchan had pleaſed the King by his diſcourſe, all the reſt of the Councellours of State ran to ſervitude, and condemned her to a long torment by a ſhort ſentence.

She was degraded and divorced, which was a thing ordinary enough to thoſe Kings who made no great account of loſing a wife, ſeing that they had ſo great a number of them in ther Seraglio. The Edict was alſo made in the tearms that the other had required it, and the name of that poor Queen went up and down the whole Kingdome as a ſad ſtory, and a true portraiture of an abated greatneſſe.

God permitted all this to make way for Heſter, whom he had deſtined to Ahaſuerus his bed, not for her ſelf, but for the ſafety of her people. After the divorce and the diſaſtre of poor Vaſthi, a new Queen muſt be ſought out, and the King comforted about his loſſe. A great culling is made through all the Provinces of the Kingdome of the handſomeſt Virgins to be brought to Court. This little Heſter is found very delightfull, being endowed with a perfect beauty and a naturall grace that ſurpaſſed all things. She is carried amongſt abundance of others, and as ſoon as the King caſt his eyes upon her, he liked her, and commanded Hegai the Eunuch that had the ſuperintendency of his Seraglio to have a great care of that young damſel, to ſpare nothing on her, and to give her ſeven waiting-maids with all neceſſary equipage. Thoſe Virgins that were thus choſen for the Prince's bed made a novitiate of twelve moneths, in which time they had all leaſure to fit themſelves, and to learn the civilities of the Court. After this, they were preſented to the King, who took thoſe that pleaſed him moſt, and when any one had paſſed a night in his chamber, ſhe was ſent in the morning into a new Seraglio unto the charge of another Eunuch, and returned no more to the King if ſhe was not asked for, and that by name.

Heſter ſpent but ten moneths in her prepartion and was incontinently conducted to the King, who liked her above all the maids that he had ever ſeen, and declared her Queen in Vaſhti's place, putting the Crown upon her head. Mordecai was raviſhed at this choice, and walked every day from the firſt beginning that ſhe was brought to Court, before the Seraglio to hear news of her, having recommended her to a certain Eunuch his confident, that had of her a very particular care. He ſent her very opportunely neceſſary advice, to teach her how to behave her ſelf; and above all, he was ſo wiſe, as to recommend to her not to declare the Nation whereof ſhe was, and to make no diſcovery that ſhe had any relation to him, which he judged to be to the purpoſe, for fear leſt Haman, who was in ſo great favour, and who hated naturally the Jews, ſhould ruine her before ſhe had taken rooting in the Kings heart.

Behold a wonderfull ſport of Providence, which tooke a little ſtone with an intention to beat down a great Coloſſus, and makes in one inſtant of an earthen pot a veſſel of gold. Men ſtand now amazed amazed to think what wind drove this poor Jeweſſe to the crown of the chief Monarchy that was at that time in the whole world. They think that ſure it was a great chance, but God knew that it was a great counſel digeſted from all eternity in his thoughts. For if command is due (according to Ariſtotle) to perſons that are moſt accompliſhed, there was ſome foundation in the excellent qualities of Heſter on which to ſet a Crown: for beſide the beauty of her body, and the ingeniouſneſſe of her mind, ſhe had great gifts of virtues that rendred her lovely to all the world, and might ſerve for models to all Ladies.

She was not a lump of fleſh, or a body without a ſoul, nor a worldly woman that had no other Idol but her Beauty, nor other Deities but Pleaſure and Ambition, as it happens ordinarily to moſt women, who ſeeing themſelves elevated to the top of the grandeurs of the age, ſtrangely corrupt their manners and diſhonour their condition. Heſters chief and principall virtue that made a moſt pure ſource of pleaſures flow into the reſt of her life, was, That ſhe was devout, and that being young of age, frail of ſex, high of condition, in a Court of an Infidel King, amongſt ſo many other Pagan women, ſhe never forgat God, but obſerved punctually, as farre as it was lawfull and poſſible for her, the exerciſe of her Religion, making her prayers with an incredible ardour, and retaining a faith inviolable in the midſt of the Empire of impiety. She brought the King her husband to the worſhip of God, and to the love of her people, as farre as ſhe could perceive any diſpoſition in him. She erected a Temple in her heart, having not yet the power to build one in her Kingdome, and directed all her Devotions to the ſacrificing of her ſelf.

She was alſo greatly to be commended for the little care ſhe had of her Body againſt the nature of that ſex, which often preferres their fleſh before God and all Paradiſe. This appeared evidently at that ſeaſon when ſhe was to preſent her ſelf to the King the ſecond time, ſince that in an occaſion ſo important wherein all other women would have had an infinite care of their habit and attire, ſhe contented her ſelf with ſo ſmall a thing: and yet in her naturall grace, juſt as a roſe adorned with its own leaves, ſhe obſcured all other beauties, even the moſt tricked and pranked. Her art was to have no art at all; to take what nature had given her, and to render all to God.

Furthermore, ſhe brought to Court a great Humility and a perfect ſubmiſſion, which ſhe never quitted, being as obedient to her uncle when ſhe had the Crown upon her head as in her loweſt age; ſhe hearkned to his advice, ſhe put it in execution, ſhe deſpiſed no body but her own ſelf. The habit of a Queen was to her a burden almoſt inſupportable, and ſhe never found more joy then in her ſolitude. There are few women that are born without ſelf-wilfulneſſe, and without opinions that augment themſelves with age, and increaſe exceſſively in high conditions, which makes us admire this woman in contemplating nearer her deportments, and ſeeing how little ſhe relied upon her own ſelf, but although ſhe was endowed with a rare wit, yet ſhe hearkned to reaſon, and without much ado yielded to good counſel, which rendred her demeanour very happy, and all her negotiations moſt advantageous.

Beſides all this, as God had choſen her for great things, ſo he gave her the prudence of the Saints accompanied with a good judgement, with docility, with providence, with diſcretion, with circumſpection, and with expeditneſſe in the execution of affairs.

To this prudence was joyned a courage, and an incomparable generoſity, even to enterpriſe by a motive of virtue, actions ſo dangerous, that ſhe could expect nothing from them that was leſſe then death. And for to crown all theſe virtues, ſhe poſſeſſed (farther) an illuſtrious patience, taking every thing from the hand of God, and ſuiting her ſelf to his will in all the ſucceſſes and events of the buſineſſes of the world.

Behold the principall qualities that adorned this Princeſſe, and that may be ſeen in thoſe women that God hath gratified with his favours. In the ſequel of this ſtory he makes us ſee the brave employment that he gave her in that Court of Ahaſuerus, to bruiſe the head of a great Serpent, and to deliver her Nation from a gulf of great and horrible calamities.

Princes and great men would be happy, if without dying by procuration, they might live in perſon. They are born often enough with moſt excellent qualities; they are calm ſeas, and killed with riches that might do good to all the world, if the winds would but let them runne according to their own nature. But as the Beauties of women are courted by many Lovers, ſo high conditions have their flatterers, that under a ſhadow of themſelves Adorers, make themſelves Maſters; and under colour of Service, exerciſe an Empire even over thoſe that think they command the whole Univerſe. Their name by this means ſerves for a Paſſeport to all miſcheifs; their Authority for a ſanctuary to crimes; their Taxes for tinder to concupiſcenſe; their Power for an inſtrument to revenge, and for a ſcourge to mankind.

This may be manifeſtly ſeen in the ſequele of this Hiſtory, where it is ſaid, That Ahaſuerus exalted Haman above all the Princes and Nobles of his Kingdome, and took the wickedſt man of the earth to make of him the moſt puiſſant, that Crimes might have as much aſſiſtance, as this Monarch had power and riches. His goodneſſe was ſeduced in this point, and his too eaſie ſpirit was gained by great appearances that ſtole him from himſelf, and left him nothing but a meer apparition of Dignity.

This Haman which he thought at firſt to be a Perſian, an honeſt man, an able, and affectionate to his ſervice, was partly an Amalekite, and partly alſo a Macedonian, a ſonne of the earth, that had neither God nor conſcience, a ſpirit full of labyrinths, captious, ſuſpicious, great in appearance and little in reality; a lion in proſperity, and an ape in adverſity, whoſe life was a perpetuall crime, whoſe avarice was a gulf, ambition an abyſſe, and fortune a ſcandall, and an injury to Providence.

Yet for all this he entred ſo farre into the friendſhip of the King, that he ſaw not, but by his eyes; heard not, but by his ears; walked not, but by his ſteps; and governed not, but by his counſels. He called him his father, and believed him the moſt excellent, and the wiſeſt man in his whole Kingdome, commanding every one to acknowledge him for the ſecond perſon of the Empire, and to give him the greateſt reverence. This Court, that was full of ſlaves, carried many candles to this Idol; ſome through fear, as to a miſchievous Devil, and others through hope and expectation to be preferred.

The poor Mordecai felt a moſt bitter grief to ſee over the heads of men, him, that would bring the whole world under his feet, and in that ſlavery ſo generall to all men, he choſe rather the loſſe of his life then of his liberty. He would never bow the knee before that Baal, and although his enemy perſecuted him in that buſineſſe by fury, and his friends by importunities, he remained unmoveable, reſolved to ſuffer much rather then to do any thing that was baſe. Haman that was at the beginning giddy-headed by the fumigations of the incenſe that was preſented to him on all ſides, and that regarded men, but as the little gnats, took no heed to it at firſt; but when he was advertiſed by his flatterers that there was but one onely man at Court that refuſed to be an adorer of his fortune, he was inflamed with choler, and eſteeming it but a ſmall game for him to cauſe one man to die, he made a reſolution horrible and bloudy to root out a whole Nation.

He goes and tells the King that the Jews diſperſed through all the Provinces of his Kingdome, were divided by Religion and by Laws from the reſt of all the world, and by affection, from his Perſon and his State. That they were a people moſt pernicious to an Empire, that alwayes ſate abrood upon ſome poiſon, and that if they ſeemed moderate, it was not but through impotence, being diſpoſed at the firſt occaſion to caſt themſelves into Rebellion and Inſolence. He added alſo, that the great care which he had of the good of the State, put theſe words into his mouth, that would cauſe the univerſall quiet of all his Monarchy, and that after conſideration had of the great perils wherewith his Crowns and Life were menaced by that faction, he hath found nothing better then to prevent them, and to cut them off in time, before they had fortified themſelves to the prejudice of the publick. That if the Treaſurers of the Exchequer feared by this a diminution of the Tributes, he would give with all his heart ten thouſand talents of his proper goods to recompenſe the Levies, ſo much he took to heart that buſineſſe that concerned the ſafety of his King and the benefit of his people.

This Serpent plaid his game with ſo much artifice, that he perſwaded whatſoever he had a mind to in ſuch a manner, as that poor Ahaſuerus, who was of a mean and credulous ſpirit, without examining any thing, plucks his ring from off his finger, puts it into Hamans hands, with a full power to do as he in his diſcretion ſhould think fit. Behold the great confuſion of the State, of the Spirit, and of the Conſcience of Kings when they ſuffer themſelves ſo eaſily to be lead away by evil counſels, and will not ſo much as know what paſſes in the government of their people.

It is an horrible thing that in the turn of an hand this miſerable Prince ſhould abandon to the vengeance of a pernicious man ſo many millions of lives, without making one ſole reflexion upon what he ſayes, or what he grants. He had no imagination whither that did tend, and his ordinary idleneſſe ſuffered him not to take any further cognizance of it; which rendred him doubly culpable, to permit ſo many murders, and to be ignorant of it. Seneca ſayes, that when Claudius was in the other world, ſome men reproached him with abundance of murders done under his name, and yet he knew not what they meant; then Auguſtus roſe up and ſaid, Thou miſcreant, we talk not here of the ſlaughters thou haſt committed, but of thoſe thou haſt not known, for it is a more ſhamefull thing to a King to be ignorant of the evil that paſſeth in his Kingdome then to act it.

Turpius ignoraſti quàm occidiſti. Sen. in Ludo de morte Claudii.

The ſiſter of one of the Ptolomy's, King of Egypt, ſeeing that her brother as he was playing at dice, cauſed ſome crimmall Proceſſes to be read to him to decide them in the laſt Appeal, ſnatched the papers out of the Clerk of the Aſſiſe's hand, and ſaid to her brother, that a dye fell otherwiſe then the head of a man. One cannot bring too much conſideration when there is a queſtion of ſhedding a mans bloud, be it in peace or warre.

Yet Ahaſuerus truſts this proud Haman, as one that would truſt the wolf with the lives of his ſheep. He triumphs with joy for having obtained the Kings ring; he reliſhes and digeſts his vengeance with ceremony. He cauſes a great veſſel to be brought him, into which he throws twelve little billets which bore the name of every moneth, and cauſes the moneth to be drawn out by lot in which he ſhould execute his pernicious deſign. The lot fell upon the laſt, although it was caſt in the firſt, and he would not change it, whether through an old ſuperſtition of his Countrey, or through the great confidence he had, that what time ſoever he took to make the projected Maſſacre, the Jews could not poſſibly eſcape him, ſo impotent they were; and he thought to keep them as beaſts ſhut up which one chaſes when one will.

It was a pleaſure to him to ſhew them the glittering ſteel a year before they ſhould die, and to make them periſh a thouſand times by fear, before their life ſhould be once taken away by the ſword. He aſſembles all the Kings ſecretaries, and dictates to them a bloudy letter, whereof he cauſes a great many copies to be drawn to ſend into all the Provinces, and the tenour of them was, That the thirteenth day of the laſt moneth, which was that of February, the Jews ſhould be maſſacred in all the Cities and Provinces that were within the utmoſt limits of the Empire; and that from the leaſt even to the greateſt, without ſparing either man, woman, or child, all ſhould be put to the ſword without remiſſion, and that their goods ſhould be confiſcated and expoſed to pillage. The Letters marked with the Seal and Arms of the King, flew as ill-boding Birds through all the extents of the ſeven and twenty Provinces of that great Kingdome. It was an Edict of Death, not of the death and of the ruine of one man, or of one City, or of one Province, but of a whole Nation. The evil was univerſall, and carried on all parts Menaces, Bloud, Slaughters, Fears, and Affrights, from Euphrates even to Nile. The terrour began at the capital city Shuſhan, where the Edict was ſeen and read by all the world, hanged upon the pillars and on the walls of Publick places bearing theſe words;

Artaxerxes the Sovereign Lord and King of all the Nations, that are from India as farre as Ethiopia, to the Princes and Governours of the ſeven and twenty Provinces of our Empire, Greeting:

Since the time that I ſubdued the univerſe under my Laws, it was never my will to abaſe the greatneſſe of my Power, but I have deſired to govern my good Subjects with all clemency and ſweetneſſe, making them enjoy a peace and tranquility to be wiſhed for by all mortalls; and for this purpoſe, inquiring of the means that I might uſe for the effecting of this deſign, Our moſt dear Haman, the ſecond perſon of our Kingdome, which exceeds all the men of the world in capacity and fidelity, hath repreſented to me, that the Jewiſh people diſperſed through all the Provinces of my Empire, being ſeparated both by Religion and Laws from all the other Nations, deſpiſe our Edicts, and ceaſe not to render themſelves troublers of the publick Quiet. Which having been well and duly conſidered, we have ordained and do ordain, That they be puniſhed according to the orders of our moſt dear Haman, who is the Superintendent of all our Provinces, and whom we honour as our true father. Furthermore we will

and

and intend that this Edict shall be put in execution, the thirteenth day of the Moneth Adar, the last of the year, to the end that all the wicked descending into Hell in one and the same day, may render peace, and quietnesse to our good Subjects, which they have troubled by their Factions. Such is our good pleasure.

Given at Shushan the first of the Moneth Nisan.

Behold how Haman and his Complices, workers of Iniquity, cut their Furies Quills, and dipped them in Bloud, to make the King of the Persians say what ever pleased them, having his Seal and Authority in their hands. Poore Mordecai seeing the great Tempest that was ready to fall upon the heads of all his people, having read that Edict, and knowing that Haman was at the Table with the King, who was not seen by any, endeavoured to move the whole World to pity, clothing himself with Sack-cloth, and covering himself with Ashes, together with all his people that wept and howl'd about him.

This sad Squadron marched even to the Walls of the Palace, without entring in, for it was not permitted not so much as to Mordecai, to be seen at Court in so deplorable a Condition, which would have offended the eyes of the delicater sort. Bad news hath Wings to fly, and abundance of Voyces to make it self be heard. The frighted Maids and Eunuches fail not to tell Queen Hester of what ever had passed, whereat shee was much amazed, and hearing that her Uncle was at the Gate, covered over with Ashes, with Sack-cloth upon his back, she sent him secretly a Sute of Clothes, which he refused, judging it not sutable to his fortune, which made her dispatch another Messenger, which was Athac the Eunuch that waited on her, who went out of the Castle, and inquired of Mordecai of all the state of so sad a businesse. The other made him a short Narration of it, and gave him a Copy of the Edict to present unto the Queen, praying him to tell her, that she must necessarily go and see the King, and act powerfully with his Majesty for the deliverance of his people.

Athac returns readily to his Mistresse, and faithfully relates to her what he had heard of Mordecai. The poore Princesse was in an equall ballance greatly tacked in minde; Shee durst not go to the King without being sent for, and to reject the intreaty of her Uncle in an accident so pressing, it was another Death to her. She sends Athac back again to represent again to the good Mordecai the danger of that Negotiation, and to tell him that there is a Law established by the Prince, that ordains, That whosoever shall present himself before his eyes, without being called for, shall be punished with Death, unlesse that by his mercy he holds out his Sceptre to him in sign of safety, and that thereupon she had not seen his Majesty these thirty Dayes, not knowing in what posture she is at present in his heart, that if she should finde him in some ill Humour, there were an end of that Life, which she seeks not to preserve but for the safety of her People.

Notwithstanding all these Remonstrances, her Uncle sends to her to go; tells her, that if she neglected to negotiate in so important an occasion, God would find other means to save his people. But she should had need to take great heed, lest her Fathers House, and her self also should perish, by too great a care of their Preservation, and that she ought to think that perhaps the Divine Providence had placed her where she was, it may be for that onely reason.

Here one knows not what one ought to admire most, whether the Authority that Mordecai took over the Queen, or the Obedience that the Queen rendered to him. She had no sooner heard that Reply of his, but she said, It is concluded, I will go, and sacrifice my self to Death with all my heart, to obey my Uncle, and save, if I can, my Nation. Go to him, Athac, and bid him assemble all the Jews that are in Shushan, let them keep a Fast of three dayes for the successe of this Attempt, with continuall Prayers. I will do the same on my side with my servants here, and afterward we will adventure upon the businesse.

Behold how we ought to proceed in great Negotiations, making God always to march in the head of them, who is the source of all good Successes. There was then an admirable Consort of Devotions, both within and without the Palace; Mordecai was in the midst of his People, lifting up his hands to Heaven, and saying;

Great God, whose Empire hath no limits, and whose absolute will suffers no contradiction; Your hands have formed both Heaven and Earth, with all the beauties that are included in their bosome, and there is nothing that can resist the puissance of your Arm. My God you know every thing, and are not ignorant that the refusall that I have made to reverence the proud Haman, proceeds of Pride or Vanity that is in me, for from this present time I would kisse the ground whereon he treads for the safety of my people. But I have been afraid to transferre the honour of the Creatour to the Creature, and to give a companion to your Majesty; and therefore I beg you, O the God of our Fathers, to cause one ray of your mercyes to shine upon those poor afflicted ones. You see the rage of our Enemies, who have all sworn our Ruine. Despise not your Inheritance, that you have Redeemed from Egypt. Shew your self propicious to your People, that is, as it were, the Lot of your Empire; Change our Mourning into Joy, and shut not the Mouthes of those that sing your Praises. This Prayer was followed unanimously by all the people.

But the Divine Hester on the other side, shut up in her secret Closet, layes aside her precious habits, and all the attires of the glory that invironed her, taking a mourning sute, and covering her self with Ashes. She was in Prayer day and night, and mortified her body with Fastings and Austerities. Care made those Roses of her beautifull face to wither, and the places that had been the complices of her joyes, were for that time watered with her tears. She said to God with an amorous heart;

My God, you know the necessity that oppresses me, and you are not ignorant that I detest with all mine heart, that proud Diadem that glitters upon my head, when by constraint I must appear at Court. I have never worn it in the Holy-dayes of my silence, and of my dear solitude which I prize above all the Empires of the Earth. You are not Ignorant, O my Lord, that since that I was transported to this Palace, my heart hath never joyed in any thing, but the consideration of your Blessings. I am here alone, and forsaken of all friends and kindred, expecting no other Succour but that of your Arm. Lo, I hold my Life and my Soul now in my hands, to lose it for you, or to save it for you. Those that have resolved to pull down your Altars, and to destroy the glory of your Temple, are the men that have sworn our Death. But give not, O Lord, your Sceptre and your Power to those that have no name amongst your faithfull People; Make their own Arrows return upon their own faces, and keep us alwayes under the Protection of your Divine Hands. Seeing that I must be the Prolocutresse for the good of all your Nation, and of mine, Inspire me with the discourses that I ought to make in the presence of that Lyon. Soften for us his heart, and make him turn his gall on the side of our enemies, that we may render to you our Thanksgivings, and offer to you Immortall praises.

The third Day being expired, she puts off her Mourning, and adorns her self with her richest dresses, to sharpen the Arrows of her Beauty which she had so worthily consecrated to the great Businesse of the preservation of her Nation. And although she had an heart filled with cares about the event of an Embassage of so great importance, yet she appeared with a Countenance as flourishing, as the fair dawning of the Day, Calming the Tempest of her Heart by the force of an invincible Spirit. After she had once more invoked the Authour and Finisher of Wonders, she went accompanied with two maids, one of which held her up, managing exactly the delicacy of her body, and the other carried the Train of her Gown largely spread abroad. She passes from Door to Door, from Chamber to Chamber, and at last arrived at the Kings, who was seated on a Throne in a Sute all laid with Diamonds, and a pomp unparalell'd. He was ruddy of Face, and had eyes very sparkling, and it seemed that he took a kind of pleasure in rowling them up and down, to dazle those that looked upon him, by the lightnings of his Majesty. At first, his look appeared a little terrible to this new Wife, whether he did it by an Amorous Caresse, or whether he was moved with some Choler to see her enter without calling for. The wise Hester knew also well enough how to play her game, and to surprise where he was weak, in which he thought himself most strong. She used a mute Eloquence, and a fear wherein there was much quaintnesse and gentlenesse of the Sex. The Carnation of her cheeks instantly took a precious paleness, that came so opportunely as if one had called for it; and as if she had been Thunder-strook with the eyes of that mighty Monarch, she let her self fall down in a swoun into the bosome of the Maid that held her up.

This wonderfull King that desired so much to terrifie, took for himself what he would give to others, and felt his own heart assaulted, by the fear he had left his Countenance had wounded the heart of his dearest Spouse. He quits the dreadfulnesse of a King, and takes the servitude of a Lover; he comes down from his Throne faster then a pase, runs as well as others to ease her of her swoun, and cryes aloud, Hester, my sister, what ails you? The Law that I have made, is not for you, but for the rest onely of my Kingdome: And when she yet gave no answer to that Speech, he takes his golden Sceptre, gives it her to touch and handle, and kisses her with a great affection, conjuring her to take courage, and to come again to her self.

Then as if she had returned from the Countrey of the Dead, she spake with a languishing voyce, and interrupted words, saying to the King, that he need not be astonished at that fear of hers, for she had seen his face as the face of an Angel, that he was truly Terrible, but withall Lovely above all the Princes of the World, so many Graces he had and beauties upon his Visage. This was to take him where he was easiest to be Conquered, and to better colour yet that speech, she let her self fall again upon the bosome of her servant. All the Court had work enough about her, and the King above all did what he could to settle her. At last she came fully to her self, and Ahasuerus told her, That if she came to make any Request unto him, she should aske boldly, yea though it were even the Moitie of his Kingdome, for he was now on tearms to deny her nothing.

It was a large promise, and one would think that now was the time for her to discover her self. Yet she had so much reservednesse, and so great a power over her self, that she advanced not yet her Businesse, but waited for the hour of his Repast, wherein she knew that the King Ahasuerus was ordinarily more free and merry. She told him onely that she came to make a small Request unto his Majesty, and most humbly to beseech him to be pleased to honour her with his Presence, together with Haman, at a little Banquet which she had prepared for them. The King was very joyfull of it, and caused Haman to be called, whom he commanded to do whatsoever Hester should desire, which was most pleasing to him, being one that loved nothing so much as that which flattered his vain-glory.

They failed not to be both of them at dinner with the Queen, who entertained them very handsomely, and with great Magnificence, and this entertainment pleased so much her Husband, that he summoned her again to ask what ever seemed good unto her, for there was no request but should be granted, that proceeded from her mouth. The Queen that would give her self leisure to consult with her Uncle first, that she might effectually disclose that great affair, put off the offer till the morrow after, and said to the King, That since his Majesty had expressed so great a satisfaction for her little Dinner, and that the cheerfulnesse of his heart redounded to the benefit of his Health, she would present to him again with all humility the very same Petition, and convince him by his friendship, which she prised above all things in the World, to eat again the following day of the Viands that she should make ready for him, and with the same Company.

This was fully granted her, and after she had prepared the spirit of the King by these dispositions, she resolved to open her whole mind, with the Counsell and art of Mordecai. Haman went out of the Palace gloriously triumphing and accompanied with a great Train; But when he perceived Mordecai at the Gate, who made as though he did not see him, when all others killed themselves to make him Reverences, he felt himself moved with fury, and went suddenly to his house, to conclude upon the Death of that innocent man.

Good (say the Philosophers) is never Good, if it be not intire and Perfect, which is the cause that there are few felicities in the World, where all Light hath its Shadow, all fruit its Worm, and every Beauty fails not to have its embasement and Allay. And this is it, that Proud Haman experiments in the highest glory of his Fortune. He makes a consultation with his Wife and Friends, and tells them, That he is this day, according to the Worlds esteem, one of the happiest men upon the Earth. If he looks upon his Riches, they are well-nigh infinite; If he casts his eyes upon his House, he sees it underpropped with a good company of Children; If he considers the favour of the Prince, Never man was in a like degree. His Counsels are the Felicities of the State, his Words are Oracles, and his Altitudes are Ravishments that dazle the whole Earth from Euphrates even as farre as Nilus. Yet he confesses to them ingeniously, that in this high heape of Honours and of Bleſſings that inviron him, he hath no content at all, as long as he ſees himſelf outbraved by that beggarly Raſcall Mordecai, who vouchſafes not ſo much as to do him any Reverence. All the Joyes that he hath in his Houſe, and all the Applauſes that he receives every day in publick, gives him not ſo much Pleaſure, as that ſole Affront powres bitterneſſe into his heart, which he cannot digeſt. And therefore he prayes them to adviſe him on ſome means that he ſhould uſe, to rid himſelf of that Villain, and ſacrifice him to his vengeance. He added, that he had Dined with the King and Queen, and that he was to go thither again the morrow after, which was a favour that none could hope for after him; yet he loſt all the ſenſe of it when it entred into his imagination, that he muſt ſee a Mordecai at the Palace gate, to reproch to him his impotence; and that there was no more life for him, as long as that curſed fellow, that was to him as an ill-boding Bird, remained at Court.

and

The Wife that was of the ſame humour with her Husband, pronounced a ſhott ſentence, and ſaid that if there were not Gallowſes enough at Shuſhan to hang a Raſcall, he ſhall cauſe one to be ſet up of fifty Cubits high, and ſhould deſire the King, that Mordecai ſhould be ſuddenly faſtened to it, and that this being done, he might go with a purified ſpirit to the Banquet of the Queen. This Counſell pleaſed him very much, and he reſolved to forward it, but Providence Prepared for him farre other buſineſſe to diſpatch, to make him know, that no body thinks upon the Ruine of another, without haſtening of his own.

The Angel of God that Governs Kings, gives them thoughts not foreſeene, and raiſes to them occaſions of Virtues and great Actions ſometimes, even when they leaſt dream of it. The King was laid upon his Bed to repoſe himſelf, and could not ſhut his Eyes the whole night, without having the leaſt appearance of Care or Trouble in his ſpirit. He calls for his Reader, and bids him reade to him ſome Book or other to entertein him. He reads in his preſence the Annals of the Kingdome, and particularly, That which happened in his Time; He comes without thinking on it, to the Year that made mention of Thares and Bagathans Conſpiracy, diſcovered by Mordecai. The Kings heart that was in the hand of God changed in an inſtant; the remembrance of that good ſervant beginns to enter into his mind with ſome Tenderneſſe and Compaſſion; That ardent and inconſiderate Love that he had had to his friend Haman grows cold again inſenſibly, without having any Reaſon for it. It ſeemed as if there had been a charm raiſed ſuddenly by an Heavenly hand. He reſumes thoughts of Conſideration, of Juſtice, and affection towards honeſt men.

He asked what Recompenſe Mordecai hath had for ſo great and notable a Service that he did his Perſon and all his State. It was found that he had gained nothing by it, but Promiſes and Hopes. The King demands of the Gentlemen of his Chamber, who was in the Anti-chamber? they anſwered Haman, that was come according to his cuſtome, to diſcourſe with him while he was riſing, and to preſſe hotly Mordecai's Ruine. He commands them to bid him enter; He enters with a Boldneſſe that promiſed it ſelf all things, and ſets himſelf to his Complements and his ordinary merriments; Yet all that had pleaſed the King heretofore, in the converſation of that man even to a Rapture, begins to diſpleaſe him now, and he ſeeks nothing more then the means to humble him.

He frames to himſelf in Idea's a man of Fortune riſing from nothing that hath prevailed over the ſimplicity of his Spirit, that hath made great Magazines of Gold and Silver out of his Levies, That diſpoſes of all the Offices of his Kingdome, That makes himſelf adored of great and ſmall, That is followed as Himſelf, and more then Himſelf, That hath his Privy-Seal and all his Authority in his hands, That hath ſo much money to lay out, as to offer ten thouſand Talents to ſatiate his Revenge, and that Authorizes all wickedneſſe, by the Name, and avouching of his Maſter, if at leaſt he hath one on this top of glory whither he is mounted. He hath now a mind to undo him, and feels a powerfull motion puſhing him forward to it, and which permits him not to deliberate of it any more, nor to Conſider with what ſecurity he might execute ſo great a buſineſſe.

He knew that he was hated of all the World by Reaſon of his Pride, and that his Adorers themſelves would have eaten him up with a very good will, if they might have had but the permiſſion given them; He ſaw that he ſubſiſted not, but by his favour which he abuſed ſo baſely. He reſolved to pick a quarrell with him, and asked him inſtantly, What might a Great King do, that would honour a Favourite to the higheſt Point? Haman thinking that that Queſtion was not made but in favour, and Conſideration of him, Anſwers with an Immeaſurable Impudence, That to honour worthily a Favourite, and to ſhew in his Perſon what a great Maſter can do that Loves with Paſſion, He muſt clothe him with his Royall Cloak, put the Kings Diadem upon his Head, ſet him upon his own Horſe, and command the greateſt Prince of the Court to hold his Stirrop and his Bridle, and lead him through all places of the City, and to Cauſe an Herald to Proclaime before him, That it is thus that Ahaſuerus honoureth his Favourites.

The Prince was aſtoniſhed at this Inſolence, and to make him burſt with ſpite, ſaid to him, that his Opinion was very good, and therefore he commanded him to render all thoſe honours preſently to Mordecai the Jew that was at the Palace Gate. This Divel of Pride was ſeized with ſo great an amazement at that Speech, that he had not ſo much as one word in his mouth to Reply; and as he was Vainglorious and Inſupportable in his Proſperity, ſo there was nothing more Amated or more Baſe in Adverſity. He extreamly racks his ſpirit to diſſemble his diſcontent; The fear of Death and Puniſhments due to his Crimes, if he did reſiſt the Pleaſure of the King, made him ſwallow all the bitterneſſe of that Cup.

A ſtrange thing! Poor Mordecai that was all naſty, covered with Sack-cloth and Aſhes, is fetched, is waſhed, is trimmed up, and clad after the faſhion of a King. Haman preſents himſelf to hold the Stirrop of the Horſe, and to lead him by the Bridle, while his Enemy was ſhewed in Triumph to the eyes of the whole City of Shuſhan. How much Reſiſtance do we think he made, not to accept this Honour? What thoughts came into his head, whether it was not a Trick of Haman, that would give him a ſhort Joy to deliver him to a long Puniſhment. He could not believe his Eyes nor his Reaſon; he thought that all this had been a Dream. In the mean while the whole City of Shuſhan beheld that great Spectacle, and could not be ſufficiently amazed at ſo extraordinary a Change.

Haman, after the Ceremony was over, returns very ſad unto his Houſe, deploring with his Wife and friends the ſad ſport of Fortune. The Confuſion of their their troubled ſpirits ſuggeſts nothing to them but Counſels of deſpair, and they ſay, That ſince Mordecai hath begun, ſure he will make an end. He was very loath to go to that Feaſt of the Queens, he feared that it would prove a ſacrifice, and that he ſhould be the offering.

Heſter that ſaw that her ſport was ſpoiled if he was not preſent, cauſed him ſecretly to be engaged, and preſſed by the Eunuchs of the King, who under colour of Civility, conduct him to his finall Miſery.

He enters into the Chamber of the Feaſt: The King diſſembles all that had been done; there was nothing talked of at the firſt, but of paſſing merrily the time away; Every thing flouriſhed, every thing Laughed, but Poyſon was hid under the Laughter, and Venome under the Flowers.

At the end of their Repaſt, the King Conjures the Queen to tell him at laſt what it was that ſhe deſired of him, becauſe he was fully reſolved to divide his Crown and Sceptre with her. Then ſending forth a great ſigh, ſhe cryed, Alas Sir, I do not ſue to your Majeſty for any of all the Honours, or the Riches of your Empire, but I deſire of you onely my own and my poore peoples Lives which ſome would overthrow, Deſtroy, and Maſſacree by an horrible and bloody Butchery. Sir, I ought no longer to diſguiſe any thing to your Majeſty; God hath made me be born of that Nation, which is given for a Prey under your Authority, and deſtin'd to the Shambels. It is me that they aime at; If they had gone about onely to make me and my People Slaves, I would have held my peace, and ſtifled my groans. But Sir, what have I done, that my Throat ſhould be cut, after I ſhall have ſeen the Bloud of my neareſt Kindred ſhed before mine Eyes, to be thrown as the laſt Sacrifice, upon a great heap of Dead Bodies, and Buried in the Ruines of my dear Countrey? Alas, Sir, ſhew us Mercy, You that are the Mildeſt of all Princes, reſtore me my ſoul, and the lives of my whole Nation.

The King entered into an Admiration of Extaſie upon theſe Words, and ſaid to the Queen,

I know not to what this Diſcourſe tends, or where the Man or the Authority is, that dares do this without my command.

Then ſhe replyes, He, to whom your Majeſty hath given your Seal, that Traytor, and perfidious Haman, It is he that hath cauſed bloudy Letters to be written through all the Provinces, to deliver me and my People up to Death, and know Sir, that his cruelty rebounds upon your head.

Haman quickly perceived that he was a loſt man, and the Paleneſſe of Death came at the ſame inſtant into his Face; The King riſes from the Table, and walks into the Garden, that was hard by, to chew upon his Choler.

The Queen that had put her ſelf into a Melancholy, caſts her ſelf down upon the Bed. Haman throwes himſelf at her feet, and as a man that is drowning, layes hold on what ere he meets with, He beſeeches her, he Urges her, he Conjures her to ſhew him Mercy, and in ſaying ſo bowed himſelf down upon the Bed, and approached very near unto her.

The King entring at the ſame time into the Chamber, and finding him in that Poſture; How (ſayes he) will he alſo violate the Queen, my Wife, in my Preſence, and in my Houſe? Let ſome body take him away. Inſtantly they come, and cover his Face as they were wont to do to thoſe that were carried away to Puniſhment, and one of the Eunuchs thought of, ſaying, That he had prepared a pair of Gallows of fifty Cubites high, for Mordecai the Preſerver of the Kings Life.

It is that which is his Due, (anſwered Ahaſuerus) and let him be hanged ſuddenly upon the Gibbet that he hath ſet up.

This was executed without delay, there being no body that was not extream joyfull of his Ruine. Mordecai was called to the Palace, to take his Place, and to Govern all the Houſhold of the Queen, that now acknowledged him in the preſence of the King her huſband, for her Uncle.

Heſter afterward beſeech'd the King, to command Diſpatches to be ſent through all the Provinces, to countermand, and to make void the Letters of Death which cruell Haman had cauſed already to be ſpread through all the Kingdome. This was found very reaſonable, and they were forthwith Expedited in theſe Termes.

Artaxerxes the Soveraign Lord and King, of all the Nations that are from India to Ethiopia, To the Princes and Governours of the ſeven and twenty Provinces of our Empire, Greeting.

Many abuſing through their Pride, the Goodneſſe of Princes, and the Honours that have been given them, do not onely endeavour to oppreſſe People, but alſo by a deteſtable Felony, to attempt upon the Life of their Benefactours, not being able to bear the Weight of the Glory, to which they are Exalted.

They are not contented to be Ingratefull for Benefits, and to Violate the Laws of Humanity, but perſwade themſelves, that, though they runne out into ſo great Crimes, they ſhall eſcape the Judgments of that Great God, from whom nothing is Concealed. Their Fury is ſo irregulated, that though they be defiled with all ſorts of Vices, they Accuſe thoſe that are Innocent, and obſerve punctually all the Juſtneſſe of their Duty, endeavouring to ruine them by the Artifices and Juglings of their Lyes. And for this they ſurpriſe the Ear of Kings, who have an Heart full of Goodneſſe and Sincerity, meaſuring thoſe that are near their Perſons by their own Diſpoſitions.

The Proof of this may be found in Antient Stories, and even in thoſe of our Dayes too, which ſhew ſufficiently how the Good Intentions of Kings, are Corrupted by the wicked Counſels of their Miniſters and Servants.

For this Reaſon we ought to give order for the Peace of our Provinces, and if we are Conſtrained to make you a Countermand, know, that it proceeds rather from the neceſſity of the Times, then from the inconſtancy of our Reſolutions.

It is neceſſary, that you ſhould underſtand that Haman the ſon of Amadatha a Macedonian by Nation and Affection, after he had been promoted by our Goodneſſe to the ſecond Place of our Kingdome, hath defiled by his Cruelty the effects of our Piety, and hath puffed himſelf up with ſo great an Arrogance, as to have dared to attempt to deprive us of our Sceptre, and of our Life. For he reſolved to cauſe Mordecai to Dye, to whoſe Fidelity I owe my preſervation, and to deſtroy with him Heſter the Companion of our Bed, and of our Sceptre with her whole Nation, by Inventions pernicious, and till this time unheard of.

He hoped by this means, that having taken away our Conſervatours, he might ſurpriſe us in a Dereliction, and tranſlate the Kingdome of the Perſians to the Macedonians.

But

But we have discovered, that the Jews destined to death by this wicked Villain, are without fault, That they use good Laws, and that they are the true Children of the most High, most Great, and Ever-living God, by whom the Empire is given and preserved to us.

And for this Reason, we make void and disannul the Letters that he hath directed to you in our Name, to cause them to be Murthered, making you to know that the Authour of the Lye hath been hanged upon the Gallowes at the Gate of Shushan, God rendering to him that which he hath deserved.

Furthermore, we Will and Ordain that the Jews live in all our Provinces according to their Law and Ceremonies, and that you assist them in bringing their Enemies to Punishment the same day that they had determined to destroy them, seeing that the God Almighty hath turned to them into Joy that day of Tears and Grief.

And since that that is Important even for our Life and Preservation, We Command that that Day be put in the number of the Feasts, that Posterity may know the Recompenses of our Faithfull Servants, and the Punishment of those that oppose our Will, and make attempt upon our State.

And if there be any Province or City that refuses to solemnize that very Day with Joyes and Chearfulnesse befitting it, we Will that it be destroyed with Fire and Sword, and that it be made inaccessible to Men and Beasts to perpetuity, to give an Example to others by the punishment of their contempt and Disobedience.

The Commands of the King were diligently executed, and the Jews Dreaded and Honoured in all places by reason of the great Credit that Mordecai had with the King his Master.

It seemed that the Sunne was risen a new for these people heretofore afflicted, and that Heaven powred down upon them blessings in abundance. There was nothing every where but Joyes, but Dances, but Feasts, in Testimony of so publick an alacrity. But it is clear that Hester held yet somewhat of the Old Testament in the searching out of the enemies of her Nation, and in the Revenge that she caused to be exercised every where upon them that had sworne her Ruine.

Haman's House was given her, and ten of his Sons hanged to accompany the punishment of their Father. Five hundred men were slain in Shushan for having adhered to that miserable man, and through all the rest of the Cities of the Kingdome, much blood was shed on the same day that had been assigned for the Massacres of the Hebrews.

We must avow that this History is Wonderfully Tragicall, and one of the most wonderfull Revolutions of Fortune that ever arrived to Great ones, to make Posterity feare the Judgements of a God whose Hand is as weighty in the Chastisement of Crimes, as his Eye quick-sighted in the discerning of Hearts.

The SOULDIERS.

JOSHUA. JUDAS MACCABEUS.

HE must be ignorant of the chief and most visible of beauties that knowes not Joshua. One cannot see the Sun without remembring the great commerce that this Valourous Captain had with the King of Stars. All the World lift their eyes up to it, but none hath ever lifted his voyce as far as it, to make himself be heard, and to make himself to be obeyed. The Stars knew Joshua because he bore the Name of him that formed them; It is he that first gave us the fore-tasts of the name of Jesus, at which the Heaven, the Earth, and Hell do bend the knee.

What lovely thing had not this generous Joshua, seeing one cannot name him without mentioning Salvation, which is the wish and content of all men? Who would think that such a spirit had been born and bred in servitude? And yet he was Pharaohs slave, he was as the rest in the chain, that was at that time common to all his people. Those were very patient that could endure it, but he was far more valiant that found a means to break it.

When in his little infancy he played upon the banks of the River of Nile with the other prisoners, he then strook terrour into all its flotes, and the Angels of Egypt, knew that he should tread under his feet the pride Pharaoh, and carry away the spoils of that proud kingdome so many times cemented with the blood of his brethren. He did every thing by Moses's orders, and Moses did nothing without him. If one was the eye of his people, the other was the arm; if one was the Conductour of them, the other was the Protectour. If one had the Providence, the other reserved to himself the execution which is ordinarily the most difficult piece of Prudence.

Moses lifted up his hands to Heaven, and Joshua his Arms upon the head of the enemies of God; the one combated with the lipps, and the other with the sword; the one poured out oyl and wine upon the Altars, the other shed the bloud of the wicked to make a sacrifice to the justice of the Sovereign Monarch.

He was inclined to war by the disposition of God himself, he received the sword as from his hands, and wore it fifty seven years alwayes in assaults, alwayes in defenses, alwayes in various encountres, and in bloody battels, for the safety and the glory of his Nation.

He hath reaped more Palms, then heaven hath stars, he made as many combats as journeyes, and gained as many victories as he gave battels. Happinesse never deliberated whether she should follow his undertakings. She was under him as a souldier in pay, and whither one carried his Standarts, the other incontinently displaied her wings to cover them. They never brake asunder, and hazard that hath often a foot so slippery, found firm ground when it was covered with the arms of Joshua.

He affronted Gyants that seemed to have been born onely for the terrour of Mankind. He tumbled down towers of flesh, and trod under feet Monsters that the most valiant durst not so much as look on. He took Cities whose walls and Citadels were so high that they seemed to be lost in heaven.

The Plains of Makkedah of Libnah, of Lachish, of Debir, of Hebron, of Gilgal, of Gezer, and of Jericho bear yet the seeds of his Lawrels. Eglon and Ai preserve his Trophes which are yet standing after they have seen the ruines of the Pyramids of Egypt. But Gibeon carries away the price of his victories, seeing that it was it that saw the Sun stand still upon his Conquest.

Plato and Aristotle that hold the heavens and the Stars, animated Julius Firmicus that believes them filled with sence and with prudence, would not have failed to tell us here, that it was the love and the admiration of the valour of that great Captain, that tyed the Sun by insensible chains in the middst of his firmament, and that he could not endure to set before he had seen the end of that famous battell; he could see nothing amongst our Antipodes that came near this spectacle; he esteemed his Light more noble and more precious for that it had shone that very Day even upon the Valour of the most rare Man of the whole Earth.

and

But the Scripture teaches us, that the chief of the Luminaries of heaven stood for that time immovable, not by any understanding that it had, but by obedience that it rendred to its Creatour, seeing the Creatour himself would obey the voyce of a man. All the Militia of heaven desired to be of the Party, the Moon and the Starres waited upon their King, and would not move one step that was not troden according to his measures.

After this do we think it strange that the Rivers turned about their Passages to favour Joshua's, and that the sacred Jordan was sensible of the foot-steps of a mortall man, to whom the Heavens themselves gave some veneration?

Millions of men grew pale with fear when they saw one single man with his sword in hand; The walls of Cities fell to the ground, though he did not touch them but with his eyes.

The onely presence of one Joshua was worth an hundred Regiments; The souldiers thought nothing impossible under him, and by him the enemies esteem'd themselves vanquished as soon as seen.

What may one say of a Generall that subdued thirty and one Kings, that brake so many Sceptres, that saw so many Crowns and Diadems at his feet? One sole Victory carried away upon a Monarch caused the Roman Captains to be seen in a Chariot of Ivory drawn by white Horses, and sometimes by Elephants and Lyons: Sesostres King of the Egyptians four Kings to be tyed to his Coach, for that he had conquered them in battell. But our Joshua, a subduer of Pride as well as men, desires no exteriour pomp to honour his deeds of valour. It sufficed him that God Triumphed in him, and would not have any other glory, but to be under the feet of him that marches upon the wings of the winds, and upon the head of Cherubins.

He was not onely a valiant Souldier, and wise Genetall, but at last the Judge and Prince of his people, Great in Arms and in Laws, and accomplished in all sort of virtues. The Israelites thinking one day that Moses their Conductour had been lost in the Wildernesse, desired the High-Priest Aaron to make them a God to supply his default; But after that Moses was dead, and that they beheld Joshua seated in his place, they desired no more any other Deity, because they perceived in him the liveliest impression that man can have of God upon the earth.

Vertues that seemed most contrary were reconciled in him, and made but one sole visage of perfection. Piety made nothing soft in his Courage, nor Courage any thing fierce in his Piety. Heigth of Spirit found that she was compatible with Meeknesse. Activenesse went the same pace with providence, and the most Illustrious of glories reposed in him under the shadow of humility. Justice in him did not offend Clemency; He imitated the living God that is mercifull even as farre as Hell. He punished Crimes with a zeal mixt with ardour and compassion; and when he caused Achan that sacrilegeous man to dye, at the time that his hand was stiffe to hold the ballance of Justice in an equality, he felt in his heart a tendernesse that made him give death to the culpable as a benefit, though others took it for a punishment.

But let us remember while we speak of Joshua that God hath covered him with the rayes of glory; to teach us, that we are constrained to cover his brave acts in silence.

To conclude, He to whom nothing was wanting but immortality, dyed as a setting Sun, animating his people with the spirit that went out of his body: and some hold that the Hebrews put upon his Tomb the figure of a Sun, as if they would say that he was amongst men that which the Sun is amongst the stars, and that there is nothing even as far as the shadow of death, that hath not kindled for him lights of Immortality.

JUDAS MACCABEVS.

WHatsoever Virtue hath of Great, whatsoever Valour hath of Generous met in the person of Judas Maccabeus to make a mervell of his life, and an Immortall memory of his Name.

God caused him to be born in a deplorable age, in the time that King Antiochus surnamed the Illustrious raised that horrible persecution against the Jews, that made the heavens to weep, and the earth to blush with bloud. It was a sport to that Barbarous man to profane holy things, and a continuall exercise to flea and roast Men, or to throw them into boyling Caldrons, without having any other crime but dying for the true Religion. The cruelty of the torments overcomes the weak, and shakes even the strongest; The Altars overturn'd upon the bleeding Priests, the children strangled in the bosome of their sighing Mothers, the flames that without distinction devoured the sacred and profane, the Houses that seemed now but dens of Beasts, presented to the world an hideous spectacle that gave more desire to dye, then courage to live.

Amidst these desolations was found a gallant old man named Matathias, the father of many sonnes all men of valour, who went out of Jerusalem to retire himself in the City of Modin. There he assembled all those of his family, who were followed of whatsoever remained yet of most courageous to oppose themselves against the fury of the Tyrant, and to retein the remnants of the true Piety. As soon as the infidels had heard that a little handfull of men assaid to subtract themselves from their puissance, and refused to make open profession of the Religion of the Pagans, they failed not hastily to send unto them a Lieutenant of the Kings, that summoned Matathias to render up himself with all his men, and to offer Incense to the Idols. But this virtuous man assembling his sons and his allies said thus unto them,

It would be to be too much in love with Life, to be willing to spare and keep it in the losse of the true Religion. I am sorry that I ever entred into the world, when I consider the time to which God hath reserv'd my age to see the disasters of my people, and the desolation of holy Jerusalem abandoned to the pillage of ra-pinous hands, and to the prophanation of the impious. Her Temple hath been handled as the object of all reproches, and those Vessels of Glory that served for the Ministery of the Living God, hath been taken away by violence. We have seen her streets covered with dead bodies, and the little children having their throats cut upon the Carcases of their Fathers. And what Nation hath not possessed our heritages, and is not inriched with our spoils? The holinesse of the Temple hath not stayed sacrilegious hands, and so many slaves of that proud City, have not been able to preserve themselves from flames. After this, what interest can we have in life, unlesse it be to revenge the quarrell of God? I am promised all the honours and all the goods that I can reasonably hope for, If I will obey the King Antiochus, and range my self on the party of those that have so basely betraied their faith. But God forbid, that I should ever fall into such a prostitution of Judgment or of courage. When all those of my nation shall have conspired to forsake their Law, to obey the time, and to accommodate themselves to the Prince's will, I can answer for my self and for my children, and for my brothers, assuring my self of their Generosity that they will never do any thing that is base. Let all those that shall have a zeal to the true Religion joyn themselves to us, and know that amongst so many miseries there is nothing better, then to mark with their blood the way of Safety and of Glory, to give example to Posterity.

In the mean time the Kings Commissioners pressed every one to declare himself, and to sacrifice, whereupon a man of the people of the Jewes, whether he was frighted by the terrour of the punishments, or allured by the promise of rewards, stepped forth to sacrifice upon an Altar set up in publick, and dedicated to the false Deities, But Matathias having looked steddily upon him felt his heart enflamed with a violent heat of the zeal that possessed him, and running to that Apostate, killed him with his own hand, and laid him dead upon the Altar, making him serve for an offering in the place to which he came to be a Priest. He added to him also that Lieutenant of the King that commanded them to offer those sacrifices of abominations, and declared open warre to all the Infidels that would constrain them to forsake their Law.

It is a wonderfull thing to consider the power of a man in zeal that contemns his life, and is ambitious of death. This holy old man began an army with five sons that he had and a few kinsmen. He quitted the City of Modin, where he could not be the stronger, to entrench himself upon a mountain, whither those that were zealous for the defence of the antient piety arrived from all sides with their wives, their children, and their flocks; all resolved to live, or to dye with the Illustrious Maccabeans. Matathias seeing his army every day increase, did brave exploits of warre so that he was not contented to beat back the Infidels, but assaulted them even in their trenches, and chased them away, which gave him all liberty to demolish the prophane Altars that they had erected in many places, to cause Circumcision to be administred to little Infants, and to recover the sacred books out of the hand of the enemyes.

In fine, this valorous Captain, after many Combats, seeing his last day approch made a long oration to his children, enflaming them to the zeal of their Religion against the Tyranny of King Antiochus, and, after he had given them Judas Maccabeus for their Chief, and Simeon for their Counsell, blessed them, and shut up his life by a most glorious end.

Judas, that had been a good Souldier under his Father, became a great Commander amongst his brethren, and continued the design that had been traced out unto him by the virtue of their Ancestours, employing all his power to raise again the Trophies of the God of Hosts that had been thrown down by the fury of the Infidels.

I find that this great Cavalier founded his whole life upon Conscience, and Honour, which he alwayes esteemed above all that is precious in Nature and recommendable to Grace. He believed even in perfection a God Sovereignly Almighty, that hath an eye always open upon the actions of men, that is the distributour of Glory, and the Revenger of Iniquities, and held firmly that he was to be acknowledged and adored by the worship and the Ceremonies ordained in the law of his Fathers; and therefore embraced with an Incomparable ardour the true Religion, using his uttermost endeavour to practice, defend, and maintain it, to the prejudice of goods, life, honour, and of all that is esteemed dearest in the world. He yielded himself to be totally conducted by Providence, which he held to preside in all Battels, so that he measured not victories by the multitude of souldiers, by arms, by fortresses, by ammunitions of warre, but assured himself that there was a secret Providence from above, that made all the happinesse and misery of men.

From thence it came that he had a wonderfull confidence in the Divine Protection, believing himself to be beloved of God, whom he loved reciprocally more by sincerity of affection, then by exteriour Pomp; He never went to fight but he fore-armed himself with strong and ardent prayers, he never undertook to give battell, but he exhorted his men to implore the assistance of God upon their Arms.

He also shewed himself very sensible of the favours of Heaven, and desired that God should first of all triumph in all the good successes that accompanied his Standards; which he expressed visibly, when, having defeated the Generals of King Antiochus in manifold assaults, and gotten a little rest to his dear countrey; he took a pressing care to cause the Temple to be repaired and cleansed, that had been horribly profaned by the Infidels.

It was an incomparable joy to all the people, when after so many desolations that had preceded, he celebrated a Triumphant Dedication, by which he caused the hopes of his Nation to reflourish. His cares extended even beyond the World wherein we live, and one may well affirm, that he was the first of the Antient Fathers of the Old Testament, that expressed more openly the charitable offices that ought to be rendred to the souls of the Deceased. This manifestly appears in an encounter which he had with Gorgias Generall of the Army of the Enemy, in which he lost some Souldiers, and when he came to visit the field of battell to view the Dead, and to cause them to be carried to the Sepulchre of their Fathers, he found that some amongst them had in their clothes certain pieces of the offerings presented to the Idols, thinking perhaps that it was lawfull for them to accommodate themselves with it for their use, though in effect the Law forbad it. This gave a shock at first unto his conscience that was very delicate, and he deplored the unhappinesse of those forsaken people, that had loaded themselves with profane Booties, yet when he thought that that befell them more for want of consideration, and by the hope of some little gain, then by any consent that they had given to Idolatry, he sent twelve thousand Drachmes into Jerusalem, to cause Sacrifices to be offered for the rest of their Souls.

This made him to be honoured with very particular favours of heaven; for he hath been sometimes seen in a combat environed with celestiall virtues that watched for his protection, and filled his enemies with terror. His very very dreams were not without a myſtery, witneſſe that which ſhewed him the Prophet Jeremy, and the high Prieſt Onias, who prayed before the face of God for the ſafety of the People; the former of which two put into his hand a guilded ſword, telling him that it was that wherewith he ſhould bring down to the earth the enemies of his Religion.

The great love that he had for God reflected it ſelf continually towards his neighbour, on whom he contemplated the image of the firſt beauty. He bore in his heart all that were afflicted, and burned with a moſt ardent love for the good of his dear countrey. The zeal of Juſtice poſſeſſed his ſoul, and he had no greater delights in the world, then to ſuccour widows, orphans, and all neceſſitous perſons. They ran to him as to their true Father; they ranged themſelves under the ſhadow of his virtue, and found there a refreſhment in their moſt parching heats. His converſation was ſweet, his ſpeech affable, his manners without avarice. He never ſold his Protection, nor made any Traffick of his Valour. He knew not what it was to buy his neighbours lands, to build palaces, to plant orchards, to make gardens, and to heap up treaſures. He was rich for the poor, and poor for himſelf, living as a man untyed from all things elſe, and faſtned to virtue alone by an indiſſoluble knot of duty.

His Temperance paſſed even to admiration, ſo greatly did he contemne thoſe pleaſures and delights that others regard as their chief felicity. He never dreamed of cauſing the beautifull women-priſoners to be preſerved for himſelf, becauſe he was skilfull in the trade of defending Ladies honours rather then aſſaulting them. He never had any Miſtreſſe, being perpetually Maſter of himſelf, and one ſhall have work enough to find out his wives name; it is not read that he had any other children but Virtues and Victories. He lived as an Eſſean eſtranged from all the pleaſures of the fleſh, and taſted no other contentment in the world, then to do great actions. He never enterpriſed the warre againſt King Antiochus to make himſelf great, and to reign, but for the pure love of his Religion and dear countrey.

Traytours and corrupted ſpirits blame him for having taken up arms, ſaying, That it behoved them rather to ſuffer the Deſtinies then to make them. That it behoved them to obey the Powers that God had ſet over their heads. That it was a great raſhneſſe to think to reſiſt the forces of all Aſia with a little handfull of ſouldiers; that it could not chuſe but provoke the conquerours, and draw upon the vanquiſhed a deluge of calamities.

The world hath been full in all times of certain condeſcending Philoſophers, who accommodate themſelves to every thing that they may not diſaccommodate themſelves for virtue. They care not what viſage is given to Piety, ſo that they find therein their own advantages. By how much the more mens ſpirits are refined to ſearch out reaſons to colour the toleration of vices, by ſo much the more their courages are weakned, and neglect to maintain themſelves in duty. There are ſome that had rather lie ſtill in the dirt then take the pains to ariſe out of it.

Judas conſidered that King Antiochus was not contented with having brought the Jews to a common ſervitude, but would overthrow all their Laws, and aboliſh entirely their Religion. He did not believe that it was lawfull for him to abandon cowardly the intereſts of God. He thought that there are times wherein one ought rather deſtroy ones ſelf with courage, then preſerve ones ſelf with ſluggiſhneſſe. He looked not ſo much upon his ſtrength as upon his duty. He perſwaded himſelf that a good Cauſe cannot be forſaken of God, and that we ought to eſſay to ſerve him, applying our wills to his orders, and leaving all the ſucceſſe of our works to his diſpoſall.

This great zeal that he had of Juſtice was accompanied with a well tempered prudence. As he never let looſe himſelf in that which was abſolutely of the Law, ſo did he never uſe to rack himſelf by unprofitable ſcruples that are ordinary enough to thoſe that are zealous through indiſcretion. Some of his Nation ſhewed themſelves ſo ſuperſtitious, that being aſſaulted by their enemies on the Satturday, they let their throats be cut, as ſheep, without the leaſt reſiſtance, for fear of violating the Sabbath if they ſhould put themſelves upon a defence. Judas following the example of his father Matathias took away that errour, which tended to the generall deſolation of his countrey, and ſhewed by lively reaſons, that God who hath obliged us to the preſervation of our ſelves by the Law of Nature, had never ſuch an intention as to give us for a prey to our enemies by an indiſcreet ſuperſtition. That it was a good work to defend the Altars and ones countrey againſt the Infidels, and that it was not to break the Sabboth, but rather to ſanctifie it.

Following theſe pathes, he was the firſt of all the Jews that made a League with the Romans, which hath ſeemed a little harſh to Rupertus and ſome other Divines. But we muſt conſider what Saint Paul ſaith, That if all commerce with the Gentiles had been forbidden to the Jews, and to the firſt Chriſtians, they ſhould have been conſtrained rather to go out of the world then converſe in it. Never did this great Captain in his moſt preſſing neceſſities cauſe the Roman ſouldiers to come into Paleſtine, fearing leſt their approach might bring ſome damage and profanation to an Holy Land. But foraſmuch as he ſaw himſelf environed all round with Kings that bowed under the puiſſance of the Roman Empire, he thought that it would be convenient to endeavour to gain their friendſhip to obtain more eaſily Juſtice againſt the oppreſſions of his neighbours. He employed the power of the Infidels not to torment the faithfull but to ruine infidelity. He ſought to thoſe into whoſe hands God had put the Power to have the exerciſe of it to the glory of him that had communicated it to them; this was not a crime, but a moſt exquiſite piece of prudence.

The falſe high Prieſt Alcimus, Judas's adverſary, did not uſe the matter ſo, who cauſed the Armies of Antiochus to come to the deſtruction of the Altars and to the maſſacre of his brethren, which cauſed him to be ſmitten with a ſtroak from heaven, and rendred him execrable to the memory of men.

But we muſt acknowledge that of all the great qualities that hath ſhined in this ſo famous man, Valour hath alwayes held one of the upper ranks. He was made for Military virtue, and furniſhed with all the neceſſary conditions that make Generalls of Armies and Conquerours. An elevated birth, an happy beginning that he had made under his father, ſcience of Warre, Authority, Happineſſe, Vigilancy, Activeneſſe, Boldneſſe, Government, and whatſoever is beſt in the profeſſion of Arms, had contributed to make of him the wonder of his age. He was a Lion's heart, that found ſecurity in dangers, and would not have even Crowns themſelves, if he did not pluck them out of the midſt of thorns. One cannot read without admiration the two books of the Maccabees, in conſidering the great progreſſes that he made in ſo little time, and ſo many various encounters. In the ſpace of ſix years he ſuſtained the great and prodigious forces of three Kings of Asia, opposing himself with a little flying Camp against Armies of fourty, sixty, an hundred thousand men, which he put into disorder and confusion. He defeated in ranged battels and in divers combats, nine Generalls of the Infidels, killing some with his own hand, and carrying away their spoils.

The first amongst them was Apollonius, who was of an high repute in Antiochus his Reign, because that he had been employed in the principall businesses of the Realm, treating with the Romans and the Egyptians for his Master. It is the very same that entred into Jerusalem with an army of two and twenty thousand men, and under pretence of Peace made there an horrible spoil. Assoon as he had heard that Judas Maccabeus had put himself into the field with a strength very little considerable, he thought that being Governour of Syria, and of Phenicia, and at that time upon the place, the businesse concerned him above all others: and therefore he collects together great troops to stop the progresse of the Jews, and to succeed with all security. But the valorous Maccabeus prevented him so vigorously, that he had not the leasure well to bethink himself: he gave him battle, wherein his men, seeing the assaults of the faithfull people that seemed the assaults of giants, began to stagger. Whatsoever pains he took to rally them, fear had so farre gained upon them, that they destroyed themselves for fear of being destroyed. Judas, by Joseph Gorians report, made that day the heads of his enemies to fall under his cuttle-ax as fast as the ears of corn fall under the hook of the reaper. He chose Apollonius out of the middle of his best souldiers and ran to him, challenging him to a duel, in which the other was overcom in the sight of a trembling army, and Judas took away his sword which he used the rest of his dayes in so many glorious combats.

Seron that was Lieutenant under Apollonius, pushed on with vengeance and with glory that made him long since seek out an occasion to make himself renowned, thinking that Apollonius his defeat was but a stroke of Fortune, and that he should quickly bring Judas into good order, rallyed all his forces, increasing his army as much as possibly he could; which gave at first a great terrour to the Hebrews, seeing that the heads of that Hydra which they thought had been cut off pushed forth so suddenly. They had journied and fasted the very day of the combat, and seemed all discouraged, but Judas exhorted them with an ardent speech that put fire and spirit into all his Army. It fell so opportunely upon the enemy, that Seron thought he had to do rather with hungry wolves then men; and although he came with a great deal of bravery to the encountre, he quickly perceived that he had sung the Triumph before the Victory, and had very much ado to retire with a whole skin, contenting himself to run away after he had had the hope of conquering.

Lysias, that was the Almighty under King Antiochus, grew mad to see himself out-braved by so small an army of men, contemptible, and knew not what account to give the King his Master, to whom he had promised to root out the remainders of the Jewish people, so that there should not be any memory of them left behind. He chose on divers occasions three of the best Generalls of all the Armies, which were Ptolomy, Gorgias, and Nicanor. Ptolomy made not any great brags; Gorgias was vain enough to promise himself the victory, and perswaded himself that he was very dreadfull. But Judas, though he had then but three thousand men badly armed, defeated him, and took his camp which was filled with great riches; which gave a great temptation to the Jewish Army that desired nothing but readily to throw themselves upon the booty. Yet their Conductour that knew the art of Warre, and that many busying themselves about the spoils had lost their honour and their life, gave a strict command that they should not touch that prey of the Infidels before the defeat was perfected, and thereupon set himself to pursue his enemies that were in a disorder, and after he had killed a good number of them, put the rest to flight.

Nicanor that was the third of those Generalls, after he had experimented the valour of Judas with the losse of his men, resolved not to commit his reputation to the incertainty of combats, but put off the Lions skin to take the Foxes, endeavouring to surprise Judas by treachery, seeing that he was impregnable by force. He made as though he sued to him for Peace, and under colour of friendship to draw him to a parley, wherein he had a design to seize upon him, thinking that it was the shortest way to end the Warre. But Judas took good order for the security of his person, and diverted that wicked design that the other had upon him. The Agreement that was esteemed a meer dissembling failed not to succeed: the two Generalls saw each other, and having promised faithfulnesse to one another, Nicanor entred into Jerusalem, and expressed much cordialnesse to the Maccabean, whether he was taken with the admiration of his virtues, and the charms of his conversation, or that he employed all those caresses to deceive him; Yet they were so visible, that they gave a jealousie to the King by the reports of some ill tongues, that rendred the familiarity of Judas and Nicanor suspected to the State. He was constrained to take a journey to the Court to justifie himself thereon, and was dismissed with an expresse command to send the Maccabean bound in chains unto the city of Antioch, if he would that his justifications should be believed. He returned then into Judea continuing alwayes his impostures, but Judas having been advertised of it, distrusted him, and left Jerusalem to retire himself unto Samaria. Nicanor caused the Priests to be summoned, to deliver him up alive or dead, and in case they did refuse, he threatned to profane the Temple, and to make a dedication of it to the false Deities. The Priests having protested to him that it was not in their power, since Judas had forsooke their city, he retired with an intention to make an exact inquest after him, and to carry him prisoner to the King.

But he seeing that the danger was very great, stifned his courage, and resolved himself rather to die like a gallant man, then to let himself be taken like a sitstill. He disposed his whole army by extraordinary devotions and exhortations that were all of fire, as being to enterprize one of the most important combats. Nicanor caused his troops to march who were of a great number, and concluded to give battle on a Saturday, believing that the day of Rest would make him a better market of the enemies bloud. He had in his Army some Jews that followed him, either by a voluntary Apostacy, or by necessity, that at that time advertised him that he would do well to deferre the day of so dangerous a battle, by reason that it was dedicated to Rest. But he demanded thereupon who he was that had ordained that day of Sabbath to countenance their sloth? They answered him, that it was the God of heaven that had destined it for his glory; whereto he replyed, That that God of heaven should content himself to make Laws in his own Dominion, but that he, that was the Almighty here on earth, commanded them to march for the businesse of the King. He was carried away with choler and precipitation, which are two very dangerous rocks in the beginning of a battle, beſides the vengeance of God purſued him as the chief of all blaſphemers. He fought ſo ill, that having been defeated by Judas, he left thirty and five thouſand dead upon the place, whoſe number he augmented, finding himſelf involved in the common miſery. The Conquerour cauſed his body to be ſought out, and commanded that his head ſhould be cut off, and the hand that he had ſtretched out againſt the Altars, ordering them to be hanged up in very remarkable places to be beheld by all the world: the Tongue that had blaſphemed againſt God was plucked out of his palate, and given for a prey to the birds of rapine. Such was the end of that blaſphemer, who hath made us ſee, that a man never deſpiſes God in his life, but he experiments the arrows of his vengeance at his death. He ſhould make a long diſcourſe that would follow in the trace all the valorous acts of Judas. I content my ſelf, my Reader, to ſet before your eyes all that is moſt illuſtrious, and to make you ſee how God fought for Judas and his brethren under the Reign of ſix Kings, with whom they had great buſineſſe to ſcuffle for.

two

The firſt and the moſt capitall of their enemies was that Antiochus ſurnamed the Illuſtrious, who was a factious ſpirit, turbulent, and enraged, that had undertaken to deſtroy the whole Nation of the Jews, becauſe they had rejoyced at the preſages of his death. One onely expedition that he made unto Jeruſalem to revenge himſelf, coſt the liberty or the life of fourſcore thouſand ſouls, the entire deſolation of the Temple, pillaged, ranſacked, and profaned even ſo farre, as that there was ſeen in it a Statue of Jupiter Olympian upon the Altar. After all theſe diſaſtres he left Lyſias his Lieutenant to extirpate the remainders of the Jewiſh people, and drew away to the coaſts of Perſia to make ſome new pillages. It was a King that Daniel calls the Impudent, becauſe he had neither God, nor Conſcience, nor Faith, nor Government, alwayes carried away by an impetuous flux of his own paſſions that transfigured him into the ſavageſt of all beaſts.

After a Reign of twelve years he finiſhed his life by a moſt horrible end, which made it viſible enough that God combated for his Macchabe, and for all the faithfull people. The Scripture ſaith, That that wicked man that often paſſed from profuſion to neceſſity without ever ſeparating himſelf from an inſatiable avarice, having heard that there was a Temple very rich in the city of Perſepolis, and that was filled with gold and ſilver, and all the moſt exquiſite rarities that Alexander the Great had left there, reſolved to take the City, and pillage the Temple, as he had done that of Jeruſalem: But the inhabitants having had intelligence of his deſign beat him back with much confuſion and great loſſe of his men, in the ruine of which he ſaw himſelf almoſt overwhelmed.

As he returned from that voyage in a very ſhamefull diſorder, he heard of the great ſucceſſes of our Macchabee, and of the routing of the Lieutenants, and of the forces that he had left behind him in Judea. This news arriving at a croſſe time ſtruck him upon his wounds, and pierced him to the heart with a lively and pricking grief. He fumed againſt heaven, he deteſted his fortune and his life, and ſwore that he would make no more of Jeruſalem but a common tomb of all the inhabitants of the City.

He haſtned with great marches for that effect, and was ſmitten with a ſtroke from heaven as inviſible as it was afterward uncureable. He that had plucked out the bowels of ſo many innocents felt himſelf tormented with a furious collick, and with a multitude of infernall pains, that in a moment deprived him of his appetite, of his reſt, and of all the joyes of life; and as evils ordinarily enough come upon the neck of one another, it happened that whiles he cauſed himſelf to be drawn in his caroch with too much precipitation, he fell, and got a wound by that fall, wherein corruption and worms ſuddenly aroſe that infeſted that miſerable body after a ſtrange manner. The ſtink of it was ſo great that all the army ſented the infection of it, and he himſelf had very much ado to endure himſelf.

Sometimes he entred into great choler that made him vomit out execrable blaſphemies, ſometimes he ſuffered himſelf to be carried away by lamentations unſeemly to his dignity, deploring the loſſe of that eſtate which was ſo beautifull, ſo ſtately, ſo triumphant, filled with honours, with health, with contentments and delights. Sometimes he paſſed into black affrights, and felt ſtinging remorſes for his life paſt, ſaying, that all his miſery came from having profaned the Temple of Jeruſalem, and made ſo bloudy a butchery of that poor people; that he perceived at preſent, that there was a ſovereign power in heaven to whom all Kings do owe obedience, and that it is an unmeaſureable folly for men to equall themſelves with God. Furthermore, he proteſted, that if he recovered his health, he would make reparation for all his faults by an extraordinary piety, filling with riches the Temple that he had pillaged, and uſing the Jews with all courteſies, and all liberalities poſſible for a great King; adding to all this, that he would make profeſſion of the Jews Religion, and would become a ſervant of the true God. This wicked man had his mouth open to ſorrows, and to vows, but God had no ears for him, and it was in vain to ſeek for mercy after he had ſo many times deſpiſed it. At laſt he rendred up his criminall ſoul after a Reign of twelve years, to ſuffer an eternity of puniſhments.

One may obſerve in many Hiſtories, that ſome very bloudy Tyrants have not ended by the ſword, but that God hath laid his hand upon them by ſome ſtrange malady and viſible ſtrokes, that have made them die ſlowly, and rendred them ſpectatours of their own diſhonour, and of their own funeralls. So died Herod, and Tyberius, Alcimus, Copronymus, and Leo.

This miſerable King left a ſonne behind him of a very ſmall age, named Antiochus Eupator, who was afſoon ſucceſſour of his fathers miſerie as of his Empire. It is a pitifull thing that the children of Sovereign Princes that are born ſo great ſhould not alwaies be born free. Many are like thoſe creatures that bear purple, pearls, and muſk; all that they have of Rich is the cauſe of their deſtruction; men ceaſe not to torment them, and to hunt after them, and if they love them it is onely to have their ſpoils. Eupator for that he was born a King became a ſlave to two of his fathers ſervants that contended for the Regency, and fell together by the ears to poſſeſſe that unfortunate pupill. It is true that Antiochus when he was dying in a ſtrange countrey, called Philip one of his great favourites, and gave him the diadem, the purple royall, and the ring to carry to his ſonne, and recommended him to him as in quality of a Tutour. But Lyſias that had bred up this young Prince from his tender infancy, and held him yet under his government, thought himſelf to be in a good poſſeſſion, and would by no means give it up.

He put off now that countenance of Governour which bare by neceſſity of duty ſome lineaments of ſeverity, and took one of a principall Officer of State, full of attractions and complacency towards his King, who eſteemed himſelf very happy that he was got out of his Wardſhip, and had his liberty. He gained him to him by the taſte he gave him of his greatneſſe and delights, accompanied with a thouſand fair promiſes to make him live the moſt contented and the moſt triumphant Monarch under heaven.

gained

Eupator that found his words true in that manner of life which Lyſias let him leade, and who durſt not anger him, imagining him yet to be his Maſter, ſhewed himſelf entirely for him, rejecting the pretenſions of his adverſary. And that which aided more yet this deſign, was, that the Army of Antiochus that ſeemed ſhould have upheld Philips party was found weak, after it had been evill entreated in a long and tedious voyage. But Lyſias had great forces on foot in Paleſtine, Phenicia, and Syria, who yielded themſelves to his diſpoſall, ſeeing that the young King declared himſelf openly for him. His competitour then began to flatter, conſidering him guarded both with favour and with force; but he ceaſed not to foment his ambitions which made on that occaſion a great havock.

The new Regent, whether through the hatred that he had againſt the Jews, or whether through the deſire that came to him of giving luſtre to the Arms of his young Prince, or whether he was moved to it by the complaints that ordinarily did beat upon his ears about the incurſions and progreſſes of the Macchabe, made a great preparation of warre, and came to fall into Judea. His Army was compoſed of an hundred thouſand foot, twenty thouſand horſe, two and thirty well train'd elephants that were diſtributed into divers legions, and carried wodden towers with great engines upon their backs. Thirty women combated upon them, and about them marched five hundred Cavaliers with a thouſand foot-men.

Judas had the hardineſſe to get him out of the fortreſſe wherein he was to go and view them, and to oppoſe himſelf againſt their deſigns. But aſſoon as he was perceived, the adverſe Army ranged themſelves into a Battalia in the preſence of the young King, who was very early up that day, beginning to reliſh the trade of warre with ſome alacrity. The trumpets began to ſound, and the legions inſtantly were ſpread over the mountains and over the vallies all round about Jeruſalem with ſuch a pomp, as that the earth trembled under the burden of the arms and of the engines of ſo great a train of men of warre. They provoked then their elephants to fight by ſhewing them the juice of grapes and mulberies ſqueezed out. Nothing was heard but ſhouts of ſouldiers, but neighing of horſes, but claſhings of lances and of ſwords, and juſt at the break of day as the Sunne appeared in the Horizon, the guilded bucklers caſt out ſo great a light that all the neighbouring mountains ſeemed to be filled with burning torches.

It is a prodigious thing that the great heart of the Macchabee ſhould march in the head of his army and begin to charge the enemy, which he dealt roughly with, killing at firſt five hundred men of the Kings van-guard without any loſſe of his. But that which ſeemed moſt fearfull, was, that Eleazer a Jewiſh Captain, having perceived an elephant wel armed and pompouſly adorned above the reſt, imagined that the King Eupator combated upon it, and was pricked forward with a generous glory to aſſault and overthrow him. He paſſed through all the ranks of the army of the Infidels that were oppoſed againſt him, and arriv'd even to that terrible beaſt, under which he ſlipt himſelf, and pierced it with his ſword, but finding himſelf cooped in by the multitude of men that were about and over him, he could not make a retreat ſoon enough, but was (as S. Ambroſe ſaid) buried in his triumph.

Yet Judas having perceived the puiſſant forces of the King, ſaw well that the party was not tenable, and made an honourable retreat into Jeruſalem. Lyſias failed not to follow and to beſiege him in his trenches with abundance of engines of ſtone and fire. The other defended himſelf very courageouſly, reſolving rather to bury himſelf in that place then to yield it up by any ſort of baſeneſſe. The beſieged after ſome time were reduced to ſome extremity, being combated by arms, and hunger in a year of reſt, wherein the Jews, according to their cuſtome, had ſowed nothing, and were no more in hopes to gather any fruits. There was every where a very great deſolation, but (as the favours of heaven happen often to good men in the bottome of their miſeries) behold an unexpected accident, that provided farre other buſineſſe for Lyſias and his pupill! Philip took his time, and ſeeing his Rivall buſied in that Jewiſh warre, was reſolved to ruine him, and to make Eupator a companion of his miſery, ſeeing he had rendred himſelf the inſtrument of his will. The deceaſed King had a brother named Demetrius, who was at that time at Rome given in hoſtage, having not the liberty to return unto his Kingdome. Philip pricked with jealouſie againſt Lyſias, failed not to ſolicite that young Prince to ſeize upon the Empire, buſineſſes being not yet well ſettled in the Nonage of King Eupator. It was an injuſtice and perfidiouſneſſe againſt the ſovereign, but foraſmuch as Antiochus the laſt dead father of Eupator had hereunto ſupplanted his Nephew by the ſame artifices, Demetrius left not to hearken to it.

In thoſe fair hopes of the Crown, and in his captivity, he was as a bird that torments himſelf in his cage upon the arrivall of a ſpring, and burned with a ſtrong paſſion to have his diſmiſſion from the Roman Senate, to put in order, as he ſaid, the affairs of the Kingdome, and to aſſiſt the King his nephew after his fathers death. But the Romans that took pity on the pupil by reaſon of Juſtice, and that feared leſt this man would embroil the State, denyed him the liberty that he deſired. Philip failed not to poſſeſſe himſelf of the city of Antioch the Metropolis of the Kingdome, and to tread out the way for Demetrius to his Nephew's throne. There were men ſuborned that ceaſed not to ſow amongſt the ſouldiers and people, That it was not a fundamentall Law in the Kingdome of the Seleucides that the Nephew ſhould precede the uncle, and although men had a mind to introduce it, that the father of the pretended King had abrogated it, uſurping the Sceptre upon his Nephew; that one ſhould do his race no injury to render it the ſame uſage; that there was no reaſon to refuſe a Prince of four and twenty years of age, well made, full of ſpirit, of courage, and authority, to take a child that had neither ſtrength nor counſel, nor induſtry, and which was born for nothing but to ruine all. To this was added, that it was not the bloud of the Seleucides that was upon the Throne, but that Lyſias Reigned, and went about to render himſelf uſurper of the Crown of Aſia, which was the uttermoſt of reproaches that ſo generous a Nation could endure to ſee a man of nothing, inſolent, ſavage, to make himſelf maſter of the moſt conſiderable part of the world, and to exerciſe a tyranny upon men of honour and merit that oppoſe his pernicious deſigns.

Theſe complaints often redoubled ceaſed not to ſtirre up ſpirits, and to procure the change of State that followed. Lyſias ſaw well that it was not now a time to be obſtinate on the ruine of the Jews, nor to buſie himſelf about the ſiege of one place, when the whole Realm was a tottering. He thought on nothing but on getting ſpeedily out of that warre with ſome little honour, thinking it not convenient to provoke a people, mutinous enough, in that commotion. He cauſed the young King to look upon them with a quite quite other countenance, and told him that it was beſt to let them live in peace, without diſturbing them in the matter of Religion, aſſuring him that in all other caſes they would contain themſelves within their duty, and that good ſervices enough might be drawn from them. Yet that he might not diſcover any lightneſſe in this change, he laid all the fault upon Menelaus that was an Apoſtate Jew, and an enemy of his Nation, who, he ſaid, had been the cauſe of all the confuſion by his railing ſpeeches; and therefore he made him ſerve for a ſacrifice to that treaty of Peace; in which he ſingularly obliged the Jews, and waſhed away the blot that the favour expreſſed by him to this wicked villain had printed upon his face. He ſhewed by this action the counſel that Politicians give their Sovereigns, to abandon thoſe to the publick hatred that have carried them to reproachable exceſſes, to disburden themſelves of the envy; and if he had practiſed this example towards him that then made himſelf the teacher of it, his Sceptre had been more ſecured, and his life moſt laſting.

Lyſias, before he raiſed the ſiege of Jeruſalem, made an Oration publickly before the Principals of the Army and all the ſouldiery, alledging fair pretenſes for that reſolution, but taking great heed not to diſcover the chief cauſe, for fear leſt that news ſhould wave the minds of thoſe that inclined enough already to the ſide of novelty and ſedition. He uſed a wonderfull diligence to render himſelf before the city of Antioch, into which he entred, and Philip, who found not himſelf yet ſtrong enough to hold out a long ſiege, quitted to him the place, and fled away to Egypt. This firſt ſucceſſe puffed up the heart of Lyſias, who became exceeding haughty, and conſidered ſo little the Romans in that high puiſſance that made the earth to tremble, that he permitted an Embaſſadour, ſent to him by the Senate, to be aſſaſſinated, without ſhewing any reaſon.

In the mean time, one Diodorus that had bred up Demetrius in his infancy, tranſported himſelf from Syria to Rome, and animated him by a great vigour of words and reaſons, to render himſelf an uſurper of the Crown. He certified him that his Nephew Eupator, which was a child but nine years old, was not any whit conſidered; that Lyſias was the object of the publick execration, that he had confidence in no body, nor any one in him; that all the ſouldiery and people ſought a new Maſter, and that he was aſſured, that if he did onely ſhew himſelf, though he ſhould be followed but with one ſervant onely, all the world would run to him to carry him to the throne. He kindled ſo ſtrongly the ambition of that young Prince, that he ſecretly ſtole away from Rome, and made account to go to the conqueſt of an Empire, accompanied onely with eight perſons. He failed not upon the way to write to the Senate of Rome, making great excuſes for his ſo ſudden a departure, renewing the offers of his ſervices, and the oaths of his fidelity, with a proteſtation that he went not to trouble his Nephew, but to oppoſe Lyſias that was an inſolent fellow, and would bring under the ſubjection of his tyranny both the King and Kingdome; he forgat not to charge him with the murder of Octavius a Roman Embaſſadour, that had been newly ſlain, adding that he would become the revenger of ſo cowardly a treachery.

The Romans ſeemed neither to be aſtoniſhed nor angry at his going but attended the ſucceſſe of his affairs to make him anſwer. He quickly got as farre as the city of Tyre, and ſent ſecretly Diodorus into Antioch to hear the reports, and ſound the ſpirits of men, which he found very much diſpoſed to a change.

Whereupon Demetrius declar'd himſelf, and took the Diadem with a generall applauſe of the Tyrians that made a great faction for him. Lyſias with his Eupator found himſelf much ſurpriſed at the news, and deliberated a long time whether he ſhould go out of that narrow paſſage to meet and fight with him, or intrench himſelf in the city of Antioch, or expect him with ſure footing. This laſt advice ſeemed the more ſecure, but it was leſſe glorious, ſuddenly to ſhut himſelf up upon the firſt brute of a ſedition, and as a fearfull creature to run into his hole to hide himſelf. It was repreſented to him, That the ſovereign remedy againſt thoſe tumults, was to flie ſpeedily to them, whereas delay would ſerve for nothing but to augment the boldneſſe of the inſolent; that ordinarily they were very much amated when they were ſet upon with vigour, before their conſpiracy was ſettled; that many that were yet but half engaged would retire from them at the leaſt rumour; that the Majeſty of Kings bore ſomething of great and ſacred that aſtoniſhed the Rebels. In fine, that it appertained to the dignity of ſo high a Prince, and to the prudence of a Miniſter of State, to endure nothing baſe, but to put themſelves ſuddenly into the field to defend their honour and their Kingdome, which are two things whoſe loſſe is irrecoverable.

Thoſe that deſired moſt the ruine of Lyſias were the firſt to flatter him concerning Courage and Generoſity, wiſhing nothing more then to ſee him in the field. This made him go out of Antioch to go meet Demetrius. But he that had ſeen himſelf ſo well accompanied in proſperity, found himſelf almoſt all alone in danger, for he was betrayed and ſold by his own ſouldiers, who ſeized upon the young King and him, to deliver them to Demetrius who was yet in a great uncertainty of ſucceſſe, and ſaid to thoſe that had elected him.

Companions, I am your work, and the queſtion of my life, of your honour, of your goods, and of all that a mortall man can fear, or hope for, is this day to be decided. If ye perſiſt in the good will ye bear to me, I eſteem my ſelf ſufficiently and ſufficiently rich. The Sceptre is nothing to me in compariſon of the approbation of your judgements and of your choice, which ought now to be verified by your courage and by your arms: We march under the favour of the Gods of the Roman Empire, againſt a tyrant that hath poſſeſſed himſelf of that young Prince and of the Crown, to aſſaſſinate the one and rob the other. It is time either to defend Juſtice by our bloud, or to conquer the Empire by our ſweat.

As he was upon theſe diſcourſes, the news came wholly to him, that Lyſias had been apprehended (with his pupil) by the conſent of all the Legions, and they were to be brought to him priſoners. This grand word gave him joy mingled with ſome doubt, which made him meditate how he ſhould uſe his fortune. He ſhewed that he had a very great ſenſe of the honour that had been beſtowed upon him, but he deſired not to ſee Lyſias nor his Nephew (as the Scripture aſſure us) whether it was that his heart was mollified with ſome tenderneſſe by the compaſſion of his bloud, or whether it was a wile of a Politician, who would not ſeem to do that which he procured to be done, that he might have leſſe blame in that action, and that he might the more eaſily juſtifie himſelf to the Roman Senate about the death of the young King. The ſouldiers finiſhed that which he had begun, ſlew Lyſias, and laid their bloudy hands upon the perſon of poor Eupator, without having any regard either to the innocency of his life, or to the tenderneſſe of his age, or to the character that he bore, ſo true it is that ambition is filled with a contageous venome that ſpares nothing for the ſatiating of it ſelf.

Demetrius ſaw himſelf King by a generall conſent of all the orders of the Realm, and had no more any thing to fear, unleſſe it was from the Romans the diſtributers of Empires and of Glories. And therefore he employed all his cares to appeaſe them by great ſubmiſſions and reaſons, that made them plainly ſee, that it was more for the intereſt of their State to preſerve then to deſtroy him. He ſent them for this purpoſe a ſolemne Embaſſage with great preſents, and and above all, a Crown of an high price, for a mark that he ſubmitted his Royall dignity to their diſcretion. Further yet, to teſtifie how he embraced their loves and their revenges, he cauſed Leptines and Iſocrates the Gramarian to be put in chains, that were accuſed to have had an hand in the murdering of Octavius their Embaſſadour, and ſent them away to Rome, to receive the ſentence of the Senate. The Roman reliſhed well all thoſe references, and confirmed the new King in his pretenſions upon the proteſtations that he made that he was not ſtained with his Nephews bloud, whom he ſaid to have been taken away by the misfortune of a Sedition raiſed againſt him, without having any means to ſave himſelf; and if he had not made a ſearch after the crime, he excuſed himſelf by the generality of the culpable, as being a thing ordinary enough, that ſins that have an infinite multitude of complices have not any puniſhment.

He was no ſooner upon the Throne but he ſaw himſelf involved by miſhap in a warre againſt the Maccabees. Alcimus that was a diſloyall Jew, and a traitour to his Nation, pricked forward by the ambition of the Pontificate; and jealous, even to rage, of the great progreſſes of Judas, failed not to prepoſſeſſe the ſpirit of the King, who was a man of an eaſie belief, to make black his adverſary by moſt horrible calumnies, and to intereſt all the Kingdomes of Syria to his ruine. This forger of warres and battles obtain'd all that he did deſire by deteſtable artifices, and cauſed armies to go to the ruine and deſolation of his Countrey. Judas Maccabeus upon this change kindled again his antient vigour, and rallied all his forces to oppoſe the Generalls of King Demetrius, ſo that at firſt he defeated ſome of them with a very famous rout, which more inflamed that Monarch, not being able to endure that his Arms ſhould be cryed down at the beginning of his Reign; this made him ſend into the field Army upon Army with ſo great impetuouſneſſe, that there was no more any means left to make reſiſtance.

Yet the great heart of the Maccabee could not yield, but ſailed againſt wind and tide, the thoughts of his valour making him forget thoſe of his danger. He had yet three thouſand men very reſolute fellows, with which he promiſed himſelf to continue his victories; but when Bacchides the Generall was ſeen appear with an army of two and twenty thouſand men, many withdrew themſelves for fear of the danger, into which the Maccabee, following the ordinary tracts of his courage, was about to precipitate them. Theſe runawayes beginning to wheel about to the other ſide, ſtole away ſo handſomely from the Army, that of three thouſand there remained but eight hundred. The Maccabee felt his heart much pierced, ſeeing himſelf forſaken of his brethren and of his friends in his greateſt need; he burned with a deſire to charge his enemies, but when he conſidered the ſmall forces he had about him, his heart bled within him. It was an evident peril to approach the enemy, and death to retire from them; divers thoughts about this combate contended in his heart, but thoſe that favoured his boldneſſe had the upper hand. Let us go (ſayes he to his men) and try our fortune; let us eſſay whether we ſhall have heart enough to encountre the army that comes againſt us. The moſt conſiderate men replyed, that they wanted not any courage, but that their ſmall appearance, would not be able to affront an army of two and twenty thouſand men with a Regiment not compleat; and that it was expedient for them to retire that day to rallie ſome new troops, and to return to the combate with hopes of greater advantages. God forbid (replyed the Maccabee) that our enemies ſhould have that contentment to ſee us turn our backs and flie before them; this is a a thing I could never yet be taught ſince I took up arms. Ha! Where is that gallantry that I have alwayes ſeen in you? Ought we to be ſo much in love with life? If our hour be come let us die valourouſly for our brethren, and let us not leave a blemiſh upon the luſtre of the honour that we have acquired.

He carries them away all by his authority, and they are already reſolved to conquer or to die. The trumpets ſounds on both ſides, the earth eccho's with the noiſe of the arms, and ſhouts of the ſouldiers. Bacchides cauſes his dragoons armed with arrows and with ſlings to advance, who began the skirmiſh, and lead up a great battle that endured from the morning to the evening, the one combating by number, and the other by valour. And when the Maccabee ſaw that the beſt troops were on the right point about the perſon of Bacchides, he reſolved to make his way thither, which he did, with a prodigious violence, making them loſe their footing, and beating them back with much confuſion. But thoſe on the left point that were yet freſh ſeeing the diſorder of their companions, came to fall upon Judas and upon all his troop that were extremely wearied with having laid upon the place ſo many bodies of the enemies. Theſe defended themſelves valiantly, but the multitude of thoſe that ſet upon them on all parts overwhelmed them, and the incomparable Maccabee by having received many wounds, opened as many bloudy gates to his generous ſoul to flie away into the other world.

There are neither Coloſſus's nor Pyramids that can equall the deeds of this gallant man. Never did any man fight better, or for a better Cauſe. His heart was a ſource of generous flames; his hand was the thunder it ſelf; his valour a miracle; his life an example; and his death was like to be that of his whole countrey that would have buried it ſelf in his tomb, if his brothers, Jonathan and Simon had not enlarged his conqueſts by the imitation of his proweſſe.

The good party was much weakned by the deceaſe of him that was the ſoul of his whole countrey, and it ſeemed that Judea would quickly be ſwallowed up by the great forces of King Demetrius: but the ſuccouring hand of the God of hoſts was not wanting to his ſervants in the extremity of ſo many miſeries. The pernicious Alcimus that had raiſed that whole ſtorm, when he thought himſelf to be above his hopes, was ſmitten with a ſtroke from heaven, and died ſuddenly of a ſtrange malady.

Demetrius, after a Reign of ſome years ſaw a great faction raiſed againſt him from that coaſt whence he leaſt expected it, which deprived him of his Sceptre and his life. His ſcornfull and haughty nature made him diſdain the Kings his neighbours, even ſo farre as to offend them, by wayes of words and deeds. He was alſo little affable and courteous to his Subjects that loved naturally to be careſſed of their Prince, Prince, and although at firſt he was of an humour good enough, yet he was ſo much changed, that having built a very ſumptuous Caſtle near his capitall city, he lived there conſtantly to take his pleaſure, and let himſelf be ſeen by very few. His people of Antioch that was on the other ſide arrogant enough, were incenſed and wearied with his Reign. They began to raiſe rebellions that were fomented under hand by the Kings of Egypt, of Aſia, and of Cappadocia that diſtruſted him, and thought to find him a ſucceſſour.

He was quite aſtoniſhed when he ſaw one Pompalus, a young man, before that time unknown, that called himſelf the ſon of Antiochus the Illuſtrious, and brother of Eupator, come and demand the Kingdome of Syria, as appertaining to him by right of birth. Many Hiſtorians hold that it was a pure fiction, and that that pretended was ſuborned by the artifice of thoſe three Kings, and namely of Ariarathes the Cappadocian: yet ſince the Scripture names him the ſon of Antiochus the Illuſtrious, I find that it is very probable to follow that which others have written, and to ſay that that Antiochus had heretofore made love to a young Rhodian woman named Bala, on whom he had begotten this naturall ſon with his ſiſter Laodice. He failed not to ſhew himſelf at Rome, and to make himſelf be ſomewhat taken notice of by the practices of one Heraclides, a wiſe and crafty man in managing buſineſſes. The enemies of Demetrius embraced this occaſion to diſturb him, and carried (as much as they were able) this man to the Throne, not by reaſon of Juſtice, but becauſe they believed they ſhould have a better market for their pretenſions by making a new creature, then ſuffering any longer him they had rendred more abſolute, then they deſired he ſhould be.

It is a ſtrange thing that a man of nothing found inſtantly Cities, Armies, and a Kingdome at his devotion. It was now that Jonathan, the brother and ſucceſſour of Judas, was ſought after, and ſued to by thoſe two adverſary Kings with extreme earneſtneſſe. Pompalus that took the name of Alexander, wrote him letters full of honour, offering him the Principality and Pontificate of his Nation, qualifying him with the name of friend, and ſending him a purple Robe with a Crown of gold. Demetrius, whom neceſſity had rendred very courteous, made him alſo on the other ſide a thouſand fair promiſes to draw him to his party. He exempted him from all Tributes, he took away the Garriſons, he gave him places of importance by a free gift, he received the Jews to offices and governments, he reſtored all thoſe of their Nation that he held in Hoſtage, He granted them an intire Liberty in their Religion, and Policy, and Revenues alſo for the Temple, ſo that there was nothing more to be deſired.

Yet Jonathan would never range himſelf under his Standards, but (as injuries being yet freſh, ſmart more then old ones) the Jews choſe rather to give themſelves to the ſon of their moſt cruel perſecutour then to Demetrius that had taken from them their dear Maccabee, and held yet their liberty under oppreſſion. The party already made againſt that miſerable Prince fortified it ſelf every day, and although he took all the good order that his affairs ſeemed to require, yet he could not divert his unhappineſſe that dragged him to a precipice. It is true that he got the better in ſome ſmall encountres, but when the great battle that was to decide the controverſie of the Kingdome was to be given, he ſaw himſelf very much forſaken, and his enemy aſſiſted with the beſt forces of all Aſia. He failed not for all that to fight with all poſſible valour, and although his Army was ſcattered, he would never fly, but caſt himſelf in the hotteſt of the mingling, killing many of his enemies with his own hand. His horſe having taken a falſe ſtep ſlipped himſelf into a ſlough whence he could not get out; but he ſuddenly quitted him, got himſelf on foot, and made a great ſpectacle, a King covered with dirt and bloud, with his ſword in his hand, that laid about with a ſtiffe arm, and without remiſſion ſuſtained the hail of arrows that the enemy let flie upon him, ſtanding inflexible againſt all thoſe diſaſtres of his evil fortune. In fine, he would not quit his Crown but with his life, and buried himſelf in honour.

Every one bows under the happineſſe of that falſe Alexander; he mounts ſuddenly upon the Throne of his adverſary, where he receives the ſervices and adorations of all the world. Philometer the King of Egypt, that had much upheld his party, in which he ſought his own intereſts, gives him his daughter Cleopatra in marriage, whoſe wedding was magnificently celebrated in the city of Ptolomais, in the preſence of the two Kings, the father-in-law and the ſon-in-law, where Jonathan was alſo preſent that was careſſed of both the two by extraordinary favours, and managed the buſineſſes of his State with all poſſible advantages.

Alexander ſeeing himſelf in unexpected riches, and amidſt ſo many ornaments of a borrowed fortune, could not contain himſelf, but let himſelf flag in a ſluggiſh and voluptuous life, abandoning all the affairs of his Kingdome to the diſcretion of one Ammonius, a young brainleſſe fellow, who carried himſelf moſt inſolently, and incenſed the Queen Laodice, and all the Nobles of the Court in ſuch a manner, as that he was at laſt ſet upon, and ſlain in the habit of a woman which he had put on to ſecure himſelf; God thus taking vengeance of his filthy and effeminate life. The Antiochians were firſt weary of the diſſolute life of their Prince that was alwayes in the midſt of wine and women, which made them believe that he was a ſuppoſititious King that had nothing in him of generous. They began to regret Demetrius, whom they had ſeen die with ſo much courage, and knowing that he had left two ſons yet very young, one of which bore his fathers name, and the other was called Antiochus Sidetes; They invited the elder of them, giving him aſſurance that he ſhould have the Crown.

Philometor that was aſhamed of the deportments of his ſon-in-law, and that under pretence of moderation deſired nothing leſſe then to adde the Diadem of Syria to that of Egypt, well knowing that ſo many changes of Maſters make a State ſhake, and give fair advantages to thoſe that would invade them, upholds this Rebellion, forſakes Alexander, and by a notable affront takes away his daughter from him to give her to the young Demetrius. And to colour his inconſtancy, he made a Manifeſt that publiſhed, That his ſon-in-law (by an execrable diſloyalty) had made an attempt upon his Kingdome, and upon his life, which made him break the friendſhip that he had ſworn with him. Under this pretence he ſeizes on ſome places which it was eaſie for him to keep whiles he made himſelf authour of the fortune of the new King. The miſerable Alexander awaking out of his ſurfeits, ſaw the Egyptian and all his Subjects bandyed againſt him, and a great army that was coming to fall upon his head, which he reſiſted feebly, and quickly forſook his party going to hide himſelf in the bottomes of Arabia, where he was hunted after and entrapped by Zabdiel the Arabian, who cut off his head, and carried it to the King of Egypt, who contemplated it a long time with a ſpirit more then ſalvage, for which he was puniſhed of God, and dyed three dayes after of the wounds he had received by a fall from his horſe at the defeating of his ſon-in-law.

Behold marvellous ſports of fortune, and great revolutions that ended not at this point yet. Demetrius, young of age and government, was not a man to ſettle a Kingdome ſhaken with ſo great concuſſions. He thought more of taking the pleaſures of Royalty then of bearing the burden of it; buſineſſes were to him as many puniſhments, and paſtime a continuall exerciſe. This was the cauſe of new factions and great ſeditions that were raiſed in his Kingdome. The Maccabees, whom he gained to his party, rendred him very good offices, although he was more ready to receive them, then liberall to reward them.

In the weakneſſe of this new Government ſtarted up the diſloyall Tryphon, who had been Captain of the Guard to the falſe Alexander, and having ſeized himſelf of a little child that his Maſter had left behind him, he had the boldneſſe to propound him for King and true Succeſſour of the Crown. When he ſaw that Jonathan already obliged to Demetrius was able to oppoſe his deſigns, and to unravel the web of his ambitions, he ſurpriſed him by a deteſtable treachery, and cauſed him to be aſſaſſinated with his children, after he had received the money that he had demanded for his ranſome.

The young King altogether aſtoniſhed at the party that was made againſt him, withdrew himſelf to the K. of Parthia, to deſire aſſiſtance of him, where it hapned, that by the calumny of his enemies, he was clapt up in an honourable priſon, as if he had come to make an attempt upon the Kingdome of his neighbour. His ſpirit, that was alwayes wanton, made love even in that captivity, and debauched a daughter of that King his hoſt, whom he was conſtrained to wed, although he was already married, and when he had ſtoln out of priſon, he was caught and brought back again to this new wife.

Tryphon knowing what had befaln him, cauſed his Pupil to be murdered by an execrable cruelty, feigning that he had been taken away by a naturall death, and took the Diadem, profeſſing himſelf to be the revenger of the Tyrant, and the lawfull King of Syria. After ſome time, the liberty of the young Demetrius was mediated, but his wife Cleopatra, that had a crafty and proud ſpirit, vext with the inconſtant loves of her husband, and wearied with his looſeneſſe, raiſed up againſt him puiſſant enemies that maſſacred him, and ſome are of opinion that ſhe her ſelf was one of the complices of that attempt, and that Demetrius his brother, whom ſhe married afterwards, was not innocent of it. My pen hath horrour at theſe bloudy tragedies, and paſſes over them as upon burning coals.

Antiochus Sidetes ſeeing himſelf on his brothers Throne, eagerly purſued Tryphon, and beſieged him in the city of Dora, where finding himſelf extremely ſtraightned, and out of all hopes of ſuccour, he killed himſelf with his own hand, and yet could not deface by his bloud the villanous ſtain of perfidiouſneſſe that remained upon him by the death of the young King.

The Conquerour perceiving himſelf above his buſineſſes, ſaw that the Maccabees, in the troubles of Syria, poſſeſſed by ſo many Kings, had made great progreſſes, would repreſſe them, and made warre againſt Simon that ſucceeded his brother Jonathan, and who was afterward aſſaſſinated at a banquet by Ptolomy his ſon-in-law. The King, as 'tis thought, upholding by his favour that cruel baſeneſſe, two of his ſonnes were involved in the miſery of the father, and the murderers were already diſpatched to adde to them John Hircan ſon of the ſame Simon. But he, having had intelligence of that firſt deſign, ſtood upon his guard, and governed Judea the ſpace of more then thirty years with much prudence and happineſſe; outliving a long time that laſt Antiochus that was ſtoned to death as he was going to pillage the Temple of Mannea.

Hyrcan had for Succeſſour his ſon Ariſtobulus who took the Diadem, and reſumed the name of King among the Jews, after a long diſcontinuation, which hapned an hundred years before the Nativity of our Lord. Thoſe of his race failed not to continue the Regall Dignity in their houſe, till that Hyrcan which was ſo cruelly ſpoiled and maſſacred by Herod, as I have ſaid in the hiſtory of Mariamne.

Behold how the virtue of Judas Maccabeus extended it ſelf through many Ages, and without thinking of it, put the Crown upon the head of thoſe that were of his family and of his name, God recompencing his Zeal and Juſtice beyond the fourth generation. I have endeavoured to make in this diſcourſe a little abridgement of that which is contained in the two books of Maccabees, and relate it to you (my Reader) in a ſtreight line, and a method clear enough, hoping that you will have content and edification to ſee the Juſtice of God reign over ſo many crowned heads, who ceaſes not to puniſh the wicked, and to render to the good, ſafety and glory for a recompence of their virtue.

GODFREY

GODFREY of Bovillon.

GEORGE CASTRIOT.

IT was not the voyce of a man, but an Oracle of the holy Spirit that Pope Urban the second pronounced, when he gave to the Crosier for a Deviſe, God will have it ſo : This ſpeech was the ſoul of all the Intentions of Godfrey of Bovillon, It was the But of all his Actions. God never made the prodigious effects of his power more viſibly appear then in the conduct of this moſt Illuſtrious Perſonage. It was a Captain formed in his Boſome, and inſtructed by his hand, that was to break the chains of the Chriſtians, and to pull down the pride of the Sultans.

So many other Expeditions were almoſt all ſplitted, but this of Godfrey bore a God would have it ſo, and nothing reſiſted its Good hap. Many men torment themſelves all their life-time in great deſigns that are as the Dragons, the Chimera's and armed men, that our fancy ſhapes upon the body of a Cloud. The wind drives them, the divers poſtures confound them, the Aſpects change them, and all that we behold with admiration in the Heavens falls in water upon our head, and makes morter under our feet.

How many Princes have made great preparations both of Men and Elephants, of Horſes and of Ships, of Arms and Ammunitions, out of a deſign to make great Conqueſts ! and all this hath vaniſhed for want of a God will have it ſo. There are certain impreſſions in great affairs which are never found without the favours of heaven. One God will have it ſo, will make us ſail in the Sea upon an Hurdle or upon a Tortoiſe-ſhell ; one God will not have it ſo will drown us in a well Rigged Ship.

It was a God wills it, that ſeized in an inſtant the ſpirit of the moſt excellent Cavaliers of Europe, to undertake a voyage into the Holy Land ; It was a God wills it that made them followed by innumerable multitudes of Mortals. But it was alſo a God wills it that made them caſt their eyes upon Godfrey of Bovillon, as upon the moſt valiant, the moſt happy, and the moſt able to pluck Jeruſalem out of the hands of Saladine.

The King of the Bees appears not more viſible in the middle of his ſwarm, then this great Captain appeared amongſt an infinite number of Cavaliers aſſembled to revenge the holy Sepulchre. There was not one onely ray of the eyes that beheld him that did not expreſſe ſome favour to his Merit ; he had as many Approvers as Spectatours, and every man ſigned him his Commiſſions even by his ſilence.

That illuſtrious blood of the Heroes that ran in his veins, that advantageous Stature that raiſed him the head above ſo many Millions of men, that face that Majeſty had choſen for her throne, that tongue that carried inſenſible chains to captivate mens hearts, that comelineſſe of the forehead that was at once modeſt and bold, that valour that was painted on all his limbs, that courage that kindled a delightfull fire in his eyes ; All the Virtues that ſeemed to march about his Perſon, and in fine, that finger of God that had imprinted on him the Character of Conquerour, made him be choſen as the firſt Moover of that wonderfull deſign.

There was nothing but his Modeſty that oppoſed the deſires of all the World, and that would make him yield to ſome other man that which every one conferred on him. But the conſideration of the publick good carried him away, and made him load upon his ſhoulders a burden that might tire the Gyants. It is true that Hugues the King of France his brother held the firſt rang by the highneſſe of his Houſe : but counſell, execution of great deſigns, and experience compleated in all ſorts of accidents gave to Godfrey the Managing of the Arms.

Our Army was found to be three hundred thouſand Foot, and an hundred thouſand Horſe, that ſeemed to carry away the Maſſe of the earth, yet the Sarazins were not diſcouraged, but aſſembled themſelves on all ſides with ſo prodigious a Multitude, that it might, as it ſeemed, equall the veins of the Abyſſe, and the ſands of the Sea-ſhore.

The controverſie was for Religion, Honour, and goods, between two Nations that aſpired to the Domination of the World, and that esteemed all sharing inconsistent with their Greatnesse. The one came thither moved by their superstition, that had gained a mervellous advantage over spirits possessed by errour, and enchanted by the charmes of a false Prophet. The other was carryed by the true Religion, perswading themselves, that they had all Justice to pluck the Sepulchre of their Master out of the hands of Infidels, and that it would be an immortall Glory to them to lose their Bloud in the same place that Jesus had honoured with his.

mi-

Mans Spirit is overwhelmed with the Number of Wonders that are read in the History of this Warre. The Historians cannot follow them, and we must averr that the Brave Godfrey having farre surpassed the deeds of Achilles and of Hector, hath had the misfortune to want an Homer.

He gave more then an hundred Battels before he saw himself at the end of his design; He fought with two Nations, that seemed Furies which Hell had vomited upon the Earth, he combated with Hunger, Thirst, Sickneſſe, and all the damnable Artifices of Negromancers that opposed his Valour. The eternall snow of the Mountain Taurus, the inaccessible Rocks, the Rivers dyed with bloud, the Seas armed with Tempests and with Monsters did never abate his ardour.

He was ready to enter for the love of his Saviour into Regions where Nature is nothing but a benummed masse, where the Sun hides it self, and the night reigns without a Peer, where the most salvage Barbarisme makes us believe that it is ranged even as far as the Gates of Hell.

The City of Nicea that bore the name of victory it self, was the first that presented Palms to this our Conquerour. It was there, that Solyman one of the most Illustrious Generalls of the Barbarians was beaten and quite vanquished, all his Army being put into a Rout, with an exceeding Massacre, that filled Asia with the terrour of the Christian Arms. It was there that the Valiant Godfrey killed with his own hand a Rabshakeh, that braved it upon the wals of Nicea, with an immeasurable presumption of his strength. The City was wonne, and the vigorous storms of the besiegers beat down before them all the resistances of the besieged.

The proud Antioch followed quickly after, and although that Corbanes was come to its relieſe with innumerable troops of Parthians, Medes, Assyrians, he could not stop the current of the prosperities of this invincible Generall, but augmented by the losse of all his Legions the terrour of that victorious arm that overthrew smoaking Cities, and made in all places a deluge of the bloud of the Barbarians.

The Caliphe of Egypt that was now advanced to divert the Fatall Day of his Sect, saw himself involved in the same ruines that he thought to have repayred.

All their attempts now remained but for the City of Jerusalem, which was the Object and Desire of our heavenly Argonauts. It was assaulted and defended with a vigour that never yet had its equall. But in the end it yielded to the Armes of the Christians. It was here that the Illustrious Godfrey was seen to combat upon an Ingine of wood that he had caused to be raised, to enter into the City. He appeared that day, not as a Man, but as a Demi-God, all flaming in the brightnesse of his Arms, whiles the Hail of Arrows flew about his Head, and his Arm mowing the Turbans of the Sarazins made way through fire and sword. He entred first of all in bright day in the sight of the Army into Jerusalem, and pitched the the Standard of the Crosse in the place where Jesus had consecrated it with his Bloud. What Acclamations! What Congratulations! What Palms and Lawrels! The Turks fled as the pale Ghosts of Hell, and the Christians erected on all parts the Trophies of our Redeemer upon their ruines.

It was then that all the Princes proclaimed him King of the conquered Countrey, thinking that there was not any one more worthy of it, in the rest of the whole world, seeing that he had joyned to that prodigious Valour the virtues of Religion, Piety, Justice, Prudence, Liberality, Magnificence, Goodnesse, Clemency and affability.

They failed not to offer him a Royall Crown richly adorned with Pearls and precious stones, but this good Prince filled with the zeal of Devotion said, What! should I bear the name of King in the place where my Master hath been covered with Reproaches? Should I take the Sceptre in my hand, where he hath taken the Crosse upon his shoulders? Should I suffer a Crown of Gold to be put upon my head, where he hath received one of Thorns? Sure I should then hold my self for vanquished, if such a vanity should be victorious over my heart. It is God that hath inspired into us these designs, it is he that hath conducted them, and that hath Crowned them. I pretend to no other honour, then to hang all honours at the feet of his Crosse.

He contented himself with the name of Duke, and set himself presently about labouring in the Civil Government, to purge the Citie of all its Infamies, to pull down the Mosqueta's to build Churches, to give a lustre to the Clergie, to cause the Gospel to be preached, to found Hospitals, to Administer Justice, to order the Militia for the defense of his Conquest, and in a word to do all the duties of a most accomplished Monarch. But (can we speak it without a Groan?) his Reign lasted but a year, and so many fair hopes were mowed down in their flower, by the pityleſſe sythe of Death. O impenetrable secrets of Providence! There was nothing beyond Jerusalem, there was nothing beyond Godfrey, but God and Paradise, that could limit his designs, and bound his Conquests.

GEORGE

GEORGE CASTRIOT.

O Ye Tombs of the Grecians, whoſe Aſhes ſeem yet to exhale Valour, rejoyce now, and hide not the names you bear, for fear they ſhould ſhame Poſterity that hath degenerated from their Virtues. Brave Anceſtours! the Glory of your Nation is not yet extinguiſhed; It is raiſed again in one ſole Man, who hath recollected in his Perſon whatſoever generoſity had ſowen in ſo many Hearts, and whatſoever Honour had ſtuffed in ſo many Trophies.

I ſee in Caſtriot a certain object greater then Leonidas, and Themiſtocles: I ſee Pyrrhus, I ſee Alexander; and if his Enemies have been more ſtout then the Macedonians, his Valour ought not for that to ſeem the leſſe.

He was a Souldier as ſoon as he was born a Man; Nature pleaſed to engrave a Sword upon his Body, at the ſame time as ſhe inſpired Courage into his Heart.

That Stature ſo proper, that Countenance ſo filled with Majeſty, thoſe Limbs ſo ſtrong and ſo Robuſtuous, thoſe Eyes that mingle the Rainbow with the Lightning, thoſe hands that ſeem to have been made for nothing but to bear the Thunder, thoſe Feet that move not one onely ſtep that ſavours not of a King, have told betimes that which fame hath afterward related to all ages.

Little Eaglet! that beganneſt in thy moſt innocent years to play with Lightning, thou oughteſt not to have been ſo valiant, or thou oughteſt to have had a more happy Father. Shall we ſay that fortune was unjuſt, in that it prepared chains for this young virtue, when ſhe ſhould have planted Laurels? Let us rather ſay that Providence was very wiſe in that ſhe found out matter for this great Heart, that would have conſumed it ſelf in its own flames, if it had not met with ſome obſtacles to reſiſt it.

It was meet that this Hercules ſhould beginne to ſtrangle Serpents from his Cradle; It was meet that he ſhould be bred in the middle of his enemies to Combate from his Infancy with that which he was to abate in his riper age.

His Father John Caſtriot, who had little ſtrength and much miſery was conſtrained to give him for an Hoſtage to Amurath the Turk, to be brought up at his Gate.

Moſes now is in Pharohs houſe, and Conſtantine in Diocleſians, but the Path is here more dangerous, becauſe it leadeth to the ruine of Salvation, and of Honour. His proud Maſter, that loves him with a Love worſe then all the Hatred in the world, would fit him for himſelf and for his infamous pleaſures. He aims at the one by the Circumciſion that is imprinted on his fleſh by an unhappy violence, he purſues the other by ſhamefull courtings which are to the Gallant child farre bitterer then Death. He had (as 'tis reported) courage enough to take the ſword in hand againſt him, that Purſued him with nothing but with flowers; He drew blood from him, when nothing could be expected of him but Tears, and put himſelf in danger of experimenting the horribleſt Torments that the Cruelty of thoſe inhumane people could invent, rather then to deliver voluntarily his Soul to ſinne, and his Body to diſhonour. His cruell friend was aſtoniſhed at ſo brave a Reſolution, and turned the furies that he had prepared for his Innocence, into the admiration of his Valour.

The Seraglio Impoſes on him the name of Scanderbeg, that is the ſame as Alexander which he took by a good omen, to fill up therewith the whole capacity of his brave exploits. He was educated in all the exerciſes of Warre in the Academy of the Turks, where he ſucceeded with ſo much force, Art, Liking, and Approbation, that every one carried him in his eyes, every one looked on him as a ſingular prop of Mahomets Empire. But he bore alwayes Jeſus in his heart; he alwayes thought on the means that he might find to break his chain; he felt in the bottome of his moſt generous ſoul flames that burned him inceſſantly with the zeal he had to raiſe again the levelled Altars of the Chriſtians, and to deſtroy the eſtate of the Ottomans.

Amurath ſaw ſome ſparkles of it flying in his converſation, although he endeavoured to cover his deſign with a great prudence. The Maſter began to fear the Slave, and was affraid to nouriſh in his Court a Lyon that might be able to ſhew him one day his Teeth.

He endeavoured to deſtroy him in various encountres, making the Exceſſe of his courage contribute to the Hazard of his Perſon. A reſolute Scythian came to Amurath's Court, challenging the boldeſt to fight all Naked with a Poniard in the incloſure of a perillous Circle, where, of neceſſity one muſt Dye, or Conquer. That man had carryed away already many bloody Palms, and put ſo much confidence in his ſtrength, that they were (according to his ſpeech) but the ſacrifices of Death that dared to attend the Thunder of his Arm. Every one trembled for fear, when as the valiant Caſtriot undertook him, and putting his Thruſt aſide with one hand, killed him with the other, with the acclamations of joy of all thoſe that envy hindred not from applauding Valour.

This Combat having not ſucceeded well for Amurath, he raiſes at another time a Perſian Cavalier that kept a ſtirre to fight on Horſe-back with a Lance. He was a man accompliſhed in that Trade, who with much chearfulneſſe of heart tranſported himſelf into Cities and Provinces, where he promiſed himſelf that he ſhould find Adverſaries to exerciſe his Arms, and increaſe his Reputation. He curvetted up and down in the Liſt proudly Plum'd, and his flaming Arms made him appear that day as the great Conſtellation of Orion amidſt the leſſer Starres.

A David was needfull for this Goliah, our young Alexander aſſaults him, falls upon him as an Eagle, handles him very roughly, and at length laid him on the ſand where he vomited out his ſoul and bloud, doing a ſad homage to valour by a juſt puniſhment of his raſhneſſe.

But Amurath that played the part of Saul failed not to find out ſome new occaſions to Exerciſe his David. He gave him all the moſt hazardous Employments of the warre, wherein he had ſtill ſo good ſucceſſe, that he changed all the Subjects of his Ruine into Trophies, and returned Crowned with Laurels even out of the Bottome of Abyſſes, and out of the throat of Lyons.

The perfidious Sultan entertained him with good words, but handled him with bad deeds. He promiſed him to reſtore him his eſtates after his Father's Death, Death, but John Caſtriot's laſt hour made it appear, that if his words were full of artifice, his promiſes were but wind.

Scanderbeg impatient to ſtay for that which ſhould never come, payes himſelf by his own hands, and ſeizes himſelf of his Kingdome of Albania, playing the crafty fellow by a Countre-Craft. The Alarm of it is in the Court, and all Amuraths Paſſions tend to nothing but Revenge. Haly Baſſa is ſent with an Army of Fourty thouſand men to diſpatch the Buſineſſe. But all his Troops are cut in pieces; and he had nothing more honourable in his Expedition then that he was conquered by the brave Caſtriot. Feria and Muſtapha purſue the ſame deſign with new Forces that experiment the ſame fortune.

What ſhall we ſay more of Scanderbeg's Greatneſſe? Amurath beſeeches, the Turban is humbled; that viſage of the Tyrant that was the ſame as that of Cruelty it ſelf, is mollified and takes the Lineaments of a ſupplyant, after it had born during his whole Life thoſe of Rigour. He deſires Peace, and it is denyed him, and ſues for an agreement, and is ſlighted. His arrogance being ſorely pricked vomits out nothing but whirlwinds of fire, and comes to fall before Croye the Capitall City of the Valiant Caſtriot, with an Army of two hundred thouſand men. The other defends himſelf with ſix thouſand. One onely place bayes that great Deluge, the Storm is ſcattered, the Siege raiſed, the ſhame of it remains on the face of the Sultan with ſo lively a Tincture, that the Shadow of death muſt paſſe over it to blot it out. He that had lived with Glory, dyes with the ſadneſſe of his Ignominy, and carries with him into the other World the unability to revenge himſelf, and an eternall deſire of vengeance.

Mahomet his ſonne, the Scourge and Terrour of the Univerſe, that overthrew two Empires, took two hundred Cities, killed twenty Millions of Men, comes to ſplit againſt the ſame Rock. Was there need of ſo much blood to write upon Caſtriot's Trophies the Title of Invincible?

Who would Imagine that a mortall man ſhould have gone ſo farre? who ſhould believe that thoſe exploits were the Actions of a ſlave? Truly we muſt avow, that he lent his Name to God, in all this buſineſſe, and that God lent his Arm to him. It is ſaid of him, that he never refuſed Battell, never turned his back, never was wounded but once very Lightly. He ſlew two thouſand Barbarians with his own hand, which he cleft ordinarily with his Coutelax, from the head down to the Girdle. Mahomet deſired to ſee that Thunder-bolt that he bore in his hands, and had it in veneration although ſo many times bedewed with his Subjects blood. He ſaw the Steel, but he never ſaw the Arm that gave it Life.

O brave Caſtriot! If the State of Chriſtians could have been delivered from the Tyranny of the Sultans, it ſhould have been by thy hands. We muſt now acknowledge that our wounds are irrecoverable, ſeeing that our diviſions hinder us from enjoying the ſuccour of ſo Divine an hand. The Feaver that took thee hence in the City of Liſſa, in the Climactericall of ſeven and nine, the moſt to be feared by old men, extinguiſhed all our hopes by the ſame burnings that conſumed thy Body. After thou hadſt lived the moſt Admirable of Captains, thou dyedſt like a truly Religious, melting the hearts of all thoſe that beheld thee by a moſt ſenſible Devotion. Thy victorious ſpirit ſoared up to the Palace of the Beautifull Sion, after it had performed in the Body all that was poſſible for a moſt eminent Virtue, and an Happineſſe, to which nothing was wanting but imitatours. The moſt barbarous thy Enemies have kiſſed thy Sepulchre, have Reverenced thy Aſhes, and ſhared thy Bones as the deareſt Reliques of Valour. And now thou haſt no more to do with a Tomb, ſeeing that thy Memory hath found as many Monuments, as there are Hearts in all ages.

BOUCICAUT

BOUCICAUT. BAYARD.

WE need not ſearch the Catalogue of Saints and Martyrs for a Souldier Furniſhed before God and men with great and Divine virtues. Behold one among a thouſand, I mean the brave Marſhal Boucicaut, who flouriſhed in France under Charles the Sixth. Thoſe petty Rodomonts, who boaſt of their Duels, but indeed meer cowardiſe varniſhed with a gloſſy colour of valour, durſt not behold this moſt excellent Cavalier, without doing that which was antiently done to the Statues of the Sunne, that is, to put finger on the mouth, and admire. For, not to mention his other acts of proweſſe, it is he who was preſent at that daring Battell which the Turkiſh Emperour Bajazet waged againſt the King of Hungary; the Duke of Burgundy, then called the Count of Nevers, with many other of the French Gentry, being there in perſon.

The Hiſtory relateth, that the Turkiſh Emperour coming to fight with dreadfull forces, began ſo furious a charge, the air being darkned with a black cloud of Arrows, that the Hungarians, who were alwayes reputed good Souldiers, being much amazed with this fierce aſſault, fled away. The French, who in all Battels had ever learned to conquer or dye, not willing to hear ſo much as the leaſt ſpeech of the name of flight, pierced into the Turkiſh army, notwithſtanding a field of Pikes and ſtakes faſtned in the earth did hinder their approch, and attended by ſome other Troops, brake the Vangard of the Turks, by the counſell and example of this brave Marſhall; whereat Bajazet much amazed, was about to retire, but that at the ſame time it was told him, that it was but a very little handfull of Frenchmen that made the greateſt reſiſtance, and that it was beſt for him to aſſault them. The Turk, who kept his Battalions very freſh, returneth, and fell like lightning upon theſe poor Souldiers now extreamly wearied. Never did an angry Lyon exerciſe more violent force againſt the Hunters Javelins, then this generous Gavalier ſhewed proweſſe which ſhined in the midſt of the adventurous Pagans. For, ſeeing himſelf at laſt negligently betraied, he having no other purpoſe but to ſell his own life and thoſe of his companions at as dear a rate as he could, he with the French Cavalry, and ſome other people that ſtuck to him, did ſuch feats of Arms, that it was thought twenty thouſand Turks were ſlain in the place. At laſt this prodigious multitude, able to tire out the moſt hardy, although it had been but to cut them in pieces, did ſo nearly encompaſſe our French, that the Count of Nevers, with Marſhall Boucicaut and other the moſt worthy Perſonages, were taken Priſoners.

The next day after this diſmall Battell, the proud Bajazet ſitting under a Pavillion ſpread for him in the field, cauſed the priſoners to be brought before him, to drench himſelf in blood and revenge, which he alwayes moſt paſſionately loved.

A ſad ſpectacle.

Never was ſeen a ſpectacle more worthy of Compaſſion; The poor Lords who had wrought wonders in Arms, able to move Tygers, were led to the ſlaughter, half naked, ſtraight bound with cords and fetters, no regard being had either to their bloud, which was noble, or youth which was pitifull, or their behaviour which was moſt raviſhing; Theſe Saracens ugly and horrible as Devils, ſet them before the face of the Tyrant, who in the twinkling of an eye cauſed their throats to be cut at his feet, as if he meant to carouſe their bloud.

The Count of Nevers, with the Count of Ewe and the Count of Marche had now their heads under the Symiter, and their lives hung as it were by a thread, when Bajazet, who had heard by his interpreters that they were near Kinſmen to the King of France, cauſed them to be reſerved, commanding them to ſit at his feet on the ground, where they were enforced to behold the lamentable butchery of their Nobility.

The valiant Boucicaut, covered with a little linnen cloth in his turn was brought forth to be maſſacred over the bodies of ſo many valiant men. He, being wiſe, and in this extremity particularly inſpired by God, made a ſign with his fingers before Bajazet, becauſe he underſtood not his Language, as if he would declare himſelf the Kinſman of the Count of Nevers, who beheld him with ſo pitifull an eye, that it was able to have rent the moſt rocky heart. Bajazet being perſwaded by this ſign that he was of the Bloud Royall cauſed him to be ſet a part among the priſoners; where afterwards by his great wiſdome he endeavoured the liberty of thoſe noble Gentlemen, and his own. I cannot think that the puny Novices of war of our time, will compare themſelves to the valour of this Heroick man, accompliſhed with ſuch gallant proweſſe.

Let us come, if you pleaſe, and look into his deportment and converſation, and conſider whether he were of the number of thoſe who profeſſe themſelves wicked that they may ſeem valiant. Our Boucicaut was a man who whileſt in time of peace he governed the City of Genoa, heard daily two Maſſes, with ſo exemplar devotion, that he never ſuffered any man to ſpeak to him in the Church; where he ſaid the office with ſingular attention; for which he ſo accommodated his company, that you ſhould never ſee the leaſt action of uncomlineſſe in Divine Service, which he did not ſeverely puniſh. And the Hiſtorian addeth, that he who had beheld his people at Divine Service, would rather think he ſaw Religious men then Souldiers. Noblemen have power to draw their families to what poſture they pleaſe, were it not through puſillanimity of ſpirit they many times give way to the torrent of nurture: and contenting themſelves to be good, make all the reſt naught by the eaſineſſe of their Natures. I mention not here a Canonized Saint, an Hermit, a Religious man, or a Prieſt; I ſpeak of a Marſhall of France, of a moſt ardent Warriour and Valiant Souldier.

Behold, I pray, whether Piety be imcompatible with Arms. This Brave Captain happily made his Will, diſpoſing of all his devotions, his affairs and Charge: each day he executed ſome part hereof, doing all the good he could whiles he lived, not expecting the caſuall portions of others piety, as thoſe who cauſe Torches to be carried behind to light them when they have loſt their eyes, and indeed, never do well but when they are in a condition to be able to do no more. This charitable Lord particularly informed himſelf of the neceſſities of the baſhfull poore, and as the rareſt pieces of his Cabinet, ſet their names down in his Regiſter: He appointed on every ſide his Alms to the poor Religious, to Widows, to Orphans, to needy Souldiers, namely to thoſe who through diſability of old age and ſickneſſe could labour no more. He viſited Hoſpitals, giving according to his means round ſummes of money to furniſh and accommodate them; if he walked in the ſtreets he ever had charity in his hands, that himſelf might give all he could, for he took therein a ſingular contentment, and never was he ſeen to be ſo merry, as when he had diſtributed good ſtore of money; This was to him as his hunting, his game, his delight.

He bare a ſingular devotion, in memory of the paſſion of our Saviour, towards the fryday; and whileſt he was able, did eat nothing on that day but fruits and Puls, abſteining from all which participated of the life of Beaſts, and clothed himſelf likewiſe in a moſt ſimple habit, deſirous to ſhew outwardly ſome taſte of the Reverence we owe to the bloud of the ſonne of God. Beſides abſtinencies commanded, he faſted ordinarily on the Saturday, which is dedicated to the memory of the Bleſſed Virgin. He never fed at his repaſt but on one diſh, and though he had great quantity of ſilver Veſſels, he cauſed himſelf to be ſerved in Peuter and Earth, being glorious in publick, but in his particular an enemy to worldly pomps and vanities.

I leave you to contemplate, how far this kind of life is alienated from the curious Nobility of our dayes, to whom ſo many Diſpenſations and Priviledges muſt daily be given, that it ſeems, it is needfull for their ſakes onely to create another Chriſtendome, beſides that which hath been eſtabliſhed by the Sonne of God. A man would ſay, to ſee how they pamper their bodies, they were deſcended from heaven, and that thither they would return, without paſſing through the Grave, they Deifie themſelves, and to fatten and guild a ſtinking Dunghill covered over with ſnow, they ſport with the bloud and ſweat of men.

Superfluity of taſte being ſo well qualified, all went in true meaſure in the houſe of this good Marſhall: his retinue was well enterteined according to his quality, and he had a very ſolemn cuſtome by him religiouſly obſerved, which was ſpeedily to pay his debts, and as much as he might poſſible to be ingaged to none. It is no ſmall virtue, nor of mean importance to be out of ingagements of this kind; if we conſider the Nobility at this time, ſo eaſily plunged in great labyrinths of Debts, which daily increaſe like huge Snow-balls that fall from the mountains, and require Ages and golden Mines to diſcharge them.

Is it not a moſt inexcuſable cruelty before God and man, to ſee a buſie Merchant, a needy Artificer, every day to multiply his journeyes and ſteps before the gate of a Lord or a Lady, who bear his ſweat and bloud in the pleits of their garments? And in ſtead of giving ſome ſatisfaction upon his moſt juſt demands, it is told him he is an importunate fellow, and many times is menaced with baſtinadoes, if he deſiſt not to demand his own. Is not this to live like a Tartarian? Is not this to degrade ones ſelf from Nobility, Chriſtianity and Reaſon? Is not this to ruine, and as it were to cut the Throats of whole Houſes and Families? Allodge not to me, that it is impoſſible for you to pay what is demanded at preſent: foreſeeing your weakneſſe of eſtate, why have you heaped ſo many debts which cannot be diſcharged!

Why do you not rather leſſen your port, and live more frugally? Why do you not caſt off many ſuperfluous things that might be ſpared? Are not offences odious enough before God, but you muſt increaſe them with the marrow of the poor? From hence cometh the contempt of your Perſons, the hatred of your Name, the breaches and ruine of your Houſes.

This man by paying his debts well, was honoured and reſpected of his Officers like a Demy-god: there was no need of making any queſtion or doubt, nor to make a falſe ſtep into his houſe. He would never ſuffer a Vice, or bad ſervant, were it to gain an Empire. Blaſphemies, Oaths, Lyes, Slanders, paſtimes, Quarrels and ſuch like diſorders were baniſhed from his Palace as monſters: and if he once found any of his family in fault he put them away leaſt they ſhould infect the other: yet he would not ſcandalize them, nor divulge their offences. At the Table he ſpake little, and did voluntarily entertein himſelf with the example of virtues which he obſerved in the lives of the Nobility: never diſcourſing of his own atchievements but with ſingular ſobriety.

In his marriage he demeaned himſelf moſt chaſtely, and had ſuch an hatred againſt impurity, that he would not ſo much as keep a ſervant that had a luſtfull eye. Behold; how paſſing one day on horſe-back through the ſtreets of the City of Genoa, as a Lady preſented her ſelf at a window to comb her hair, and a Gentleman of the Marſhalls train ſeeing her treſſes very bright and beautifull cryed out, Oh what a goodly head of hair! ſtanding ſtill to behold her. This Lord looking back on him with a ſevere eye, ſaid, It is not well done, it is not fit that a wanton eye ſhould be ſeen to glance from the houſe of a Governour.

back

In this kind and all others which concerned the commerce and peace of the Citizens, he rendred ſo ready and exact juſtice, that it was a Proverb amongſt the Genoes when any one was offended, to ſay to him who had done him wrong: If you will not right me, my Lord Marſhall will. The other underſtanding it, oft-times rather choſe to ſubmit to the right, then expect a condemnation, which was inevitable. By this means he ſo gained the good opinion of the people, that the inhabitants of the City ſent to the King, beſeeching him, that he might continue the Government to the end of his dayes, which having obtained, it ſeemed to them, that they had procured an Angel from Heaven to be ſet at the Stern of their Common-wealth.

At that time when the Emperour of Conſtantinople, then diſpoſſeſſed of one part of his Empire by the great Turk, came into France to deſire ſuccour, and had obtained of the King twelve hundred men defrayed for a year, many widdow Ladies were ſeen at the Court, who complained of injuſtice and oppreſſions which were offerred them after the death of their husbands; whereby this good Marſhall was ſo moved with compaſſion, that with much freedome he inſtituted an Order of Knights for the defence of afflicted Ladies, which he ſirnamed The Order of the White Ladie, becauſe they who made profeſſion of it bare a Scutcheon of gold enamelled with green, and thereon the figure of a Lady in a white Veſtment: thus ſought he by all occaſions to do good, and ſhewed himſelf a great enemy of idleneſſe, as being the very moath of great Spirits.

He ordinarily roſe early in the morning, and ſpent about three hours in Prayer and divine Service: after that duty was performed he went to Councel, which laſted till Dinner-time. After his repaſt he gave audience to all thoſe who would ſpeak with him upon their affairs, never failing to behold his Hall daily full of people, whom he ſpeedily diſpatched, contenting every one with ſweet and reaſonable anſwers: from thence he retired to write Letters, and to give ſuch order to his Officers which his pleaſure was ſhould be obſerved in all his affairs: and if he had no other employment he went to Veſpers. At his return he took ſome pains or recreation, then finiſhing the reſt of his Office, he ended the day. On Sundayes and Holy-Dayes he either went on foot in ſome Pilgrimage of Devotion, or cauſed the Life of Saints, or other Hiſtories to be read, daily more and more to diſpoſe his Life and Converſation unto Virtue. When he Marched into the field, he uſed moſt admirable diſcretion, never oppreſſing any of his company, nor would he permit even in the enemies Countrey, that the leaſt diſturbance ſhould be done to Churchmen.

Behold you not here a Life worthy of a French Cavalier? Oh Nobility! This man was not a Petty Roiſter, that makes boaſt to fight in a green meadow; But a Souldier, who during the Warres with the Engliſh kept the Field of Battell three times thirty dayes together, againſt thoſe brave Souldiers who did oppoſe him; from whence he went out all ſparkling with glory and wonder.

I would here willingly adde a Bertrand of Gueſclin Count of Longuevil, and Conſtable of France, whoſe Life Mounſier Menard hath given us written by a Pen of that antient Age, in as antient Language. You ſhould ſee a man, who after he had dedicated his Soul, Body, and Arms in the Offertory of a Maſſe at the Altar, fought ſix or ſeven times hand to hand in the Field, exerciſed ſtrange Feats of Battell and Arms; ſtood in the midſt of Combats unmoved, and confident as in his Chamber, being otherwiſe furious, ſtrong and ſtout in the preſſe. You ſhould ſee a man ſage in Counſels, prompt in Execution, whom an Enemy found near at hand when he thought him thirty miles off. A man in all things elſe free from Fraud or Diſſimulation, Chearfull, Courteous, obliging and liberall of his own, employing his Movables and his Wives Jewels for the relief of poor Souldiers.

Then you may judge, whether by being Valiant you may live in the Court of a Chriſtian Prince like a little Turk. Where is your Judgement? and where is your Reaſon?

BAYARD.

BEhold a man whose life not long since hath been published to serve as a modell for the Nobility: we yet touch him as it were with our finger, for he dyed under the reign of Francis the First, having served three Kings in their Armies, the space of two and thirty years. It is the valiant Terrail, otherwise called Cavalier Bayard born in Daulphine. I willingly make use of his Example, both because one of our most warlike Kings, the sonne of Francis the First would needs be knighted by his hands, to witnesse the honour he bare to his valour, as also for that I see therein many noble passages which taste of the virtue of a true French souldier. He was a courageous Captain, of excellent direction, valiant and magnanimous, of whom it was said, that he had the assault of the wilde Bull, the defence of the Bore, and slight of the wolf. I set aside his warlike deeds, I take some of his virtues which here I will make use of. This royall courage had no other aim in arms, but the glory of God, the service of his Prince, and the honour of his profession, whereof we have an ample testimony in a short Elogy, which his secretary made upon him, saying. That after these two and thirty years service, he dyed almost as poor as he was born. Much is spoken in these few words, and I think Bayard more glorious under this title, then if he had born the Dutchy of Milan on his back. He had the true piety of a good Souldier: for every morning he prayed to God most devoutly, and would not permit any man to enter into his chamber during his devotions: He was so obedient to those who commanded in the Army, that he never refused any commission imposed upon him. Yea, well foreseeing that the last charge enjoyned him by the Marshall Bonivet was most dangerous, and as it were impossible, yet he went thither, sacrificing his life to the commandments of the Lieutenant of his Prince, that he might not digresse from his ordinary custome. There was he slain by the most generous manner of death that could happen to any Captain of his quality. He was a Lyon in Arms, who with a choice company of men selected by him and trained to his profession, wrought such admirable effects, that there was not any battel wonne, of which he was not ever the principall cause. Never was any man more terrible to an enemy in the conflict, but out of it, it was said he was one of the most affable and courteous men of the earth: he was so ill a flatterer of great men, that to gain a Kingdome he would not be drawn to speak any thing but reason. His practise was to honour the virtuous, speak little of the vicious, lesse of his own atchievements, never to swear; to do favours to all that required them as willingly as if himself were to receive the benefit, to give secret alms according to his ability, in such manner, that it is written, that besides his other acts of piety, he married at the least an hundred poor young maids. Behold of what elements his soul was inwardly composed. As for the manner of his carriage in the warre, he as little cared for money as the dust of the earth, and desired not to have any but to give; witnesse an act of great liberality, which is related of him. He took fairly by law of Arms a Spanish Treasurer, who had about him fifteen thousand Ducats: one of his Captains named Tardieu, enraged with choller, swore that he would have part of the booty, because he was in the Expedition. This good Captain smiling said unto him, It is true, you were of the enterprise, but are not to share in the Booty; and if it were so, you are under my charge, I therefore will give you what I think good. This man entred into more violent fury, and went to complain to the Generall, who having well considered the businesse, adjudged it wholly to Bayard. He caused his Ducats to be carried to a place of safety, and commanded them to be spread on a Table, in presence of all his people, saying to them, Companions, what think yee? Do yee not here behold fine junkets? Poor Tardieu, who had been put by his pretensions by expresse sentence of his Captains, looked on this money with a jealous eye, and said, If he had the half of it, he would all his life be an honest man. Doth that depend on this? (saith this brave Spirit) Hold then, I willingly give you that which you by force could never obtein. And so caused he at the same instant seven thousand five hundred Ducats to be told out to him. The other, (who in the beginning thought it was but a meer mockery, when he saw it to be in good earnest, and himself in possession of that he desired) cast himself on both his knees at the feet of Bayard, having abundant tears of joy in his eyes, and cryed out, Alas my Master, my Friend, you have surpassed the liberality of Alexander: How shall I be ever able to acknowledge the benefit, which I at this time do receive at your hands? Hold your peace, (said this incomparable man) If I had power, I would do much more. And thereupon causing all the souldiers of the Garrison to be called, he distributed the rest of the Ducats; not keeping one sole denier for his own use.

Martiall virtues of a brave French Souldier.

I ask of you, whether this were not a heart of true pearl, wherein there could not one least blemish of Avarice be found? Yea, also when he passed through the Countrey, even in a land of Conquest, he paied his expence. And one saying to him, Sir, this money is lost: for, at your departure from hence, they will set this place on fire. He answered, Sirs, I do what I ought, God hath not put me into the world to live by Rapine.

Moreover, the excellency of this man appeared well in an affair, wherein the life of the most eminent man of the world was interessed. For, he at that time being in Italy, was sent by the King to assist the Duke of Ferrara against the Army of Pope Julius then much opposit to France, although so many other worthy Popes heartily loved our Nation. When one Monsieur Augustine Gerlo, a Gentleman of Milan, but yet a traitor and factious, went to the said Duke to perswade him to forsake the French Engagement, with intention to destroy them, and promised him that in recompence he would give him his Neece in marriage, and make him Captain Generall of the Church. This Prince would not seem in any wise to understand him; but he handled the matter so by his policy and advantageous promises, that he gained this Augustine who gave him his hand that he in few dayes would destroy the Pope by a mischievous Morsell which he could easily give him. The Duke of Ferrara having thus dived into his plots and intentions, went immediately to find out this our noble Bayard in his lodgings, and made a long discourse to him of the evil disposition of Pope Julius, and the enterprises he had both on his life and on the Frenchmen, of purpose to enkindle him for Revenge. Then he also pursued his opportunity, and made discovery to him of the treason of this wicked Gerlo. Bayard looking amazedly at him, said, How, Sir! I could never have imagined that a Prince so generous as you would conconſent to ſuch a wickedneſſe: and had you done it, I ſwear by my ſoul, before night I would have given the Pope notice of it. How! anſwered the Duke, he would have done as much either to you or me. It is no matter (replyeth Bayard) this treachery diſpleaſeth me. Whereat, the Duke ſhrugging up his ſhoulders, and ſpitting on the ground, ſaith, Monſieur Bayard, I would I had killed all mine enemies in this ſort: but, ſince you diſlike it, the matter ſhall reſt, and you and I both may have cauſe to repent it. We ſhall not, if it pleaſe God, replyeth the good ſouldier: but, I pray you, put this gallant into my hands that would do this goodly piece of ſervice; and if I do not cauſe him to be hanged in an hour, let me ſupply his place. The Duke finding in him this courage and fidelity, did all he could to wave and excuſe the plot, ſaying he had given him aſſurance of his perſon.

But, behold you not here a brave ſpirit in Bayard? See you not a man of a Royall conſcience, and of an honeſty in all things like to it ſelf? Away then with thoſe petty and baſe ſpirits of the abyſſe more black then ſpectres and infernall furies, who have neither loyalty for their Prince nor Common-wealth, but as it may concern their own intereſts; who ſwallow treaſons as big as camels to gain a fly. Such would make truth it ſelf to lie, were not heavens Providence awake to make their events as tragicall, as are their determinations abominable and hideous.

All the braveſt Chieftains have ever held it to be higheſt of their glorious victories, to be crowned with Chaſtity. It was the Trophey of Cyrus, to whom, for this cauſe God gave all the treaſures of Aſia: It was the Triumph of Alexander, who, in recompence thereof, had the conqueſt of the Perſians: And, the Emperour Julian, who made profeſſion herein to imitate him, although he had apoſtatized and renounced all other ſacred tyes, would never forſake Chaſtity, but wittily ſaid, This Virtue made beautifull lives, as Painters fair faces. But, not to ſearch ſo farre into the duſt and rubbiſh of Antiquity; I will draw one line more upon our Bayard in this Point, whereon his Hiſtory dignifies him with a paſſage admirable and unparallel'd.

Some there were had adviſed to convey into his chamber a maid which was one of the faireſt creatures in the world, and indeed ſhe was endowed with an angelically gracefull aſpect, ſave that at that inſtant her eyes were ſwoln (above their ordinary orbs) with an extremity of tears: and that too beſpake rather the commendable virtue of her modeſty, then the blemiſh of her beauty: Whom when the Captain had well ſurveyed; How now fair maid! ſaith he unto her; What ſayeſt thou? Why comeſt thou hither? The amazed damoſel falling on her knees, with that utterance her ſighings would afford her, ſhe thus anſwers him: Ah! Sir, My mother hath commanded me I ſhould do what you would have me; yet (Sir) I am a Virgin, and never (truly) had I any diſpoſition to do ill, however a neceſſity enforced me hither; for, my mother and my ſelf are ſo poor, that we are nigh periſhing through hunger: but, I wiſh to God I might ſee death, thereby to be diſſolved from the number of unhappy maidens, rather then to ſully my ſoul with the leaſt unworthy and ignoble act. Which words of hers pierced ſo this generous Lords ſoul to the quick, that they cauſed tears in his eyes, aſſociated with this reply; Verily, pretty ſoul, I will not be ſo wicked as to take that from thee which thou ſo charily haſt kept for the ſociety of pureſt Angels. Thereupon he cauſed her to be veiled leſt ſhe ſhould be taken notice of; and that ſhe might not be expoſed unto the rigid dealings of a rude hand; (not transferring the charge of her perſon to anothers care) he, with a lighted torch in his own hand, conducts her to her ſafe repoſe in the houſe of a virtuous kinſwoman of his, where he for that night leaves her. The day following, he ſent for her mother, and ſaid unto her, Are not you a wicked woman to betray the honour of your daughter, which ought to be more dear unto you then your life? Certainly for thus doing, you deſerve a puniſhment ſo much the more rigorous, as that I underſtand you are a Lady: and by a courſe ſo ſiniſter you wrong Nobility. The Lady hereat wholly confounded, knew not what elſe to anſwer, but that they were as poor as might be. Is there yet (ſaith he) no man that for her birth, beauty, and virtues ſake who requireth her in holy Marriage? Yes, truly (ſaith ſhe) an honeſt man, a neighbour of mine; had ſhe (as he with her demands) ſix hundred florens, which I am in no capacity to raiſe or to procure.

Then the brave Bayard drew out his purſe, and ſaid, Here are two hundred crowns (which are of more value then ſix hundred florens of this countrey) to marry your daughter withall: which my will is you diſpatch within three dayes: and farther, to enable you the better thereto; I alſo adde one hundred crowns more to adorn her with decent change of apparel, and I give your ſelf an hundred Crowns, which well houſewived, may ſerve to ſtave you off from future unbecomming ſhifts and poverty. All which was done accordingly, to the unſpeakable joy both of the mother, and of the daughter, who thenceforth lived in an honourable and comfortable condition.

O Nobility! I preſent not here an Hermit, but a Captain (who was a French Souldier) who was moulded of no other fleſh, bloud, nor bones, then are ye your ſelves: yet he performeth an act of a Religious man the moſt mortified: he exerciſeth the liberality of a King; he equalleth therein, yea ſurmounted the heroicall deeds of the greateſt Saints. True it is, Saint Nicholas ſaved the honour of Virgins, contributing thereto his gold and ſilver: as true it is that in ſo doing he generouſly triumphed over the covetouſneſſe of temporall goods; yet, he ſerved not in this action as a Triumph to himſelf, which is verily the choiceſt piece of eminent virtues. But, behold a Cavalier who vanquiſheth both Avarice and Luſt, (the two moſt dangerous rocks of the world.) Bayard commandeth his purſe in a fortune not the beſt accommodated; and that meriteth no ſmall applauſe: But Bayard, in the high flouriſh of his age, of a body vigorous, commands the paſſions of his ſoul and conquers them, even at the temptations of an object ſo amiable (as hath been repreſented here unto you) I beſeech you therefore, let it be no longer ſaid that Chaſtity is onely to be found amongſt the truly moſt mortified retirers into Cloiſters; for, it is every where, where the fear of the omnipreſent God, and where generoſity or reall virtue is. What then can ſo many wretches anſwer to this, who fill the world with ſins, the Nobility with diſgraces, their bodies with diſeaſes, their name with infamy, and load ſo many poor abuſed creatures with miſeries and deſpair? What can our ſpruce gallants deviſe for paſſable excuſe, who brave it through the ſtreets in their ridiculous offents of borrowed feathers and in habits; remaining indebted to the mercer for the ſtuffe, and to the poor taylour for the faſhion; paying yet neither the one or other? True jack-daws of Æſop, who deſerve that all other birds ſhould aſſemble to pull their plumes off which they have (thus no better then) ſtoln to catch and to be caught with vanity. What will here ſo many gluttons and gameſters ſay, who rent up and eat the entrails of men by their bloudy riots?

You ſee 'twas poſſible that this gallant ſouldier, by unravenous hands had four hundred crowns, (a ſum in thoſe dayes held a huge one) yet all this he gives in one onely alms; but, thoſe (whom I thus have taken to task) who in a bravery talk of nothing leſſe then piſtolets, not mind any thing elſe but their ſordid voluptuouſneſſe, have not a denier to throw to a poor body.

Purſuing this courſe, He did an act (at the taking of Breſſia a city in Italy) indeed for ever memorable, which was thus; That being ſet in the front of the Perdues, he firſt entred and paſſed the Rampart, whence he received a hurt in the top of his thigh, ſo dangerous that the top of a pike wherewith he was thruſt ſtuck in the wound: he, nothing terrified hereat, ſaid to one Captain Molard, I am ſlain; but it is no matter, let your men march on confidently, the town's our own. Then, two of his ſouldiers bare him out of the throng, who ſeeing his wound ſtreamed forth much bloud, they pulled off their ſhirts and rent them, binding up his thigh therewith; and, in the next houſe they hit upon, they took a little door off the hinges whereon they laid their tenderly beloved Captain, to bear him the more eaſily. From thence they went directly to a great houſe which they ſuppoſed (in all likelihood) to be a very convenient repoſe, and for his accommodation (and ſo indeed it proved:) For, it belonged to an honeſt Gentleman who thence retired into a Monaſtery to avoid the fury which is ordinarily found from conquering ſouldiers: for, the ſaccage of this City was ſo dreadfull, that there were reckoned as well of Venetians who defended it, as Burgeſſes, to the number of twenty thouſand ſlain: yet, his wife (the Lady of this houſe) with her two daughters, fortunately had ventured to abide at home, who yet through fear had hid themſelves together under hay in a barn, from whence the noble Matron made firſt her appearance to the two ſouldiers knocking at the gate, which (arming her ſelf with reſolution) ſhe opened to them, when eſpying a Captain all bloudy, for whom they demanded a room in her houſe to retire in; ſhe conducts them with their carriage on that homely bier (as is before related) into the faireſt and beſt furniſht chamber, where ſhe caſt her ſelf at his feet, ſaying, Sir, I freely make a tender of this houſe unto you with all the furniture thereof, which you may call yours even by the law of Arms: However, this favour I onely beg of you, you will be pleaſed to protect me and ſave mine honour inviolated, as alſo of my daughters (two poor maids) grown up to marriage eſtate, whom I and my dear husband value as the pledges of our conjugall affection. The Captain anſwered, Madam, fear not, We ſouldiers that muſt ſtand the ſhock of warre oftimes do meet with ſuch like caſualties as hath now betided me, which was the cauſe (not any deſign to wrong your perſons or diminiſh your poſſeſſions) that drave me hither: and whether I ſhall eſcape this wound be a contigency remote as yet from my aſſurance; yet, this I faithfully promiſe you, that, whilſt I live, there ſhall not be done the leaſt injury to you nor your daughters, no more then I would have befall to mine own perſon. Onely keep them in your lodging, and let them not be ſeen: ſend for your husband home again, whom you may aſſure and your ſelf too ye have a gheſt who will do you all courteſie poſſible. The Lady comfortably acquieſcing in the belief of his nobleneſſe uttered by his word, ſhe goes about the orderly contrivance of her houſwife-affairs accordingly, and having employed all her prudentialleſt care to give him good entertainment, ſhe ſoon perceived ſhe had lodged an honeſt man, (amongſt other his own perſonall civill manifeſtations) by the harmleſſe and juſt deportment of the Duke of Nemours the brave Generall of the Army (Gaſton de Foix) who came daily (with his choiceſt Chevaliers) to viſit him; yet he, and all they (although it was then in a city of their conqueſt) made offer of paying for what ever proviſions they demanded for their repaſts. The good hoſteſſe therefore took her ſelf ſo much the more concerned to wait on her noble inmate (as indeed ſhe did) as on an Angel ſent her from heaven: ſo much divine honour and virtue ſaw ſhe reſplendent in him. When he was well cured of his hurt, and ſpake of diſlodging thence to be preſent at the battle of Ravenna, where that his Generall paſſionately deſired him no leſſe for his ſociety then his ſervice; the Lady (who accounted her ſelf as his priſoner, with her husband and their two daughters, conſidering that if their gheſt would rigorouſly uſe them he might (according to the uſe and liberty of a ſouldier) draw ten or twelve thouſand crowns from her,) reſolved to give him a preſent: and therefore went into his chamber with one of her domeſtick attendants who carried a little ſteel cabinet, and preſently ſhe threw her ſelf at his feet, but he quickly raiſed her up again, not ſuffering ſhe ſhould ſpeak a word till ſhe was ſeated by him, at which time ſhe made this ſpeech well obſerved by the Secretary of Bayard.

Sir, ſith it ſeemed good to the high Providence that this city ſhould be deſtined to a captivity by your valour; the favour which God hath afforded me by ſending you into this houſe which is wholly at your ſervice, I thankfully contemplate as one which hath been no leſſe then the preſervation of the life of my husband, mine own, and that of my two daughters, with their unattempted chaſtity; which they dearlier eſtimate then their precious life. Beſides, your people have demeaned themſelves (to your own rare example, as well as to your lawfull commands, I attribute it) here in my houſe, that I have cauſe for ever to commend their ſober carriage and modeſty, and not deſerving the leaſt blame or complaint for any kind of injury committed by them. And, yet Sir, I am not ſo ignorant of the condition whereunto the miſery of warre hath reduced us, as not very well to apprehend that my husband, my ſelf, and our children are your priſoners, and that all the goods in this houſe are in your power to be diſpoſed of at your liking and diſcretion: But withall, knowing the nobleneſſe of your heart which is incomparable; I am come moſt humbly to beſeech you to take pity on us your poor captives, and to deal with us according to your manifeſted goodneſſe and clemency, whereto we render as a thankfull ſacrifice this poor preſent earneſtly deſiring it may be acceptable. Having thus ſpoken, ſhe took the cabinet out of her ſervants hands, and opened it before the good Captain, who ſaw it to be full of ducats, whereat he ſmiled, ſaying, Madam, how many ducats have you there? The poor woman, diſmayed becauſe ſhe thought his ſmiling had proceeded from conceived diſcontent, anſwered, Here are but two thouſand five hundred ducats; but if you be not ſatisfied herewith, we will procure you more. Nay, Madam (replyed the Captain) I do well aſſure you, that ſhould you give me an hundred thouſand crowns, you could not (for all that) do me ſo much good as you have benefitted me already by your courteous entertainment and virtuous offices of recovering me. In what place therefore ſoever I ſhall remain, while God prolongs my life, you ſhall find you have thereby engaged a Gentleman ready to embrace occaſions of ſerving your commands. And now, as for your ducats, I will take none of them, but give you thanks, and ſo I pray you put them up again. For my part, I have ever eſteemed people of honour more then crowns; and think not, Madam, but I go away as well contented from you as if this city were at your diſpoſition, and you had made me a preſent thereof.

people

She again humbly proſtrating her ſelf on her knees, and the Captain lifting her up, ſhe anſwered, No Sir? I ſhould think my ſelf for ever the moſt unhappy woman of the world, if you accept not of this preſent, which is nothing in compariſon of the infinite obligations I owe to your worth. Well (ſaith he) ſith you give it with ſo good a will, I accept it for your ſake: but, cauſe your daughters to come hither that I may bid them farewell. Theſe virtuous ſouls following their mothers preſidency, had alſo with her charitably aſſiſted him during the time of his infirmities cure, many times touching their Lute whereon they played very ſweetly, for his minds recreation. Upon this ſummon of his into his preſence, they fell at his feet, the elder of the daughters (in the name of both) made a ſhort ſpeech unto him in her mother language, importing a thankfull form unto him for his juſt performed preſervation of their honour. The Captain heard it, yet not without a weeping-joy and admiration at the ſweetneſſe and humility he therein obſerved, and then ſaid: Ladies, ye do that which I ought to do; which is, to give you thanks for the many good helps ye have afforded me, for which I find my ſelf infinitely obliged unto you. Ye know, men of my profeſſion are not readily furniſhed with handſome tokens to preſent fair maidens withall. But behold! your good Lady-mother hath given me two thouſand five hundred ducats: take each of you a thouſand of them as my gift, for ſo I am reſolved it ſhall be. Then turning to his Hoſteſſe, Madam (ſaith he) I will take the five hundred to my ſelf to diſtribute them among poor Religious women who have not had like happineſſe with you to be preſerved from the ſouldiers plundering pillage: And as you better then any other may judge of the neceſſities which each one may by ſuch accidents have befaln them: ſo I am confident I can depute none a more faithfull ſteward for the diſpoſing thereof then is your wife, ingenious, and charitable ſelf, unto whoſe ſole diſpoſall I freely recommend it. The Lady touched to the quick with ſo rare and pious a diſpoſition, ſpake theſe words unto him; O flower of Chevalry to whom none other can be compared! Our bleſſed Saviour and Redeemer Jeſus Chriſt, who for us ſinners ſuffered death and paſſion, both here in this world, and in the other, reward you. The Gentleman of the houſe, who at that time heard the courteſie of his gheſt, came to thank him with a bended knee, making him (withall) a ſurrender of his perſon, and a ſequeſtration of his whole eſtate; but he moſt nobly left him maſter of himſelf and of his eſtate. The young gentlewomen who (amongſt other their many accompliſhing endowments) were skilfull at the needle, made him a preſent of a crimſon-ſattin purſe very richly wrought, and of two bracelets woven with thread of gold and ſilver. He very graciouſly receiving them; Behold (ſaith he) I eſteem theſe more then ten thouſand crowns: and inſtantly he put the bracelets on his wriſts, and the purſe into his pocket; aſſuring them that while theſe their reſpect-remembrances would laſt, he would wear them for their ſakes. Which civil ceremonies ended, he mounted on his horſe, accompanied thence with his true friend the Lord D'Auvergny, and with about two or three thouſand gentlemen and ſouldiers; the Lady of the houſe and her daughters, and the whole family as paſſionately lamenting his departure, as if they ſhould have been left to the ſword, although they had aſſurance from him by his undeniable Protection under which he left them, and their poſſeſſions to be unmoleſted after his departure.

If the ſtarres were to deſcend from heaven, I would demand now whether they might find more love and reſpect then this heaven-born piece of generoſity did both receive and return. But, be ye your own judges if your obſervations tell you not, it farre otherwiſe befalls thoſe ſilly fencers who in like times of advantages ruſh themſelves into ſuch well-feathered nefts, and otherwiſe then as fatall Comets portending fire and the deſtroying ſword, who make the props of buildings tremble with their loud blaſphemies, who load whole families with injuries, without the leaſt regard of age, ſex, or honour, but make a ſport at the bloud and wounds over whom they tyrannize, pillaging them like ravenous harpies fatted with humane ruines. However, ſhould they do nothing elſe all their life time but heap up mountains of gold and ſilver; they could not arrive to the leaſt part of the contentment which this good Captain enjoyed, who ſought no other recompence from his fair way'd actions, but the ſatisfaction of his ſerene conſcience, and the glory to have done ſo well. And thus it is (O ye who would your ſelves to be indeed enobled) that hearts are gained: thus ye oblige (if I may ſo ſay) both earth and heaven to become due tributaries to your virtues, with bleſſings round about you here, and with a crown of immortality hereafter.

THE

THE STATES-MEN.

JOSEPH. MOSES.

I Begin the Elogies of holy States-men with the Patriarch Joseph, who was the firſt of Gods choſen people, that entred into the Court of an Infidel Prince, to make of his life an example of virtue, and of his demeanour a miracle. Here is an high deſign of God, who tranſports a young child out of the cabans and condition of ſhepherds, to make him the ſecond perſon of a great Kingdome, to give him the heart and the treaſures of his Maſter, the friendſhip of the Nobles, the veneration of the People, and the admiration of all the world. Thoſe that look upon this hiſtory after a common manner, obſerve ordinarily therein the changes of humane things; the beginnings, the progreſſes, and the iſſues of worldly affairs: But if we would penetrate farther, we ſhould find two great reaſons and two admirable deſigns of Providence about the entrance and negotiation of Joſeph in Egypt.

The firſt is, that according to the ſaying of the great S. Leo, it was reaſonable that the eternall Word that was to come for the ſalvation of the whole world ſhould be divided through all Ages, and through all Nations, ſhewing himſelf to ſome in figure, to others in reality, giving himſelf to ſome by Hope, to others by Preſence, and to many by remembrance. He inſinuated himſelf into the antient Jews by Prophecies; into the Gentiles by Oracles; into the Learned by Riddles; into the People by viſible Figures; into the Saints and the Religious by Myſteries; into the Profane and Gentiles by Government and Politick Prudence. This is the faſhion that he held towards the Egyptians, making them ſee the firſt rayes of the Birth-day of his coming in the perſon of Joſeph, that wore very advantageouſly the Lineaments of his Divine Perfections, and merited to be called by advance, The Saviour of the world.

The ſecond reaſon is, that God meaning to begin that Divine work of the perſecutions and the wonders of his choſen People tranſports Joſeph thither, and makes of him a man of ſufferings and of prodigies, to be as a grain of ſeed out of which one ſhould ſee ſpring that numerous poſterity that ſhould equall the ſtarres of heaven. This eternall high Prieſt prepared for his Altars a great ſacrifice of Tribulation, and of Patience which was to be honoured with ſo much Bloud, and ſo many Tears of the Righteous, and would invite thereto the Saints by the imitation of a Patriarch that conſecrated himſelf by his own evils and mounted out of a deep pit to the triumphant chariot of the Pharaoh's.

I have propoſed to my ſelf to repreſent this to you (my Reader) not relating at large his Hiſtory which is ſufficiently known, but by making ſome reflexions upon it able to make us admire the greatneſſe of God, and to faſhion the manners of Courtiers affected to virtue, by originalls that God hath placed as upon the frontiſpiece of his palace.

Let us obſerve then (according to the purſuit which the Scripture makes us ſee in this narration) his entrance into the Court, his beginning, his progreſſes, his virtues, his negotiations, and his ſucceſſes, from which we ſhall draw great lights and infallible proofs of the work of God upon thoſe whom he embraces by love and by a very particular conduct.

Ambitious ſpirits have ſtudied in all times the means to make a fortune at the Court of Kings, and have applied themſelves ſtrongly to this deſign, as to the ſtudy of the Philoſophers ſtone, or to the conqueſt of the golden fleece: But they have had work enough to find out the true principles and cauſes of the good will of great ones, which is the reaſon that ſome ſeem to have the golden wings of fortune her ſelf to flie to the palace of Honour, without labour, and without difficulty, culty, while others with indefatigable pains grow old in diſgrace and in contempt. Lilius Giraldus a learned man digged out of the ground in his ſearches an antient picture of the induſtrious Apelles, wherein after he had painted Favour winged, blind, ſtanding upon a rouling boul, environned with riches, honour, diſdain, flattery, and the impunity of all crimes; he places at her feet ſome Philoſophers that ſtudied her Genealogy, ſome making her the daughter of Beauty, others of chance, others of Induſtry, others of Virtue: but the ableſt confeſſed that ſhe was a baſtard, and not begotten of lawfull Parents, but of an obſcure and dark Confuſion.

And indeed if we ſpeak of the favour of Princes taken according to the world, we muſt acknowledge that it is very uncertain, having as many divers births as there are different humours in the mind of great ones who are ordinarily ſubject to many changes, whether through an opinion of their greatneſſe, or whether through the delicateneſſe of their breeding, or whether through the diverſity of thoſe that approach them, and ſo many fantaſticall conceits that proceed from the perturbation of their own felicities. Who is able to tell all the entrances into favour, ſeeing there are ſome that have been promoted highly for having cauſed a little ſucking pig to be roaſted handſomely, as it happened to a favourite of Henry the Eighth's King of England? It is true that there are ſome that inſinuate themſelves by beauty and by a good grace, others by jeaſting and delightfull paſtimes, others by underſtanding and the conduct of affairs, others by valour, others by ſcience, others by the invention of crimes and infamous wayes of magick, by unſeemly complacencies and unworthy ſervices which they render to the revenges or to the pleaſures of their maſters.

But (not to ſpeak of other proceedings that are leſſe clean) thoſe that give precepts of riſing at the Court will tell us, that he ought to be of a good birth, of a pleaſing behaviour, very dextrous in all ſorts of exerciſes fit for the Nobility, of a gentle wit that hath ſome tincture of ſcience, of a poliſhed converſation, full of civility, affability, and prudence. In a word, he muſt be a man of conſcience, of underſtanding, of courage, of ſervice, and held up by ſome powerfull friend, that will gain the good will of great ones, and to open to himſelf a large way to the honours of the age. This is ſaid with much prudence, but we muſt avouch, that beſide all theſe rare qualities, there is a ſecret puſh of an inviſible hand that thruſts forward the favourites, which ſome have attributed to the ſtars, others to deſtiny, others to a good temper, but which I think with reaſon to be an effect of the divine Providence, and an operation of the Guardian Angels, who in proſperous affairs, procure often counſellours and officers to Kings by high and ſublime wayes, of exquiſite gifts and profitable to ſecond the good genius of the Prince, and to advance by the ſame means the favourite.

This is that which may be obſerved clearly in the perſon of Joſeph (whoſe Elogy I have undertaken to give you.) There is required in a man of a ſecular State the birth of a gentleman to make a fortune at the Court, and this man was the ſon of a ſhepherd; a skilfulneſſe at weapons, he had never handled nor perhaps ſeen any; a gentleneſſe in the exerciſes of the body, he knew no other but thoſe of ſhepherds; a grace of ſpeech, he was a ſtranger and a barbarian to the Egyptians; Military valour, he knew no other combates but thoſe of the rammes and bulls; politick prudence, he came from a ſavage life where he had had no other converſation but that of trees and beaſts. What was it then that promoted him in the Court of Pharaoh, and made him riſe ſo high? Muſt we not acknowledge with all ſubmiſſion of ſpirit, that there is an heavenly hand that takes a charge of this buſineſſe, and that it is our Tutelar Angel to whom God having given Commiſſion of our lives and fortunes, it is no way credible that he neglects us in theſe great occurrences of exerciſes and of converſations that are to compoſe the happineſſe or the miſeries of our life?

Yet it is true that God deſtining a man to ſome great deſign fails not inſenſibly to furniſh him with neceſſary qualities for that diſpoſall though they are elevated above the opinion of the world, and ſometimes even contrary to the ordinary practiſes of Courtiers; from thence it came that Providence had made Joſeph of a good mind, and of a grace fitting for converſation, of a ſweet and pleaſing humour, of a ſpirit capable of buſineſſe. She gave him a marvellous gift of Prophecy and of Interpretation of Dreams, which wrought the principall effect of that high fortune, in a King curious to know the things that were to come, and a Nation much inclined to Divinations, and to the knowledge of the ſecrets of Nature, and above Nature. Here is a point of Doctrine neceſſary to be obſerved, as well for the Science as for the Conſcience, ſince the obſervation of Dreams, which many make by Superſtition, was made by Myſtery, to the honour of the Interpretour, and to the profit of all the Nation, as the Hiſtory will ſhew you clearly in its ſequele.

We know that a Dream is a viſion which is made in ſleep cauſed by the remainders of the images of the things which we have received in our ſenſes and in our imagination when we were awake; and is as the Eccho which brings a repetition of the actions of the day. Our ſoul hath this mark of its immortality, that it is in a perpetuall motion, without any interruption, after the manner of the heavenly Globes and of the intelligences. When the body is laid faſt by the charming ſweetneſſes of ſleep, and the night makes a league with all the actions of the day, the ſoul makes not any with its operations; it meditates, it reaſons, it ſpeaks, it is in action, it negotiates, and without parting from its body flies beyond all lands and ſeas to enjoy a friend. She opens her ſelf with joy, pricks her ſelf with ſorrow, intereſſes her ſelf in buſineſſes, and not being able to uſe the members of her body, ſerves her ſelf with her own members, and her own faculties for the ſatisfaction of her deſire. And as ſword-players ceaſe not ſometimes to fence without arms, and to uſe geſtures as if there paſſed a reall combate; ſo our ſpirit, whiles we ſleep, carries her ſelf away, and does every thing in Idea, as if it were ſeconded by the body. Such is the ſtate and naturall condition of Dreams, as Tertullian hath well explained it in his Book concerning the Soul. But beyond this, it is expedient to note that there is ſomething in them of extraordinary and Divine, which made the Stoicks ſay, that Providence carefull of our preſervation gave us Dreaming, as a domeſtick Oracle, to inform us of our good and evils. This cannot be underſtood commonly of all Dreams, the truth being ſuch that there are five ſorts of them which Macrobius following the Antients names the Phantaſme, the Raving, the Viſion, the Oracle, and the figurative Dream; we ought not to relie much upon Phantaſmes, which are as ſhadows, which preſent themſelves to our imagination in the very firſt cloud of ſleep, nor of Ravings which follow ordinarily the ſtate of the paſſions and affections of our ſoul and of our body, as Artemidorus reaſons in the beginning of his work; but much on Viſion, which without following the paths trodden the day before by our ſenſes, make us ſee and diſcovet things in our ſleep which we experiment when we are awake to be the ſelf ſame which we ſaw when we were aſleep. And as for Oracle, which expreſſes to us apparitions of God and Angels, or certain grave perſons that ſeem to ſpeak to us, and to advertiſe us of what we have to do, or not to do, it cannot be but very conſiderable; as alſo the Figurative Dream, which ſhews us under Figures and Symbols the divers accidents of things profitable either to the common good, or to our particular conduct.

I have been willing to clear this with more day, to make us know the excellent gifts of the divine Goodneſſe communicated to our Patriarch in that interpretation which he gave to Dreams. To ſpeak truth, it was a kind of Prophecy, which being properly a manifeſtation of Truths elevated above the ordinary knowledge of man, clearly diſcovered it ſelf in Joſeph in the declaration which he made of things ſo hidden, and ſo little penetrable to the underſtanding of the moſt learned men of Egypt. Saint Thomas diſputes touching the excellency of Prophecies, and ſayes, That thoſe are more ſublime that are purely intellectuall, then others that are made by ſimilitudes. But although thoſe of our Joſeph were revealed by Riddles and by Figures, yet they mount for all that to an high point of excellency; foraſmuch as they were by this means more proportioned to the capacity of a Nation that loved them more when they were involved in the ſhadows and in the clouds of thoſe Figures, then if they had been naked and totally unmixt with corporall Idea's. And I think that the great excellency of a maſter and of a teacher, is to accommodate himſelf to the ſpirit of thoſe to whom he would perſwade the verities of his Doctrine.

Now it diſcovers to us at preſent, that this firſt Courtier of the choſen people had ſomething of Divine that prepared him to great actions, inaſmuch as from his little child-hood he was exerciſed by thoſe myſterious Dreams, and amorous of Heaven, and of the Starres that enlightned him in the ſilence of a delicious night, and brought him the preſages of his future greatneſſe. God hath often ſpoken to his moſt faithfull ſervants by the means of Dreams: as, to Mordecai; to the Wiſe-men of the Eaſt; to Saint Joſeph the ſpouſe of the moſt holy Virgin: and the obſervation of them is not bad when one perceives in them ſome extraordinary thing, and which tends to a good end by lawful and commendable means.

It is true that Ariſtotle thought, that Dreams came not from God, becauſe if that had any likelihood, that favour would be for none but for the Philoſophers and for eminent perſons; but we muſt pardon a wiſe worldly man if he knew not the admirable commerce and the ſweet diſcourſes that the Spirit of God is pleaſed to make with ſimple and innocent ſouls, which being empty of themſelves are filled advantageouſly with the Deity. Such was little Joſeph, when he ſaw in a Dream his ſheaf of corn that exalted it ſelf above thoſe of his brethren, and when he beheld the Sun, and the Moon, with the eleven Stars that came to worſhip him and do him reverence. This probably ſeemed to him a preſage of a great happineſſe, ſeeing that according to the Maximes of Aſtrampſychus in his book of Dreams, it is a mark of felicity to ſee the ſtars in ones ſleep. He had not been then refined at Court when he boaſted of that Dream by a childiſh innocence, and related it to his brothers, who conceived ſo much jealouſie from it, that they reſolved upon his deſtruction.

Here is a ſecond work of Providence which pleaſes her ſelf in doing the works of her trade, and in conducting to the haven thoſe whom ſhe hath taken in charge by turning her back to them. His brothers, ſaith S. Gregory, ſold him for fear leſt he ſhould be worſhipped according to his Dream, and he was worſhipped becauſe he was ſold. Envy (which is properly a ſadneſſe for the honour and welfare of another, foraſmuch as that it ſeems to us to tend to the diminution of ours) finds objects in all places; it enters into Jacobs family, a family of Saints, to teach us (ſaith Saint Ambroſe) that the ſervants of God have not eſcaped Paſſions, but conquered them. He that in the Government of all Egypt found nothing but admiration amongſt ſtrangers, meets with envy amongſt his brethren, and amongſt thoſe of whom charity ſhould have been adored though ſhe had been perſecuted in all the habitable world. There is not a more ſubtil poyſon then that of aſps, nor a more deadly envy then that of brothers, and eſpecially of thoſe that make profeſſion of wiſdome and of holineſſe. This animall Paſſion, that makes at length a ſinne of the ſpirit, feels her ſelf moſt conveniently lodged in the heart of ſpirituall men; ſhe ſleeps in their boſome as in her neſt; and becauſe that ſhe is alwayes a companion of ambition, and that ſuch kind of perſons are ordinarily extreme deſirous of the glory that proceeds from the reputation of virtue and of learning, it comes to paſſe that ſhe hath in them more exerciſe and nouriſhment. This ill-boding Comet diſcovers in them without ceaſing new vapours to be digeſted, and by how much the more aged the envious are, by ſo much the more ſtrong are their habits to this ſinne. The rayes of virtue and of all perfection are darted continually into the eyes of thoſe of the ſame houſe, which makes this iniquity increaſe by the frequentation of its objects. Little things prick as well as great, and thoſe Spiders find every where matter for poyſon. Good muſt be hid from them, that their evil may not be diſcovered, and virtue be put out of ſight, that ſhe may be put out of the danger of being envyed. Oleaſter ſaith, that God covered Moſes with a cloud in thoſe familiar Colloquies which he had with him, for fear that that being perceived by the Jews who were at the bottome of the Mountain in its higheſt luſtre might move envy by an object that merited nothing but veneration.

But how juſt is God to turn that fury of the Serpents againſt her ſelf, to cauſe her to promote whiles ſhe abaſes, and to honour while ſhe inſults, and to ſanctifie whiles ſhe perſecutes thoſe on whom ſhe imprints the ſtrongeſt venome of her rage! O what a brave ſpectacle it is to ſee ſo many ſtorms poured down continually at the foot of the mountain Athos, with an eternall deſpair to cover it! And what an excellent Theatre of Providence is it to behold envious men that envy without ceaſing, and that are never envied, becauſe they have nothing that merits envy! they caſt out their foam and their froth againſt a man whom Gods raiſes upon the wings of glory, and by making themſelves an hell in their entrails, they prepare for him a paradiſe.

Joſeph

Joseph sold to the Ishmaelites is bought by Potiphar a great Prince of Egypt, who had the confidence of King Pharaoh and his Arms in his hands. He enters into the Court, a thing which he never had so much as thought on; he comes thither with a chain to carry away one day the collar of gold; he is received there as a Slave, to become a Master, and submits his neck under the yoke of Servitude, to Govern. He enters powerfully into the favour of his Lord, who finding him discreet, industrious, and faithfull, gives him the charge of all his house, of his goods, and of his revenues, which he causes greatly to encrease, so much were his pains accompanied with an abundance of the benedictions of heaven. But the immodest love of his Mistresse raised him great combats that served for an exercise to his virtue, to put it in the highest lustre of its glory.

Behold a point where God shews plainly, that one never loses any thing by being faithfull to him; and that the greatest triumph of virtues, is, to have sin in ones power, and innocence in ones will. Those that would raise fortunes of glasse upon the foundations of iniquity, would have thought that Joseph had had a fair opportunity in his hands to promote himself at Court, seeing himself beloved of one of the chief Ladies of the Kingdome, who was as much disposed to wish him well, as powerfull to make his happinesse. There was no need to woo her, and to gain her heart by many artifices; she loves, she desires, she presses: love hath robbed her of the quality of a Mistresse, to make her take that of a Servant who offered to him her passion. That pleasing beauty of Joseph, which virtue placed upon the highest of the thrones of love, darted arrows at her that made her forget her self, to run after her slave.

What shall this faithfull servant do, that sees that his beauty hath passed him Master in one day of his Lords house and bed? He is young, it is a vice, some one will say, pardonable to his age. He is a stranger, he hath need of an upholder, he is a man of fortune, he ought not to shut the door against her when she offers her self to him. It is a deed that will passe in an eternall secret; if he grants his Mistresse's request, wealth, content, authority, credit, are for none but him; if he denies it, he must fear chains, prisons, fire, and sword, and all that a woman will, and all that a provoked love can do. It was a great combate, wherein Reason had the upper-hand of Passion; Grace of Nature; and God of Man. Joseph would not be fair to the prejudice of another, thinking that that was not the true beauty that was adorned to the disadvantage of Chastity, but that which is preserved to the honour of Modesty. He settled his eyes fast upon the Naturall Law of God whom he adored, and although he seemed then to use him harshly in that captivity, yet he forgot nothing of his duty. He represented to himself the faithfulnesse that he had promised to his Master; the short pleasures that accompany sin, and the remorse that follows; he extinguished the flames of love; he brake all his darts; and in his slavery made himself master of him that hath captivated so many Kings.

He came out of the chamber where the snare was laid, as a ruby out of burning flames, without losing any thing of his integrity, and making his fair lustre glitter in the eyes of heaven, his onely witnesse. He quitted his coat, and thought it no more his own, after it had touched the hands of that immodest woman; he feared lest that contageous venome of love might communicate it self to his heart by the simple touch of a garment; he stayes not near her; he busies not himself so much as to make her a discourse of continence; he answers her by running away, and conquers the strongest of the passions by turning to it his back. O why were not all the roses and all the lillies that flourished in the gardens of Egypt for that time employed to make immortall crowns for that Chastity that consecrated it self so highly even in the Kingdome of loves! O how well did he then merit to be mounted upon a chariot drawn with horses whiter then the snow, and to be shown to all Egypt, as a tamer of monsters, and a triumpher over vices!

Nevertheless (the love of his Mistresse turning it self into rage) he is accused of having attempted to ravish the honour which he preserved. His innocence is born down by the artifices of a wife, and the credulity of an husband; he suffers for virtue all that the most faulty could expect in punishment of their crimes. He is put immediately into the dungeon, loaden with irons, used with all possible rigours, without being defended or succoured of any one; he expects nothing every moment but an ignominious death to put an end to the miseries of his life.

Eternal Wisdome! (said Tertullian) you cut your children's throats and use them as sacrifices, as if you could not crown them but by their torments, as if you could not honour them but by their punishments. But why do we complain (said a learned Father of the Church) Joseph is free in this captivity; if his body groans under the irons, his spirit walks with God, philosophizes with God, and thinks that the recompence of a good action, is, to have done it.

Behold the exact method that Providence keeps in the conduct of her chosen ones; One deep must call upon another deep; the deep of afflictions calls for that of glories, and the heighths of honour are prepared according to the measure of tribulations. It is the gold that (according to Job's speech) comes from the North; it is that divine crystall that is congealed under the breath of God; it is those burning arrows of the Lord of hosts that cause those combatants to let fly their colours, and that make wounds by communicating lights.

Ab aquilone aurum venit flante Deo concrescit gelu. Job 37.

Joseph's prison was a school of wisdome where God spake, and his servant hearkned to him, having his ear in heaven, and his heart in that of his Master. A certain Grace that proceeding from the interiour of his soul spread it self upon his visage, and made it self be heard in every one of his words, gained him the heart of his goaler that used him kindly, having already an high esteem of his innocence and of his virtue. There are some men so happy that they find Empires every where, which was the cause that this holy Patriarch obtained by merit the charge of all the prisoners that were companions of his misery, and made himself by love the governour even of him that held him in captivity.

It happens in this accident, that two of the King's officers, his Butler and his Baker, were brought into the same prison, and given in ward to Joseph to administer to them things necessary for life. He comforted them in their adversity, and entertained them with good discourses, and as he saw them one day very melancholy he inquired after the cause of their sadnesse, and perceived that they disquieted themselves about their Dreams. The Butler had dream'd that he saw a Vine with three branches, which at one time was adorned with leaves, with buds, with blossomes, and with ripe grapes, and that after he had gathered of its fruit, he squeezed it into Pharaoh's cup which he held in his hand, and presented it unto him. Whereupon Joseph foretold him that within three dayes he should be re-established in his office. The other had seen himself in his Dream carrying three paniers of meal upon his head, and it seemed to him that in that which was the highest of all, there was abundance of the delicacies of his trade, which the birds of prey came and snatched away, which made his Prophet denounce to him an ignominious death. The effect was answerable to the predictions in the limited time, and the one died upon the gallows, and the other was re-invested in his place.

But, that being very true which S. Thomas hath observed, that there be four sorts of people that easily forget a courtesie; Proud men, to whom one does some small displeasure, though they have been at other times greatly obliged in divers accidents. Base and mean persons that are unexpectedly raised to some degree of honour. Children, that are become men; and Prisoners that are set at liberty. The Butler was so ravished with his change of fortune, that he was no longer mindfull of his friend; the enjoyment of a present good making him lose the remembrance of the Prophecy concerning the time to come.

Yet Providence that would exalt Joseph to the highest top of honour at the time at which she had destined it, sent Dreams to Pharaoh about the state of his Kingdome, which caused great troubles in his mind, there being no body that he could find able to resolve his doubts. It was then that the Butler spake, not being ignorant that this news would be most pleasing to the King, and told him the Dreams that had happened both to him and to his companion when they were in prison, adding the interpretation given upon them by a young slave, an Hebrew by Nation, kept in the same goal, and the effect that had followed the Oracles of his mouth. Whereat the King being much joyed, commanded that he should be instantly fetched out of prison, and be brought to be seen and heard by his Majesty; which was readily performed, for after they had trimmed his hair, and cloathed him with a befitting habit, he was presented to the Kings eyes, who received him with much courtesie, and having related to him his Dreams, which were of seven kine, fat and wonderfull fair, that had been followed and devoured by other lean ones, and as much as could be, out of flesh; as also of seven ears of corn extremely well filled that had been eaten up by other empty and barren ones: he desired him to give him the Resolution of them. Whereupon, Joseph shewed a singular modesty, telling the King, that the true explications of Dreams, and all certain and infallible Prophecies came from God which is the father of lights, and at length opening his opinion, said, That Egypt should have seven years, such as never were, for abundance and fruitfulnesse, that should be followed with seven others over which should reign such a barrennesse and famine through all the land, that it should deface the memory of all that great fertility that had gone before. And therefore he would counsel his Majesty to find out a prudent and active man to give him the superintendency of all the land of Egypt, which should have Commissaries under him through all the Provinces, that should cause diligently the fifth part of the fruits, and the revenues of corn that should proceed every year out of that fecundity to be laid up and kept in the Kings granaries and magazines, that should be distributed in divers Provinces for that purpose, and that this would be a most secure means to remedy the great famine that should follow that long prosperity.

The interpretation of Pharaoh's Dream was admired, and the advice judged exceeding good, which caused the King, thinking that there was no man in all his Realm more capable of that design then he that had given the invention of it, to establish from that time Joseph in that Charge so important to the whole Nation. It is a marvellous thing to consider the honours that this Prince did him, and the high titles wherewith he qualified him (God being pleased to shew in this that he multiplies the consolations of his faithfull servants above all the measure of the displeasures that they can have received) for he did not content himself to give him the silk robe, the collar of the order, the ring of his finger, to procure him a rich marriage by causing him to be espoused to the daughter of an high Priest of the city of Heliopolis consecrated to the sun, but he caused him to be called The Saviour of the world, and commanded that he should be carryed through the capitall city upon his triumphant chariot, and that the Herald of Arms should cause men to bend their knees before him, that he might be acknowledged of all the people, and that all the world might understand that nothing was done but by his orders.

Where are those admirers of the fortunes of glasse that happen to to the wicked? where are those adorers of the Colussu's of dirt that appear by the help of some false guildings, and are immediately reduced to dust? Let them see and let them consider that the God of heaven and earth which we adore is the God of honour too, whereof he gives a share to his, when it pleases him, with magnificences that surpasse all whatsoever one can imagine. For a prison of three years Joseph is exalted to a principality of fourscore, with an authority so absolute, that it never yet had its equall since the foundation of the Monarchy of the Egyptians.

It now remains to observe for the instruction of Courtiers the deportments of Joseph in that Charge, and although the Scripture sayes very little of that businesse, enlarging it self principally upon the narration of his reconciliation with his brethren, yet it omits not to give us something whereon to meditate, and whereby to instruct our selves about his demeanour at the Court.

In the first place, he is greatly to be commended for having preserved through his whole life a piety inviolable in the Religion of his fathers, without altering the service of the true God by any bad tincture of the superstition of the Egyptians. Represent to your selves a child about seventeen years of age, that was in a strange Nation as the Morning-star, whereof the Scripture speaks, in the midst of clouds, without a father, without a mother, without a governour or a teacher, without a Priest, without a Sacrifice, without a Law, without Precepts, and without example, that saw himself allured and powerfully sollicited to quit his Religion, by that complacency which he desired to give his Prince, by the consideration of his fortune, by the friendship of the great ones, by the condition of his marriage, and by the liking (which he might aim at) of a people extremely fastned to their errour, that could not easily endure those that had any other opinion of their Gods then their madnesse did prescibe. And yet, in an age so tender he holds his own by constancy of mind against the mighty, by reason against the sages of the countrey, by warinesse against his own wife, by sweetnesse and by prudence against the people. He remains alone, amongst so many millions of superstitious men, an adorer of the truth in spirit, without other sacrifices or ceremonies which were not lawful for him to use. To speak truth, he that shall weigh all these circumstances, will find a marvellous weight of virtue and constancy in this holy personage. We may see many of the young gentry sufficiently well educated at the first, that coming to breathe the air of liberty amongst the Hereticks, and having not the frequentation of the Sacraments so free as formerly, easily forget their duty, and without having any other corruptour to sollicite them, corrupt themselves ſelves of themſelves through the want of courage and wearisomneſſe of virtue. But if there be any baits of pleaſure or of honour that allures them to the ſide of impiety they tread often times under foot all that there is of divine and humane, for the ſatisfying of their ſenſuality. But this young man that ſaw every day before his eyes a thouſand ſtumbling-blocks in a Nation that was addicted to Idolatry above all the People of the World, and that had often torn in pieces thoſe that expreſſed any contempt of their Ceremonies, preſerves himſelf amidſt theſe enticements and theſe furies, as a fountain of freſh-water in the midſt of the ſalt-Sea. The true God alwayes returned into his thoughts when he was to combate againſt the paſſion of his Miſtreſſe, when he was to preſent himſelf to the King, when he was to require an oath of his brethren, it was by the true God, and when he was ready to render up the Ghoſt, he conjured his children not to let his bones rot in a land of Idolatry.

Yet ſome men may wonder, that in ſo long a ſojourning as he made in Egypt, and in an authority ſo abſolute, he tooke care onely of the Politick affairs, and advanced not the intereſts of his Religion. Some may marvell at the alliance that he made with a daughter of a Prieſt of Idols, which could not be without putting his conſcience in great danger, there being nothing more full of Artifice then ſuperſtition that is upheld with Love.

But to this I anſwer, That all that he could do then was to preſerve his Faith, without pretending to ruine the contrary. It was not expedient that the figure ſhould incroach upon the Body, and that Joſeph ſhould do the work of the Meſſias. This demolition of the prophane Temples, and this deſtruction of the Idols was not due but to Jeſus Chriſt, and to the Deifying operations of the Evangelicall Law, after the coming of the Holy Spirit. How ſhould Joſeph have been able to enterprize the converſion of the Gentiles, ſeeing that our Lord would not permit, no not his Diſciples, while he was yet on earth, to make incurſions, and miſſions into the Countrey of the Heathens, commanding them to ſtay for that ſpirit of fire and light that was to inflame the whole world with its ardours? And as for that which touches his allyance, there was not yet any Law that forbad the Mariages of the Jews with the Gentiles, and he had but newly ſeen the example of his Father Jacob, who had allyed himſelf with the houſe of Laban. This was done indifferently enough in the Law of Nature, by reaſon that God had not commanded any thing that was contrary to this practice, and becauſe that his People were yet but a little family in the middle of the world. But this faſhion was changed afterward, (as it is clear by the Scripture) and thoſe who produce the Examples of Abraham and of Jacob, to perſwade allyance with Infidels, ſhew that they have little Reaſon and much Paſſion.

In the ſecond Place, I ſay that the Modeſty of Joſeph is of a rare Example, and of a ſtrength of mind almoſt incomparable. Which will be eaſie enough to prove to thoſe that know how ſeriouſly to weigh the change of humour and of ſpirit, that honour ordinarily brings with it, and eſpecially when it is great and ſudden, and falls upon a perſon that is not accuſtomed to it. There are ſome that are like the Thracians that make themſelves Drunk, ſtanding about burning coals, by the odour of a certain herb which they throw into the fire, after which they dance continually, and forget all the functions of the reaſonable life. So may you ſee abundance of ſuch men, who perceiving themſelves raiſed upon the wings of fortune, fall into ſuch a madneſſe of glory, that they are as it were dizzy-headed by certain venimous fumigations of ambition, and know themſelves no more. But this man ſees himſelf at his going out of priſon mounted to the higheſt point of honour that ever happened to a Favourite; He hath the Kings Ring and Seal, he triumphs upon his Chariot, he ſees the Nobles in admiration of his Fortune, and the Commons in veneration: he ſees the applauſes, he hears the Clamours of thoſe that highly publiſh him the ſaviour of the world; And yet for all this great preparation, there eſcapes not from him one onely word of vanity. He expreſſes not any complacency in thoſe honours, and in that habit, and it is not read that after the day of the Ceremony he ever uſed them. He publickly avouches that he is the ſon of a Shepheard, he cauſes his Father and his Brothers to come into the Kingdome of Egypt, not to give them the Offices of the Court, and the Treaſures of Pharaoh, but he lets them alone in their vocation, contenting himſelf to procure their quiet, and ſome ſmall commodities ſutable to that Paſtorall life. He humbles himſelf before his Father, he acknowledges and makes much of his Brethren, he gains the heart of all the world, and bears ſo actively that high top of glory, that he ſeems to be no more laden with it, then a Bird is with his Feathers.

The third perfection of Joſeph is remarkable in the great and laborious ſervices that he rendered to his Prince, with an high Prudence, an exquiſite Diligence, and an inviolable faithfulneſſe. He viſited in perſon all the Provinces of Egypt, and in the great fertility of thoſe fortunate years, when Corn was almoſt as cheap as ſand, he laid up a prodigious ſtore in the Kings Magazines to relieve the neceſſities of the barrenneſſe that was to come: and indeed it did not fail to happen, but indured the ſpace of ſeven years, with ſuch a violence, and ſo great diſaſters, that it ſeemed that the bowels of the Earth were iron, and that God had reſolved to deſtroy mankind by a Generall Famine. It was then that all the People implored the mercy of the King, who ſent them back to Joſeph who cauſed the Granaries of all Egypt to be ſet open, and ſold corn to all thoſe that had need of it, firſt for money, afterward for Cattell, and at laſt when both money and Cattell failed the Egyptians, they ſold their Lands in great number, ſo that all Egypt was ſubmitted to the diſcretion of the King, to avoid that raging Famine. They gave themſelves and their little poſſeſſions with all their heart for Bread; But Joſeph takeing pity of their great miſeries made them Conditions that were above all their hopes. This people was of a ſpirit bright enough, addicted to novelties and ſeditions, which made them often ſhake off the yoak, but Joſeph tamed them inſenſibly by their own neceſſities, and ſubjected all Egypt to his Maſter, cauſing him to reign peaceably, and with a great authority, and yet for all this drew no envy upon himſelf, but quite contrary he made his Government be admired, and his memory bleſſed!

Amongſt all this it is not ſaid that he enriched his houſe with the great treaſures that he heaped up for Pharaoh, and although that his Maſter had put all things into his power, yet he uſed them ſo moderately, that when he had a mind to offer preſents to his brother Benjamin, whom he loved as his own heart, he contented himſelf to give him five ſuits of Clothes, and three hundred Livers, making the ſame largeſſe to his Father, with ſome Mules to tranſport their Baggage. Yet is is very true that he cauſed the Land of Goſhen to be given them, but it was, as it were, by way of loan, to dwell there, and to husband it, till the return that Jacob pretended to make to the Countrey of his Fathers. In a word, Joſeph plainly ſhewed that he was little affected to all the Riches of the Egyptians when he received of his father, and made reckoning of it, a little piece of Land that he had gained from the Amorites.

A fourth quality of this wise Governour, which is greatly to be priz'd, is seen in the great prudence and singular sweetnesse which he used in his Government, in such a manner that he gained the affection of all the great men of Egypt. David speaking of this discretion and of this goodnesse saith, according to the Hebrew Text, That he tyed them all to his heart, which is as much as to say, That he united them to his person by a great affability, by good offices, and by honest yieldings. They looked upon him as a Father, and as a Master, and had him in veneration: and yet for all this he was not puffed with Pride, nor inebriated with the opinion of his own sufficiency; But in all the extraordinary favours that he received of the King his Master, he was communicable, and esteeming himself as one of them, he saw them all under him. To speak sincerely, it is an admirable thing, That a stranger should have held the Stern of a Kingdome the space of four score years in a Nation full of Spirit, and sufficiently seditious, without complaints, without discontents, and without intermissions in a calm so peaceable, a Peace so amiable, a Love so Universall. How many do we see in Histories that being come to some dignity seem continually to hold a Wolf by the ears and as they love nothing but their own Interest, so are they loved sincerely of no body, which puts them in continuall frights and makes them fear even the very shadow of an hair! They think not that there is any security for themselves, unlesse they put the whole world in danger, nor safety, unlesse it be in the publick Ruines. This makes them be hated of God, and Men; and causes cares to leap over Ramparts of Steel and Iron, to beset their silver Ballisters, and to call them to an account at every moment for the Calamity of the Living, and for the Blood of the Dead.

This was a fifth Lineament of his good demeanour, that he had bowels of Compassion for the poor People in that cruell Famine, and generall despair of all Egypt. And although one might imagine that he had promoted the Interests of the King in an excesse to the detriment of the Subject; yet is it true that he that will well consider the estate and Lawes of that Monarchy will impute to Josephs favour that, which he would have taken at first sight for Rigour in his Government.

It is certain that according to the Antient Histories which treat of the Policy of that Nation, the Revenue of Egypt was divided into three parts: the first of which was claimed by the Priests that were in great number, and in great esteem in a superstitious Nation; and that Portion was employed in the building of Temples, in the expence of sacrifices, and in the maintenance of the Sacrificers and Ministers that were preserved in their inheritances and possessions by the Reverence that was born to Religion. The second was the Kings who was obliged to feed and pay the Souldiery, and those that administred Justice. The third belonged to the Common people composed of Labourers, of Shepheards and of Artificers, who seeing themselves oppressed with famine, offered willingly their inheritances and their Bodies too for Bread. But Joseph remitted all, gave them wherewith to sow, and even the Cattel to Plow the Ground, on this condition, that they would render to the King the fifth part of the Increase, which they agreed to with a free will, finding their repose, their good, and their safety in that transaction. So that the holy Patriarch is free from blame in all these proceedings. For if upon the foresight of the barrennesse he made provision of Corn, it was Prudence, if he sold it dear in a time that the want of it was great, it was justice; but if he exacted not of the Egyptians all that necessity prescribed them; using them with more favour then the misery of their condition did bear, it was mercy. And to make it evidently appear that Joseph made himself beloved of the People, one may observe an excellent Treatise of Julius Firmicus an antient Ecclesiasticall Authour that assures us, That the Egyptians finding themselves infinitely obliged to his Providence and to his Courtesie, consecrated him under the name of Serapis that carried a measure of Corn upon his head, to signifie that he was the God that had given them bread.

For a sixth observation, one cannot sufficiently admire that prodigious goodnesse which he testified in his reconciliation with his brethren. Upon which the sacred History extends it self with magnificence and pomp, for he did that action with much preparation, and seasoned it with a certain gentlenesse and memorable circumstances to render it more solemn. He frighted them to secure them; he made them sad to make them joyfull; He tormented them with fears and griefs to make them taste their felicity with a more delicious daintinesse.

An Antient said also, That there is never any thing Good without the experience of Evil, and for this purpose he afflicts them at first by a feigned Rigour, to make them experiment a true Goodnesse; for to follow in this History the paths of the holy Scripture without any other amplification such as one may reade in the History of the R. Fa. Talon who hath handled this subject with a flourishing and delightfull stile: Consider how when they presented themselves unto him to buy Corn in Egypt by his permission, he knew them without being known, He assumed a severe countenance, and harsh language, he used them as Spies that come to observe the defects of the Cities and of the Citadels of Egypt to make a report of it to the enemy. They very much astonished, answered, that they were very farr from all such practises, being of a peaceable nature and condition, the sons of a good man the father of twelve children, the youngest of which stayed at home with him, and the other was dead many years ago.

Joseph that had not his reckoning if he got not his dear brother Benjamin that issued from the same mother as himself, frighted them more to make them resolve to bring him, and told them, that he perceived well that they were Impostours, and that he would believe nothing of what they said, if they came not to produce that little brother of whom they spake; That these were but inventions to amuze him, but he would not be satisfied, nor put off with Fables. Thereupon he gave command that they should all be put in prison under a good and safe Guard. These miserable men lay three dayes in a place where they endured very long, and they began to think upon their conscience, perswading themselves that it was their brothers blood that rebounded upon their heads. Joseph causes them to be brought, and questions them again, as to make ready their indictment, and to cause them to be put to death. The fear wherein they thought themselves to be gave them great remorses, and made them say amongst themselves; It is upon a just ground that we suffer now an accident so little expected by us; we well enough remember that we saw the anguish of our poor brother Joseph, when we held him in our cruell hands to kill him; we have sold him to the infidels, and he dyed in slavery overwhelmed with miseries; It is of his bloud that God makes us now to give an account.

They said this with a low voyce in Josephs and the Egy-

Egyptians presence, thinking that their language had not been understood by any one; but all those words entred into the heart of their good brother, who was very much melted with compassion, and withdrew himself to let fall some tears which joy and pitty forced from his eyes.

In fine, he commanded them to return unto their home, on condition that one of them should remain Prisoner till such time as they had brought their little brother. Simeon was chosen to be the sacrifice, and was bound in their presence, which they could not see without a sad displeasure. This done they were dismissed with their Loads of Corn, and the money which they had brought secretly put up again into their sacks by Josephs order. When they perceived it, it astonished them, but being already far advanced upon the way, they returned to their Father, related to him faithfully all that had passed, and expect thereupon his counsels and commands.

But when the Good-man heard them speak of taking away his Benjamin, he felt himself touched in the apple of the eye, and said, that he saw plainly that all his children would be taken from him, that they should remember that one had been devoured by the wild beasts, another lay in chains in a strange Countrey, and that instead of comforting him, they would yet carry away him that assisted him in his old age, and made him love more tenderly that little life that remained to him; That if this should come short home, It would precipitate his grey hairs to the Grave with most bitter Griefs. It was pitifull to see the torment of that good old man, and he was not for that time to be pressed farther upon a point so sensible. They let some dayes slip away, and as the famine increased, and the Corn diminished, Jacob without being brought to it by his Children begins again to speak of a voyage into Egypt. They reply that it was a superfluous thing to think on it, if he made not a resolution to send with them his sonne Benjamin; but when they spake to him of that, they opened the wound of his heart, and he said that it was to make all the miseries of his unfortunate house fall back on him, and that they might well have omitted to tell the Governour of Egypt that they had yet another brother. Whereupon they informed him, that he himself had inquired particularly about the state of all the family, and that they had no list to lye, not being able to Divine that he would demand that child.

The necessitie of food, and the love of a father combated at the same time in that afflicted heart, and he knew not what to resolve on. His sons seeing him a little stagger, urge him eagerly as one does those that are slow and fearfull when one would wrest any thing from them. Reuben offers him his two little sonnes in hostage, and would have him kill them, if he brings not back to him his Benjamin. Judah engages himself for him upon his head and life. The battery was too strong for him not to yield; he orders them therefore to take some of the best fruits of their Land to make presents to that great Lord of Egypt, and to carry their money double, to restore that which had been put into their sacks, lest it should have happened by an over-sight, and also to take their little brother seeing that such was the necessity. When they came to a departure, he felt great convulsions, and said to them, go then in an happy hour. I pray my God, the God Almighty which hath never yet forsaken me, that he would render that great Governour of Egypt favourable to you, and that you may quickly bring back that poor prisoner, and my little Benjamin which I put now into your hands upon the promises which you have made, to which I call heaven to witnesse. Know furthermore, that I am deprived of all my children, and that I shall be as in the Grave, till such time as the happy news of your return shall give me a Resurrection.

This being said, they put themselves on the way, arrive at Egypt, and present themselves suddenly to their brother who perceived that Benjamin was there, whereat he was wonderfully pleased, and commanded his Steward to make ready a dinner, because he would eat with those strangers. They are brought into the house with much courtesie, yet (as an evil conscience is ever fearfull) they perswade themselves that it is to put them in Prison, and to keep them in servitude by reason of that money which they had found in their sacks. They addresse themselves to the Gaol-keeper of the house, very much scared, and beseech him to hear them; they relate to him with great sincerity all that had happened to them, protesting that that came not by their fault, and offering all that they thought they were indebted to him. The other made answer with great affability, that he had received of them good money, that he held himself satisfied, and that if they had found any in their sacks it was their good luck, and the God of their fathers that had a mind to gratifie them. He gave them notice that they were to dine that day with their Lord, who would suddenly return from his affairs to set himself at Table. They order in the mean time their present, and their brother Simeon is released who embraces them with a joy which was as the fore-runner of a greater. They are made to wash and repose themselves, and meat is also given to their Mules.

And when all this was dispatched, Joseph enters to go to dinner; they prostrate themselves before him with a profound reverence, and offer him their presents. He receives them with great courtesie, and asks of them at first sight, how their good Father did, and whether he was yet alive. To which they answered, that God of his goodnesse had preserved to them that which they held most dear, and that he was in a very good condition. Then he fixt his eyes upon his brother Benjamin, and said unto them, Is this then your little brother of whom you have made mention to me? To which they answer, that they had brought him with them, to obey his commands, and to justifie the sincerity of their proceedings. His heart was ravished at him, and turning himself towards him, My child, sayes he to him, I pray God to give you his holy Graces, and to keep you in his protection. Upon this speech, he felt his heart very much moved, and ran into his Closet, not being able any longer to hold his tears, and wept in secret, so great an impression had bloud and nature, and perhaps the remembrance of his Mother who had born them both, made upon his Spirit.

When he had wiped his face, he returns with a merry countenance, he commands his men to wait. He dined apart, a little separated from his brethren, and from another company of the Egyptians who were also at the Feast and had no communication with the Jews. He gives charge above all that they use well the youngest of those eleven brothers, which say that they are all the sons of one and the same father, and that they should spare nothing on them. After all, he ordered that they should fill their sacks with Corn, and that they should put again the money also in them, as they had done at their first journey, and spake to his Steward, giving him charge to take the Cup in which he drank and to put it in the sack of little Benjamin, which he did; and after they had well dined, they passed the rest of the day in all tranquility, expecting the morrow to put themselves upon their way, and to return to their father.

When

When the day began to dawn after they had bid their Adieus, and given their thanks, they depared from the City very joyfull, for that they had had so happy Accidents; But they were not very far before they see a man coming from Joseph, that seems exceedingly to chase, stops them, and sayes to them that some body had stoln away his Masters Cup with which he serves himself to drink in, and to Divine things hidden; that this could not happen but from them, and that they were very injurious, after they had been enterteined in the house of the Governour of Egypt with so much courtesie, to render him evil for good and to fly away after they had committed a Theft so base and so outrageous.

The brothers extreamly astonished answer that this cannot be, and that they should be the wickedest men upon the earth if they had as much as dreamt of such an attempt; That there was no likelihood that they that had brought back faithfully the money that had been put into their sacks would steal in the house of so high a Potentate; Furthermore, that there was no need of words, but that he should come to proof, and search every where, and that if any one of them was culpable of that sactiledge, they were content to deliver him up to death, and to render themselves all the Governours slaves for reparation of that fault.

The condition is accepted with moderation, that the faulty should be punished, and that the innocent should go free. They are all searched in order, and the Cup was found in the sack of the youngest. The brothers are seized with a profound astonishment, and the poor child so amazed, that he hath not a word to defend himself. They begin all to afflict themselves, and to rent their clothes, and return to the City as Thieves taken in the fact to render an account to the Governour. As soon as he saw them he reproched them of ingratitude, and said to them, that they were much deceived to come to him to steal, seeing there was not a man in the whole world that had more news of secret things then he. All prostrate themselves on the ground, and do him Reverence; Judah takes the word and sayes, That they came not to excuse themselves, that they had nothing to say, since God had rendred their iniquity so visible, that they were come all to offer themselves to him to be his slaves with him that had done the deed. Nay, it shall not go so, saith Joseph, but the culpable shall stay with me, and ye shall return all of you, at liberty to your house. Then Judah drew near, desired audience with a profound humility, and declared how that child was his Fathers heart and life; and that having received order from his Excellence to pluck him out of the arms of the old man and to bring him, they had given him battells to make him resolve on that Voyage, to which he would by no means hearken. But the desire they had to give all possible satisfaction to his greatnesse had made them presse that businesse so farre as to oblige themselves life for life, body for body, and to deliver their little children to death, in case that they brought not back their brother Benjamin; that thereupon the goodman rendred himself with much difficulty, and that to go and tell him at present that his dear sonne in whom he lives, and by whom he breathes, is stayed prisoner in Egypt, for a case of theft, would be to give him a double death, and to send him to the Grave with inconsolable griefs. And therefore he beseech'd his Greatnesse to shew them mercy, and to take him for a slave in the place of his brother Benjamin.

Joseph could hear no more, so much love and pity did he feell in the bottome of his heart. He caused all the servants to withdraw, not being willing that any of the Egyptians should be witnesse of this action, and then he lifted up his voyce with a great sigh, and a torrent of tears that glided from his eyes, and said, I am Joseph, is my Father yet alive? At that speech these poore men stood so surprised, and in such an extasie, that they made him no reply. By how much the more he saw them astonished, by so much the more did he make much of them, and making them approach very near him, he said again, I am Joseph, I am he that ye sold to the Ishmaelites to be carried into Egypt. Trouble not your selves; God permitted this for my good and for yours. Two years of Famine are past, there are yet five remaining, and I have been sent from on high into Egypt to nourish you, and to preserve you in the rigour of the time. It was not by your counsels, but by the ordinances of God that I came into this Kingdome. And now behold, I am as a father to Pharaoh, the Superintendent of his house, and the Prince of Egypt. Go, haste ye to return to my father, carry him the news of my life and of my dignity, relate to him all the glory and all the magnificence that invirons me, and tell him that I expect him here, and that it is the will of God that he should come to sojourn in the land of Goshen, where he shall have all that he can desire for his children and for his flocks. This said he embraced them weeping, begining with the little Benjamin, and then they took the boldnesse to speak to him with open heart about all that had passed, thinking themselves obliged above all measure to his goodnesse.

The fame of this acknowledgement ran in the house of Pharaoh, who ordered Joseph to cause his Father to come and sojourn in Egypt with his brothers, dispatching many charriots to carry all his baggage.

The children returned Triumphing, and gave him the news that his sonne Joseph was alive, and the second person of the Realm of Egypt that had the managing of all. The Good-man thought that it was a dream, and the admiration of it held him so seized that he could not come to himself again; at length when he saw that it was all in good earnest, and that the Chariots that were to carry away all his family were at the gate, he said, that now there remained nothing more for him to desire, if his sonne Joseph was alive, and that he would see him before his death. Some time after, he departed, being encouraged by an heavenly Vision that promised him all good successes in that journey; and when he was arrived at Goshen he dispatched Judah to give the newes of it to his sonne Joseph, who at the same instant went up into his Coach to go to meet him, and seeing him embraced him with close enfoldings, weeping for joy and tendernesse upon his neck. His Father holding him between his arms said; My son, It is at this houre that I shall dye content, since God hath shewed me the grace to see you, and to leave you alive after me. The holy man was also presented to King Pharaoh who made him a great enterteinment, and demanded of him his age; to which he answered that he was but an hundred and thirty years old, that those dayes were few and evil, and were not extended to the age of his Fathers; He blessed the King, and his place of abode was assigned in the land of Goshen where he lived in a most full content.

And now I demand of my Reader, if there be any thing more magnificent, more sweet, and more benigne then the heart of Joseph in all the circumstances of that Reconciliation with his brethren? We see many Histories wherein the Grandees of the earth that mount up on their Thrones, after they have been offended, who, have nothing so ordinary as to make Furies and Vengeances with squadrons of Hangmen march with them by their side, to Ruine those that have done them any disdispleasure. But this man, after he had been so cruelly used, after he had been stripped of his cloathes, cast into an old pit of water, domineered over, and sold to Barbarians by his own brothers with an intention to keep him in an hard slavery the rest of his dayes; not onely forgets all that had passed, but pardons them with a profusion of Charity; he does them good, he over-whelms with good offices those ungratefull men, and in obliging them, he hath but one trouble, which is to see them shamefull of their crime. He weeps while he embraces them one after another: He would not that that fault should be imputed to them: He sayes that it was a design of God on which they should think no more unlesse to thank him. These bad brethren, after their fathers death, finding themselves pricked with remorse of conscience, and imagining that that pardon was but a dissembling, cast themselves at his feet, and beseech him to lay aside all the resentments of past wrongs; but he raised them, weeping, and promised them a Charity totally fraternall, and for ever inviolable. And though he was so puissant and so absolute, he never advanced his own children to the prejudice of his brothers, observing them and respecting in every thing the right of Eldership which nature had given them over him. Certainly a man that hath such a power over himself ought to be looked upon on earth as a Starre that should descend from heaven, and as the liveliest image of the divine Goodnesse: he merits not onely to triumph on Pharaoh's charrets, but on the Heaven of heavens, and so be beheld by Angels with admiration of his desert. Finally, that which was glorious in Joseph for the fulnesse of this perfection, was the strength and equality of an incomparable spirit; he was alwayes like himself, and saw all the changes of his fortune without changing: He descends into the deep pit with the same countenance as he mounts upon Pharaoh's charret: He complains of nothing: He accuses no body: He stifles all the displeasures and all the resentment of nature in him. He is loved of his Mistresse, without condescending to her passion: He is hated of her, without accusing her cruelty: He is accused, without defending himself, persecuted, without resisting. So many years roul over his head without writing one onely word to his father to the disadvantage of his inhumane brothers: He suffers with silence: He hides his evils with industry: He does good without affectation: He bears upon his shoulders all the cares of a great Government without groaning under his burden: He communicates his glories and his pleasures: He reserves to himself onely the toils: He takes the bitter and the sweet, the hard and the soft, prosperities and adversities, as the sea that receives all the rivers without changing either colour or savour. All his life is but a picture that hath alwaies the same visage: and as the Deity does continually one and the same action without altering or wearying it self, he continues the exercises of his goodnes without remission, even to the last article of his life.

MOSES.

WHat spectacle is this here? A cradle of bulrushes floating upon the River Nile, and in it a little abandoned Infant, for whom his own mother is constrained to make a grave of water to avoid the fury of the murderers that came to pluck him from the breast. His sister follows him with weeping eyes, and sayes to him, Go poor child whither fortune shall conduct thee; go, my dear brother, upon the floats of a furious Element which perhaps will be more favourable to thee then those inhumane men that seek thy life, when as thou knowest not yet what 'tis to live. This River will have pity on thee, or if it swallows up thy cradle in its waves, it will lodge thy bones in its bosome, and cover thy death to sweeten the bitterest of our evils which is to have eyes to look upon our misery.

But while that this poor maid weeps upon the bank of Nilus, and mingles her tears with the water of the River, Providence takes the care of that cradle; she makes her self as the Pilot of that little vessel which is without mast, without rudder, without cordage; she supplies all, and does all, she shews how one may find life in death, and an haven in a shipwrack.

The daughter of King Pharaoh comes with her female train, and in it is her intention to bathe her self, but in God's intention, that she might be made the mother of that little Infant exposed to the mercy of the waters; and that since she could not be so by Nature, she might be by Adoption. She discovers first of all that cradle which was on the waters side, and dispatches one of her damsels to take it up and bring it her, that she might see what was in it; she finds a very fair child which pleads his case before her by the eloquence of his tears and of his cryes, and implores her mercy against the fury of the Infant-slayers. Her heart is melted in compassion towards it, and she gives command that it should be kept and nourished; his sister standing opportunely by sayes unto her that she knew where was a good Nurse that would well acquit her self of that duty, if it pleased her Majesty that she might call her; whereto she having shewed some inclination, she causes the mother to come that nursed with all security her dear Infant which she had exposed through diffidence.

This little body drawn out of the bundle of rushes is he that God hath chosen to shake all Egypt, to overthrow the pride of Pharaoh's, and to draw his people out of Captivity.

The Hebrews were already multiplied exceedingly in the Kingdome of Egypt after the death of Joseph, in the space of sixty five years, and began to make themselves feared of their Masters. The face of the Realm was changed, and he that was then upon the Throne was a Prince that remembred not any longer the obligations that the Monarchy had to the Patriarch Joseph, but blamed the counsels of his Predecessours for having permitted a stranger-people to have a dwelling in his Kingdome; that seeming to him, according to humane Policy, of pernicious consequence, and thinking that that waxing stronger, as it did, every day might be capable to make an attempt upon the State, or be serviceable to those that had a design to make a commotion, and to embroil the affairs of the Kingdome. He judged not ill, according to the rules of Politicians; and for that purpose, he resolved with himself to abate and to destroy them by what means soever it was done. The first was to consume them amongst stones and mortar in the structure of those prodigious Pyramids that are to be seen in Egypt.

The ſecond was to command the Midwives to kill all the Male-children, which they did not execute through the fear which they had of God, and the horrour of that command. This made him adviſe upon a third means, and ordain, that all the Boyes from the day of their birth ſhould be drowned in the River Nile.

But God (that would teach Princes and State-Miniſters, that although one ſhould have in Idea any juſt and lawfull deſign, yet one never ought to ſeek to compaſſe it by unjuſt and violent means) permitted not this unhappy Prince that gnawed himſelf with cares and unquietneſſe, and tormented his life by ſo many new inventions of malice and of fury, ever to bring about what he projected; and his ſucceſſour, after a thouſand ſcourges, and a thouſand diſaſtres of his Kingdome which he ſaw every day fall by pieces before his eyes, was buried in the red Sea for drowning thoſe little Innocents in the Nile.

The life of one onely man oftentimes coſts him dear that will have it by Revenge; what then do we think that it is to root out a great family, or a whole Nation to ſatisfie one of our appetites? All the veins of thoſe that are perſecuted bend themſelves to reſiſtance, and God (in fine) taking their cauſe in hand overwhelms all humane Policy in a crudity of undigeſted deſigns and a ſhame to have try'd every thing and to have done nothing, to have exhauſted the ſweat, and the bloud of the people, the gold and the ſteel of great Kingdomes, all malices and all hell, and to obtain no other thing but a remarkable Confuſion through the weakneſſe of ones power.

Seneca ſaid to Nero that inflicted ſo many deaths by a jealouſie of State, that he killed men to good purpoſe indeed, and that whatſoever endeavour he uſed, he ſhould never put to death his ſucceſſour. When Tyrants torment themſelves without, and ſack ſmoaking cities, and mow off ſo many innocent heads, they have within that which will deſtroy them. Pharaoh ceaſed not to ſtorm, and to make every day new maſſacres, to cauſe him to periſh that would make an attempt upon his State; and in the mean while his own daughter nouriſhes the moſt capitall of his enemies, that was to make his Sceptre fly in ſhivers, and bury him in his race under the ruines of his Empire.

Naturall Hiſtory hath obſerved a ſtrange thing of the nature of the Helmet-flower, that it is a plant as venomous as poſſible, and that kills all thoſe that eat of it, and yet for all this, there are little flies about that plant which are nouriſhed with it, and (what is admirable) ſerve for an Antidote againſt its poyſon. The Court is a reſidence very prejudiciall to Innocence, and that of Pharaoh's was without doubt a School of Murders and of Maſſacres, rather then an Academy of Honour: and yet God permitted that Moſes ſhould be bred up there, and that without being touched with a venome ſo contageous to virtues he ſhould give a remedy to thoſe that were offended with it.

He learned all the Arts and all the Wiſdome of the Egyptians; he conſidered all their Policy, all their Artifices, their Arms; their Levies, their Victuall, their Souldiers, the Principles of their Government, the Effects, the Succeſſes, the Diſpoſition of King Pharaoh, the Eſteem, the Credit, the Capacity, and the Deſigns of the great Ones of the Court, the Means that had upheld that Monarchy, and the Things that might ruine it. He was reſpected and eſteemed of all, as the true ſon of the Princeſſe, which gave him the liberty to know every thing, and to learn the ſecret myſteries of the Empire, not as a ſtranger, but as an originary.

He ſhewed from his infancy ſome glimpſe of the greatneſſe and of the power to which God deſtined him, when (according to the report of the Hebrews) being at play one day with the Crown of Pharaoh, he threw it on the ground, and trod upon it with his feet, which was eſteemed a very bad preſage, and gave much trouble to the King; but when they would diſcern whether that action proceeded from judgement and from malice, or from chance, they preſented to him on one ſide an apple, and on the other a coal of fire, to ſee to which of the two he would reach his hand; now the child quitting the fruit, took the fire, as if he would put it to his mouth to eat it. Whereupon the ſages of the Nation informed the King, that there was no reaſon to put to death an infant, adopted by his daughter, for an action of ſimplicity.

He was then trained up in the exerciſe of arms, and Joſephus relates, that being come to maturity of age, he was a great warriour; and that the Ethiopians having made an inundation upon the Realm of Egypt with great forces, when the State was very much troubled with them, the King was counſelled by his Oracles to make uſe of an Hebrew Captain to ſtop the courſe of thoſe hoſtilities. The charge of the Army was given to Moſes, who led it with great prudence through places that others judged inacceſſible, and by means of certain Birds which he cauſed to be carried out of Egypt, purged the Countrey of the ſerpents that were wont extremely to annoy the ſouldiers. In fine, he chaſed the Ethiopians and ſhut them up within the walls of their city Saba which he puiſſantly beſieged. The beauty of his countenance furniſhed him with darts and engines to take it, that were ſtronger then fire and ſword. The Kings daughter having ſeen him from an high tower as he gave orders for the ſiege, was ſo raviſhed with his valour, that ſhe became paſſionately in love with him, and cauſes him to be ſued unto for marriage, on which condition ſhe would deliver the city into his hands; which was executed, and the Nuptialls followed, which changed the thunders of Warre into the ſongs of Love. The glories that this Conquerour gathered from theſe combats were the ſeeds of an enraged envy which the Egyptians had againſt him, ceaſing not to perſecute his virtue, ſo that he was conſtrained to get him out of Egypt.

Yet it is held that he was at Court till the age of fourty years, without advancing any thing in that great affair of the Deliverance of his People, ſo leaſurely do mighty negotiations proceed, and are like the Planet of Saturn, which being the higheſt is the ſloweſt too. He reſented his bloud, and his originall, and had very much ado to digeſt the rigours that he ſaw continually exerciſed upon his brethren; yet as long as he was at Court, his ſpirit ſeemed to be in an eclipſe without producing the vivacity of thoſe fair Lights that God communicated to him in the wilderneſſe. The Wiſe-men loſt their Starre at the Court of Herod, and Moſes was deprived of his high revelations in that of Pharaoh. He was in a condition not to be able any longer to diſſemble the evil of his Nation, and in an impotence to advance the good as he would have done; he made a reſolution to leave that place that was ſo familiar to Crimes and inacceſſible to Virtues. The clamours that he heard, and the miſeries that he ſaw, rent his heart; He could not hold from making an inſolent Egyptian that tormented one of his brethren feel how much his hand weighed; for having already a ſecret magiſtracy from God, he killed him, and buried him in the ſand.

A few dayes after, as he plaid the moderatour between thoſe of his Nation, an impudent fellow roſe up againſt him, and demanded of him the virtue of his commiſſion, reproaching him with the murder of the Egyptian which he thought had been very ſecret: yet when he perceived that it was known at Court, and that Pharaoh that was a ſuſpicious Prince took jealouſies of his courage and of his ſufficiency, he quitted all the greatneſſes and all the delights of the palace of that Monarch, chuſing rather to ſuffer with his Brethren, as ſaith S. Paul, then to taſte any more the ſweetneſſes of a temporall glory. It is an act of prudence to ſteal away from the fury of a wicked Prince, who holds for enemy all that there is of virtuous, and to hide ones ſelf as thoſe Rivers that go a long way under ground without being ſeen of any one, and then unexpectedly produce themſelves, to water the meadows, to bear boats, to ſerve for a knot to the commerce of men, and to make Iſlands and Beauties for the ornament of Nature. Theſe retirings have been advantageous to many, whom they have hid for a time, with an intention to ſet them afterward in bright day. The fire which devours every thing hath no more to do with the aſhes and the rage of Tyrants, that ſwallows up every thing, thinks no more on thoſe that enter while they live (as it were) into the ſepulchre of a life unknown to all the world.

up

Moſes paſſed from one extremity to another without the middle, when forſaking the Court, after a ſtay of fourty years, he went to range himſelf in the life of ſhepherds, and remained as one loſt in the world, to find himſelf with God. He withdrew himſelf into the countrey of the Midianites, where he had at firſt approach a pleaſing encountre that made him find a commodious dwelling, and a marriage according to his heart. The ſacred Hiſtory ſayes that Jethro a Prieſt and Shepherd in that Region had ſent ſeven daughters whereof he was the father, to draw water at a fountain for their flocks to drink, and that having met with other ſhepherds inſolent enough, that taking a pride to inſult over the infirmity of that ſex, ceaſed not to harry them, and to hinder them from the uſe of an Element that nature had made to ſlide for the commodity of the publick. Moſes (that had the quality of Plato's Magiſtrate, whom he would have to be zealous and courageous for the defence of Juſtice) could not endure the inſolence of thoſe wicked men, and takes the maidens part whom he defended againſt oppreſſion with ſo much ſucceſſe, as that he chaſed away their adverſaries, and gave them free liberty to draw water. For which they thought themſelves very much obliged, and failed not to make a large relation to their father of the courteſie of that Egyptian that had taken them into his protection. Their father received him into his houſe, and took ſo much pleaſure in his converſation, that he gave him one of his daughters in marriage, and allied him to his family by an indiſſoluble amity.

This new ſon-in-law accuſtomed himſelf to a countrey life, and practiſed the laborious exerciſes of ſhepherds; ſo true it is, that able men bend their ſpirit whither they will, and are good at doing every thing, habituating themſelves to perſons and to places where their lot hath ranged them, bearing equally want and abundance, and ſhewing by their example, that there is no life in the world ſo ſtrange that may not ſerve for matter to virtue. But without ſpeaking yet of the great ſecrets that God kept hidden in this ordering of Moſes, I find that it was the means to make a great Stateſ-man of him, becauſe that Philoſopher which hath deſerved the title of Divine ſayes, that a good King is nothing elſe but a ſhepherd of a reaſonable flock; and that he ought to take his firſt Rudiments from the manner of ordering ſheep, to ſucceed well in the Government of Kingdomes; that he ought to ſee the tender love, the cares, and the toils of the true ſhepherds, to learn how he ought to demean himſelf towards his Subjects. Moſes had all leaſure to lay thoſe grounds, tarrying as many years in his Countrey life as he had before paſſed at Court: and ceaſing not to play the Philoſopher, and to contemplate in that great School of Nature, where God ſpake to him, and taught him leſſons through the veil of all the Creatures. O how little did the pompous pride of the Pharaoh's then ſeem to him! O how contemptible then did ſeem all thoſe beauties of duſt, and thoſe fortunes of wind that are at Court! His heart dilated it ſelf in the greatneſſes of God, and became every day wiſer then it ſelf.

This long ſolitude having purged him from the impurities of the earth, rendred him capable of the viſits and commerce of God; and the time deſtined to the deliverance of his people being now at hand; as he went along entertaining his thoughts, he was got farre into the deſert, and perceived that miraculous Buſh all crowned with innocent flames that gave it a delightfull beauty, and the fire that conſumes every thing ſeemed rather to dreſſe then to offend it. God meaning to ſignifie by this the eſtate of his choſen people, for whom the burning coals of Perſecution prepared an high luſtre of glory. Moſes charmed with this Viſion draws near, and hears a voyce out of the middle of the Buſh that calls him, and having commanded him to put off his ſhooes through reverence, ſpeaks with him, and declares to him its will about the going out of Egypt, which the Iſraelites were to enterpriſe and execute under his command.

To ſpeak truth, this was one of the greateſt Colloquies, and one of the higheſt Diſcourſes that was ever under Heaven, wherein the Sovereign Maſter ſeated upon a Throne of Fire talked with the moſt excellent man of all Ages touching the means to break the chains of ſix hundred thouſand men, beſides women and little children that groaned under an horrible Captivity, and drowned every day a part of their life in their teares. Moſes that was now totally accuſtomed to the ſweetneſſe of his ſolitude, refuſed at firſt to be the Negotiatour of a buſineſſe of ſo great importance, and to betake himſelf again to the Court of Egypt to treat with Pharaoh, alledging his inability, the incredulity of the people, and the impediment of his ſpeech, to free himſelf from that Embaſſage. But God having aſſured him that he was He that is, that is to ſay, The abſolute Being, the Independent, and the firſt Originall of all Eſſences, that would be with him, and would give him for a companion, his brother Aaron, who was eloquent enough; and in fine, having confirmed him by prodigious Miracles that he cauſed to be done in his preſence, wan him, and made him conſent to his will.

Ariſtotle in the fifth of his Politicks hath ſaid That of all the things that cauſe the ſubverſions of Kingdomes and of Empires, there was not any more pernicious then Injuſtice, and Oppreſſion of the innocent, which may be obſerved clearly in this proceeding. For, behold the ruine of a great Realm procured by the cruelty of the Miniſters of Pharaoh, who by his conſent and orders turmoiled inceſſantly a people, miſerable and afflicted, above all meaſure. Their piercing clamours, ſo many times redoubled, clave the clouds, and were carried by the Angels even up to the Heaven of heavens, repreſented before the Throne of the living God, with ſo much force and vigour, as they made tender the bowels of the God of mercy, that deſcends, and ſpeaks athwart the Flames and Thrones to bring about their ſafety.

Moſes and Aaron failed not to diſcover themſelves to the moſt eminent of the choſen people concerning the Counſel that God had taken of their Liberty, whereat they were at firſt ſo joyed, that they proſtrated themſelves on the earth through reſpect, adoring the divine Goodneſſe that carried himſelf with ſo much love to the eaſing of their miſery: but when this buſineſſe proved thorny and full of obſtacles, their courage failed them, and had almoſt as leave crouch in their Servitude, as buy their Liberty at the price of a reaſonable pain. Yet Moſes, accompanied with his brother, courageouſly tranſports himſelf to Pharaoh's Palace, ſpeaks to him with a generous liberty from the living God, and declares to him his Commands, which were, to diſmiſſe his people, and let them go out of Egypt to ſacrifice in the wilderneſſe.

He that reigned at that time was one Pharaoh Cenchris, an haughty and inſolent Prince, who having never heard any ſuch language, ſaid, That he knew not that God that intermeddled to make him ſuch Commands, and that he was fully reſolved not to let go the prey which he held in his hands; that all theſe diſcourſes of Sacrifices and of Devotions proceeded from nothing but a pure idleneſſe fatall to the Jewiſh people, and that he would give them ſo much exerciſe, that they ſhould not have the leaſure to dream on ſuch Fancies. And, in effect, he commanded the Commiſſaries that preſided over the labour of thoſe poor ſlaves, to redouble their Pains and augment their Burdens. The ſtraw that was furniſhed them before to make the brick taken from them; they were conſtrained to ſeek for it where they could, and yet for all this the number of their bricks which they were bound to render every day was not diminiſhed. And though this was a thing impoſſible for them, yet muſt they expect rods and baſtonado's, and all imaginable rigours. This made a great noiſe amongſt the People, which began already to murmure againſt Moſes and Aaron, blaming their enterpriſe, and complaining that they would let them at Liberty.

It is a moſt ordinary thing in all great affairs; there are ſpirits that are like thoſe watry clouds that never carry lightning, ſo cannot they ever conceive any thing that is vigorous: they would have good things, but they would have them looſely, and would willingly deſire that Nature ſhould renew for them the favours of the Terreſtriall Paradiſe, and ſhould give them roſes that ſhould never be compaſſed about with thorns. But as one ought not to be raſh and violent to puſh forward buſineſſes out of a giddy humour, ſo ought one not to be ſlack and effeminate in letting thoſe alone that oblige us by conſcience and by duty. Moſes deſiſts not for all this, but takes a ſtout reſolution to advance the work of God, even to the Point whither Providence would have it come. He had on one ſide men to combate with that reſiſted their own good; and on the other, an impious, obſtinate, and cruel Prince: he gains the one by reaſons and by ſweetneſſe, he brings down the other by threats and prodigies.

One may here manifeſtly ſee the paths that God hath trodden in the puniſhment of Pharaoh, when he would abandon a King or a great man for his demerits, and ſacrifice him to his Juſtice; letting him fall into a reprobate ſenſe, which is the laſt ſtep that one makes to enter into hell. He permits him (to ſatiate an Ambition or a Revenge) to intangle himſelf in ſome great deſign under the pretenſe of Juſtice and of Honour; and foraſmuch as he is extremely thirſty after the greatneſſe of the earth, puts him upon a pinacle in the higheſt dignities and the moſt magnificent negotiations, leaves him to himſelf, and to the wiſhes of his own heart; and although he be vicious, gives him great ſucceſſes and incomparable proſperities that puffe up his heart, and make him preſume upon his own conduct. He takes from him the taſte of Divine things, letting him ſlide into a contempt of the holy Word, and of all the admonitions that one can give him about his ſafety. If he hath any faithfull Counſellour, he puts him out, and ſubſtitutes in his place flatterers and enchaunters. If there come any ſcourge from heaven to overwhelm him, he is made believe that it is but a naturall thing, and ordinary enough, and that he ought not to trouble himſelf about ſuch a buſineſſe. If he be ſenſible of any evill that affrights him, men endeavour ſuddenly to ſcatter it, and to make him underſtand that that is not the wrath of God, but an order of Nature, and that he may mock at the tempeſt as ſoon as the calm returns.

All this is made viſible in this miſerable Prince. A great Kingdome, great Ambitions, Revenges hereditary againſt the choſen People, an immoveable deſign to root them out, a contempt of God, ſucceſſe in his vengeances, and ſome ſatisfaction of ſpirit by the pains of thoſe miſerable ones, Moſes baffled, the Flatterers hearkned to, the Magicians adored, the Plagues of heaven turned into laughters as ſoon as they were paſſed, an heart (at laſt) hardned by its own malice, and not by the work of God who doth no more make ſin, then the Sun makes the night. Moſes endeavours firſt to gain him by the force of reaſons, and by the ſweetneſſe of words, whereto, when he ſhewed reſiſtance, he employed Miracles for the proof of his Commiſſion, which the King cauſed to be counterfeited by his Magicians, oppoſing the Shadow to the Light, and a Lie to Truth.

After which, the wrath of Heaven cauſed thoſe ten Plagues, related in Exodus, ſucceſſively to rain upon him. For that unfortunate Prince ſaw firſt of all the River of Nile all in bloud, as if it had demanded Vengeance of God for thoſe little Innocents that had been caſt into it. He ſaw Frogs that came out of the ſame Stream by an impetuous ebullition, in ſuch a manner, as that they covered all the fields, entred into the houſes, filled the tables, mounted upon the beds, and gave horrour and torments to all Egypt. He ſaw thick clouds of Gnats, that were raiſed all on a ſudden, caſting themſelves upon the cattle and upon the men, with ſo irkſome a trouble that their life was full of bitterneſſe. He ſaw after that, armies of all ſorts of Flies, ſo different in their kind, ſo violent in their aſſaults, and ſo pernicious in their effects, that they defiled every thing with their venome. He ſaw a furious mortality of Beaſts, that fell every moment, and infected the air by their corruption. He ſaw the bodies of his Subjects all laden with Ulcers, wherewith the Magicians themſelves, in puniſhment of their crimes, were covered in ſuch a faſhion as that they could ſtand no longer in the preſence of their King. He ſaw the moſt horrible Hail fall from Heaven, that ſince Egypt was in being there was never ſeen the like; for it ſuſtain'd it ſelf upon the wings of the Lightning, and the Fire and Ice agreed extraordinarily together for the puniſhment of thoſe perfidious men. He ſaw legions of Graſhoppers that made an inundation upon the champains, and made havock of the plants, finiſhing to deſtroy that which the Hail had begun. In fine, all Egypt was covered with thoſe palpable Darkneſſes that laſted for the ſpace of three dayes, during which, the Egyptians remained as bound with the inviſible chains of a night without repoſe, which had nothing better in it then to take from them the ſight of their diſaſtre.

But

But that which terrified them above all the plagues was when the deſtroying Angel entring at midnight into all their houſes killed the firſt-born from the child of the Millers wife, to the Kings ſon, and there was not an houſe wherein the firſt bloſſome of the Family was not lopped off by the pittileſſe hook of Death. The fathers were touched with a ſtupid grief, the diſheveld mothers threw themſelves down upon the bodies of their infants, to gather from their mouths the remainders of their life; the whole family ſent out howlings rather then complaints, and the evil was ſo univerſall, and ſo preſſing, that there was neither conſolation, nor remedy. Pharaoh ſighed at every Plague, and ſeemed to be willing to turn to God, but as ſoon as he had the leaſt releaſe, he returned to his obſtinacy, which was a mark of a Reprobate ſoul. Yet his ſubjects ſenſibly touched with the laſt accident urged the Hebrews to be gone, and would no longer oppoſe the counſels of God.

The day of departure is taken, and the ſix hundred thouſand combatants, with an innumerable number of women and little children, after the ceremony of the Paſchall Lamb, travell to the red-Sea loaden with gold, with ſilver, with ſuits of apparell and with all the richeſt ſpoiles of Egypt. The pillar of cloud and of fire marched before them in the head of the Army, to give ſignall to the twelve Tribes that beheld it viſibly on all parts. Notice is given in the mean time to King Pharaoh, that thoſe fugitives were already ſtoln away, and gone enriched with the treaſures of his People. And although he had given ſome kind of conſent to their going, yet he enters again into his furies, aſſembles his light-Charriots, and all the flouriſhing Legions of Egypt to purſue the Iſraelites. They failed not to overtake them quickly upon the Sea-ſhore, ſo that the two Armies were in view of one another. The one of which was filled with a great number of people badly prepared at that time for a combat, valour forſaking their heart, and their hands ready to throw away their arms; The other was compoſed of ſprightfull and well trained Regiments, to whom choler and the hope of booty gave a new vigour. The glittering of the Arms, the Clouds of duſt that were raiſed, the ſhouts of the Souldiers mingled with the neighing of Horſes, gave mortall ſtrokes to the hearts of that poor multitude which had now no other thought but to dye murmuring, and to revenge their death on Moſes by their murmures.

Alas, ſaid they, What! were there no Graves in Egypt to bury our lives and miſeries, without leading us into the Wilderneſſe to deliver us for a prey to the ſword of the Egyptians, and to the Birds of rapine? Did we not ſay well that we ſhould have ſtayed peaceably in the bondage wherein God had ranged us, without making theſe great proviſions, and ſhutting our ſelves all up as in a net, to deliver our ſelves to the diſcretion of our enemies? We have the ſea on one ſide, and on the other our incenſed Maſters that breathe nothing but fire and bloud: on which hand ſoever we go we ſee nothing but images of death and infallible marks of the miſery that threatens us.

All the Army was filled with fear, and the ſighs of the Wives and of the Children abated the courage of the Fathers and of the Husbands, who expected nothing any more but to be the ſubject of an horrible butchery. But the generous Moſes, although he had an heart pierced with grief to hear their blaſphemies, ran through the ranks of the Army, encouraged the Captains, animated the People, and as long as he had any voyce or breath cried without ceaſing, Courage, my friends, ye are here aſſembled to ſee the wonders of the God of Hoſts: Behold them onely, without troubling your ſelves, and God ſhall fight for you. See and conſider thoſe brave Egyptians your perſecutours, and believe that it is the laſt time that you ſhall ſee them, for they ſhall be no more. And after he had ſaid this, he ſpake to God with a ſilence that ſurpaſſed all clamours, and therefore God anſwered him. What haſt thou to do any more to cry thus after me? Lift up thy Rod, ſtretch forth thine hand, divide the floats of the Sea, and make thine Army march through the fair middle on dry foot. This was executed, and all that great people of the Iſraelites (animated by the ſpirit of God, and the voyce of Moſes that marched in the head of them) deſcended with a firm footing and a ſecure countenance into thoſe Abyſſes where the water of the ſea retiring it ſelf apart made them ramparts of Chryſtall on each ſide, and diſcovered to them in the middle a path that the hand of God ſeemed to have laid with tapiſtry for to make them paſſage. The pillar of fire that was planted in the midſt of the two armies furniſhed them with unparrallel'd lights to manifeſt the works of God, and on that ſide which looked towards the Egyptians it was horrible and dark, bearing already the preſages of the funerals that attended them. The Angel of God ſhut up in this engine of fire darted out Thunder-ſtriking looks upon the Diadem of Pharaoh, and upon all thoſe that encompaſſed him. Their courage failed them, and nothing now was left them but a rage yet ſuming after bloud. They throw themſelves deſperately into the ſea which they promiſed themſelves to paſſe over on dry foot as advantageouſly as their adverſaries. But the waters returning into their bed, with an impetuous courſe invelop'd thoſe miſerable men; there was nothing now but a confuſion of men and horſes, of Arms and Chariots, of bodies peſtering one another, that diſputed their life with the waves, and dyed expiring out the remainders of their fury. Pharaoh the King was drowned; the aſſiſtance of his Captains had not the ſtrength to ſave him whom the hand of God would deſtroy. Nothing was to be ſeen but Bucklers and Turbans floating upon the water, and death painted in a thouſand faces that made a mervellous booty. The Iſraelites being in an extaſie at theſe wonders, thundred out a ſong in the praiſe of God, that hath ſince raviſhed the heart and ear of all Ages.

After that Moſes had drawn his people out of the captivity of Egypt, he imitated God that did not make ſo fair a world to abandon it, but governs it by a ſecret providence that inſinuates it ſelf into all the parties of the univerſe. So this great Legiſlatour employed all his cares to the conduct of this great multitude, to which his preſence produced the ſame effect as the infuſion of the ſoul into the body. The chief and moſt ordinary pains that he took was to appeaſe the murmures and ſeditions that were born at every ſeaſon, and and ſometimes for very light occaſions. But the greateſt part was for the belly to which hunger gives a greedineſſe, and the law gives no ears. When amidſt the deſerts of Arabia, where they journied, they felt any mitigation in their pain; Moſes was a man incomparable: but as ſoon as water and bread and fleſh failed them, he was no more their friend; they longed inceſſantly after the fleſh-pots of Egypt, and ſtirred up furious tempeſts.

We ſee examples of this in all Polities, Empires, and Republicks, where all thoſe things that aſſault the life of the people make them ſend forth great cries, run to ſtones and ſteel, and tear men into little ſhreds. Thoſe that would reign peaceably think more of gaining the hearts of their ſubjects then the money, and take a wonderfull order that the inferiour people may have wherewith to nouriſh and maintein themſelves in mean commodities and all that is abſolutely neceſſary to life. Augustus Cesar, the wiſeſt of the Roman Emperours, had ſo particular a care to provide for the City of Rome, that when he ſaw it threatned by any famine, he would be like to dye; and he took more pleaſure to hear the poor Mechanicks commending his paternall ſweetneſſe, and the happineſſe of his time, then to behold Coloſſus's and Arches of triumphs erected in his name. Thoſe that take a way quite contrary ſay, Let Clown grumble, and let Clown pay, that one ought little to care for the complaints and murmurings of a diſarmed Communalty. They fill every place with menaces and with terrours; they authoriſe themſelves by a great force of arms, ſeeing well that they cannot arrive to what they would have, by love. But beſides that this faſhion of governing provokes God which is the father of the poor, and the comforter of the afflicted; It cannot ſubſiſt but by a great violence which cannot continue long either in nature, or in a civil life.

Moſes took nothing from this people, to whom it was an injury in their opinion, to give nothing. It ſeemed as if he bore them all in his entrails, and that he was to nouriſh them as a mother; If he came to fail in it, they forgot all the benefits of the time paſt, and ceaſed not to grumble and murmure at the preſent. He had need have had the Magazins of God himſelf, to ſatisfie them in a deſert, where there was little to live, and much to ſuffer. So alſo the Divine goodneſſe was never wanting to them in their neceſſities, and this mild Conductour, that made it his glory to overwhelm theſe ungratefull men with benefits, opened by his prayers the gates of heaven to cauſe Manna to be rained down for them. It is formed in the dew, when the ſubtler parts of the earth mix themſelves with the moiſture, and when all this compoſition is purified and baked by the heat of the Sun to a convenient temper. It happens in certain places with profit enough, but if the bleſſing of God had not given an extraordinary virtue to this food, it was a Diet too dainty for hungry ſtomachs.

So were they weary of it, and deſired fleſh, crying with full mouth, and forcing a man that had nothing, to do miracles to content their ſenſuality. This great conductour that pitied their neceſſities, and was not willing to deſtroy them, pacified them by a faſhion full of modeſty, a powerfull ſpeech, ſweet promiſes and good performances, by making himſelf a Mediatour to God to obtein favours for them, when they merited puniſhments. They ſaw clouds of Quailes fall down upon the Army which God ſent them very opportunely, but he failed not to puniſh afterward their intemperance by ſudden deaths, and Sepulchres raiſed in the wilderneſſe that bore a long time the name of their concupiſcence.

Another time as they were in great want of water, and made a great tumult for the thirſt that tormented them, Moſes aſſiſted by the Divine power, opened the ſlancks of the Rocks, and made fountains to iſſue forth of them that quenched the thirſt of the whole Army. Their diſtruſt cauſed the greateſt part of their evils, and if they had nothing capable to afflict them, they themſelves framed Spectrums of terrour to themſelves, and found their torment in their own imaginations.

Above all, they exceedingly ſcared themſelves at the return of the Spies from the land of Promiſe; a falſe Rumour being ſowed in the Army, that it was a Land that devoured its inhabitants, and that it was inhabited by Gyants of ſo prodigious an heighth, that other men being compared to them appeared no more then Graſhoppers. Then they entred into ſtrange fumes, crying all aloud, that they ought rather to create a Generall to lead them back to Egypt, then to go and ſacrifice their wives and children unto Monſters. Moſes and Aaron thinking themſelves not able to appeaſe that furious ſtorm of words humbled themſelves before them, and remained proſtrated on the earth, while Joſhua and Caleb renting their clothes, for the horrour that they had of that ſedition, aſſured them that that report was falſe, that the Land of Promiſe was very good, that it flowed all in Milk and Hony, and that by the help of God they would poſſeſſe it, and over-maſter the originaries which they would eat as bread. Notwithſtanding all this they had run to ſtones, if God had not appeared in that high luſtre of his glory, and threatned to conſume them all by a generall peſtilence; But Moſes laboured earneſtly both with voyce and prayers to appeaſe the wrath of God, who puniſhed at laſt the Rebels by the privation of the Land of Promiſe which they had ſpoken againſt with ſo much extravagancy.

Theſe murmures that proceeded from fear and weakneſſe of courage ſeemed more ſufferable then thoſe that came from pride and malice, as the ſedition of Corah, Dathan, Abiram, which made an horrible havock. Theſe men followed with two hundred and fifty of the Princes of the Synagogue rebelled againſt Moſes and Aaron, uſurping the Cenſer, and publiſhing aloud that all the people was conſecrated as well as they, and that they did wrong to claim to themſelves an Empire over their brethren that belonged not to them; that that which had made them preſſe this going out of Egypt was nothing but an ambition that carried them to domineer over free-men, and that they exerciſed ſo great a tyranny over their ſubjects, that there remained nothing more but to pluck out their eyes. Moſes very much aſtoniſhed at ſuch inſolent Language proſtrated himſelf with his face on the earth, referring to God the deciſion of the controverſie, and urged them to appear the morrow after to offer Incenſe, and to ſee how God would like their offering.

The Anti-Prieſts failed not to be at the door of the Tabernacle with their Cenſers in their hands to make a combination apart, and to oppoſe the Pontificate of Aaron. But the living God that authoriſes the true High Prieſts appeared upon the Tabernacle after a terrible and threatning manner. The people that inviron-ed the Mutiners ſuddenly ſeparated themſelves at the voyce of Moſes; the earth opens it ſelf under the feet of Corah, Dathan, and Abiram to ſwallow them up alive with their Pavilions and all their riches. The others were devoured by fire from heaven viſibly with an extream affright of the whole Army; and foraſmuch as there remained ſome rebels that mourned for the dead, and enflamed the diviſion, the hand of God yet ſmoaking over their heads was ready utterly to deſtroy them, had not Moſes proſtrated himſelf before the Tabernacle praying for them, and had not Aaron holding the Cenſer, and beſeeching the divine Majeſty between the living and the dead appeaſed the wrath of Heaven. But the puniſhment of theſe miſerable men left much terrour in the ſouls of the people, and an example of perpetuall memory to all thoſe that reſiſt the Powers that are lawfully eſtabliſhed by God.

There were Combats at home and abroad; for the Amalekites, a ſalvage nation deſcended from Eſau's children, endeavoured to beat back the people of God, and gave them battell, which Moſes accepted, and making Joſhua Generall of the Army, contented himſelf to go to the top of the mountain to pray to the God of the living, and to obtein the Victory. His prayers were darts of fire ſhot upon the enemies, for as long as he kept his arms lifted up to God in prayer, the Iſraelites had the better, but if he ſlacked them never ſo little, they had the worſt, which made Hur and Aaron hold up his Arms to prevent a wearineſſe in them, and by this means he deſiſted not till ſuch time as the Adverſaries covered with their dead bodies all the field of battell. Now becauſe this great People would have been but a confuſed maſſe, had they remained without law and without policy which is the ſoul of Aſſemblies, Moſes was powerfully inſpired by God to make laws as well thoſe that concerned Religion, as others that regarded the Civil. The Philoſophers aſſure us, that every thing that lives in Nature, lives by the Light, and that all life is nothing elſe but Light, which ſpreads it ſelf into the whole Univerſe, and not content to guild it with its brightneſſe, communicates to it quickning ſpirits and ſecret influences which make all the productions in the boſome of Matter; That which the Light doth in the naturall World, the Law imitates in the Civill. It is a participation of the firſt Reaſon of the ordination and Providence Divine, which inſinuates it ſelf into the maſſe of Mankind, embelliſhes it with its ſplendours, and unites it in the point of Felicity by inviſible chains of love and obedience.

ries

Gods reaſon is the ſovereign Law which reſides in the Divine underſtanding, in the treaſures of his Wiſdome, and is as the Primum Mobile of all the regulated motions of the intellectuall nature. Plato ſayes That the World following that rule keeps an equall path, with all the fitneſſe, and all the meaſures requiſite to its preſervation. But as ſoon as it departs from it, it falls of neceſſity into great diſorders which cannot be ſurmounted but by the Divine ordination that re-calls Nature to the point of its Felicity. And becauſe the Eternall Law is ſo high and ſo ſublime that it ſurpaſſes all our thoughts, God hath cauſed a Rivulet to flow from that ſource, which is the Law of Nature, a true light of right Reaſon imprinted in the underſtanding of all men. But it being ſo often darkened by the black vapours of the animall Paſſions, there was a neceſſitie of humane Laws and Magiſtrates to put them in execution, by the puniſhment of the wicked, and the recompenſing of the good. God gave then a ſtrong inſpiration to Moſes; to preſcribe Precepts and Rules to his People, that have been admired by all Nations.

The Manichees, by the relation of S. Auguſtine, rejected the law of Moſes as wicked and tyrannicall; but in this they have been condemned by the Church; for there is no doubt, but that (having been given by God that is the Father of all Goodneſſe) it was good and profitable, to keep the Jews as under a Pedigogie till the grace of the Goſpel. And S. Paul himſelf in the Epiſtle to the Romans, where he ſeems to go about to deſtroy it, calls it for all that Holy, Juſt, and Good; But if ye compare it to the Law of grace ye ſhall find it harſh and imperfect. The Moſaicall Law, ſaith that great Doctour, conteins commands, but, that Jeſus gives aſſiſtance; the one beſtows light to know, the other ſtrength to execute. In the antient Law God ſayes, Do what I command thee. In the new Law we ſay to God, Give what thou commandeſt. Moſes divided that antient Law into three parts, the firſt of which conteined the Morall, and was included in the Decalogue, the Second comprehended what ever belonged to Ceremonies and was called Ceremoniall, the third regarded Juſtice between party and party, and was Judiciall. The firſt teaches how a man ought to carry himſelf with God and his neighbour to obtein ſalvation. The ſecond treats of the Temple, of the Synagogue, of the High-Prieſt, of the Prieſts, of the Levites, of the Prophets, of the Votaries Nazarites and Rechabites. It deciphers the inſtruments of Gods worſhip, as are the Tabernacle, the Ark of Covenant, the Propiciatory, the Table of Shew-bread, the Altar of the Perfumes and of the Burnt-offerings. It preſcribes the order of the Sacrifices and of the Sacraments, of the divers obſervations of Vows, of Faſts, of Feaſts, of Jubilees, of Shavings, of Habits. The third part ſpeaks of Kings, of Warre, of Peace, of Marriages, of Polygamy, of Divorce, of Crimes, of Theft, of Uſury, of Adultery, of Policy, of Men-ſervants, of Maid-ſervants, of Hirelings, of Strangers, and of the Poor. All this is read yet to this day in the Penteteuc, and is ſufficiently expounded by ſo many Interpreters of Scripture. It would be an infinite, tedious, and unprofitable buſineſſe to go about to decipher it here peece-meal. Let us content our ſelves that as the Morning dyes by bringing forth the Day, ſo the Law is expired by producing the light of the Goſpel.

Moſes undertook not ſo great a work by humane ſtrength, and truſted not to himſelf in ſo high an enterpriſe, God would conduct it with his Authority, and cauſed the People to be commanded to puriſie themſelves, and to ſtand ready on the third day to hear his will. That day being come, from the morning were heard great Thunders, and abundance of Lightnings ſeen that iſſued out of thick Clouds, at the ſound of an affrightfull Trumpet that ſeized all the People with aſtoniſhment. They removed themſelves according to the Orders of their Legiſlatour to the foot of the Mountain Sinai, with a prohibition to paſſe further. All the Mountain ſmoaked as a great Fornace, by reaſon that God was deſcended thither all in fire, which made it extream terrible. But Moſes his dear favourite aſcended to the higheſt top amidſt the fires, the darkneſſes and the flames, in that Luminous obſcurity where God preſided that ſpake to him face to face as to his moſt intimate confident. After all that thundering voyce of the Living God was heard that pronounced his Decrees and his Laws in that Chamber of Juſtice hung with fire and lights that trembled under the footſteps of his Majeſty. All this Law was ſet down in writing with a moſt exact care, and is yet read every day in the five Books of the Law.

Now, Religion being the Baſis of all Policy, without which great Kingdomes are but great Robbings; This wiſe Law-giver applyed his whole care and travell to the rooting out of Idolatry, and to the cauſing of the Adorable Majeſty of God to be acknowledged in the condition of a worſhip truly Monarchicall, and incommunicable to any other; as appears in the puniſhment which he inflicted on thoſe that had worſhiped the golden Calf.

For the Scripture ſaith, That when the Iſraelites perceived that Moſes tarried a long time on the Mountain of Sinai in thoſe amiable Colloquies that he had with God, they grew weary of it, and ſaid to the high Prieſt Aaron, That ſince that man that had brought them out of Egypt was loſt, they ought to dream no more of him, but make in his place Gods that ſhould march in the head of their Army. Aaron, that perperhaps had a mind to make them loſe the reliſh of that deſign by the price to which it would amount, demanded of them the Pendents of the ears of their Wives and of their Children, to go to work about it; but their madneſſe was ſo great that they deveſted themſelves freely of all that they had moſt precious to make a God to their own phanſie. Aaron accommodating himſelf to their humour through a great weakneſſe made them a Statue that had ſome reſemblance of the Ox Apis that was adored in Egypt. As ſoon as they had perceived it, they began to cry, Courage, Iſrael, behold the God that hath drawn thee out of the ſlavery of Egypt. Aaron accompanied him with an Altar, and cauſed a ſolemn Feaſt to be bidden for the morrow after, at which the people failed not to be preſent, offering many ſacrifices, making good cheer, and dancing about that Idol. God adverti ſed Moſes of that disorder, and commanded him to descend suddenly from the Mountain to remedy it; although he intended to destroy them: and had done it, had he not been appeased by the most humble Remonstrances and Supplications of his servant. He failed not to betake himself speedily to the Camp, where he saw that Abomination and the Dances that were made about it, which inflamed him so much with Choler, that he brake the Tables of the Law written by the hand of God, thinking that such a present was not seasonable for Idolaters and Drunkards. He rebuked Aaron sharply, who excused himself coldly enough, and not intending that so abominable a crime should passe without an exemplary punishment: He took the Golden Calf, and beat it into dust, which he steep'd in water, to make all those drink of it that had defiled themselves with that sacrilege, and to make them understand that sinne that seems at first to have some sweetnesse is extreamly bitter in its effects.

that

After which he commanded That all those that would be on Gods side should follow him, and the Tribe of Levi, as being the most interressed, failed not to joyn with him; whereupon seeing them all well animated he gave them order to passe through all the Camp, from one door to the other with their swords in their hands, and to slay all that they met, without sparing their neareſt kindred. This was executed, and all the Army was immediately filled with Massacres; Rivers of blood ran on all sides, accompanied with the sad howlings of a scared multitude that expected every minute the stroke of death. God would have that this so severe a punishment be executed upon those miserable men to cause an eternall horrour of Idolatry which is the most capitall of all sins. And to retein the worship of God a thousand pretty Ceremonies were practised after the structure of the Tabernacle of the Ark of Covenant, of the Table of the Shew-bread, of the Altars, and after the institution of the Pontificall habits, of the Offerings and of the Sacrifices that were celebrated with much order and a singular Majesty.

Moses also was indefatigable in rendring Justice sitting from the morning till the night on his Tribunall to hear the requests of all the particular men that came to him; which Jethro his father in law, that was come to visit him, having perceived, said to him that it was impossible for him to be long able to undergo so troublesome a labour, and that he ought to choose amongst all the people some Puissant men, fearing God, true, and enemies of covetousnesse to administer Justice, and that it would be sufficient to reserve to himself the controversies that should be of greateſt importance. Moses believed his counsell, and established an handsome order for the decision of the differences that should arise amongst the People. He passed fourty years in the wilderneſse in divers habitations, partly in war against the enemies, partly in preserving peace amongst his People, and confirming all the laws which he established by the command of God. In this exercise he lived to the age of an hundred and twenty years, separated himself from all things of the world, and was so united to God, that it seemed that even his Body it self passed into the nature and condition of an immortall Spirit. In fine, God having shewed him upon the mountain Nebo all the Land of Promise which he had got to by so many good counsells and so much pains, he dyed in that view without entring into it; was mourned for thirty dayes by the Israelites, and interred of set purpose in a sepulchre unknown to the eyes of men, for fear left he should give an occasion of some Idolatry to that people that would have held him for a Deity.

Never had man a Birth more forlorn, a Life more various, or a Death more glorious: of an exposed Infant, he became a Kings son, of a Kings son an Exile, of an Exile a Shepheard, of a Shepheard a Captain, of a Captain a Prophet, of a Prophet a Law-giver, of a Law-giver a Sovereign; the God of Kings, and the King of all the Prophets: Active at Court, Devout in Solitude, Victorious in War, Happy in Peace, Wise in his Laws, Terrible in his Arms, a man of Prodigies, that opened Seas, Manur'd Wilderneſses, Commanded things Sensible and Insensible, and exercised an Empire on all Nature. He was Indefatigable in his Travels, Zealous for the honour of God, disobliged from his own interest in the punishment of the Sacrilegeous, Patient in his own Injuries, Familiar to Few, Courteous to all; a Companion of Angels, the Favorite of God, of a Life very long, and of a Memory that shall have no end.

SAMUEL.

SAMUEL. DANIEL.

Samuel that ſeemed to have been born for nothing but to pray, and to paſſe away his life in the Tabernacle of God, got very forward at Court, and in the managing of the great affairs of State. His Birth is a Miracle, his Life an Example, and his Death the immortality of his virtues. He was one of thoſe infants that are expected a long time before they come, that are the ſons of ſo many vowes, and that pay the expectation of their Nativity by the happineſſe of their Life. It belongs onely to great things to be ſeen before they are, by preſages, by deſires, by hopes, and to make themſelves be ſeen, after they are no more, by an eternall memory.

Hannah his mother barren in children, but fruitfull in virtues, conceived him rather by her ſighs then by her pleaſures. He was a gift of the Tabernacle which ſhe rendered to the Tabernacle, and as ſhe had obteined him by ſupplication, ſhe made of him a man of prayer, devoted from his infancy to the Divine Miniſteries, and a Nazarite by expreſſe vow which lived in abſtinence, and had no other profeſſion but contemplation. It is by theſe exerciſes that God raiſes great Perſonages, and we cannot chooſe but expect brave actions on earth, from a man that hath much commerce with heaven.

So God began betimes to communicate himſelf to him, and to make him partaker of his ſecrets. He informed him of the deſtruction of his Maſter, Eli the High-Prieſt, and powerfully fitted him for his Service. This Eli was a reverend old man, a Judge of the People, that had lived in an high reputation and great glory amongſt the Iſraelites, but his reign being too ſoft, his children that were now great abuſing his authority, practiſed a petty Larceny even as far as unto the ſacrifice it ſelf, and committed impurities and debaucheries of women; which are moſt ordinarily two of the chiefeſt things that make a change of Government, there being nothing that doth more exaſperate the ſubject then the avarice and the luxury of thoſe that rule; the one making attempts upon their goods, and the other upon their bed. A grave father of the Church addreſſing a ſpirituall direction to a Governour, admoniſhes him, That it is not enough for him to be innocent, if all his family doth not imitate him, and form themſelves according to his examples; for, what profit is it, ſayes he, to a miſerable people to have a Prince or Governour wiſe and moderate, if, while he abſteins from things not permitted, there be one of his ſervants that making uſe of his name and power takes occaſion to ſatiate his Avarice?

Theſe wicked ſons of Eli, Hophni and Phineas committed a thouſand extortions under the authority of their father, and diſhonoured his gray hairs by the incontinence of their diſſolute youth. The complaints thereof came to their fathers ears, but inſtead of depriving them of their Offices and Commiſſions which they held of him, which would have been a means to waſh away the ſtain that was imprinted on his renown, he contented himſelf with giving them a weak admonition, which having little force upon their paſſions, had yet leſſe effect upon their actions.

God then took the buſineſſe in hand after a very ſtrange manner; for the Philiſtims the ſworn enemies of the choſen people ran upon their Frontiers, and put an army into the field, which obliged the Iſraelites to arm, to hinder the waſte that they made, but being come to the encountre they loſt the Battell, wherein 4000 men were ſlain upon the place. The conquered people reſuming heart and arms ſet on foot an huge Army that marched under the wings of the Ark of Covenant conducted by Hophni and Phineas to whom it apperteined by office. But theſe debauched men, and ill-train'd for war, rather precipitated then gave a ſcond Battel, and did their buſineſſes in it ſo ill, that thirty thouſand men were cut in pieces, and they themſelves increaſed the number of the dead, and were both ſlain in defence of the Ark that was taken and carried away by the Philiſtims.

This deplorable news being come to the ears of Eli gave him ſuch a confuſion of ſpirit, that he let himſelf fall, and dyed upon the place mourning for the Ark of Covenant above his own children. His houſe fell into great contempt after his death, as had been foretold him, and none of his race came to old-age, the hand of God not ceasing to revenge the Injuries of his Tabernacle, and of his People, to instruct great ones that are in Offices to look carefully to this, that Religion and Justice, as two sisters, by an indissoluable knot be kept fast to one another.

The Affairs of the Jews were in a piteous estate after the losse of those two Battels, and there was need of a puissant hand to repair those losses. But the Sovereign Master lent his thereto, and raised up Samuel to settle again all that the furies of the wars had shaken. This good Pilot consecrated himself by a Tempest, and took the Government when every rationall man would have thought of quitting it. This was a sign that he entered into it by wayes very clean, coming in a time when there was more matter for compassion then Ambition. He had no other Love, but that of the Publick good, he knew no other Avarice, but that of time, nor other Pleasures but Businesses. His first aime in the Government was to banish Idolatry, and to put in vigour again the worship of the true God, well knowing that the most fatall plagues of States come from the contempt of Religion. He was a man of order, of a great understanding, and of a powerfull speech that never fell to the ground. He caused ordinarily whatsoever he had a mind to establish surest to passe Generall Assemblies, that what concerned the good of every man might be done by the advice of all the World.

One of the first functions that he exercised was to make an excellent Oration to the People, and to tell them of their infidelity, making them see That Gods forsaking them came from that they had forsaken God, and that if they would enjoy the favours of his protection as their fathers did, they ought necessarily to banish the strange Gods, and to abolish eternally the names of Baal and Astaroth to whom many amongst them had devoted themselves; that God the Sovereign Master could not endure any companion in his Throne, and would not have to do with hearts divided to imaginary Deities; That if they served him faithfully, he hoped that he would deliver them from the hand of the Philistims, and would exalt again the glory of their nation that had been brought low by so many ill Encountres and extream lamentable losses.

He perswaded the whole assembly so powerfully by the force and sweetnesse of his discourse, that all those that had been defiled with those bad beliefs abjured their superstitions, and made a strong resolution to serve no more any, but the Living God, and to bury all their Idols in the Grave of forgetfullnesse. Whereto Samuel seeing them disposed called together the States Generall into a place named Mispah, where he promised to make very solemn prayers for all his Nation. The People failed not to be there in great number, and with a singular devotion drawing water, and powring it out as in the presence of God; whether it was a fashion of purification among the Hebrews, or whether by this Ceremony they would represent the vanity and weaknesse of all men, that are before God as little drops of water spread upon the earth, and that have no true contentment but in God alone who is the fountain of all good things. They disposed themselves to receive the mercy of God by a publick fast and a repentance of their faults, confessing aloud their ingratitude to God. Samuel comforted them, and having reconciled them to God again, united them among themselves by a mutuall concord, deciding their differences, and judging their Law-suits in the place fore-named with so much equity that all the People thought that the golden age was raised again under his government.

But the Philistims that would perpetually bring them down, having intelligence that they made assemblies in Mispah which turned to their prejudice drew themselves again into the field to fight them, whereat the people that had already experimented the disasters that proceeded from such hostilities was seized with a great astonishment, and implored the aid of Samuel to secure them from the fury of their adversaries. This made him have a particular refuge to the goodnesse of God, whom he invoked by his ardent prayers and by the suitable sacrifices which he offered, being a Priest by an extraordinary mission of God. The Israelites encouraged by their Protector bestir themselves to resist their enemies and combate them with firm footing not without great successe. For by good luck it happened that at the same time that the battell was given Samuel was presenting to God a burnt offering for the whole army, which was so worthily accepted that the trumpet of heaven sounded aloud in great thunderings and menacing lightnings that affrighted the Philistims and put them into a rout, which drew the inhabitants of Mispah to the glory of the combat, and joyning their troops with those that had gone before them, defeated the army of the Philistims, and took from them the desire of hazarding another battell.

Samuel took his time very opportunely, and seeing them in such a disposition hearkened to an honourable peace which he made, by recovering the Cities which the Philistims had usurped in those great advantages of their Arms. This was a most wise counsell and worthy of that great States-man that knew by experience that the Nation of the Philistims was stirring and quarrelsome as much as possible, and that his had need of rest to shut up the wounds that so many strange warrs had opened. Further he considered that the worship of the true God perished and lost much of its lustre by continuall warrs that rendred his subjects lesse docile in things Divine, and that the Licence of arms stifled the Laws and actions of Justice; In fine he had regard unto himself and was not ignorant that having not been bred in the exercises of war, he might succeed better in the Civill Government, and give much more satisfaction to all his people.

Every thing happned just as he had projected; for this Peace being well limited by his Counsels and by his cares was a second source of all blessings to his Nations. He visited himself in Person the Cities that the Armies had ransacked, and to whom the commerce of the victorious Philistims had given some bad tincture of their Superstition, and went through all places as a favourable Constellation, bringing Light and healthfull Influences to his People. He marked his footsteps with the zeal of Justice, and all his journies with publick felicities.

But we must averre that the People is a motley Beast that cannot endure warr, and yet loathe a long peace. If it be in trouble, it doth nothing but sigh and groan, and if it hath too much ease, it is onely to kick and winch. It grows weary of its own felicities, and is not sensible of its happinesse but by misery, nor tasts it its prosperities but by losing them. The Israelites at length distrelished Samuel, & inclined under pretence of an advantage, to change the Government. The fashion of this sage Judge seemed to them too simple; they would see a Prince of the People that should have more state about his Person, and that should make a greater noise. And just as the Romans under the Empire Galba lamented the losse of Nero, because they were fallen from a Court full of Luxury and Dissoluteness into another Face of Government under an old man, that had not about him the great Train of an Emperour, and that reduced the Libertines to the Antient Discipline; So theſe blind Iſraelites diſguſted a calm and temperate adminiſtration that produced good effects without oſtentation. They took a colour from his age, and from the offices which he had given his ſonnes, making them by a kind of Reſignation Succeſſours of his office, but not of his virtue, ſeeing that according to the publick voyce they had behaved themſelves but with little honeſty, ſtudying more to content their own Avarice, then to render juſtice. Upon this, they demanded a King whom they offered themſelves to receive from Samuel his hand, ſo good an opinion had they of his ſincerity and ſo much reverence to his Perſon.

these

This Propoſition touched ſenſibly the heart of Samuel; for it is true, That good Officers, although they adhere not to their Charges through Ambition, yet they cannot chooſe but have ſome diſpleaſure, to ſee themſelves put out by a Prince, or an ungratefull Common-wealth, after long and faithfull Services, and eſpecially if they are Aged; They would not have their Age paſſe for a Crime, and think that they are alwayes vigorous enough to acquit themſelves of their duty; But it is as certain that Samuel, that was a man of God, conſidered not ſo much his own intereſt as the Peoples, which he ſaw weary of their Liberty, and by a profound infatuation, demand a Yoke, whoſe heavineſſe it ſhould feel when it had no more the power to ſhake it off.

To ſpeak ſincerely, The Rule of one Man over another is a delicate piece, and when God eſtabliſhed the Dominion of Adam, he gave him all power over the Creatures, but he would not comprehend therein the Men that ſhould deſcend from him. The World was more then two thouſand years before it was known what Monarchy or Empire was; The Younger were ruled by the Elder with a ſweet and amiable diſcretion, in which there was much ſatisfaction and ſmall conſtraint.

The People of God reteined alwayes very near this form of Governing; for the Antient Patriarchs preſided over the reſt as Maſters of Families more by Reverence then by Command. Moſes in that high Authority that could do every thing both upon Men and upon the Elements, never aſſumed the name of King, and his Succeſſours till Samuel his time contented themſelves with the Stile of Judges of the People.

Nimrod was the firſt amongſt the Gentiles that uſurped a new Domination over the liberty of the Nations that he ſubdued by Arms, having learned in the continuall Maſſacres of Beaſts Cruelty towards Men. Not but that Kingdoms and Monarchies ſince that time have been holily inſtituted of God; But he hath alwayes willed that Kings ſhould learn that there was none but he in the Univerſe of all the Creatures that was an abſolute Maſter, having alone the Power to Create, and to Annihilate what or whom he pleaſes. This is not permitted to the Greateſt Monarchs on the Earth, who remaining within the bounds of their charges ought to acknowledge themſelves the Vicegerents and Subſtitutes of God, to Conduct Men to their End, making them arrive at the heighth of Felicity, by the wayes of Juſtice and of Religion. But when they ſtray from theſe intentions, and abuſe the Goods, the Bloud, and the Life of their Subjects, as if they were the Proprietours of them, and not the Stewards, they render themſelves reſponſible to Gods Judgement for all the abuſes that are committed in the whole Kingdome through their default.

This change of Government projected by the Iſraelites was not according to Gods Heart, who comforted Samuel and told him, that he ought not to be ſad for that they were weary of him, ſeeing they were weary of God Himſelf which is an Infinite Goodneſſe, and gave him Collegues in his Empire. He Commanded him to make known to them the Right of a King, which ſhould be, to take their children for his ſervants and to Employ them on ſuch Trades as he ſhould judge fit for the profit of his Houſe, to uſurpe their Lands and Inheritances to accommodate therewith his Minions, to exact Tithes of their Revenues, of their Vines, and of their Corn to enrich therewith his Officers, and in a word, that he would govern every thing after his own Fancy.

Thoſe that take theſe words as a Right that God eſtabliſhed in favour of Kings are very farre from the ſenſe of the Scripture, for they are ſpoken by way of Menace and not of Approbation. Otherwiſe we ſhould avouch that King Ahab had right to take away Naboth his Vineyard, for which he was ſo ſharply reprehended and ſo ſeverely puniſhed, with his Wife Queen Jeſabel. Yet it is moſt Juſt that Kings and Sovereigns ſhould have ſome reaſonable Tributes from the People to ſupport the Majeſty of the Kingdome, to maintein their Family, to protect their Subjects againſt Hoſtilities, to open them Trading, to give them means to preſerve and increaſe their Revenues, to make Friendſhips, to live peaceably in their Commodities, and to defend them againſt the violent Uſurpers of their Goods.

The School-Doctours, as Cajetan and Gregory de Valentia require four Conditions to juſtifie Impoſts. The Firſt is, The Power and Authority of the Prince. The Second, That they tend to a good End. The Third, That they be according to the ability of the Subject. The Fourth, That they be impoſed upon fit Perſons, and rather upon certain Marchandiſes, then upon that which is totally neceſſary to the Life of Man.

Samuel failed not well to aggravate to the People the Burdens that they ſhould undergo by chooſing them a King, and the Repentance that they ſhould have of it, when the evil ſhould be incureable. But (It being hard to make them believe Reaſon that never uſe it but when it flatters their own will.) The Iſraelites were no way diverted from their Propoſition by all poſſible Remonſtrances, but continued to demand a King with great urgency, deſiring to be like in that to ſo many other Nations. They were much like the Froggs in the Fable that prayed Jupiter to give them a King, whereto he agreeing, threw into their Lake a great piece of Wood which much aſtoniſhed them at firſt, but ſeeing it without Motion they deſpiſed it, and ſaid that they deſired a King Robuſtuous, Active, and Nimble, whereupon he gave them a Bird of Prey that ceaſed not to devour them; After which they made great Complaints, but he would hearken to them no more. So God cauſed this miſerable People to be advertiſed that when they ſhould be weary of the Domination of Kings, and that they ſhould deſire another form of Government, he would have no ears for their Requeſts. All this inflamed them the more, ſo reſolved were they upon their Miſery.

Samuel being willing to deliver himſelf from their Importunities purpoſed to chooſe them a King, and to give him to them with his own hand, not for any mind that he had to keep yet the Government, but for the zeal that he had of the Glory of God and of Juſtice, deſiring that the pains that he had taken to procure peace unto his people, and to preſerve it many years together, might not be made unprofitable through the Caprichio's of an evill Succeſſour that perhaps might take a pride in changing all that he had ſo carefully eſtabliſhed. He did not caſt his eyes upon his own Kindred to make himſelf a creature in whom he might reign according to fleſh and blood, but he took by the Order of God a man very ignote, and little taken notice of amongſt his brethren.

Here is a mervellous ſport of Divinity, that calls things that are not as things that are, that makes the Light break out of Darkneſſe, and traces the rayes of his Glory upon an heap of dirt. Saul, of the Tribe of Benjamin, the leaſt amongſt the Hebrews, and one of the leaſt qualified in that Tribe, a Countrey-man, into whoſe heart the Court and Royalty never entred, not ſo much as in a Dream, went to ſeek his fathers Aſſes that then were gone aſtray. A domeſtick ſervant that was with him ſeeing that he loſt his labour in that ſearch gives him notice that in the neighbouring village there was a great Perſonage that was ignorant of nothing, and that he could well tell them news of their loſſe, and added, that he had a piece of ſilver that was worth about ſix pence which he would make a preſent to him. Saul conſents to it, and they goe along both together into the Village of Ziph, where Samuel was that was to be preſent that day at a Sacrifice and a Feaſt that was made among the Principall men. Without thinking on it, they meet him, and asked of him where was the Prophets houſe. Samuel knew by revelation that it was he of whom God had ſpoken to him, and whom he had choſen to be the King of his People, and entertained him very courteouſly, and invited him to the Feaſt, and to tarry that night in his houſe without going further; and promiſed him that he would tell him all that his heart thought on; and as for the Aſſes he needed not to trouble himſelf, for they were found again. But there were other affairs that concerned him, and that would ſuddenly make all the Glory and all the Riches of Iſrael fall into his hands.

The other was extreamly ſurpriſed to ſee himſelf entreated with ſo much honour, and confeſſed with all ſincerity the meanneſſe of his family, and the little cauſe that he had to pretend to ſuch heighths as thoſe. But Samuel taking him by the hand brings him with his ſervant into the Hall of the Feaſt, and ſets them both at the upper end of the Table, where there were thirty Gueſts, and cauſed Saul to be ſerved with all that was moſt exquiſite in the Banquet that was kept upon a little Hill very near the Burgh, to which they deſcended after their repaſt, and Samuel led Saul into his Houſe, and made him lodge that night in his own Chamber. The morrow he conducted him to the Suburbs of the City, and having cauſed his ſervant to go before, poured on a ſudden upon his head a precious ointment, and kiſſing him, told him That God had Anointed him King of his People which he ſhould deliver from the hand of the Philiſtims. After which he foretold him many things that ſhould befall him, and gave him evident ſigns of the verity of his words.

When he was returned, he had a curious Uncle that inquired after all that had happened to him, to whom he ſpake of the Aſſes, but was very wary not to diſcover the ſecret of the Royaltie. Some time after Samuel called a Generall Aſſembly of all the people to proceed to the Election of a King, and having diſpoſed all the Tribes of Iſrael for that deſign, the lot fell upon that of Benjamin, and upon the Famely of Matri, and in fine, upon Saul, who had hid himſelf, that he might not expreſſe any ambition of that Royalty; But he was ſuddenly taken forth out of the place where he had retired himſelf, and was ſhewed to the whole Aſſembly, in which there was not a man that he did not out-paſſe by all the head.

This rejoyced Samuel, and made him ſay that they might plainly ſee that God took a care of their affairs in that Election, by giving them ſo brave a Man that had not the like amongſt all the People, whereupon they all cryed, God ſave the King.

After this Eſtabliſhment, Samuel called a ſecond Aſſembly for his own Diſcharge, wherein he made a powerfull Oration, declaring to the People the Goodneſſe and the Favours they had received from the Hand of God in all his Conduct, ever ſince their coming out of Egypt, and made a kind of Recapitulation of thoſe that had Governed, and delivered them from their Enemies even till this time; Then he repeated to them that they had plucked a King out of the hand of God with all importunity, and that it was not pleaſing to his Divine Majeſty. Whereof he gave them a good Pledge, making at the inſtant the Voyce of Heaven ſpeak in a great tempeſt, which affrighted them ſo much that all deſired pardon of that ſinne which they would never before acknowledge.

But before he came to thoſe Reproaches, he highly juſtified himſelf, calling them to give a Teſtimony of his Conduct and Converſation amongſt them; He Conjured them to ſpeak before God and the new King, if he had ever injured them, or been exceſſive either upon their Perſons, or upon their Goods, and that if they had any thing concerning his Life, or his Converſation, or the Adminiſtration of his Charge, he was ready to give them all ſatisfaction.

The Reverend Old-man melted their hearts, and all rendered him the teſtimony of an Honeſty and Juſtice irreproachable. Thereupon he proteſted that he would never forget them, and that being out of his Office, he would offer to God his moſt fervent Prayers for their Wellfare, and would have a care of their Quiet, as farre as he ſhould be able, exhorting them furthermore to remain inviolable in the Religion of their Fathers, and in the true Worſhip of the Living God, and aſſuring them that he would never caſt them off as long as they ſhould adhere to him by the Submiſſion and Duties of true Children.

The People began to perceive what they had loſt, in the diſcharge of ſo Venerable a Perſon, and were aſhamed of their precipitation; but they were now embarked too far, and muſt ſail to the liking of the Tempeſt.

Here is a great Secret of Divine Policy which hath tormented Curious Spirits in their ſearch into it, that demand wherefore God (making uſe of the Miniſtery of the wiſeſt Man that was at that time on Earth to give a King to his own People, that was to be as the Foundation-Stone, and the Baſis of the Royalty of Judea) made ſo ill a choice, that he was as it were forced by the deportments of Saul to break in pieces his own work. But we ought to conſider that in the choice of Princes and Sovereigns, God approves not alwayes all that he gives, nor gives not alſo all that he approves. There are Kings that are given by favour, and others by wrath; Thoſe are ſent into the world as Starres, and theſe as Comets. He ſaith in his Prophet, That he will give a King in his fury, to expiate the ſinnes of his people; and S. Gregory hath hath worthily obſerved, that Kings are meaſured out by Providence, according to the diſpoſition of the Subjects; and which is more, that God permits the ſins of good Kings for the chaſtiſement of the people, and that there is ſuch a connexion between the manners of the Maſter and the Servants, that the fault of the Maſter cauſes the wicked life of the Servants; and the good life of the Servants, the amendment of the Maſter. God was provoked againſt the Iſraelites by reaſon of their Idolatry, of their Obſtinacy, and of their Ingratitude towards Samuel, and this was the cauſe that he gave them Saul, not ſo much to govern, as to puniſh them, and make them regret the virtue of their contemned Prophet by the compariſon of the two Governments. He ſuffers alſo Samuel to be deceived in that choice, to teach us, that it belongs onely to the eternall Wiſdome to know, and to make turns of State that ſurpaſſe the capacity of the ableſt men.

If the ſtature of the body made the Excellency of Kings, Saul (without controverſie) was one of the chief; he had a very fair appearance to the exteriour, but within were found great defects of virtues and Royall qualities. He was a guilded portall that nature had built for an houſe of ſtraw. The people at firſt were raviſhed with him, and meaſuring him by the greatneſſe of the body, judged him the prime man of their Nation, not ſeeing that making that judgement, they preferred a flint before a pearl. The firſt unhappineſſe of his conduct was, that he had not an heart for God, but for his own intereſt, and that he did not unite himſelf cloſe enough to Samuel, that had made him King, and that was the Oracle from which he ſhould have learned the divine Will. The ſecond was a furious State-jealouſie, his capitall devil that put his Reaſon into a diſorder, and infected all the pleaſures and contentments of his life. He was but weak to hold an Empire, and govern with love, and yet he loved paſſionately all that he could leaſt compaſſe, and would do every thing of his own head, thinking that the aſſiſtance of a good Councel was the diminution of his Authority. Sometimes he was ſenſible of his defects, but inſtead of amending them, he deſired to take away the eyes of thoſe men that perceived them. His Spirit was little in a great body; his Reaſon barren in a multitude of buſineſſe; his Paſſions violent with ſmall reſervedneſſe; his Breakings out impetuous; his Counſels ſudden, and his Life full of inequalities.

Samuel had prudently perceived that the Philiſtims were dangerous enemies to the State of Judea, becauſe they knew its weakneſſe, and kept it in ſubjection a long time, depriving it of the means of thinking fully upon its liberty. And therefore he maintained a peace with them, and uſed them courteouſly, gaining all that he could by good Treaties, and would not precipitate a Warre, which was to weaken the Iſraelites without recovery. But Saul thought not himſelf an able man, if he had not ſpoiled all, and without making any other proviſion of neceſſary things, he made a great levy of Souldiers, and a mighty Army to go againſt the enemies, in which there was but two ſwords. It was a plot that permitted not the Hebrews to have Armorers, nor other men that laboured in Iron, totally to diſarm them, and at the leaſt motion that they ſhould make, expoſe them for a prey. Theſe aſſaulted Philiſtims found him buſineſſe enough through the whole courſe of his Government and Life, and in the end, buried him with his children in the ruines of his State.

But God that would give ſome credit to Samuel's choice, ſent at firſt proſperities to Gods people under the conduct of that new King, wherein, that which ſerved for a glory to that holy man, was a vain bait to Saul, to make him enterpriſe things that could give him no other ability but to deſtroy himſelf.

About a moneth after his election, Nahaſh the Ammonite, raiſed an Army to fall upon the Jabites that were in league with the people of Iſrael, and thoſe ſeeing that they were not ſtrong enough to reſiſt ſo terrible an enemy, diſpatched an Embaſſage to him to treat about a Peace. But that inſolent Prince made anſwer to their Embaſſadours, that he would not make any treaty of Peace with them on any other condition, then by plucking out their right Eyes, and covering them with a perpetuall ignominy. Theſe poor people that were reduc'd almoſt to a deſpair, implored on all ſides the aſſiſtance of their neighbours, and failed not to ſupplicate to the Iſraelites (their friends) to do ſomething in their favour. Their Meſſengers being arriv'd at Gibeah, related the ſad news of the cruelty of Nahaſh, that filled the people with fear and tears. Saul returning from the fields, was driving his oxen, when hearing the groans of his Subjects, demanded the cauſe of it, and having been informed, entred into ſo great a rage at the pitileſſe extremities of that fierce Ammonite, that he inſtantly tore in pieces his two oxen, and ſent the pieces of them through all the cities and villages of his Dominion, commanding every one to follow him to revenge that injury, otherwiſe their cattle ſhould be deale with, as he had done with his two oxen. The Iſraelites mov'd, partly by compaſſion, and partly alſo by fear of thoſe menaces, poured out themſelves from all parts to this Warre in ſuch a ſort, that he had got together three hundred thouſand men. He divided them into three Battalions, and went to meet the Ammonite, whom he ſet upon ſo vigorouſly, and combated ſo valiantly, that he totally defeated his Army, and humbled that proud Giant that thought on nothing but putting out mens eyes, making him know that pride goes before reproach, as the lightning before the thunder.

All the great people that compos'd that Army returned unto their houſes, and Saul retained onely three thouſand men, whereof he gave one thouſand to his ſon Jonathan, that was a man full of ſpirit and generoſity, and farre better liked then his father Saul. This Militia was too little conſiderable for ſo great enemies, yet he had a courage to aſſault a place of the Philiſtims, and routed their Garriſon; whereat they being pricked beyond meaſure betake themſelves into the field with an Army, in which there were thirty thouſand chariots of warre, and people without end; whereat the Iſraelites were ſo affrighted, that all ſcatter'd themſelves, and went to hide themſelves in caves, ſo that there remained but about ſix hundred men with Saul, who marched with a ſmall noiſe, and durſt not appear before his adverſaries. Samuel had promiſed to ſee him within ſeven dayes, to ſacrifice to God and encourage the people.

But Saul ſeeing that the ſeventh day was come without having any tidings of him, takes himſelf the burnt offering, offers the Sacrifice, and playes the Prieſt, without having any Miſſion either ordinary or extraordinary. As ſoon as he had made an end of burning the Holocauſt, Samuel arrives, to whom he related, how that ſeeing all the people debauch themſelves and quit the Army, and how that being preſſed by his enemies, in a time wherein it behoved them to have recourſe to prayer before they gave battle, he was perſwaded that God would like well enough that in the neceſſity, and long abſence of Samuel, he ſhould perform the office of a Prieſt by preſenting the burnt offering, which he had done with a good intention, without pretending to usurp any thing upon his office. Samuel rebuked him sharply for that action, to shew, that there is no pretense nor necessity that is able to justifie a sin; and that it no way belongs to Lay-people to meddle with the Censer, and to do the Functions that regard the Priests. Then Samuel fore-told him that his Kingdome should not be stable, and that God would provide himself another that should be a more religious observer of his Law: thereupon he left him for a time, and Saul having recollected all the people that he could endeavoured to oppose the enemy.

The brave Jonathan, accompanied with his armour-bearer, found a way to climb over rocks, and to surprise a court-of-Guard of the Philistims which they thought had been inaccessible, which put them in a terrible fright, imagining that those that had got so farre had great forces, though they did not yet appear.

This brought their Army into a confusion, and God also putting his hand farre into the businesse fill'd them with such an amazement, that their ranks being in disorder, they killed one another without knowing their own party. The people of Israel having received intelligence of that rout take heart again, and get them out of the caves into which they had retired themselves, to range themselves about Saul's person, who was thereby transported with such an ardour, that he conjur'd all his Army to follow the Philistims (without drinking or eating) till they were all destroyed.

This was a precipitation of his unequall spirit and a true Chimæra; yet desiring to make that passe for Zeal which was a pure Passion, he would needs cause his son Jonathan to be put to death for having sucked a little honey at the end of his rod; but the people rescued him out of his hands, and desisted to pursue the Philistims, being not in a condition to fight with them.

Some time after, Samuel exhorted him to enterprise a puissant Warre against the Amalekites (sworn enemies of the people of God) and conjur'd him to make every thing passe through the edge of the sword, without sparing any body; and above all, to reserve nothing of the booty that should be made upon them, that should not be consumed with fire. To this, Saul seem'd to be inclin'd with vigour, and raised an Army of more then two hundred thousand men; so great was the weight of the Authority, when Samuel put himself into party. He fell suddenly upon the Amalekites and defeated them with a generall rout, so farre, as to take their King prisoner; but he contented himself with destroying and burning all that was caytiffe and unprofitable, reserving Agag the King, with the best flocks and herds, and choicest moveables. In the mean while, he was so much puft up with this victory, that he caused an Arch of Triumph to be erected to himself, and spread himself in the vanities of his spirit while God was thinking of rejecting him, and giving orders to Samuel to tell him his unhappinesse. Yet Saul (blind in his sin) received the man of God into his Camp with an extraordinary joy, vaunting himself for having efficaciously fulfilled the commandment of God; and while he was speaking it, the voyce of the Flocks that he had put aside was heard; whereupon Samuel said, What means this Cattle that strikes my ears with its bleatings? To which he answered, That he had reserved them expresly for an offering to the living God. But Samuel replyed, That there was no Sacrifice so pleasing to God as Obedience; and that Sin, which was contrary to him, was a kind of Idolatry; and that since he had despised the Word of God, he should be cast off, and deprived of the Kingdome; whereat he being astonished, confessed that he had offended hearkning more to the voyce of the People then to that of God, and beseeched Samuel to excuse his sinne, to bear with his infirmities, and to go with him to the sacrifice to adore God in sign of reconciliation. Whereto Samuel replyed that he would have no more any thing common with a man whom God had abandon'd, and saying this, steps forward, and turns his back to him: the other layes hold on the fringe of his robe which remained in his hands, which when the Prophet saw, Behold (said he) how your Kingdome shall be divided and given to a better then your self. The Triumpher of Israel, the true God of hosts is not as a man, to change his purposes, and repent him of his counsels. The King humbled himself again acknowledging his fault, and beseeching Samuel earnestly not to leave him, but to render him the ordinary respect before the Princes of the people, and to come and worship God with him. Samuel, fearing the disorder of the Army, consented for that time, but afterward never saw Saul any more to the day of his death.

He ceased not to weep bitterly for him, considering that he that had been chosen by his hand had come to so little good, and had carried himself with so much contempt of the commandments of God. This wounded his heart, and would not let him put an end to his mournings, till his great Master comforted him, and suggested David to him, who should fill up worthily the place that Samuel was about to lose by his iniquity. And (indeed) he performed then a bold enterprise, going to Bethleem, under colour of a Sacrifice, and Anointing David King in Saul's life time, although that design was secret, that it might be managed with more successe. After that time, Saul was left visibly by God, possessed with an evil spirit, and gnawed perpetually with jealousies of State which the person of David caused in him by reason of his valour and great virtues, as I shall declare in the following Elogy. In the mean while, Samuel lived retired from Court, without meddling with Sate-affairs; and Saul, by his departure, changed the sins of Vanity and of Fearfulnesse into Sacrilegies and Massacres, letting loose the bridle to his fury, to retain the phantasme of an Empire that flew out of his hands. Good Samuel ceased not in his solitude to bewail two King that he had made, looking upon one as an homicide, and the other as a sacrifice of death. He was afflicted inconsolably to hear of the deportments of that furious Saul that made of one wickednesse a degree to passe unto another, inventing every day new butcheries to cement his Throne with the bloud of his brethren. He melted himself with compassion for his poor David, seeing Saul's sword hang but by a little thread, alwayes ready to fall upon his innocent head. He deplored the miseries of the poor people which he could not any longer remedy, and passing over again in his remembrance all the vicissitudes of mans life, and the treacheries of the Court, he had an ardent thirst to depart out of this world to go to find Innocence in the bosome of his Fathers. God heard him, and drew him to himself by a peaceable death the seventy and seventh year of his age, the eight and thirtieth of his Government, and the seventh after his retreat from Court. He was mourned and lamented for, by all the people, as the Father of his Countrey: and magnificent Funeralls were made for him, to render him a testimony at his death of the commencommendable actions of his holy and generous life. Saul remained yet two years upon the Throne after him, and the Even before his great overthrow, the Soul of Samuel returned from Limbus, not by the work of the Pythoneſſe, but by the will of God and ſpake to him, and told him of his diſaſtre, as I have ſaid in the Maxim of the Immortality of Souls.

DANIEL.

Daniel entred into the Court by Captivity, ſtayed there by Mortification, made himſelf known by Prophecy, and there alſo rendred himſelf renowned by great Virtues. To comprehend this, it is neceſſary to know, that the little Kingdome of Judea was ordinarily very much expoſed to the Armies of the Aſſyrians, which God had choſen to be the ſcourges and the inſtruments of the Juſtice that he exerciſed upon the ſins of his people. King Nebuchadonozor that reigned in that Monarchy ſix hundred years before the Nativity of our Lord fell upon Paleſtine with a mighty Army, took and pillaged the city of Jeruſalem, carried away King Jehojakim, with the richeſt veſſels of the Temple, and abundance of priſoners of the moſt noted men, amongſt which was Daniel, accompanied with other young children of a good parentage.

The King gave charge to Aſhpenaz chief Gentleman of his Chamber, to chuſe him Pages of Royall extraction, well made, without any blemiſh or diſgrace, as well of mind as body, that ſhould be verſed in arts befitting the Nobility, well learn'd in exerciſes, docile, and well-governed, and that he ſhould teach them the Chaldean Tongue, which was the Language of the Kingdome, that they might wait upon him in his Chamber. Aſhpenaz having proceeded in the buſineſſe with much conſideration, reſolved to take Daniel, and his three companions, Ananias, Azarias, and Miſael. From hence one may collect, that this young child was endowed with moſt excellent qualities for the converſation of the world, and the life of the Court. Some have perſwaded themſelves that he was the ſon of King Hezekiah, but it is without foundation, and with ignorance of the Chronology, ſeeing that if this opinion were true, it muſt be inferred, that Daniel that is here dealt with as a child, and choſen for Nebuchadonozor's Page, was at that time fourſcore and ten years old, which would be a great impertinency.

Yet it is credible that he was deſcended from ſome ſon or daughter of the ſame King; but, however, one may aſſure that he was of the bloud Royall, ſeeing the King had expreſly ordered, that the Children that were to apppear before him for his ſervice ſhould be taken out of that quality. Beſides his eminent birth, he was endowed with a very gentle faſhion, knowing according to his age, dextrous in the exerciſes of the Court, of a ſweet and prudent ſpirit, very different from the temper of him that we propoſed in the precedent Elogy. But to ſpeak ſincerely, if a good man ought to be conſidered as a Temple, theſe exteriour qualities make but the portall; there are others in the underſtanding and in the will that compoſe the Myſteries of the Sanctuary.

This young child was endowed with a great intelligence in things of Faith and Religion, and of a chaſte fear of God, and of rare virtues, that ſurpaſſed farre the ability of his age. Who can ſufficiently commend that which he did at his entrance into the Court with his companions, that took light from his ſpirit, and ſtrength from the imitation of his courage? They were now come from the ſiege of an hunger-bitten city, from a long voyage, and abundance of weariſome toils; they find themſelves ſuddenly in the abundance and delicacies of a magnificent Court, where they were to be fed as the other Pages, with the viands that were ſerved up to the Kings table.

Youth hath ordinarily a great inclination to a ſenſuall life, and to content all its appetites; ſo that there are ſome that ſeem not to eat to live, but to live to eat. Yet theſe young children made a firm reſolution to abſtain from all the delicious food that was ſerved up to Nebuchadonozor's table, whether for the fear that they had, leſt they ſhould have been offered unto Idols, or for the love of Temperance; they earneſtly beſeeched the maſter of the Pages to entertain them with nothing but with pulſe: and when he feared leſt that uſage ſhould make them lean, and that the King ſhould perceive it, they prayed him to try them for the ſpace of ten dayes, aſſuring him, that living in ſuch a manner, they ſhould be full of health and vigour. This was verified by experience, and when they were to appear in the preſence of the King, they were found in good plight, active, and well inſtructed above all the reſt.

The Prophet ſaith, That the beauties of the deſert ſhall be fat and fruitfull: ſo thoſe bodies that are as deſerts, deprived of the fat and of the abundance that a voluptuous life miniſters to the delicate, have a certain bleſſing of God, that infuſes into them an health, a grace, and a beauty, ſutable to a good temper. Do we not ſee that all thoſe birds of prey that feed themſelves with the fleſh of beaſts ſend forth an horrid cry? but the Nightingales that live innocently by ſome little ſeeds of plants ſing melodiouſly. Daniel was made to charm the ear of a great King by his diſcourſes, to live in contemplations and in lights; he would have nothing to do with the ſmoak and ill vapours of Nebuchadonozor's Kitchen. Pſal. 64. Pingueſcent ſpecioſa deſerti.

He was full three years under this maſter of the Pages, Praying, Faſting, keeping the Law of God, learning the Language of the Countrey and the Modes of the Court. This time being expired, he was preſented to the King amongſt other children of divers Nations, who liked him exceeding well, with his companions, and found that he eminently ſurpaſſed the capacity of all thoſe of the Countrey, and of the reſt that were nouriſhed with him. When he was advanced in age, and now approaching to thirty years, it pleaſed God to render him very famous at the Court, as another Joſeph, by the Interpretation of a Dream.

King Nebuchadonozor had a great Viſion in his ſleep which very much diſquieted his mind; for there remained in him an Idea that he had dreamt of ſome magnificent thing, but his Dream was eſcaped from him, and he could by no means unfold it, whether he ſaid true, or whether he diſſembled to try his Diviners, and all thoſe that undertook to foretell hidden hidden things. He makes a great Assembly of the Sages of the Countrey in his Palace, to know of them what it was that he had dreamed; whereat these men were very much astonished, and told him with all humility, that no man ever dealt so with the Interpreters of Dreams, but that the extraordinary manner was to declare the Vision, and then seek for the Interpretation.

This King that was of an impetuous and extravagant spirit, said, That he was not contented with that triviall fashion of telling his Dreams, to give them matter of inventing afterward such an Interpretation as they would; but that the true secret of the Science was to divine the Dream it self. The Magicians reply'd, That there was none but the Gods that could give a resolution of that, and that their commerce was farre distant from ours. The King thereupon sent them away with anger; and without giving vent to his choler, resolved to rid himself of all the Diviners in his Kingdome, having already given command to his Captain of the Guard to put them all to death. All of them fled, and were exactly searched for; Daniel that was thought to make profession of these extraordinary Sciences was involved in the same danger, there being no want of wicked minded men, that seeing him sufficiently in the favour of the King endeavoured to destroy him in that occasion.

He would not suddenly forsake the Court, as one scar'd, but assuring himself of Gods protection, he presented himself to the Captain of the Guard, praying him to make some surcease upon that rigorous Edict, and not to dip his hands in bloud by the death of so many men; but to permit him onely to present himself to the King, and he hoped to give him all content. In this he shewed himself very prudent, there being nothing better in troublesome affairs and very sudden, then to bring some retardment, whilst the spirit may give it self leasure to come to it self again, and to find expediments to get out of an ill way. He spake to the King, expressing much compassion even for them that bore him envy, and desired some delay, which was very reasonable to resolve so crabbed a Question.

Now when he saw well that it passed the capacity of any created spirit, he had recourse to the Creatour by most humble and most fervent prayers, which he recommended also to his dear companions, that all conspiring to the same design, they might the more easily obtain the mercy and the illumination of God in so great and so profound a secret. It is thus that good men proceed in all businesses of importance, distrusting all their own managery if it be not directed from on high. Their prayers redoubled day and night one upon the other forced heaven with a pious violence, and the Dream with its Interpretation was revealed to Daniel in the midst of his most ardent Devotions. He felt his spirit touched with a glimpse of the first light, and saw as in a mirrour, all that had passed in Nebuchadonozor's mind with such a certainty, as permitted him not to doubt of it. Then he was not like Archimedes who having found some secret of the Mathematicks, as he was in a Bath leapt out all naked by a strange transport, crying through the streets, I have found it, I have found it. This is ordinary to spirits that have nothing in their head but vanity; but holy Daniel cryes out thereon, Let the name of God be blessed for ever, for to him belongeth wisdome and strength. It is he that distributeth wisdome to the true Sages, and that bestows knowledge on those that range themselves under his Discipline. It is he that reveals things hidden in the most deep abysses, and knows that which is buried in the most thick darkness, and light dwells perpetually with him. I praise thee, and I confesse thee from the bottome of my heart the God of my fathers, that hast given this strength of spirit and this understanding to penetrate the Kings secret.

He spake many such like words, and rising from his prayer, he went to seek the Captain of the Guard, whom he besought to save the Sages of Babylon, and to cause no more to die, because he had found out the secret that was searched after by the Prince; which the other received with much joy, and failed not immediately to carry news of it to the King, who caused Daniel to be called, of whom he demanded the performance of his promise. Then the Prophet using a great prudence and a singular modesty excused all the Sages of Chaldea that could not find out the Kings secret thoughts, and vanted not himself to know them by his own sufficiency, but by the inspiration of the God whom he adored. In which, he expressed a great wisdome and a generous humility not giving any praise to himself, but transferring all the glory to the living God, that he might work in the King an high esteem of the true Religion.

S. Gregory saith That those that seek their own glory in the Commission they have from God, are like those that espousing (in quality of proxies) a wife by order of their Master, would play the Husbands, not contenting themselves to be simple Commissioners. Daniel abhorred such proceedings, because he was a Starre that would shew his Sun, and would not be seen himself but by his favour. He made then a large discourse to the King his master, and told him his Dream, which was touching that famous Statue, that had an head of Gold, a breast and arms of Silver, a belly and thighs of Copper, legs of Iron, and feet partly of Iron and partly of Earth: and added, that whilst the King beheld it in his Dream, he saw a little stone come from a great mountain that strook the feet of the Statue and tumbled it down immediately, scattering the Gold, the Silver, the Copper, the Iron, and the Earth as small chaffe dissipated by a whirlewind, and that that little Stone changed it self in an instant into a huge Mountain, and filled the whole earth.

After he had so subtilly touched the Vision of the Prince, making him remember all that his imagination had framed, he descended to the particularities of the Interpretation, and said, That he was the Golden Head of that Statue, God having made him a King of kings, and having given him Strength, Rule, and Glory, with a Power over the Earth inhabited by men, over the birds of the air, and the beasts of the field. Then he advertised, that after him should come a Kingdome lesse then his, that should be as Silver in comparison of Gold: And after that second should arise a third, resembling Brasse, that should command over the whole earth: And after that a fourth, which as Iron, should subdue and break in pieces all that it should meet with. And as for that that he had seen the Feet of the Statue composed of Iron and Clay, it meant, that there should be a great inequality and disproportion in that last Empire, by reason of the mixture of very differing parts that could not be fitted well together. In fine, that God would raise up a Kingdome of Heaven, signified by that little Stone, that should crush the other Kingdomes, and should remain stable to all Eternity.

The King was so transported with Daniel's discourse, that he rose suddenly from his Throne, and bending with his face to the earth, worshipped him, commanding that Sacrifices and Incense should be offered to him, and publishing highly that his God was the God of gods, and the Lord of kings, to whom alone alone it belonged to reveal Myſteries, ſince he could penetrate into ſuch a ſecret.

Wiſdome was never upon ſo high a Throne, as to ſee the proudeſt of Monarchs at her feet. Yet Daniel well knew how to moderate the tranſports of his ſpirit, and by ſhewing him the nothing of the creature to draw him to the worſhip and honour of the Creatour which was the maſter of Knowledge, and ſource of all pure Light. Theſe are the wonders of the Sovereign Monarch, to conſider, that a young man that came to that Court as a ſlave ſhould find there ſuddenly in the eſteem of his Prince the quality of a God; he was ſhut up continually in his chamber, and his ſpirit walked through the whole Univerſe; he was a Captive, and ſaw Kings paſſe before him as the Dream of a night.

For repreſent to your ſelves with what wiſdome and with what greatneſſe of conceptions he ſaw in one onely Dream that which ſhould extend beyond ſix hundred years, and that which had been doing thirteen or fourteen hundred years before. That Golden Head of the Statue was the chief Monarchy of the World, founded (as 'tis held) by Belus whom Ninus his ſon conſecrated for a God, cauſing a great ſtatue of gold to be erected for him, which had eyes counterfeited of certain precious ſtones that were afterwards called Belus his eyes. This Ninus took to wife a maid that came from nothing, named Semiramis, that gained him by her charms, and reigned after him in a moſt imperious way, till ſuch time as ſhe was aſſaſſinated by her own ſon, when ſhe incited him to a moſt enormous ſin. This ſon that was called Ninias was eſteemed but little, and followed with about two and thirty ſit-ſtill Kings, the laſt of which was Sardanapalus, that was ſpinning out his diſtaffe amongſt the women of his Seraglio, when he was ſurpriſed by a revolt of two of his Captains, and burnt himſelf with all his moſt precious wealth that he might leave to his conquerours nothing elſe but aſhes.

This Monarchy of the Aſſyrians was then divided into two Kingdomes by thoſe two Chiefs that conſpired againſt their Maſter. Arbaces took the Medes, and Beleſus the Chaldeans; out of this Beleſus iſſued thirteen Kings, amongſt which were Nebuchadonozor and Belſhazzer: Arbaces was followed by nine, the laſt of which was Aſtyages.

Theſe two Kingdomes were afterward incorporated into one ſole Monarchy of the Perſians, figured by the Silver, founded by Cyrus, whom God ſeemed to lead by the hand to the conqueſt of Nations, and to give him happineſſe at his diſpoſall, to follow no more any but his ſtandards. His Monarchy reckoned two hundred years, and fourteen Kings, when under Darius, one of the greateſt ſpectacles of the inconſtancy of humane things, it was buried by the Grecians, after five millions of men had been conſumed in three battels.

Alexander founded this third Empire, repreſented by the Braſſe, and did that great maſter-work, by which he ſeemed to have been born onely to ſhew poſterity to what point of greatneſſe a man may arrive by the heighth of his enterpriſes, and the vigour of his arms. The courſe of his Reign ended in twelve years, and ſo many conqueſts were bounded by a glaſſe of poyſon. His Princes ſhared diverſly the Empire, who, after they had dipped their ſwords ſo many times in the bloud of the Barbarians, waſhed them in their own, and tore one another by horrible Civil Wars.

Finally, the Roman Empire was that Iron which brake the Gold, the Silver, and the Copper, and ſwallowed up all the Monarchies to contribute to its greatneſſe. But there was a mixture of Clay and Iron in this; that ſo many ſtranger-Kings (that were effeminated by luxury) were adjoyned to the invincible force of that courageous Nation. This was not well founded; there was need of an eternall Kingdome, which began at the Birth of our Lord, ſeven hundred years after the foundation of the city of Rome, and is exerciſed after a ſpirituall and eminent manner to the end of all Ages.

I have deſired to trace out this in a few lines, to verifie the Interpretation that Daniel gave to Nebuchadonozor's Dream, and the great lights that he communicated to him about the eſtate of the Empires of the earth. The King in this conſideration could not ſatisfie himſelf with admiring of him, and raiſed him unto moſt high degrees of honour, making him as Vice-Roy of all the Provinces of his Kingdome, the chief Magiſtrate, and the Prince of the Council of the Sages. He was conſtrained to accept all this by reaſon of the imperious humour of his Maſter, who in his firſt motions would no way be contraried; but he ſo ordered the buſineſſe, that his cares were divided amongſt his dear companions, to whom he cauſed Offices in the Provinces to be beſtowed, whilſt he was alwayes about the Kings perſon.

But it ſeldome happens that good men are raiſed at Court, but that God makes them know, by ſome revolution or other, the brittleneſſe of all the glory of the world. Scarce had they taſted the firſt-fruits of the honour due to their merit, but the Prince alwayes puffed up with his victories, and pricked with an high eſteem of greatneſſe, without having any remembrance of the Conduct of his Empire that had been repreſented to him in his Dream, cauſes a golden Statue of ſixty cubits high to be erected for himſelf, that ſhould be one of the moſt formidable Coluſſus's that had been ever ſeen. And as it was the cuſtome to make great Ceremonies at the Dedication of theſe teſtimonies of honour that were given to Kings, he ſummoned all the principall men of his whole Kingdome, the Governours, and the Officers of his Crown. One reades not that Daniel had any thing to do with it, be it, that he was abſent upon ſome great employment, or be it that he avoyded that occurrence by a ſhift: But his companions were ſent for thither, becauſe that the great credit that they had by the recommendation of Daniel had already drawn upon them the envy of thoſe of the Countrey, who ſought for nothing but an occaſion to deſtroy them.

They might deliberate among themſelves whether it were not permitted to render an honour purely civil to the Statue of a King, and conclude with reaſon, that ſuch an action tended not to the ſin of Idolatry. They could not be ignorant that the Prophet Eliſha granted leave to Naaman the Syrian to accompany the King his maſter to the Temple of the Idols, and even to bend the knee, not with a deſign to do homage to the falſe God, but with an intention to hold up his Prince whilſt he lean'd upon him, as was his cuſtome. This action ſeemed more bold, becauſe here is mention of a place wherein worſhip was rendred to an imaginary Deity; and although that this Naaman had neither heart nor adoration for it, yet thoſe that ſaw him bow before that Abomination might inferre that he periſhed in his Superſtition; yet for all that the Prophet grants him in this thing all that he deſired. By a juſter title ſeems it, that theſe here ought not to have moved ſo furious a tempeſt againſt their Nation for lack of doing reverence to the Image of a King.

Nevertheleſſe, theſe three young men, after they had conſidered that the King pretended to cauſe himſelf to be adored in that Statue as a God, filled with a ſenſe of their Religion, whiles ſome ſuffered themſelves to go to that adoration, and others fled for fear of torments, presented themselves to the King, and protested loudly that they were the servants of the Living God, and that they should hold it for a great sin to render the honour that is due to him, to an Idol.

The King was suddenly moved with choler, and threatned to cause them to be burnt alive if they obeyed not, and that there was no God either in heaven or upon earth that should be able to deliver them out of his hands. These gallant Princes not being able to endure this blasphemy, answered constantly, that the God which they served was the Sovereign Master of all Kings, that nothing was impossible to his power; that it was most easie for him to draw them out of a danger so evident, but happen what would, they would never be so base and cowardly as to betray their Faith and belie their Religion.

What cannot Resolution do? What cannot Courage do? What cannot true Piety do? And what does not the Spirit of God? That three children that were strangers amidst so many millions of Infidels that environed them as enraged wolves amidst the thundring angers of an inexorable King, the horrible faces of hangmen, whilst the flames of the fornace into which they were suddenly to be thrown flashed over, to the horrour and trembling even of those that were without danger, should stand as three rocks immoveable to all these violent shakings! What menaces did this wicked King employ to make himself to be feared! What sweetnesses and allurements to make himself be beloved! And yet they remain inflexible to rigours, and impregnable to caresses. They are cast into those fiery coals that bore a true representation of hell, to endure the sharpest of pains, and they find there the most sensible of pleasures. The fire forgets it self to be fire; the fornace strows it self with flowers; the gentle breathings of the South-winds temper the ardour of the flames, and that which was the most rigorous of punishments becomes a Throne of honour, upon which these three Champions speak as Oracles, and all the Creatures change themselves into ears to hear them.

The King that was there present, and that had seen them thrown in fast bound and manacled, when he saw them walk all three, assisted with a fourth that was the Angel of God in that great and horrible fornace as in a meadow enamell'd over with flowers, demanded of his Princes whether they were not those same men that were newly thrown into the fire, and whence it could come to passe that that Element should change its nature for them, after it had devoured their executioners. He draws near to the fornace, he calls them by their names, and commands them to come to him, to see if they were not spirits loosed from the body. They come forth, he embraceth them, he is in an extasie for joy, and confesses with a loud voyce, That the God of those Children is the true God; and ordains, that he that shall be so hardy as to blaspheme him should be punished with death, and his house confiscated.

What triumph was ever so glorious as that of the true Religion, that then made visible her grandeurs to the sight of all the Infidels in her Captivity, and when one would have thought her dead, wrote her praises in characters of fire? The Nobles came about these three Princes, considered their habits, the hair of their heads, their flesh, their skin, and found that every thing was intire. Calumny changed her self into adoration, rage into astonishment, and those that were thought lost and reduced to nothing, saw themselves consecrated by their punishments.

This should have converted the King, and all his Nation, to the worship of the true God; and yet (those chains that keep men bound in their Superstition for a long time, and by deep rooted habits being almost indissoluble) every thing remained in the same condition, and this Prince blinded by the prosperity of his arms, carried his ambitions to the highest point to which those of mortall men can mount, whilst it pleased God to chastise him by a very extraordinary change.

A year before that the unhappinesse befell him, he saw in a dream a tree of an immense heighth, that seemed to him to cover all the earth with its branches; the leaves thereof were pleasant; the fruit most savoury; the beasts of the earth fed under it, and lived by the favours they received from it; and upon it the little birds of the air made melodious consorts; whilst on a sudden he saw an Angel descend from heaven, and commanded that the Tree should be cut down, her branches scatter'd, her leaves shaken off, her fruits destroyed, that it should be tumbled down upon the grasse, wet continually with the dew of heaven, bound with a great iron chain, and that there should be left onely some small root to spring up again in time to come, but that it should lie seven years under ground before it should appear.

He was much affrighted at this Dream, and made a second assembly of the Sages of his Kingdome that could not give any sutable Interpretation of it. Daniel was call'd, and the Dream related to him from point to point by the Kings own mouth, from which he immediately discovered much misery for his Master. There is need of a great force of spirit when one is to carry an afflicting Truth to a person that one loves, and of whom one hath received great benefits.

One would have counsell'd Daniel to hold his peace, to dissemble, to elude the true sense by some appearing Interpretation; yet, he knowing that God had sent him to that Court not to vaunt himself in the honour of his offices, and in the abundance of his riches, but have a care of the salvation of his King, and to heal the vanities of his spirit, although that by interpreting this Dream according to the truth, he should bring himself in danger of the ruine of his fortunes. He disguised nothing, but told him, that it were to be wish'd, that the effect of that Dream might fall upon his enemies, but since that unhappinesse threatned him, it would be better to endeavour to divert it, then to invent artifices to suppresse it.

That he was that great Tree that lifted his branches as high as heaven, and covered with his shadow the roundnesse of the earth, that so many millions of men were in shelter under his protection, and breathed by his favour; but forasmuch as he had despised God, and had entred into a great presumption of his sufficiency, without considering that every thing came to him from on high, that he should be separated from the conversation of men, ranked with beasts, that he should eat the grasse of the field as an ox, and should be exposed to the rain, and to all the injuries of the air, living as a beast, till such time as he should know that there is one most high God that rules over the kingdomes of Monarchs, and gives them to whom he pleases; but there being yet a root remaining to that overthrown Tree, that there should be some recovery from that brutall life, and that he should be put again into his Kingdome when he should know the power of the heavenly virtue.

This Daniel was a sprightly Courtier, to tell a King that he should become an ox for the space of seven years; this had been enough to have made him been declared an Impostour, and been banished from the Court. Nevertheless it is a strange thing that Nebuchadonozor makes no reply thereto, but hears patiently the counsel that he gives him, to expiate his sinnes by Alms and by good Works. He was seized with a great great fear of God, with an affright that took from his mouth all manner of reply, to think by what means he might appease the menaces of heaven.

But we must averre that this great King had something in him very wild, and a spirit that had no more subsistence then the clouds and winds. He passed often from one extremity of the passions to the other without lighting upon the middle, and sometimes he appeared humbled to the abysse, and sometimes also clave to the air and clouds; and planted his Throne by extravagant imaginations even above the stars.

This Dream of the Tree kept him in his wits a pretty while, but scarce were twelve moneths expired, but being one day in his Palace, he entred into a mad vanity about the city of Babylon which he said he had builded by the strength of his wit and of his arm, and for the high magnificences of his glory. The word was yet in his mouth, when the anger of God fell upon his head, as a sudden flash of lightning, and he was changed into a beast; not that he lost his humane soul, nor the ordinary figure of his body, but he entred into so violent and so extraordinary a frenzy, that he perswaded himself that he was an ox, and instantly forsook his Palace and his Throne, ran up and down the fields, and fed on grasse with the beasts; and although endeavour was used to cure him by all sorts of remedies, yet experience shewed that this evill was a wound from heaven, for which no case was to be found. He became so mad that they were fain to bind and chain him, and yet he brake his chains and tore his clothes, and exposed himself all naked to the rain, to the winds, and to all the rigours that the seasons brought. His hair increased horribly, and his nails so crooked, that they would make one believe that he was some bird of rapine.

All the Court was in mourning and sadnesse for this so terrible an accident, and although his burnt bloud, and his violent passions had much contributed to his malady, yet so was it, that the blindest saw that there was in it a manifest punishment of God.

Evilmerodach his son took the government of the Empire in quality of Regent, during the indisposition of the King his father; and although he appeared to be much moved at that change, yet there was more shew in it then reality. But in fine, this miserable frantick having passed seven years in a pitifull condition came again to his right senses, and the first thing that he did, was, to lift up his eyes to heaven, to blesse God, to acknowledge that his might was without limits, that his kingdome was an everlasting kingdome, that all men of the habitable earth were but nothing before him, that he disposed of all, as well amongst the heavenly virtues as amongst the creatures of this lower world, that nothing could resist his power without experimenting his Justice.

His good Subjects touched with a great compassion sought him out again, and re-placed him upon his Throne, where he reign'd with a great modesty, and lived in the knowledge of the true God, as so farre, as to work out his own salvation, as S. Augustine assures us, together with other Fathers of the Church. So every thing was restored to him with more splendour and Majesty then before, his accident bringing no diminution to his Authority. This gave incomparable joyes to holy Daniel, who amidst all the Grandeurs of the Court, wished for nothing but the conversion of his Master.

Evilmerodach that had taken some liking to the Regency was not contented at this change, but expressed so much despight at it, that the King his father distrusting him, kept him in prison, which was very bitter unto him, seeing himself descended from the Throne, in a moment, to the condition of a captive.

It is held, that Nebuchadonozor reigned after his re-establishment the space of six or seven years, and that the successour of his Empire was this Evilmerodach his prisoner, who remained a long time in the languor of his captivity. He found in that prison Jehojakim King of the Jews, and (as men in misery have a kind of obligation to love the like) he looked upon him with a good eye, and recreated himself often with him, having no other company at all. The memory of this friendship accompanied him to the Throne, and he caused his companion to be delivered out of prison, using him honourably, and giving him even Offices of importance in his Court. The new King passing from one extremity to another in such a sudden, behaved himself but ill; for it is said that he caused the body of his father to be torn in pieces, for fear he should return again from the gates of death to resume his Sceptre, and that he reigned with much insolence, taking a pride to trample under-foot all that his predecessours had exalted. And therefore, that eclipse that Daniel was in at Court, as it appears from the sacred Text, might have happened at this time, since that the Jews were retir'd, and had little credit in the kingdome.

This holy Prophet seeing himself discharged of the businesses of the Court, and ranged in a solitude, was in his element, and recollected all his thoughts to give to his heart the joyes of God, which good souls find in a retirement. It was then that he entred farther into the commerce of the intelligences, that he was visited by Angels with more favour, that he learn'd the secret of Empires, and saw all the glory of the world at his feet: yet he could not belie his good heart, nor avoid but that the contempt of the true Religion, and the affliction of his poor people that suffered much in this alteration, was very sensible to him.

Evilmerodach was never the happier for leaving the pathes of Piety which his father had trod out for him; for after a short and wicked Reign he was suppressed by his brother-in-law Neriglossor, who having a child by his wife named Belshazzar, the grandchild of the great Nebuchadonozor, put him forward to succed in the Empire. In the mean while the father governed the kingdome in quality of a Regent, and when Belshazzar was of age, he remitted all the power into his hands, which he used moderately during his fathers life; but as soon as he was dead he laid aside his vizard, and grew dissolute in the quantity of excesses and of debauches shamefull to a Prince of his extraction.

The heighth of his fatall pleasures was in the most sumptuous banquet that he made, to which he invited a thousand persons of the best quality in his kingdome, wherein their spirits being poured out into an excessive voluptuousnesse, the King himself being full of wine and impiety, commanded that the magnificent vessels which his grandfather had taken in the Temple of Jerusalem should be brought upon their cupboard; which was readily performed, and he put them into the hands of his wanton Courtiers and immodest women, who mocked at the mysteries of the true Religion. That banqueting-house seem'd nothing now but a repair of Bacchanals, where Gluttony, Love, Sport, Jeasting exercised all their power; and the lascivious devils were unchain'd to induce the ghests to all sort of intemperance, when behold a Prodigy comes that changes the dissolute merriments of that Court into an horrible tragedy.

An hand of a man without the body appeared upon a wall, whose fingers seem'd to move, and to write unknown characters, whereat the King was so affrighted, that all his body trembled, and his countenance appeared laden with pale colours of Death, which spoiled all the sport, and caused a great silence in the banqueting-hall. Immediately recourse was had to the Sages and Diviners of Chaldea to reade and interpret that writing; but they were found alwayes weak in such mysteries as these.

The Queen Mother had a good soul, and retained alwayes some impression of the true Religion, she remembred Daniel that was at that time banished from the Court, and had in esteem his great wisdome and good conversation: and therefore as soon as she had heard of the accident that had happened, and the great trouble of mind the King her son was in, she entred into the hall, and spake to him very advantageously of Daniel, assuring him, that he was a personage that was fill'd with the Deity, and that under the Reign of his Grandfather he had given admirable interpretation of hidden things, which made him be loved of that great King, who fail'd not to declare him the Prince of the Council of the Sages of Chaldea; but that the insolences of Evilmerodach (insufferable to all the world) had driven him from the Court, though not from Babylon, in which yet he was, and that he was the onely man capable to resolve him in so strange a businesse.

The King received this advice with much joy, and commanded instantly that Daniel should be caused to come to him, who was retired in his little solitude. He is sought for, he is found, he is brought to his Majesty, who entertained him very courteously, and asked of him the Interpretation of the words written on the wall, promising him that if he would tell him the truth he would give him the purple robe and the collar of the Order. But Daniel expressed to him that all these presents moved him nothing, and that he aimed at no other honour at the Court then that of his Master, whose will and decrees he would declare. He puts the King in mind of his Grandfather, of the Greatnesse and of the Majesty of his Empire, of the absolute power that he exercised over men, and how his heart being lifted up against God, he was reduced to a brutall life, in which he remained the space of seven years, till such time as his chastisement giving him wisdome had rendred to him his health and Sceptre. After he had prepared the spirit of Belshazzar by a domestick example, he told him with a generous freedome, that that which he had known to happen to the person of that great King was sufficient to humble him, and yet he had exalted himself against the Sovereign Monarch, and had caused with much mirth of heart the consecrated Vessels of his Temple to be profaned, when he caused his Gods of gold and silver to be praised to the reproach of the true God, and that in revenge of so bad an action, that hand which he had seen on the wall was sent from heaven and had written three horrible words, which are, Mene, Tekel, Phares, that is to say, Count, Weigh, Divide; the first signifies that God hath counted the dayes of his reign, and hath put a period to them: the second, that he had been put in the balance of the Sovereign Judge, and that he had not been found weight: the third, that his kingdome should be divided, and given for a prey to the Medes and Persians.

It is a strange thing that Daniel having made so dolefull a prediction, King Belshazzar entred not into wrath against him, but on the contrary, commanded that the purple and collar of gold should be given him, which he had promised to the Interpreter of his vision. But there will be lesse cause to wonder, if we consider that it was a Maxim amongst the Babylonians not to be angry with the Diviners and Astrologers when they foretold any evil to come; no more then with the shadow of a Sun-dial that shews the hour, or the weather-cock that declares the wind. And furthermore, this young Prince hearing his Prophet speak with so much judgement and sanctity, had him in esteem for a man of God, which he ought not to offend, and besides that by entreating him with courtesie, he hoped, that being a friend of the true Gods, he might have as much power to turn away the scourge wherewith he was threatned, as he had understanding to know it, and force of spirit to foretell it.

One might also marvel that Daniel, who at the the beginning testified that he made small account of the riches and greatnesse of the Court, for all that accepted of the purple, of the chain, and of the dignity of the third person in the kingdome, that was presented to him. But we ought to observe, that sometimes it is an infirmity of spirit not to be able to endure honour when it comes by a Divine disposall and a secret of Providence over us. This wise Courtier considered, that being of his own nature so farre from all these things, they came to seek him out in his solitude, and that it was a sign of God that would have it so, not for him, but for the benefit of his Nation, which was much more favourably used in matter of the exercise of their Religion when he was in favour; besides that the virtue and moderation which he made glitter in all his actions, even in his highest prosperities, contrary to the ordinary manner of all those that were then at Court, gave more glory to God, then if he had been perpetually hidden in an obscure life.

It was an indiscretion in Belshazzar to expresse so much astonishment, and to disclose that prediction, by reason that there was a secret conspiracy against him, which was plotted amidst those publike dissolutions, and the conspiratours were the more animated to the execution of that enterprise, when they knew that that Prodigy threatned him. The same night they performed their wicked design, and outrageously murdered him, after he had reigned but nine moneths since his fathers death. The principall men of the Kingdome that were of the conspiracy chose one of their complices named Nabonidus, who is called in Scripture Darius the Mede, who knowing the Prophecy of Daniel, and the freedome with which he had spoken to the King, esteemed him for it, and retain'd him at the Court in the quality which his Predecessour had given him a night before his death. When he saw himself established in favour again, he forgat not God, his heart being alwayes animated with a zeal to his Religion; and when he saw his King inclining to the Superstition of the Countrey, his heart was much grieved at it, and he endeavours to cleanse him from his errours, seeing him to be of a disposition too simple and credulous to the prejudice of the truth.

Amongst these false Deities, Bel was adored with an exquisite and sumptuous worship, in as much as there were offered to him every day out of the Kings house twelve baskets of meal, forty sheep, and six great measures of wine; and it was believed that that Idol did eat up all the offerings. The King that loved Daniel so much as to make him dine sometimes at his own table, desired that he would accommodate himself to the Laws of the Countrey, and that he would expresse some affection to the service of that great Bell that was adored universally by all the Nation. But this wise Courtier answered him freely that he would never worship any but the true living God. Darius replyed, That there was nothing required to be adored but to live; Bel was truly the living God because he did eat and drink well, and cost much to feed him. Daniel smiling answered, that it was a great simplicity to think that that Idol did eat up all that was offered him every day. Whereupon the King was moved with a curiosity to know how all this went, and having caused the ordinary viands to be offered at Bels altar, carefully saw all the doors of the Temple shut, and put Guards before them that no body might enter in. Daniel before he went out thence with the King caused abundance of Ashes to be sown there, hoping by this means to discover the Imposture. The morrow after the King caused the doors to be opened that had remained fast shut with his own seal, and when as he entred in he saw that all the victuals had been taken away, he cryed out that Bel was a great God, and that it must needs be acknowledged that he did eat excellently well, seeing nothing of all those offerings was remaining. But Daniel instantly made him see upon the ashes the steps of those that had entered, whereat he was astonished, and called for all the Priests of that Idol, to whom he shewed their cheat, and pressed them so eagerly that they discovered certain little doors under the Altar through which they entred to the number of threescore and ten, besides women and little children to devour the sacrifice. The King was ashamed at the simplicity of his belief; this shame passed into wrath, and wrath proceeded as far as blood, causing him to put to death all the Impostours.

be

Furthermore, in the same place there was a Dragon which was yet worshiped by that superstitious people, which Daniel, after he had obteined the permission of the King, killed by making a masse compoſed of pitch, of greate and of hair, which he made him swallow, and with it choake himself.

This made a great commotion amongst the people that said that the King was become a Jew, causing his Priests to be murthered, and killing the Dragon, that there was now nothing remaining but to strangle all the sense of the Antient Religion. In such a manner that behold a great tempest is raised against Daniel, which in the opinion of all the world, threatned him with an inevitable death. The Grandees of the realm endeavour to ruine him by all ways, and considering that he was exact and irreprochable in his office, they resolve to ensnare him in matter of Religion. Under colour of gratifying the King they beseech him to make an edict, That whosoever should desire any thing of the Gods or of men for the space of thirty dayes except of the King, should be cast into the Lions-den; which the King granted them, not knowing what their malice plotted against the innocence of his Prophet and Officer of State. He was watched on all sides, and retired himself from the King to diminish the jealousie that men had of him for the favours he received from him.

All his consolation was in Prayer and in those amiable discourses which he had with God; and therefore he was afflicted as much as can be expressed, seeing that the King his Master let himself be perswaded to make an edict so outrageous against the honour of God, as to forbid to pray unto him. Yet this hindered not him from continuing his oraisons, lifting up thrice a day his weeping eyes on that side whereon the Temple of Jerusalem was built, and sighing in the presence of his great Master with the ardours of an heart that evaporated it self all in Love.

The Nobles that were every day at his door failed not to surprise him, and to accuse him that he had transgressed the Edict, which he acknowledged freely. Complaints of it were suddenly made to his Majesty whose heart was wounded for the affection that he bare to Daniel, and he laboured even till the Sun set to save him; nevertheless seeing himself pressed violently by his Edict, and the vehemence which the Nobles used that it should be observed, he abandoned the innocent to their fury against his will. This defiles the conscience of many great men, who are evil-doers of their disposition, and yet for all that commit great evils through the complacency that they give to the violent humours of those that are about them. He had some hope that Daniel would escape, and that the God which he adored would save him, and therefore he made no resistance by arms, but delivered him into their hands to be cast into that horrible den of the Lions that had been kept hungry on purpose that he might be the sooner devoured.

But, O God of wonders, what Prodigies here! The Lions worship their prey; Daniel is visited in that Cave by a Prophet come in an instant from Judea by the Ministry of an Angel that brought him his dinner. The beasts change their Nature, and Nature forces her Laws for the respect of a servant of God. The King that had lain down without his supper, and had not slept all night for the fear that he had for his poor Daniel, runs early in the morning to the Lions-den, which he had caused to be shut up with a great stone put upon the mouth of it, and stampt with his own Seal, and there cryes out with a lamentable voyce asking of Daniel whether he were yet alive; who made him see how the God that he adored had delivered him and preserved him from all evill; Whereat he was so ravished, that he began to look upon him as an heavenly man, caused his accusers to be apprehended, to be exposed to the same Lions who devoured them immediately, and published an Edict in favour of the true Religion. This King reigned seventeen years, till such time as Cyrus by a most particular design of God seized upon the Monarchy and dealt favourably with the faithfull people. Daniel remained always very considerable, having seen five Kings passe away, and was at last honoured even by his enemies themselves for his rare virtues, and for the wonders that God had placed in his person. One may observe in his life abundance of Lineaments that adorn highly the conversation of a true Courtier, as are, his constancy in Religion, his Devotion, the tenderness of his love to God, his Charity towards his neighbour, his modesty, his sparingness to speak of himself, his Moderation in Prosperity, his Strength of spirit in Adversity, his inviolable Firmness never to yield to sin, his exact Faithfulness towards his Master, his Conscience, Science, and Ability in the Administration of his Charges, his Love to his Friends, his Compassion to the Miserable, his affability towards all the World, his patient enduring of the humours of Strangers, his Prudence in his Conduct, and the blessing of God that made all his enterprises prosper.

THE

THE RELIGIOUS MEN.

ELIJAH. ELISHA.

BEhold here an admirable Courtier that was never of the number of those flatterers of the Court that keep Truth in Iron-Chains, and give to vices the colour of virtue. Elijah was a Prophet that included the name of God and of the Sun in his Name, and who all his life-time bare the perfections of them both, as being a true child of Light, of Fire, and a visible image of the invisible beauties. As he was yet hanging at his mothers breast, his father had a vision, by which it seemed to him that his son sucked fire in stead of Milk, and nourished himself with a most pure flame, which without offending him, furnished him with an Aliment as delicious as possible. So was he all his life a Man of Fire, and as it seemed that that King of Elements followed the course of his words and will, so he burnt also in the Interiour with that fire that kindles the heart of Angels.

He was the first of men that set up the Standart of Virginity, that consecrated it upon his body when it was unknown and despised in the World, who made an Angelicall order of the Mount Carmel to which he hath transmitted his spirit through a long and sweet posterity that hath found sources of contemplation which he derived to the world to water the barrenness of the Earth, that hath traced the Originals of all his virtues upon that fair Carmel, upon that sacred solitude that was his first Terrestriall Paradise.

His Speech was Thunder, and his Life Lightning, his Example a School of great Actions, his Zeal a Devouring fire, his Negotiations the affairs of Eternity, His Conversation an Idea of the Contemplative and Civil Life, his Translation a Miracle without peer. I leave to those that have undertaken to write his Life the retail of his Virtues and of his Miracles, staying onely upon his Actions that he did at Court, treating with the Kings Ahab, Jehu, Ahazias, and the wicked Queen Jezabel.

He flourished nine hundred years before the Nativity of our Lord in the Kingdome of Israel, which was then divided both by Religion and by Policy from that of Judah and Jerusalem. Ahab the son of Amri, an ill Crow of an ill Egge, held then the Empire, and being married to a Sidonian the daughter of the King of Sidon which was called Jezabel, an haughty and malicious woman, he was totally governed by her, and to render himself complacent to her humours caused a Temple to be erected to the God Baal, and near that Temple a Grove to be Planted, where were committed all the Abominations ordinary to Idolaters.

Elijah that burned with the Zeal of the honour of God was touched with a most sensible grief by so scandalous an action, and was stireed up by his great Master to destroy that Mystery of Iniquity. Now, he knowing that it was hard to Preach efficaciously the Truth to Spirits froliking it in the middest of the smiling prosperities of the world thought, by the order of the God of the Universe, that it was best to afflict that wicked people by a long famine and great adversities to make them reflect upon themselves, and return to the worship of the true Religion. He swaie then aloud and publickly before Ahab for the punishment of his Idolatry, that there should not be during three years either rain or dew upon the earth, and that the Heavens should become Brasse to chastise that Age of Iron, and that he should not expect that it should be opened during that time, unlesse it were by the words of his mouth.

As soon as he had said this in the presence of witnesses he went away to the Eastern Coast; and hid himself at the Brook of Carith over against Jordan, where God nourished him by Ravens that brought him him orderly every day his portion. In the mean while the drought failed not to raise a great famine on the earth, and chiefly in the Kingdome of Israel, where one could see nothing but people crying with hunger; But the Heavens took in hand to revenge the God of Heaven, and the Clouds, that are as the Breasts of the Earth, had no water for a people that abused the Elements and all the Creatures to the prejudice of the Creatour.

In the mean while, God that spares not alwayes the Lands and Goods of his Servants in a common havock, that they may not amuse themselves on the vain prosperities of the World, permitted that that Brook that furnished the Prophet with water, should grow dry as well as the rest. But as the Ocean which retires it self out of one River, swells it self in another, so this great Nursing-father of Elias that seemed to fail in matter of that little Rivulet, recompensed it by the miraculous liberality of a poor widdow. He forsook not that station that Providence had assigned him, although barren, before he had orders for it from God his Master, who sent him to the Countrey of Sidon to Sarepta, assuring him that he had already provided for his nourishment.

The Prophet arriving at the destined place, found at the City-gate a poor Widow-woman, the mother of a little sonne, and forasmuch as he knew that the Famine was great every where, that he might not astonish her at first, he desired of her onely a glasse of water, which she gave him with a good will, after which, he prayes her to add to it a morsell of bread; but the good woman sware to him that she had but one handfull of Meal left in the great rigour of Famine, and that she was going to gather two or three small sticks, to make a little fire and to bake a Cake, which would be the last that she and her sonne should eat in all their lives, for after that repast they must resolve to dye. Yet for all this Elijah orders her to make him a little Loaf baked under the Ashes, and to think afterward upon her self and sonne, and assure her self that neither her Meal, nor Oyl should diminish any thing till such time as the Famine should be past.

It was a strong proof of the faith of this Sidonian that commanded her to take away the Bread from her self and her sonne to give it to a stranger, and quitting that which she had in her hands to rest upon uncertainties: Yet she obeyed in that great necessity, yielding more to a man that she knew not, for the esteem that she had of his virtue, and the opinion which she had that he was the servant of the great God, then to her own Life. So true it is That the Considerations of Religion and of Religious persons touch even the souls of Pagans and of Infidels. So was she worthily requited, having a little inexhaustible treasure in her house, which was sufficient for her Prophet, for her self and for her child; and this was a particular mercy of the Sovereign power to her, that called her to his knowledge by this miracle, and would not that Elijah should eat alone the bread which he multiplyed by the words of his mouth, but that he should give part of it to the poor, as our Saviour did afterward; God ordaining that good miracles should be never vain, but profitable to the soul and body of men created after the image of God. While he stayed in this house, the sonne of the Dame of it dyed of a burning Feaver, whereof this poor afflicted woman laid the fault upon Elijah, saying that he had renewed the memory of her sinnes before God; and Elijah complained of God for that he had afflicted his Hostesse. But that great Master did all for his own glory, for Elijah having three times contracted himself upon the dead body of the child, breathed into him the spirit of life, and restored him to his mother.

Three years being now passed in the great anguishes of hunger, God commanded Elijah to present himself again to Ahab, and was resolved to send some Rain. When the extremity of the evil was very great, and no inventions could be found to appease the scourge, Ahab a carnall man, instead of having recourse to Prayers and Supplications to ease his subjects, thought on nothing but preserving his Horses and his Mules. He had at his service and at his Court in quality of a superintendent of his House, and of his Levies, a great and good man named Abdias who moderated the furies of that wicked Court, saved the Prophets of God when they were persecuted, and greatly comforted the People. Ahab resolved to go one way, and send him the other, to seeek some herbage to feed his Cattle.

As Abdias was going along his way, he met with Elijah the Prophet, whom the King had caused to be searched after in his own territories, and through all the neighbouring Kingdoms without being ever able to learn any news of him. And therefore he was very much amazed at that accost, and asked him if he were Elijah, whereto he answered, that he was the very same, and that he should go and give Ahab information of his comming. The other making him a low Reverence with his face to the Earth, replyed, wherein have I ever offended you, that you should deliver me into the hands of Ahab with an intention to cause me to be put to death? For it is true that there is no Kingdome nor Nation, whither my Master hath not sent to inquire news of you, without ever getting any light of you; and now if I should go tell the King of your arrivall, and the spirit of God should carry you away (as it doth ordinarily) to transport you into some other part, I should be found a Lyar, and the King would take away my Life. What good would it do you to be the cause of my death, seeing that I have feared God even from mine infancy, and have alwayes honoured his servants so farre as to preserve an hundred Prophets from the horrours of the Persecution, and nourish them secretly at mine own charge in Caves wherein they were hidden? Do not deprive your self now of a servant that is most gained unto you. The Prophet assured him, and sware to him that he would appear before Ahab.

By which I find that this Abdias was very prudent in that he would not rashly carry a news to his Master that should be without effect; because that great ones are easily incensed, when men are so light as to promise them what they ask, and answer not their expectation; besides that if they are frustrated of their desire, they think themselves to be slighted, and are angry even at the times, and elements that do not apply themselves to their humours. When therefore he was assured by the inviolable oath of a Prophet, he went to the King, and told him that he had met with Elijah who was ready to present himself to his Majesty.

This Prince that burned with a passion to see him stayed not till he could come to see him, fearing lest he should steal away again, but went to meet him in person, and having found him, asked him with disdain, whether he was not the man that embroiled all his Kingdome? The Prophet as bold as a Lyon answered him, that he had never embroiled any thing but that the trouble came from his Fathers house, and from him, for that they had forsaken God and followed Baal; and that if he would know by experience the errour wherein he was, that he should make an Assembly on Mount Carmel of all the People of Israel, and summon thither the four hundred and fifty false Prophets that are every day fed at Queen Jezabels Table, and that there ſhould be decided the buſineſſe of Religion.

and

It was an high attempt, on which Elijah had never ſo much as dreamed, had he not had an expreſſe Revelation from God: for one ought not lightly to commit the verity of the faith before the Court and the common people to uncertain diſputes and doubtfull accidents from whence the Pagans and Hereticks may by chance draw ſome advantage. But the Prophet being well aſſured on his ſide; King Ahab expoſed himſelf on His to cauſe a great revolt among his ſubjects, and a manifeſt divorce with his wife. Yet God would have it ſo to diſabuſe him, and to bring him back to the true Religion.

As ſoon as he had then accepted the condition and commanded the aſſembly, there were gathered together an infinite number of people (there being nothing that ſo much tempts curioſity as the affairs of Religion) It was then, that one might ſee the aſſurance and vigour of a true ſervant of God; for he obſerving that the King and people who had not yet choaked all the ſeeds of Truth floated in divers opinions ſpake ſolemnly to them, That it was no longer time to halt ſometimes on one ſide, and ſometimes on the other, and that if Baal were God they ought to follow him, but if there were no other God but that of Iſrael, called upon from all times by their Fathers, it was he to whom they ought to adhere with an inviolable fidelity. To this the aſſembly made no anſwer, there being none that was willing to ſet himſelf forward upon an uncertainty. Then Elijah taking the word again ſaid, Behold four hundred and fifty Prophets of Baal on one ſide, and I a Prophet of the true God all alone on the other part in this place here; To make a tryall of our Religion, let there be two Oxen given us, for each of the two parties, let them be cut in pieces, and the pieces put upon a pile of wood without puting any fire to them either on one ſide or on the other; we will expect it from heaven, and the Sacrifice upon which God ſhall make a flame appear from on high to kindle it, ſhall carry away the teſtimony of the true Religion.

To this all the people anſwered with a confuſed voyce, that it was a good Propoſition. The Victims were brought, ſacrificed, and put upon the wood to be conſumed. The Prieſts of Baal began firſt to invoke the heavenly fire, and to torment themſelves with great cryes, and a long time without any effect. It was already mid-day, and nothing had appeared to their advantage, whereat being very much aſtoniſhed, they drew out their Razors, and make voluntary inciſions upon themſelves according to their cuſtome, thinking that a prayer was never well heard, if it were not accompanied with their blood, which the evil Spirit made them ſhed in abundance to ſatiate his Rage.

This nothing advanced the effect of their Supplications, which gave occaſion to Elijah to mock at the vanity of their Gods, ſaying, that Baal, that gave no anſwer, was aſleep, or buſie, or on a journey, or perhaps drinking at the Tavern. He remained either with ſecurity amidſt ſo many enraged Wolves, covered with the protection of the God of Hoſts, and began to prepare his Sacrifice, taking twelve ſtones in memory of the twelve Tribes of Iſrael, to erect an Altar to the name of God; after which he divided the Offering into divers parts, put them all upon the pile, and that none might have any ſuſpition that there was fire hidden in ſome part of them, he cauſed abundance of buckets of water to be thrown upon the Sacrifice, and all about it, and then began to ſay, Great God, God of Abraham, of Iſaac, and of Iſrael, ſhew now that thou art the God of this people, and that I am thy ſervant. I have obeyed thee in all this reſting my ſelf upon thy word; Hear me, my God, my God hear me, and let this aſſembly learn this day of thee, that thou art the true God, and the abſolute Maſter of all the univerſe, and that it is thou that art able to reduce their hearts to the true belief.

Scarce had he ended his prayer when the Sacred fire fell down from heaven upon his Sacrifice and devoured the Offering and the Altar, to the admiration of all the People; who proſtrating themſelves on the ground began to cry, That the God of Iſrael was the true God. Take then ſayes he, the falſe Prophets of Baal, & let not one ſole man of them eſcape us. The People convinced by the Miracle and the voyce of Elijah, without expecting any other thing, fall upon thoſe falſe Prophets, takes them, and cuts them all in pieces. Ahab amidſt all this ſtood ſo aſtoniſhed that he durſt not ſpeak one onely word, nor any way reſiſt the Divine Command.

The Prophet bad him take his refection, and go into his Coach, for the ſo much deſired rain was near, and having ſaid ſo, retired himſelf to the top of the Mount Carmel, and ſent his ſervant ſeven times to the ſea to ſee whether he could diſcover any clouds; but he ſaw nothing till the ſeaventh time, and then he perceived a little cloud that exceeded not the meaſure of a hand; and yet he ſends him to tell Ahab that it was time to Harneſſe, if he would not be overtaken with the rain. He mounted inſtantly into his Coach to get to the City of Jezrael, and Elijah ran before as if he had wings.

In the mean time the Heavens grew black with darkneſſe, the clouds collect themſelves, the wind blowes and the Rain falls in abundance. Ahab failed not to relate to Jezabel all that had been done, deſiring to make the death of thoſe Prophets paſſe for a decree of heaven, for fear leſt that imperious woman ſhould upbraid him with the ſoftneſſe of his courage. But ſhe not moved with thoſe great miracles of fire and water, that were reported to her, began to foam with wrath, and to ſwear by all her Gods that ſhe would cauſe Elijahs head to be laid at her feet by the morrow that time.

The Prophet is conſtrained to fly ſuddenly to ſave himſelf not knowing to whom to truſt; ſo that having brought with him but one young man to accompany him in the way, he quitted him, and went alone into the wilderneſſe, wherein having travelled a day he entred into a great ſadneſſe, and laid him down under a Juniper-tree to repoſe himſelf, and there felt himſelf very weary of living any longer, and ſaid to God with an amorous heart, My God, it is enough, take mee out of this life, I am not better then my fathers. It is a paſſion ordinary enough to good men to wiſh for death, that they may be no more obliged to ſee ſo many ſinnes and miſeries as are in the World, and to go to the place of reſt to contemplate there the face of the living God. But this deſire ought to be moderated according to the will of God.

As he was in that thought, ſleep, that eaſily ſurpriſes a melancholy ſpirit, and wearied with raving on its pains, ſlipt into his benummed members and gave ſome truce to his torments. But that great God that had his eyes open to the protection of ſo dear a perſon diſpatched to him his guardian Angell, who awaked him, and ſhewed him near his head a cruſe of water and a loaf of bread baked under the aſhes (for ſuch are the banquets that the nurſing Father of all Nature makes his Prophets not loving them for the delights of the body, but contenting himſelf to give them that which is neceſſary to life) he ſaw well that it was a Providence that would yet prolong his life. He drank drank and ate, and at length being very heavy fell asleep again. But the Angel that had undertaken the direction of his way waked him, and told him that it behooved him to rise quickly, by reason that he had yet a long way to go. Elijah obeyed, and being risen found that he had gained a merveilous strength, so that he journied fourty dayes and fourty nights being fortified with that Angelicall bread, till such time as he came to the Mountain Horeb. There he retired himself into the hollow of a Rock, unknown to men, but well known to God that appeared to him and comforted him, asking of him what he made there? Whereto he answered That he was zealous with an ardent zeal for the God of Hosts, but the children of Israel had forsaken him, demolished his Altars, killed his Prophets, and that he alone remained, yet for all that they ceased not to seek his life to extinguish the whole service of God. Upon this God commanded him to come forth, and to stand upon the mountain to see great sights caused by the presence of God. And suddenly there came an impetuous whirlwind that overturned the Mountains and brake the Rocks, but God was not therein; after that impetuous Wind came an Earthquake, but God was not therein; after the Earthquake devouring-Fire, but God was not in those flames; after the Fire, behold there came a small gracious gale, and God was in it. And therefore Elijah ravished with a profound respect covered his face with his Mantle, and kept himself at the entry of his Cave, where he heard a voyce that demanded of him again what he did there? whereto he answered as before, that he fled from the persecution of those that would give him the stroke of death for the zeal which he had to the service of the Living God.

But the voyce commanded him to return, and to take again his way through the desert into Damascus, and gave him order to Anoint and declare two Kings, the one over Syria, which was Hazael, and the other over Israel, which was Jehu that should succeed his Persecutour. Furthermore, God informed him, that all was not lost, but that he had yet reserved to himself seven thousand servants that had not bowed the knee to Baal, nor lifted up their hands to adore his Idol. He added yet farther, that he should take Elisha for his Companion and Successour, of whom he had reason to expect good effects.

Such was Elijahs Vision, and his discourse with God; and it seemed that this Sovereign Teacher of the Prophets, shewing him the representation of an impetuous wind, of an Earthquake, and of Fire, in which God was not, although he was in a little gentle blast, and would signifie to him that His Spirit is not in those great commotions that would seem to overturn all nature, but in a certain Calm that produces little noise, but much fruit filling the earth with blessings. So also would he make him hope, that after these violent persecutions, and those fatall Convulsions of Kingdoms, there should come a sweet and peacefull Messias; and that forasmuch as concerned him, Jezabels persecution should cease, and his soul after the toyles of that banishment should taste the sweetnesse of an anticipated Paradise.

He took then his way again according to the command of God without passing by Samaria, and finding Elisha plowing the ground with twelve yoak of Oxen, cast his Mantle on him, to signifie to him that he was called of God to that sacred ministery of Prophecy, which the other understood, and quitting instantly his Oxen ran to Elijah, whom he beseeched that he would permit him to go and give the kisse of peace to his Father and Mother, after that he would adhere to nothing, but render himself up to him; which Elijah having granted, he, when he had acquitted himself of his duty, returned and sacrificed two Oxen which he boiled with the wood of his Plough, and made a Feast with them for the people; after which he ranged himself under the conduct of the Prophet, and was a perfect imitatour of his virtues.

An ill occasion embarked him again in a Combat against Ahab and Jezabel, which was fatall to them both. The King had a mind to enlarge his Gardens, and Naboths Vineyard was near his Palace, and for his advantage; he calls for him, and asks him very courteously for it, promising to pay him the price that it was worth, or to buy him a better inheritance in whatsoever place he would. The desire was very civill, and not like that of so many other Princes and Lords, that disposed at that time of the goods of their subjects as of their own, usurping by violence that which they could not have by right. Yet this good man, that measured all by the affection he bare his Vineyard and not by the submission he owed his Master, was obstinate, and told him, That it was the wealth of his Fathers, which he would no way part with.

Ahab was much troubled at this denyall, and returning to his Palace threw himself upon his bed, and would not eat at the ordinary hour of his repast. The Queen his wife being surprised at that accident goes to see him, and inquires after the cause of his indisposition, which he declared to her out of a desire he had to receive some ease. This Princesse which was a daughter of the King of Sidon, and who knew how her Father reigned absolutely over his subjects falls a laughing, and meaning to blame the weaknesse of her husband, said to him; It appears plainly, Sir, that you are a Prince of great authority, very worthy to govern a Kingdome, since you receive affronts from your subjects, and revenge them upon your self by the losse of your dinner. But if that be all that hinders you, I pray, arise, be merry and eat, for I know the way to make you possessour of that Vineyard that you desire.

At the same instant that Imperious Queen takes her seal, writes a Letter to the Principall men of Jezreel, and commands them to call an Assembly, under colour of a Fast and Publick Prayers, to call Naboth to it, to make him sit amongst the chief, and not to fail to suborn two witnesses against him, that should depose that he had blasphemed against God and his King, and thereupon indite him, and stone him.

Behold how so many Ministers of Iniquity use the Innocent, not seeing that at the same time as they lay snares against the honour, the goods, and the life of their neighbour, an invisible Hand draws up in Heaven the decree of their ruine. This Letter being come to Jezreel, the principall men assemble themselves, and not seeking any delay or incident to sweeten a bad businesse, betray their conscience to avoid the fury of the King, executing that which was commanded them, and before they are Judges render themselves Criminall. Thus go violent Reigns, where virtue is abandoned by some through wvakneſſe, and persecuted by others through fury. Miserable Naboth astonished at that wicked calumny, protests his innocence in the face of Heaven and Earth, justifies, and defends himself by good reason; but the false Witnesses, which are the instruments of Satan, and the chief furies against the peace of mankind, urge and torment him; His Judges sold to iniquity condemned him; He is led out of the City, delivered to the fury of the people, overwhelmed, as a Blasphemer of God and the King, with a bloody tempest of stones and flints, every hand making it self injurious againſt him, ſome through a falſe zeal, and others through a compliance with the humours of Ahab and Jezabel.

The news of his death comes inſtantly to the Court, and Jezabel carries it to the King, without ſpecifying to him any other thing, telling him onely that Naboth was out of the world, and that he might now enjoy his ſpoils all at leaſure. To ſpeak Truth, Great ones have great cauſe to make to God Davids Prayer, and to beſeech him to deliver them from others ſinnes, and from thoſe that are hidden from them. Unfortunate Ahab knew nothing of all that had paſſed, and takes not the pains to inform himſelf of the manner of that death; He truſted all to his wife, and gave her his ſignet, his authority, his heart and Counſels. It was enough to make him guilty to put the Government of his Kingdome into the hands of that Sidonian woman who, he might well know, had great inclinations to bloud and rapine. Princes do wiſely not to rely too much in every thing upon their Counſellours of State, without watching over their actions, and uſing all diligence to diſcover their deportments without believing any thing lightly either on one ſide or the other.

Ahab without taking any farther information was going to poſſeſſe himſelf of Naboths bloudy ſpoil; when the Prophet Elijah by the command of God came and found him upon the way, and began to roar againſt him as a Lyon, What, ſayes he, Murther the Innocent, and take away his Inheritance bedewed with his bloud? After this what is there more to do? Know, Sir, that the Vengeance of God hangs over your head, and that in the ſame place as the Doggs licked the bloud of Naboth they ſhall lick yours. This unhappy Prince extreamly amazed at ſo thundering a ſpeech was not incenſed againſt the Prophet, but endeavouring to pacifie him, ſaid to him, Wherein have I offended you? and in what have you found me your enemy, that you uſe me with all theſe rigours? You are enough mine enemy, ſayes the Prophet, ſeeing you are Gods; and ſince yee have ſold your ſelfe, through love to an Idolatrous woman, to ſerve her paſſions, and commit ſo many wicked acts in the face of God. In puniſhment of your crimes, He will ruine your Houſe, and blot out your Poſterity; the bloud of that murthered Innocent will coſt Jezabel dear, for ſhe ſhall be eaten up of Doggs in the field of Jezreel.

Poor Ahab returns hanging down his head without paſſing farther, tormented on one ſide by the remorſe of his own Conſcience, and on the other by the love he bare to his Sidonian, whom he would not any way diſpleaſe. He ſaid nothing to her of all that ſhee had done without his privity, in Naboth's buſineſſe, whether through affection, or through fear of her wicked Spirit. He revenges himſelf upon himſelf, he rents his Clothes, he faſts, he covers himſelf with ſackcloth, without putting it off even when he went to bed; which ſoftned the heart of God, who ordained that the Kingdome ſhould not be taken from him during his life, but that his Poſterity ſhould be deprived of it.

Three years were ſlipt away, and Elijah was abſent, when Ahab reſolved to proclaim warre with the King of Syria, to recover Ramoth one of his Cities that the other had uſurped, and engaged Jehoſaphat King of Juda to his party, making a new Alliance of Arms and Intereſts with him. When they were aſſembled, Jehoſaphat which had a zeal to the true Religion, ſaid, That it would be good to conſult with ſome Prophet before they enterpriſed the warre; and Ahab to content him, called for four hundred, but they were the falſe Prophets of his wife, who were none of the beſt, and who foretold him all falſely, that he ſhould have an happy iſſue of his enterpriſe. King Jehoſaphat asked Ahab, whether amongſt that great number of Baals Prophets there were never a Prophet of the true God that one might hear ſpeak, meaning by this to induce him to his duty, and to the knowledge of the true Religion. Ahab replyed that there was none at preſent, but a certain man named Michaiah, but he could not endure him, becauſe he prophecied nothing but miſchief to him. Jehoſaphat ſaid, that he ought not for that to hate him, but that it would be good to hear him, and inſtantly was ſent away a Gentleman of the Court to call him. This man ceaſed not to adviſe him upon the way to remit ſomething of that rigour that was uſuall to him, and to render himſelf complacent to the King as all the other Prophets had done; whereto he anſwered, That he could do nothing againſt the Spirit of God, nor againſt his conſcience. When he was come, he perceived a great aſſembly of falſe Prophets, who all approved that warre. One among them named Zedechiah had made himſelf iron horns, to ſignifie to King Ahab that he ſhould ranſack all Syria with a mighty power, and that nothing ſhould reſiſt his Arms. But Michaiah being asked, ſpake at firſt by fiction, as the other Prophets, foretelling proſperities without end. Whereat the King being aſtoniſhed that he did it againſt his cuſtome, conjured him not to flatter him, and to tell him openly the truth. To which he anſwered, that he would not counſell him to hazard a battell againſt the King of Syria, for if he did, his whole army would be ſcattered; and added alſo, that God had given permiſſion to the wicked ſpirit to deceive him, and that he had found no better way to do it, then to ſpeak by the mouth of ſo many falſe Prophets that encompaſſed him. Whereupon Zedechiah being incenſed at that ſpeech gave him a blow, and the King commanded his Perſon to be ſeized on, and to be put in priſon, to be kept there faſting with bread of tribulation and water of anguiſh till his return. But the Prophet aſſured him, that if he went he ſhould never return again.

It is a ſtrange thing that we cannot believe Truth that comes from the mouth of Gods ſervants, becauſe it complyes not with our paſſion. It is alſo a manifeſt puniſhment to thoſe that deſpiſe it, not to conſider that God begins the ruine of their fortune by the blinding of their Counſels. Ahab obſtinate to his miſerie marches with all his Army againſt the King of Syria; Jehoſaphat engaged through inconſideration in that league purſues what he had ill begun, and thinks that there is no better means to juſtifie an errour, then Perſeverance.

When the two Kings approached the enemy, and the Armies were ranged in Battell, the King of Syria gave expreſſe charge to his moſt reſolute men to aim at the King of Iſrael, and to endeavour to carry him, it being the true means to diſpatch the buſineſſe and put an end to the warre. Ahab began to fear his unhappineſſe, and prayed Jehoſaphat to go into the mingling, putting him forward with courage out of a deſign, perhaps, to cauſe him to be deſtroyed, and to draw all the weight of the Army upon him, by diverting it from his perſon; And indeed, when the Syrians thought that he that engaged himſelf ſo boldly was the moſt interreſſed, and that without doubt there was all likelyhood that it was Ahab, they fell upon him with ardour, ſo that he thought he ſhould have been hemmed in. But when he betook himſelf to crying out aloud, animating his ſouldiers to his defence, the enemies that had a mind to ſpare him retired to fall on Ahab; It happened that an Archer letting fly an arrow at randome ſtroke him with a mortal wound: whereupon he commanded his Coach-man to turn about, and to draw out of the mingling well perceiving that he was grievouſly hurt. All the Army was immediately ſcattered, and the Herald of Arms proclaimed that every man might return to his home. King Ahab dyed the ſame day, and his body was brought back to Samaria, where it happened, that as his Coach that was all bloody was a waſhing in a pool of the ſame City, the Dogs ran thither and licked up his bloud according to Elijahs prophecy.

an

Ahaziah his ſonne ſucceeded him inheriting the ſuperſtition and miſery of his father; for after he had reigned a very little while, he fell out at a window of his houſe, and grievouſly hurt himſelf, without being ever able to find a remedy to his evill. And having forſaken God, ſent meſſengers to the God of Ekron to know if he ſhould recover from that ſickneſſe; but the Prophet Elijah having met his Meſſengers upon the way rebuked them ſharply, for that they went to conſult with Idols, as if there were no God in Iſrael; and commanded them to tell their Maſter, that he ſhould not be cured of his wound, but ſhould dye without ever riſing out of the Bed wherein he lay. This Prince offended at this truth, cauſes the Prophet to be purſued, and ſends one of his Captains with fifty ſouldiers to apprehend him: This man in mockery called him Man of God, and prayed him to deſcend from the mountain whither he had retired himſelf, but Elijah perſiſting alwayes in his ſpirit of rigour, ſaid, that he would give him proofs that ſhould make him know that he was not a Man of God through vanity and irriſion, and at the ſame inſtant he cauſed fire to deſcend from heaven, which conſumed him and all his company. Ahaziah ſends another of them for the ſame purpoſe, which meets alſo with the ſame ſucceſſe. He charges again a third, the Captain of which gained Elijah by ſubmiſſion, and brought him to his Maſter, to whom he ſpake conſtantly the truth, and adverſiſed him of his approaching death; and the other durſt not do him any miſchief, well knowing that he was under Gods protection.

The truth of the Prophecyed was manifeſt ſoon after by the death of Ahaziah, who had for ſucceſſour his brother Joram, who reigned twelve years, and although Elijah was already tranſlated from this life that is but a paſſage to another eſtate, his Prophecy failed not to be accompliſhed particularly upon the houſe of Ahab, and the wicked Jezabel. For Eliſha according to the order of God, and the command received from his Maſter, cauſed Jehu to be crowned to reign in Iſrael. To this purpoſe he diſpatched one of his Diſciples, put a violl in his hand, wherein was the oyl deſtined for his unction, giving him charge to go to Ramoth in Gilead, where Jehu one of Jorams principall Captains commanded, and beſieged the city continuing the ſiege that Joram had laid before it, whiles he went to Samaria, to be dreſſed of ſome wounds that he had received in the warre againſt the Syrians. Aboue all he recommended to him that the buſineſſe ſhould be kept very ſecret, and that when he ſhould be arrived, he ſhould call Jehu aſide, and withdraw into ſome chamber, and there conſecrate him King with that unction that he had in his hand, making him know that God gave him his maſters houſe and crown to revenge the bloud of the Prophets and ſervants of God upon the race of Ahab and on Jezabel.

This ſonne of a Prophet ſent by Eliſha did all that was commanded him, and arriving at the Camp found Jehu environed with other Captains, and ſignified to him that he had a word or two to ſpeak to him, which made him quit the company, and enter into a neighbouring chamber, where the other powred out the ſacred oyle upon his head, ſaid to him. I have anointed you this day over the people of the God of Iſrael, and conſecrated you King to ruine from God the houſe of Ahab your Maſter, and to revenge the bloud of the Prophets and ſervants of God upon Jezabel who ſhall be eaten up of Doggs and no body ſhall give her buriall. As ſoon as he had ſaid this he opens the door and flies; Jehu comes forth, and ſhews himſelf to his Captains, who had a curioſity to know what had paſſed in that treaty, and asked of him what that mad-man meant that came to him. Jehu feigning that they well enough knew the cauſe of it, and need not go about to inform themſelves, held them in expectation, and in fine declared to them that it was one of Eliſha's diſciples that had brought him the news that he ſhould reign in Iſrael, and that ſuch was the will of God.

It is a wonderfull thing that none of the chief men of the Army oppoſed themſelves againſt it, but that all at that very inſtant laid down their Cloaks under Jehu's feet as it were to raiſe him a throne, and cryed out God ſave the King. The conſpiracy againſt Joram being framed, he hinders any notice to be given him, and marches with a ſtrong hand to the City to ſurpriſe him, and Ahaziah King of Judah, together with him, that was come to viſite him in his ſickneſſe. The ſentinell that ſtood at the gate of the City told that he ſaw a body of Cavaliers coming in a right line to the City, whereupon the King ordered that one of his men ſhould go out to diſcover it. This Scout was gained by Jehu, and ranged himſelf on his ſide. Another is ſent out, which does alſo the ſame; whereat the King being much aſtoniſhed takes his Coach, and and Ahaziah his, to ſee what the buſineſſe was. As ſoon as he perceived Jehu, he ſaid, What? are you not a man of peace? Whereto Jehu replyed, What peace, while the fornications and poyſonings of Jezabel your Mother are yet in full vigour? Joram ſaw plainly by his countenance, and by that anſwer, that there was miſchief, and began to wheel about, ſaying to Ahaziah his companion We are betrayed, and ſeeing that he was no way prepared to make reſiſtance to ſuch a power betook himſelf to flight. But Jehu bending his Bow lets fly an Arrow at him that pierced him through and killed him in his Chariot. At the ſame inſtant he cauſed his body to be taken up to caſt it on the road, in the field of Naboth, and purſued Ahaziah who having received a mortall wound as he fled gave up the Ghoſt at Megiddo, from whence he was carried to his Metropolis Jeruſalem to be interred with his Fathers.

In the mean while Jehu marches victoriouſly to the City of Jezreel, and the miſerable Jezabel hearing of the death of her ſonne by the conſpiracy of his enemy, and conſidering that there was no way to oppoſe him by arms had recourſe to the charmes of her ſelf ſex. She was yet in ſuch a condition as ſhe thought her capable to enamour that new King. Inſtead of putting on mourning, ſhe decks and paints her ſelf, and places her ſelf in a window of the City in ſight of all the world to ſee that Conquerour paſſe by. But he having caſt his eyes on high, asked who that woman was, not being able yet well to diſcern her ſo farre off, and when anſwer was made him that it was Jezabel the Queen, he commanded thoſe that were in the window to throw her down, which they did without any farther deliberation, and the miſerable in falling bedewed the wall with her bloud, and expired the remainder of her life under the feet of horſes. Jehu remembred as he was at ſupper what had paſſed, and was touched with ſome remorſe for the uſage that had been ſhewed to Jezabel his Mistresse, and said to his men, Look out the body of that wretched woman, and give it buriall, for she was a Kings daughter. And when they were come upon the place they found nothing but her head, with the ends of her feet and hands, the Doggs having eat up the rest. This history is hortible, and none can sufficiently imagine the vengeance of God upon those that violate Religion, and shed the bloud of sacred persons and other of Gods servants.

One cannot justifie Jehu for the bebellion against his Master, but in taking him for a scourge of the wrath of God who was an instrument of his Justice without for all that becomming just. For whatsoever pretence he made of Religion, he was pushed on by a tempestuous and bloudy ambition, and made himself a Revenger of Tyrants for no other end, but to be their successour, filling with crimes the place that he had voided by fury. He made use of the Prophets for his own interest, and left not to continue the Idolatry of the golden Calves, to render himself pleasing to the most powerfull. He was an ambiguous spirit, and had as many waters and folds, as he had pretensions. He caused his Mistresse to be killed more for the fear of his mind then for the zeal of Religion. This poor Sidonian that was a woman of a good understanding and courage, instead of living quietly with her husband, was pricked on with a vanity to make her Gods be worshipped, and ceased not to persecute the Prophets, having sworn that she would cause Elijah to be murthered, making him to be followed and sought after in all places without being able to entrap him. But on the contrary he ruined her with all her house, leaving a terrour to all great ones to enterprise any thing against those that are protected under the covert of the face of God.

As this Prophet had been a man of Prodigies in all his Life, so God limited his conversation amongst men with a strange miracle that since Enoch had not been practised in the world. It is said that an egg well emptied and filled with dew will mount on high, and follow the raies of the Sun that draws it. So Elijah by a long exercise of contemplation was purified from all earthly things, and filled with the unction of the Spirit of God. He thought on nothing but on Heaven, where he had lodged the better part of himself. God had revealed to him that he should not dye after the manner of other men, but that he should be rapt and carried away into a place of peace and rest. He expected that most happy day, and thought to steal away even from his own disciple Elisha that would never quit him. They were walking both together after they had passed the river Jordan on dry foot, Elijah having divided it with his Mantle, when behold a burning Chariot drawn with Horses of fire comes to take up the Prophet. Elisha his disciple had earnestly begged of him, that his Spirit might be multiplyed in him, as well in what touches Prophecy as the gift of Miracles, and Elijah promised him that it should be granted to him, in case that he could see him when he should be taken up. And this is the reason for which that dear Disciple never went out of his sight so much as one moment, and when that Chariot surrounded with innocent flames presented it self, he saw his Master ascend who was on a sudden snatched up above the clouds of heaven in recompence of his zeal and most pure Virginity. Elisha looked upon him with tears in his eyes calling him his Father, the Chariot of Israel, and the Conductour of the people of God. In fine, when he appeared no longer, he rent his clothes wearing mourning for a losse common to all the people of Israel, but very particular to him; and gathered up his Mantle as a precious Relique which he carefully kept, making use of it to divide the waters of Jordan, and to renew the miracles of his Master.

Elijah according to the common opinion was transported to the Terrestriall Paradise from which he is to come at the Renovation of the world. And as if in that dwelling of delights he had not yet cast away the care and direction of the Court; Joram King of Judah received a Letter from him nine years after his Translation, in which he chid sharply for his bad deportments, and foretold him the sickness that should happen to him. Some hold that that Letter was written by Elijah before he was taken up by way of Prophecy, and kept till that time by Elisha. Others as the Hebrews think that it came by Miracle and by the Ministery of an Angell, directed by Elijah at the same time, to teach us, That the Saints renounce not a Legitimate care of the Court, and of the Affairs of the World, when they are to be directed to the glory of God, to whom the Living and the Dead ought to render the Homages of their Fidelity.

ELISHA.

ELISHA.

HE that hath ſeen Elijah cannot be ignorant of Eliſha, ſeeing his maſter made him heir of his Spirit (as it were) by a wonderfull tranſpiration. That man of fire engraved his character upon the perſon that he loved moſt in all the world, with ſo perfect an expreſſion, that he ſeemed to be born again in him in every thing that he had of excellency.

He went to take a new life in a terreſtriall paradiſe without loſing that which he had in the world. He lived in the one by himſelf, and in the other by Eliſha; in the one he performed contemplative Functions, and in the other, active; in the one he was a Demi-god, and in the other the Prince of men. That Mantle of Elijah was more then an heaven beſpangled with its Starres, ſince it carried ſo many Lights and Sciences. It dryed up the waters of Jordan, but it opened at the ſame time ſprings of Wiſdome. It was an Oracle (more admirable then the gift of the high Prieſt) that ſpake without a voyce, and taught without a ſchool, that could change in a moment Ignorants into Doctours, and Peaſants into Prophets.

Eliſha was taken from the plough, and after he had till'd the earth, he manured his own ſpirit. He that commanded a little field, exerciſed his Empire over great kingdomes; he made and unmade Kings, as the true ſervant of Elijah, or rather as the Interpreter of God. Happy are the lands (ſaid one) that were heretofore tilled by the hands of Triumphers, and with a Plough crowned with Lawrels; but more happy thoſe of Eliſha, that experimented that ſame arm as was to divide the waters and crown Kings.

O what a great thing is Nothing in the hands of God! ſince that a man come from the plough does miracles in Nature, and prodigies in Empires. His wonders have in ſome ſort exceeded thoſe of his maſter, for he reſembled the ſhoots of the vine that raiſe themſelves even above the tree that have ſerved them for a prop. We let paſſe all that he did amongſt the people, to conſider him treating with the Kings and Princes of the earth where we ſhall ſee how he brought the Maxims of heaven.

The firſt encounttre that happened to him at Court, was with three Kings, Jehoſhaphat King of Juda, Joram King of Iſrael, and the King of Idumea. Joram had taken arms againſt the King of Moab, that refuſed to pay him a certain tribute, and had drawn to his party thoſe two other Kings that went to aid him in perſon. Now as they paſſed through the deſerts of Idumea, they were in extreme want of water, ſo that the men and beaſts were ready to periſh; which put Joram in an unſpeakable grief, ſeeing that he had aſſembled thoſe two Kings with their armies, to make them die with thirſt. Jehoſhaphat, that was more pious then he, counſels him to have recourſe to God by the interceſſion of ſome Prophet. One of his Courtiers ſuggeſts Eliſha to him, who was near the place. The three Kings go to ſeek him in a company, to implore his aid.

But as ſoon as the Prophet ſaw Joram the ſon of Ahab, who was an Idolater, as his father had been, he ſaid to him with an incomparable conſtancy, What have we to do together? Go, and conſult with the Prophets of your father, and of your mother Jezabel; thoſe that are the ſervants of God are not for you. This was to expreſſe contempt enough to a King; and yet it is the faſhion of men at Court not to be repulſed at firſt by the diſdains and anger of a man with whom they have buſineſſe. This man purſues and tells him, that it was a piteous ſpectacle to ſee three Kings periſh for thirſt, and ready to be delivered into the hands of the Moabites. Eliſha remaining in the ſame opinion, replyed, were it not for the reſpect I bear Jehoſhaphat, who is a worſhipper of the true God, I would not ſo much as look you in the face.

Which diſcovers clearly, that alliances with Infidels, although for certain neceſſities they may be ſomewhat tollerable, ceaſe not for all that to be alwayes much to be feared. Eliſha would not for that time addreſſe himſelf to Jehoſhaphat and diſunite him from that enterpriſe, imitating the prudence of thoſe that let a buſineſſe begun run on, when it may any way be defended; but yet he ſufficiently expreſſed, that that company did not pleaſe him: and when Jehoſhaphat was returned to his houſe from the warre that he had maintained with Ahab againſt the King of the Syrians, the Prophet chid him for it, and told him, that he deſerved the wrath of God for having given aid to an impious King; but that he had had a regard to other good works done by him, and was not willing to deſtroy him So Eliſha could not endure to ſee that company with him, and was ſo farre tranſported with a fervency of zeal, that he was fain to call for a muſician to ſing ſome ſong, and by his harmonies appeaſe the ardours and commotions of his ſpirit, to ſet it again in a perfect calmneſſe. After this, he felt the powerfull effects of the hand of God, and in a deſperate drought commanded to make channels and pits, and promiſed water in abundance, with a compleat victory over the Moabites. And this Propheey was verified the morrow after, when ſtreams were ſeen gliding in all places, to the comfort and admiration of all the world.

The Moabites having diſcovered the deſign of theſe three Kings that came out againſt them, put themſelves into the field, and when they perceived upon the break of day a river that was all red by the reflexion of the rayes of the Sun that ſhined upon it, they imagined that their enemies had mutually ſlain each other, that that river was red with their bloud, and that there was no more to do but to run after their ſpoils. But they were extremely amazed when they ſaw themſelves combated furiouſly by thoſe that they had put in the number of the dead. The King retired into his capitall city, which was immediately beſieged, and preſſed with violence. He eſſayed to make a ſally and ſurpriſe the Idumeans, but had no good ſucceſſe. And therefore he had recourſe to an horrible attempt, and made a pitifull tragedy; for he killed his onely ſon, the heir apparent of his kingdome, and offered him in ſacrifice to his falſe Gods, cauſing his head to be cut off as a victim, upon the ramparts, in the view of all the world. The devil had perſwaded thoſe miſerable Pagans that the ſacrificing of humane bloud was ſovereign to appeaſe the wrath of the Gods; which made this deſperate King ſlay his own ſon to preſerve his Crown and State by a remedy worſe then the diſeaſe.

This mad man ſaw not that Kingdomes cemented with the bloud of innocents cannot be of long continuance in the hands of thoſe that poſſeſſe them by ſuch inhumane wayes; and that ſacrificing his own ſon to buy a Peace, he made himſelf an interiour warre in his own ſoul, and raiſed againſt himſelf a thouſand furies, with as many ſnakes and torches to ſtirre up bloudy remories the reſt of his whole life. The beſiegers had ſuch an indignation at an act ſo barbarous, that they left the ſiege through horrour, being unwilling any more to preſſe him that for the fear of evil had deſcended (in their opinions) to the laſt of evils. This warre had good ſucceſſe, and the preſence of a faithfull King brought a bleſſing to the Infidels; whereas at other times the faithfull ones have periſhed by their alliance with the Infidels: as it happen'd to Ahaziah, King of Juda, who was at laſt killed by Jehu for having too much embraced the friendſhip of thoſe that were not of his Religion.

Now although the Prophet Eliſha had an heart pierced with grief to ſee Joram ſeparated from the true God, yet he left not to ſuffer him as long as Providence would have it ſo, to ſerve him like a good ſubject, and to give him advice very neceſſary for the preſervation of his State. He declared to him the counſels and the enterpriſes of the King of Syria his enemy, which he knew by the ſpirit of Prophecy, ſo that the other was amazed to hear that the moſt ſecret buſineſſes which he had treated in his cabinet with his moſt intimate confidents were diſcovered. He thought that his Counſellours of State ſold him to the King of Iſrael, but one aſſured him that that came from the Prophet Eliſha who knew things to come by the Spirit of God, which was in him in a wonderfull manner.

This Prince inflamed with choler, diſpatches immediately Souldiers (in a great number) to apprehend Eliſha, who failed not to beſet the little city of Dothan whither the Prophet was retired. The Prophets ſervant being riſen at break of day, to go abroad, perceived thoſe companies of men of arms, and ran to his maſter much affrighted, crying out, That all was loſt, and that the city was environned with chariots and with horſes that came to take him. But Eliſha filled with the confidence that he had in God his great Maſter, made him anſwer, That there was nothing to be feared, and that his party was much the ſtronger; which ſeemed very hard to be believed by a man whom fear had ſo much ſhaken, till ſuch time as his Maſter taking away the fillet of ignorance that was upon his eyes, diſcovered to him a mountain full of chariots and of horſes that entowred Eliſha, and watched for his protection.

Thus it pleaſes God ſometimes to draw his ſervants out of the hands of perſecutours by extraordinary wonders. At other times he permitts darkneſſe to exerciſe its power upon the light, and the impious to take and perſecute the juſt, to render them glorious by their ſufferings. He would not admit on the day of his Paſſion the twelve legions that he might have obtained of his heavenly Father for his defenſe, that he might not deprive our Chriſtianity of the example of his dolours; and yet he raiſes up armies of fire to defend Eliſha, with intention to make us ſee that he is able to hinder us from receiving any harm, but that it is the greater glory to conquer it by Patience.

The Prophet ſeeing the heavenly legions that ſtood to aid him, would not for all that thunder ſtrike thoſe that came to take him, but contented himſelf to blind them for a time, that he might have given them light for ever, if they would have preferred it before darkneſſe. Thoſe poor men ſeeing themſelves ſtruck with ſuch a ſudden blindneſſe were extremely aſtoniſhed, yet (as malice quits not ſo ſoon her venome) they ſought for the ſervant of God, blind-folded, darkned as well in mind as body, when he preſented himſelf to them, and told them that he would ſhew them the man they ſought for if they would follow him, which being agreed to, he led them ſtraight into Samaria, the capitall city of their enemies, and at the inſtant reſtored to them their eyes, to give them the knowledge of the danger wherein they were.

They thought that there was nothing now remaining to them but to be cut in pieces, and indeed, Joram the King of Iſrael would have cauſed them to be maſſacred, had not Eliſha forbid him to touch them, becauſe that he had not got them by the point of the ſword, but were come by miracle into his hands. Furthermore, he ordered that ſomething ſhould be given them to eat, which was done, and after they had taken their refection, they were ſent back the ſtraight way into their Countrey. Behold a courteſie worthy of the New Teſtament and of the Evangelicall Law! Eliſha would not that his miracles ſhould be miſchievous; he contented himſelf to overcome thoſe by Benefits that he might hurt by Juſtice, to ſhew, that there is nothing ſo victorious as a great heart that can make viſible, that it is the higheſt point of power and goodneſſe, to pardon that by grace and mercy that might be revenged by reaſon.

Some time after, Benhadad King of Syria came to lay ſiege to the city of Samaria, where the King was ſhut in, and preſſed ſo vigorouſly the beſieged by famine, that an aſſe's head was ſold for fourſcore livers, and a little barrel of pigeons dung for five franks. It was an extreme rage, and a furious deſpair that expected nothing but the heighth of evils for its remedy.

It happen'd that King Joram paſſed through the ſtreet, that he put on ſackcloth under his clothes, when a poor woman all beblubber'd with tears came to him, and requeſted of him life and ſafety; but the poor King not knowing what to do for her, ſaid onely to her, That he was not God to give her bread: ſhe then deſired Juſtice of him in a controverſie which ſhe had with a wicked woman. The King was content to hear her, and thereupon ſhe told him, that ſhe had made an agreement with that woman to eat together two little ſons whereof they were mothers, on ſuch conditions that hers ſhould be eaten firſt, and that the morrow following, her neighbours ſhould be ſerv'd up to the table alſo; and that in the purſuance of this, her little ſon had been maſſacred and devoured by his own mother and the complice of her crime: but that now there was a queſtion of proceeding to eat the ſon of her camrade, ſhe had hid him, and refuſed to give him, and that thereupon ſhe beſeeched his Majeſty to do her Juſtice. Joram was ſo affrighted at the propoſition of that woman that he rent his clothes, and put himſelf in mourning.

But inſtead of humbling himſelf, he ſware that the head of Eliſha ſhould not ſtay a day longer upon his ſhoulders, vexing againſt him, that he being ſo powerfull, ſuffered ſuch a famine of his people without helping it. He was like thoſe Mexicans that make their King ſwear that the Sunne ſhall give the Day, and the Clouds their Rain, and the Earth its Fruits; and in caſe that this fails, lay the blame on him and murder him. He imagined that the Prophet had barrenneſſe and fruitfulneſſe in his hands, as his maſter Elijah, and that he ought to ſacrifice him for the Publick. This ſpeech coſt Joram dear, who was afterward diſpoſſeſſed of his kingdome; and the Prophet doubting of his attempt, ſaid to thoſe that were about him, That the ſon of the murderer Ahab had given command to cut off his head, that he that was to give the ſtroke was upon the way, and that they ſhould keep the door faſt ſhut: where we ſee, that the ſame Prophet that had before fiery legions at his command, is on terms to defend himſelf after a faſhion weak enough to reſiſt reſiſt the forces of a King. But it is to teach us, that God gives not alwayes to the Saints the power of Miracles, no more then the ſpirit of Prophecy, and that that failing, they ought to make uſe of the lights of their ordinary prudence.

It may be inferr'd from the ſacred Text, that Joram changed his mind, and came himſelf to find Eliſha, not as a perſecutour, but in quality of a ſuppliant, advertiſing him of the extreme rage of the famine by the accident that had newly happen'd to thoſe miſerable women. Then Eliſha inſpir'd, promiſed aloud, that in that very time that ſeem'd ſo calamitous, a buſhel of meal ſhould be ſold but for twenty ſous at the gate of Samaria, and that for the ſame price one ſhould have two of barley. Whereto one of the Nobles of the Court, on whom the King leaned, replyed, That that would be very hard to be believed, though it ſhould pleaſe God to open windows in heaven to make it rain corn. But Eliſha anſwered, that he ſhould ſee that miracle before his eyes, but ſhould not enjoy its good effects.

The morrow after it happen'd, that four lepers that had withdrawn themſelves near to the gate of Samaria, preſſed with hunger and with miſery, of which they could find no eaſe, neither within nor without the city, were reſolv'd to go into the camp of the enemy, to find there either bread or death. As they approached their trenches, they perceiv'd that all was empty; which made them venture to enter in their tents, where they found abundance of booty and began to pillage. Yet they had ſome remorſe of conſcience to think ſo ardently upon their own profit, without carrying that good news to the city, and ran inſtantly to the porters of Samaria, to cauſe the King to be advertiſed of that happineſſe. He was ſo out of hope, that this made him enter into diſtruſt, leſt it ſhould be a plot of the enemies, out of a deſign to make them come forth and ſo ſurpriſe them. A reſolution was made, that ſome Cavaliers ſhould be ſent forth to diſcover what had paſſed, and of the five horſes that were left in the city, the reſt being conſumed by the famine, two are diſpatched, who confirm the news brought by the former meſſengers, and aſſure that the Syrians had raiſed the ſiege in diſorder, forſaking their victuall, their ammunitions, and all their riches. The God of hoſts that holds in his hand the iſſues of battels and of ſieges, had operated therein, raiſing a fervour in them that made them believe, that the King of Egypt and the King of the Hittites were coming to fall upon them with huge armies to cut them in pieces, whereat they were ſo affrighted that they quitted all that they had moſt precious to ſave their lives.

This hunger-ſtarv'd people that had been ſo long ſhut up within the walls of a deſolate city goes out in throngs, and runs on all ſides to the prey that the hand of heaven had prepared for them. The abundance was ſo great, that the Prophecy of Eliſha was verified, and that great Lord that had contraried it by deriſion was trod to death by the people at the gate of the city; ſo dangerous it is to diſtruſt the power of God, and to oppoſe his Prophets.

Eliſha had another paſſage with Naaman, in which he expreſſed a great generoſity. This Naaman was a Syrian by Nation, and Lord high Conſtable of the King of Syria. His condition had filled him with honours and with riches, but his conſtitution had burdened him with a ſhamefull leproſie that deprived him of all the ſweetneſſes of his life. God that often makes the renown of great perſonages fly upon the tongue of ſimple people where it is leſſe ſophiſticated, permitted that a little girle (a ſlave) that had come from Judea, that was at that time in Naaman's wife's ſervice, ſhould ſpeak a thouſand good words of the miracles of Eliſha to her miſtreſſe; and aſſured her, that he would eaſily be able to reſtore health to her maſter, and to cure him of his leproſie.

This came to the King of Syria's ears, who very much priſed his Conſtable by reaſon of the great and faithfull ſervices that he had done him. And, as thoſe that deſire cure neglect no advices, he ſends Naaman to the King of Iſrael with many preſents, requeſting him to heal him by the means of his Prophet. The King was greatly amazed at theſe letters, and imagined that that crafty Syrian meaned to pick a quarrel with him to invade his kingdome, entreating him as a Deity, as if he had been the authour of life and death. His apprehenſion was ſo great, that he rent his clothes and put himſelf in mourning, as in the danger of near diſaſtre.

But Eliſha comforted him, made him know that there was a moſt mighty God in Iſrael that wrought by his Prophets, and bad him not to fail to ſend the ſick man to him, which he did, and Naaman was immediately at Eliſha's door, with a great train of chariots and horſes. But the Prophet having a mind to ſhew at that time that he was not moved with the vanity of all the retinue of great perſonages would not ſo much as ſee him, but ſent him word that he ſhould go and waſh himſelf ſeven times in Jordan, and then he ſhould recover his health. This Lord was vext at ſo dry a proceeding, and went away diſcontented, ſaying, That if there were no other myſtery in it, his own countrey wanted not ſprings and rivers; ſo ordinary it is for men to ſlight remedies that ſeem too eaſie, and for the imagination to look to be entreated with pomp.

Yet his ſervants told him, that the experiencing of that counſel would not coſt him much, and would annoy him nothing, and that in any caſe he ſhould make triall of it, which he did, and carried away a perfect cure; whereat he was ſo raviſhed, that he betook himſelf ſuddenly to Eliſha's houſe to give him thanks, confeſſing that there was no other God in the world but that of Iſrael, in ſuch a manner, as that he gained the health of his ſoul by that of his body, and quitted at the ſame time his leproſie and his infidelity.

He urged the Prophet to accept abundance of rich preſents, wherewith he came well laden, but he conſtantly refuſed them, which is no ſmall proof of virtue and of greatneſſe of courage. For covetouſneſſe is like the ſhadow that hinders the light of the ſun, extinguiſhes its heat, and nouriſhes ſerpents; ſo ſhe doth eclipſe the brightneſſes of the ſpirit of the Prophets, deads the love of the Devout, and gives nouriſhment to the Paſſions. Men antiently were try'd by the river of Rhine, but now they are experimented by the golden ſtreams of Pactolus. Thoſe that render Piety mercinary, have none at all; the ſpirit in them follows the fleſh, aad heaven gives way to earth. All the importunities of Naaman could not ſhake Eliſha; he was a baſilisk that could not be enchaunted by the charms of avarice; he had eyes of proof againſt the gliſtering of the gold of Syria; when he would have no money, the other begged of him a little earth, as much onely as would load two mules, to build an Altar to the true God with holy ground, and not profaned by Idolatry; expreſſing by this requeſt, that he deſired to worſhip the true God in ſpirit and in truth, though he received not Circumciſion, nor the other Ceremonies of the Jews. He aded to his former ſuit the permiſſion to accompany his maſter to the Temple of the Idols through a pure civility, without rendring any inward adoration to the Gods of Syria, which the Prophet granted him, and ſent him away in peace, all full of bleſſing.

But

But Gehazi Eliſha's ſervant was like to ſpoil all by a wicked cozenage; for he ran after Naaman, who ſeeing him come alighted out of his chariot and received him with much honour, asking what he deſired of him. The other feigned, that two children of the Prophets were come to ſee his maſter, and that he deſired to gratifie them with a talent of ſilver, and to give to each of them a change of raiment. Naaman thought himſelf obliged by this requeſt, and inſtead of one talent gave him two, with two handſome ſuits of clothes, cauſing all of it to be carried by two of his ſervants, by reaſon that a talent of ſilver was a good load for one man. Gehazi thought that he had ſucceeded bravely in his cheat, but when he preſented himſelf to his maſter, he told him, that he had been preſent in ſpirit at all that had paſſed, and that he was not ignorant, that he had at preſent ſilver from Naaman enough to become a great Lord, and to buy lands and ſervants; but for puniſhment of his crime, the leproſie of Naaman ſhould ſtay on him, and ſhould paſſe as an inheritance to all his race: and at that inſtant he was ſtricken with the leproſie, and retired himſelf, leaving an horrible example to all thoſe that betray their conſcience to ſatiate their covetouſneſſe.

It happens that theſe bad ſervants extremely black the reputation of their maſters that have not alwayes their eyes on their ſhouldiers, as Eliſha had, to ſee that which paſſes behind them; but when they imagine that they live very innocently, and that they diſcharge their conſciences in their charges, one may find that a crafty wife, or a corrupted Committee ſell them by a thouſand practices, and devour the marrow and the bloud of men under the favour of their name. Sigiſmond the Emperour made one of his officers named Pithon, that had betrayed his affairs through covetouſneſſe of money, drink up a glaſſe of melted gold. 'Twas but a bad potion, but ſutable for the chaſtiſement of an overflowing avarice that hath no longer eyes for heaven, having already given all her heart to the earth. It is credible that Naaman was advertiſed of the untruſtineſſe of Gehazi, and that this nothing blemiſhed the high reputation of Eliſha, that was ſpread through all Syria.

After the cure of this Naaman, Benhadad, that was his Maſter and his King, fell into a mortall ſickneſſe, and when he had learnt that the Prophet Eliſha was come as farre as his city of Damaſcus, he diſpatched Hazael, one of the prime men of his Kingdome with fourty camels laden with great riches, to conſult with him about the hope that he might have of his recovery, and to deſire his help. The Prophet was not like Hyppocrates that would cure none but Greeks, and refuſed to go into Perſia, though he was invited thither by letters, and by the offers of that great and magnificent King Artaxerxes. But quite contrary, the man of God thought that one ought not to limit the gifts of heaven, and that he that opens the treaſures of nature to all the Nations of the earth, would not have one detain the marks of his power without communicating them to thoſe that bear in any faſhion his Image.

He cleanſed the leproſie of Naaman, but yet for all that cured not Benhadad, becauſe it was a decree of Providence that he ſhould die of that ſickneſſe. The Scripture tells us not expreſly what became of thoſe great preſents, but it leaves us to think that Eliſha refuſed them as he had done thoſe of Naaman, and did nothing that belyed his generoſity. Although one may alſo believe that he accepted them, as well to diminiſh the levies of the enemies of his people, as to ſpread them amongſt the poor of his own countrey. He ſpake onely to this Hazael the Kings Embaſſadours a very ſhort ſpeech, which was, that he ſhould die of that ſickneſſe, and ſhould never riſe out of his bed again; and yet in appearance he commands him to tell him, that he ſhould eſcape it, and recover again his health.

Which cauſes here a queſtion to ariſe (thorny enough) touching the permiſſion of a lie, and which hath made Caſſian and other antient Divines ſay that there are ſome profitable lies which one ought to make uſe of, as one uſes ſerpents to make treacle. But this opinion is no way followed, but is found condemned by S. Auguſtine, and the moſt renowned Doctours. So that when Eliſha ſaid to Prince Hazael touching his King, He ſhall die, but tell him he ſhall eſcape: we ought to take it as a command that authorizes a lie, but as a prophecy of that which ſhould be done. For the Prophet foreſaw theſe two things with one and the ſame ſight, both that Benhadad ſhould die, and that Hazael, to flatter him, ſhould promiſe him health and life. And therefore he addes, Tell him that he ſhall eſcape; which in a Prophets terms is as much as a future, and means, that although I declare to you his death, yet I know you well, and am certain, that according to your politick Maxims you will not fail to promiſe him a cure. It is juſt as God commaaded the evil ſpirit to lie and to deceive Ahab, foretelling what he would do, and not commanding that which ought not to be done according to the laws of a good conſcience.

As Eliſha was foretelling of that Kings death, he felt an extaſie of ſpirit, and changed countenance notably, and began to weep, whereat Hazael was much aſtoniſhed, and had a curioſity to know the reaſon of a change ſo ſudden. But the Prophet continuing in the trans-ports of his ſpirit, ſaid unto him, I weep and I ſigh bitterly, for I know the evils that thou wilt make my poor people one day ſuffer. Thou wilt burn down the fair cities; thou wilt make the young men paſſe by the edge of the ſword; thou wilt daſh out the brains of the little infants; thou wilt inhumanely rip up women great with child; thou wilt ſack my dear countrey, for which I now pour out my tears by way of advance. The Embaſſadour was amazed at a diſcourſe ſo ſtrange, and ſaid, Why? What am I ſhould do all theſe outrages? God forbid that I ſhould ever ever proceed ſo farre; I have in all this no more belief then hath my dog.

But Eliſha inſiſting, told him, I know by divine Revelation that thou ſhalt be King of Syria, and that which I ſay ſhall come to paſſe under thy Reign. Behold a ſtrange Prophecy, and ſome body may wonder that Eliſha did not cauſe that wicked man to be ſtrangled that was to make all thoſe tragedies; for how many mothers are there that would have choaked their own children at their breaſt, if they had foreſeen that after they had ſucked their milk they would one day aſſume the ſpirit of an hangmand, to tyrannize over mankind! Yet Eliſha rejects not that Hazael, but conſecrates him King by his ſpeech, becauſe that he knew that it was a diſpoſition of God who would make uſe of him as of the rod of his fury, to chaſtiſe the Idolatries of his Kings, and the ſins of his People.

All men of God have this property, to ſubmit themſelves exceedingly to Gods will, although it ſeems to will and permit things ſtrangely lamentable. In concluſion, as Predictions are very tickliſh and flatter the intention of thoſe that promiſe themſelves Empires and wonders; they animate alſo the heart of thoſe that have wicked undertakings; and one ought never to permit any one to take conſultations with Aſtrologers and Southſayers about the the life and fortune of great men. This Embassadour returning to the Court deceived his King, giving him all hopes of a life, and when he doubted least of death, strangled him with a wet napkin, paying himself with a Kingdome for a recompence of his wickednesse. And although it was a disposition of God that Benhadad should be deprived of his Sceptre, yet it failed not to be a crime in Hazael.

The last rancounter that Elisha had at Court was with King Joash, who went to see him a little before his death; and this Prince foreseeing that he would quickly depart out of this world, said to him weeping that he was the Father, the Chariot, and the Conductour of his Kingdome, and of all his People: expressing, that he was afflicted with the regret of his losse above all the things of the world. But Elisha to comfort him, made him take his bow and arrows, and put his hand upon the Kings hand as to guide it; after that, he commanded the window to be set open towards Syria, and caused the King to let flie an arrow which he accompanied with Propheticall words, saying, That it was the arrow of salvation, whose feathers God himself did guide, and that it was a messenger that prophesied to him, that he should combate and destroy the Syrians, enemies of his people.

After that, he bad Joash again strike the ground with the point of a dart that he had in his hand, which he did three times; and the Prophet told him that he should carry away as many victories over the King of Syria; but if he had stricken till seven times he should have ruined him even to the utmost consummation.

A little while after Elisha dyed, with an high reputation of sanctity, and an extreme regret of all the orders of the kingdome, and was interred in a place where he raised afterward a dead man by the touching of his bones; God rendring every thing wonderfull in him, even to his very ashes.

It appears by all this discourse, that this personage had not a Piety idle and fearfull, amorous of its own small preservation, without caring for the publick good; but he had an heart filled with generous flames for the protection of his people, and an incomparable security to shew to Princes the estate of their conscience. He supported all the Realm by his prayers, by his exhortations, by his heroick actions: and the losse of one such man was the overthrow of the prime Pillar of the State.

ISAIAH. JEREMIAH.

THE Prophet Isaiah hath engraved his ſpirit in his Book, and cannot be commended more advantageouſly then by his works. He that would make him great Elogies after ſo ſublime a Prophecy would ſeem to intend to ſhew the Sun with a torch. The things that are moſt excellent make themſelves known by themſelves, as God and the Light; and I may ſay, all the words that this divine Perſonage hath left us, are as many characters of his Immortality.

It is with a very juſt title that we put him amongſt the holy Courtiers, for he was born at the Court of Judea, and ſome hold that he was the nephew of King Amaſiah. This birth ſo elevated, and ſo many fair hopes which might flatter him to make him follow the courſe of the great ambitions of the world, did no way ſhake the force of his ſpirit. It was a ſoul conſecrated to things Divine, that ſacrificed the firſt fires of his youth by the moſt pure flames of Angels. Never did Prophet enter into that Miniſtery with more authority and diſpoſition of heaven.

He had a ſublime viſion, in which he ſaw the Majeſty of God ſeated upon a Throne of Glory environ'd with Seraphims, that were tranſported through the admiration of his greatneſſe. God in perſon created him his Prophet; the Seraphim, a meſſenger of the ſovereign power, purified his lips with a Carbuncle, from whence proceeded a celeſtiall fire, that if he had got any pollutions at the Court, where tongues are ſo free, they might be taken away by that ſacred touch. He offered himſelf to God with an heart full of chearfulneſſe, to carry his word before Kings and Subjects, without fearing their menaces or their furies. And he acquitted himſelf all his life time worthily of that duty, and propheſied more then fourſcore and ten years, not ceaſing to exhort, to counſel, to rebuke, to inſtruct, to comfort, and to perform all the exerciſes of his charge.

His Eloquence is as elevated as his birth; he ſpeaks every where like a King, with a ſpeech firm, lofty, and thundering, that paſſes all the inventions of man. When he threatens and fore-tells the calamities of Nations, it is ſo much lightning kindled by the breath of Seraphims that proceeds out of this Divine mouth that pierces the rocks, that ſhakes the mountains, that cruſhes the higheſt cedars into duſt, the nations into fear, and the Kings into reſpect.

When he comforts, they are rivers of milk and honey that flow from his tongue, and ſpread themſelves with incomparable ſweetneſſes into afflicted hearts. When he deſcribes the perfections and the reign of the Meſſias, they are the amorous extaſies of a ſpirit melted by the heats of Jeſus that ſtrikes, burns, and penetrates him more then ſeven hundred years before his Birth.

The holineſſe of his Life marched alwayes hand in hand with his Doctrine; He was a man, dead to all worldly things, that lived but by the raptures of his deified ſpirit. He loved ſingularly the poor, and comforted them in all their neceſſities. He ſpake to Kings and reproved their ſins with an heroick conſtancy worthy of his Bloud and Miniſtery.

At the ſame time, as Romulus began the Court of Rome, Iſaiah ſaw that of Judea, where he experimented great changes and ſtrange diverſities according to the revolutions of humane things. He paſſed his youth under his uncle Amaſiah who was at firſt a Prince good enough, and very obedient to the voyce of the Prophets; for when he had enterpriſed a mighty warre with the Idumeans, he raiſed two armies, one of his own people, and the other of the unbelieving Iſraelites which he had invited to his aid; but when the Prophet told him that he did not well to make uſe of the Arms of Iſrael that was impious and ſeparated from the true God; he diſcharged them freely, although he had already paid an hundred thouſand men, and contenting himſelf with his own troops, gave them battel, which he gained with great advantages.

But it is a ſtrange thing, that by taking the Idumeans, he took alſo their Gods to worſhip them in Jeruſalem, ſalem, and made himſelf an arm of hay with the prop of theſe imaginary Deities that had in nothing profited their adorers. A man of God that propheſied in thoſe times rebuked him ſharply for it; but he demanded who made him the Kings Counſellour, and threatned to ſlay him, if he did not learn to hold his peace. The other, without being afraid, denounced againſt him that he ſhould come to ſome ill end, and left him by flying from the Court. After which, this miſerable Prince fell into a reprobate ſenſe, was taken in war by his enemy the King of Iſrael; his capitall city was laid waſte, the Temple and his palace pillaged; there was no more that remained to him but a ſhamefull and miſerable life which his own ſubjects tare from him by a wicked conſpiracy.

Uzziah his ſon and Iſaiah's couſin-german was ſet on his fathers Throne at ſixteen years of age, and reigned a very long time with a reign peaceable enough. He built ſome cities, and fortified others, ſet in order an Arcenall ſtored with good arms, enterpriſed wars againſt the Philiſtims, which he ended happily enough. He defeated alſo the Ammonites and the Arabians, which made incurſions upon his territories, and renowned himſelf by famous victories. He embraced alſo willingly his reſt in ſeaſon, and addicted himſelf in the time of peace to husbandry.

The converſation of his dear couſin that began to propheſie the ſeventeenth year of his Reign, contributed many good effects to his government. But as he ſaw himſelf enjoy a long Reign, with abundance of favours from heaven, he became very abſolute in his will, and would joyn the high-Prieſt-hood to the Royalty. For he took the cenſer, entred into the Temple, preſented himſelf at the Altar of Perfumes, to burn Incenſe after the manner of the Prieſts, and although the high Prieſt Azarias oppoſed him ſtoutly, he deſiſted not from that attempt, till ſuch time as by a manifeſt puniſhment from heaven he found himſelf on a ſudden touched with a leproſie, which appeared on his face, and rendred him hideous, and out of knowledge, which made the Prieſts, (animated by the judgement of God that had intervened thereon) chaſe him from the Temple; and he was conſtrained to retire himſelf unto an houſe out of Jeruſalem, having left the adminiſtration of his Kingdome to his ſon.

This change was very ſenſible to the Prophet that had loved him tenderly, and ſupported the intereſts of his houſe; but on the other ſide, it was a comfort to him to ſee that he had a ſenſe of his fault, and had reduced himſelf voluntarily unto the obſcurity of that life for the chaſtiſement of his ſin.

His example ought to ſerve for a terrour to the Secular Powers that will encroach upon the Miniſtery of the Prieſts, and break the barriers that Providence hath eſtabliſhed for the differencing of the Spirituall and Temporal Authority. There is need ſometimes but of a little tongue of Earth to ſeparate two ſeas, and to keep them in good intelligence, but if one ſhould go and cut it off, they would mix themſelves and make a great deluge. So may we ſay, that the wiſdome of God hath put certain bounds between the Prieſts and the Kings, which keep the affairs of the Church and of the State in a good temper; but when certain young Abirams interpoſe themſelves to confound theſe Powers, they overflow the banks, and make waſtes prejudiciall to mankind.

After the death of Uzziah, Jotham who was already fitted for buſineſſe, took the government with title of a King, and making a ſtrong reflexion upon the deportments of his grandfather and of his father, extracted from thence a moſt excellent leſſon, ruling his ſubjects with great moderation ſo that the Prophet Iſaiah had nothing to do with him.

But he left an abominable ſon named Ahaz, that quitted the God of his fathers, renewed the Idolatries of the moſt corrupted of his Predeceſſours, took the falſe Religion of the Kings of Iſrael, cauſed ſtatues to be planted on the mountains and on the hills, offered Incenſe to them, made his children paſſe through the fire, and conſecrated them to Idols; which drew the wrath of heaven upon him and upon his people which was beaten with a thouſand ſcourges and moſt great calamities.

The Prophet Iſaiah ſaw all theſe ſtorms falling down upon the miſerable Judea, and ceaſed not to forewarn them, and to arm himſelf with a mouth of fire againſt the diſorders of that wicked Prince; but it was without much effect, he being ſo much corrupted.

Who would ever have thought that of ſo bad a father ſhould have been born ſo excellent a ſon as Hezekiah, who was inſtructed by Iſaiah, and followed totally the courſe of his will and counſels ſo Divine, ſo wholeſome; and wiped out the blot that his father had imprinted upon the Altars of the living God, and made the true Religion flouriſh again, which ſeemed altogether extinguiſhed in the confuſions of an abandoned age! He brake down all the Idols that that unhappy Ahaz had erected. He diſſipated the profane Groves planted on the mountains for the exerciſe of his abominations. He did not pardon ſo much as the brazen Serpent that Moſes had cauſed to be ſet up to a good end, although the Idolaters had afterwards abuſed it.

He commanded that the Temple ſhould be purified and cleanſed by the Levits, together with the Tabernacle and ſacred Veſſels, polluted by his predeceſſour. He renewed the order of the Sacrifices, and the Quoires of Singers dedicated to the praiſes of God; he rallied all the faithfull people to celebrate the Paſſeover and the other ſolemne Feaſts amongſt the Jews. This Reign was a golden Age, and a true ſchool of Wiſdome, when the Prophet and the King conſpired with a wonderfull accord in the ſervice of their great Maſter. Iſaiah ceaſed not to produce ſound thoughts; and that which was wholeſomely thought on by that holy man, was ſtoutly executed by the courageous piety of this good King. He laboured in all things for the honour of him on whom do depend all Crowns, and God alſo laboured powerfully for him, doing more buſineſſe in one night then the arms of iron and ſteel could have done in ten years.

Every one knows how Sennacherib the King of the Aſſyrians came to lay ſiege before Jeruſalem with a prodigious army, againſt which there was no humane reſiſtance. He ſent a certain man named Rabſhakeh in an Embaſſage to King Hezekiah, who vomited out blaſphemies, and propoſed to him conditions ſhamefull to his reputation, and impoſſible to all his powers. All the people were in an affright, expecting nothing but fire and ſword. The King covered with ſackcloth implores the heavenly aſſiſtance, and ſends the chief Counſellours of his State to the Prophet Iſaiah, to turn away this ſcourge by his prayers. The holy man, in that confuſion of affairs wherein one could not ſee one onely ſpark of light, encourages him, animates him, and promiſes him unexpected effects of the mercy of God. The Prophecy was not vain, for in one onely night the Angel of God killed an hundred fourſcore and five thouſand men in the Army of the Aſſyrians by a ſtroke from heaven and a devouring fire, which reduced them to duſt in their guilded arms. This proud King was conſtrained to make an ignominious retreat, and being returned to Niniveh the capitall city of his Empire, he was ſlain by his own children. This is a manifeſt example of the amiable protection of God over the Holy Court, who defended his dear Hezekiah by the interceſſion of the Prophet as the apple of his eyes.

He expreſſed yet another ſingular favour to him in a great ſickneſſe, cauſed by a malignant ulcer, of which (according to the courſe of nature) he ſhould have died: and therefore Iſaiah went to ſee him, and without flattering him, brought him word of his laſt day, exhorting him to put the affairs of his State in order. This good King had a tender affection to life, and being aſtoniſhed at that news, prayed God fervently with a great profuſion of tears, that he would have regard to the ſincerity of his heart, and to the good ſervices that he had done him in his Temple, and not to tear away his life by a violent death in the middle of its courſe. The heart of the everlaſting Father melted at the tears of that Prince, and he advertiſed Iſaiah, who was not yet gone out of the Palace, to retread his ſteps, and carry him the news of his recovery.

He told him from God that he ſhould riſe again from that ſickneſſe, and within three dayes ſhould go up to the Temple ro render his Thanks-giving. Further, he promiſed him that his dayes ſhould be augmented fifteen years, and that he ſhould ſee himſelf totally delivered from the fury of the Aſſyrians, to ſerve the living God in a perfect tranquility. The King was raviſhed at this happy news, and deſired ſome ſign of the Divine will to make him believe an happineſſe ſo unhoped for. Iſaiah for this purpoſe did a miracle, which ſince Joſhua had not been ſeen nor heard, which was to make the Sun turn back, ſo that the ſhadow of the Diall which was in the palace, appeared ten degrees retired, to the admiration and raviſhment of all the world. And to ſhew that the Prophet was not ignorant of Phyſick, he cauſed a Cataplaſme compoſed of a lump of figs to be applyed to the wound of the ſick man, whereby he was healed, and in three dayes rendred to the Temple.

This miracle was not unknown to the Babylonians, who perceived the immenſe length of the day in which it was done, and their Prince having heard the news of it, ſent Embaſſadours to King Hezekiah to congratulate his health, and to offer him great preſents; whereat this Monarch, that was of an eaſie nature, ſuffered himſelf to be a little too much tranſported with joy, and out of a little kind of vanity made a ſhew of his treaſures and of his great riches to thoſe ſtrangers; which ſerved much to kindle their covetouſneſſe. And therefore the Prophet, who was never ſparing of his remonſtrances to the King, rebuked him for that action, and fore-told him that he made Infidels ſee the great wealth that God had given him, through a vain glory which would coſt him dear, and that having been ſpectatours of his treaſures they had a mind to be the maſters of them, and that at length they ſhould compaſſe their deſign, but that it ſhould not be in his time. This Prince received the correction with patience, and took courage, hearing that the hail ſhould not fall upon his head, paſſing over his to his childrens.

Manaſſes his ſon ſucceeded him, a Prince truly abominable, who wiped out all the marks of the piety of his father, and placed Idols even in the very Temple of the living God. All that Idolatry had ſhown in ſacriledges, cruelty in murders, impudence in all ſort of wickedneſſes, was renewed by the perfidiouſneſſe of this man abandoned of God. Poor Iſaiah that had governed the father with ſo much authority had no credit with the ſon; this tygre was incenſed at the harmonious conſorts of the divine Wiſdomes that ſpake by his mouth, and could no more endure the truth then ſerpents the odour of the vine.

Yet he deſiſted not to reprehend him, and to advertiſe him of the puniſhments that God prepared for his crimes; whereat this barbarous man was ſo much moved and kindled with fury, that he commanded that this holy old man that had paſſed the hundreth year, ſhould be ſawn alive by an horrible and extraordinary puniſhment.

O Manaſſes! cruell Manaſſes, the moſt infamous of tyrants, and the moſt bloudy of hang-men! this was the onely crime that the furies themſelves even the moſt enraged ſhould never have permitted to thy ſalvageneſſe. This venerable Maſter of ſo many Kings, this King of Prophets, this prime Intelligence of the State, this Seraphim, this inſtrument of the God of Hoſts, to be uſed ſo barbarouſly at the Court by his own bloud, after ſo many good counſels, ſo many glorious labours, ſo many Oracles pronounced, ſo many Divine actions ſo worthily accompliſhed! All the Militia of heaven wept over this companion of the Angels, and the earth cauſed fountains to leap up to bedew her lips in the midſt of her ardent pains. His Wiſdome hath rendred him admirable to the Learned; his Life inimitable to the moſt Perfect; his Zeal adorable to the moſt Courageous; his Age venerable to Nature; and his Death deplorable to all Ages.

JEREMIAH.

BEhold the moſt afflicted of Holy Courtiers, a Prophet weeping, a Man of ſorrows, an heart alwayes bleeding, and eyes that are never dry. He haunted not great men but to ſee great evils, and was not found at Court but to ſing its Funerals, and to ſet it up a tomb.

Yet was he a very great and moſt holy perſon that had been ſanctified in his mothers womb: that began to prophecy at the age of fifteen years; a ſpirit ſeparated from the vanities and the pretenſions of the world, that was intire to God, that lived by the pureſt flames of his holy love, and quenched his thirſt with his tears. He drank the mud of bad times, and found himſelf in a piteous Government in which there was little to gain, and much to ſuffer.

After that the cruell Manaſſes King of Judea had been ſpoiled of the Sceptre, and led priſoner into Babylon, chained as a ſalvage beaſt, he was ſenſibly touched with his affliction, and made a ſevere repentance, being caſt with his irons into a deep pit, where he converted himſelf to God, with bitter ſorrows and roarings of heart that made him obtein a pardon of his ſins, even ſo far as to reſtore him his Liberty and his Crown. He behaved himſelf exceeding well the reſt of his dayes, deſtroying that which he had made, and repairing that which he had deſtroyed. But he left behind him a wicked ſon, who having imitated him in his vices, followed him not in his repentance. It was the impious Amon, who was nevertheleſſe the father of the holy King Joſiah, who began to reign at eight years old, and was governed by the good and ſalutary precepts of the Prophet Jeremy who took him into a ſingular affection.

This good Prince conſecrated the firſt fruits of his government by the extirpation of Idolatry, which he deteſted alwayes by words, and combated by an indefatigable zeal. He never took any repoſe till he had cauſed the Idols in Jeruſalem and in the neighbouring places to be beat down, plucking up all thoſe abominations even by the root. He had ſworn ſo capitall an enmity with impiety, that he perſecuted the authours of it even to the grave which the condition of our mortality ſeems to have made as the laſt ſanctuary of naturall liberty, yet he cauſed the bones of thoſe that had heretofore ſacrificed to Idols to be burnt upon the ſame Altars as had been prophaned by them. After that he commanded that the Temple ſhould be purged, and that the order of the ſacrifices and of the praiſes of God ſhould be there carefully obſerved.

The reading of a good book found in the Temple had ſo powerfully wrought upon him that he aſſembled his people, and cauſed it to be read in preſence of all the world, with fear and trembling at the threatnings conteined therein againſt the impious. Then he conjured all the company there preſent to renew in the ſight of God the oath of fidelity, and to promiſe him never to depart from his Laws and his commandments, which was performed. There was a re-birth of a quite other world under the reign of this wiſe Prince that rejoyced the heart of the Prophet Jeremy; but he taſted a little honey, to drink afterward a cup of wormwood.

Joſiah was now come to the flower of his age and of his brave actions, having reigned more then thirty years in a mervellous policie and great tranquility, when Pharaoh Necho King of Egypt making war againſt the Aſſyrians would paſſe through Judea, which gave ſome fear to this good Prince as well for the oppreſſion of his ſubjects that were menaced by the paſſage of a great army, as not to give cauſe of diſcontentment to the King of Aſſyria, and therefore he beſtirrs himſelf to reſiſt him and to oppoſe his paſſage.

It is the miſery of little Princes to be engaged in the differences of greater ones, as between the Anvill and the Hammer; they cannot favour the Party of the one but they muſt render themſelves the ſworn enemies of the other, and Neutrality renders them ſuſpected to both. It is a difficult paſſage, where whatſoever Induſtry one brings to it, one often leaves behind the beſt feathers of his wings. Joſiah without advertiſing the King of Aſſyria that the Party would not be maintainable if he ſent not a powerfull Ayd, arms ſuddenly againſt a mightier then himſelf. Necho ſends to him his Embaſſadours to tell him that he meant no harm to his Perſon or to his State; that his deſign was againſt another King whom he went to combate by the orders of Heaven; that God was with him, and that if he endeavoured to ſtop his paſſage evil would betide him for it. Notwithſtanding theſe preſſing ſpeeches Joſiah goes out to meet him, and as he was come to coping with his adverſary, at the very beginning of the mingling he was wounded mortally with an arrow, and commanded his Coachman to draw him out of the combate, which he did, and as he was put in his ſecond charriot which followed his charriot of war after the faſhion of Kings, he gave up the ghoſt without finding any remedy to divert the ſharpneſſe of that fatall ſtroke. His body was brought back to Jeruſalem all bloudy, and the mournings for his death were ſo ſenſible and ſo piercing that it ſeemed as if there had been an univerſall ſacking of the whole City.

Never Prince was ſo beloved, never any more paſſionately lamented, nor is there to be found any one among all the Kings of Judea that had leſſe vices, and more zeal for the honour of God; his life was without ſpot, his reputation without reproach, and to ſay truth, his goodneſſe was as it were the breath that all the world did breathe. Poor Jeremy was ſo caſt down at a death ſo ſuddain, that he loſt all his joyes, and begun then, according to S. Jerome, to make thoſe ſad lamentations that have engraved his grief on the memory of all men.

To queſtion why ſo good a King after ſo many actions of Piety was killed by the hand of an Infidell, as an old ſuit that humane curioſity hath commenced againſt providence from the begining of the world; Some (ſaid Plinie) thrive by their wickedneſſe, and others are tormented even by their own Sacrifices: But who are we to think to draw the curtain of the Sanctuary before the time, and to know the reaſons of all that God does, and permits in the world? For one virtuous Prince that is afflicted in the accidents of humane things, we ſhall find alwayes ten wicked ones that have ended miſerably; and yet we ceaſe not to quarrell with the ordination of heaven. By what contract is God to make his ſervants alwayes winne at play and war? Muſt he do perpetually miracles to make himſelf be thought what he is? What wrong did he do Joſiah if, after a reign of one and thirty years, conducted with great ſucceſſes, and an univerſall approbation, he dy'd in the bed of valour defending his countrey and rendring proofs of the greatneſſe of his courage? What injury was it to have given him the honour to carry the hearts of all his ſubjects to his grave, and to ſpread the glory of his name through all ages, and all the living? After that we have ſeen in hiſtories 100 Tyrants dye, almoſt all in a row, of hideous and bloudy deaths; we come again to King Manasses, who after he had shed so much bloud passed out of this life by a death peaceable enough; we return to Herod, and Tiberius, and to Mahomet, who died in their beds, as if they had been great Saints of fortune canonized by their happinesse.

of

Alas, what is the life of these and of their like! to be stabb'd every moment in the heart, and in the publick opinion; to be cursed of a million of mouths every hour of the day; to remain shut up in the enclosure of a palace walls, as old owls, and to have no other pleasure but to make fire and bloud rain upon the heads of men! What contentment to wax pale at every flash of lightning; to tremble at every assault of the least disease; to prepare poisons and haltars for every change of fortune; to live for nothing but to make men die; and to die for nothing but to make the devils a spectacle of their pains! Is this it that deserves the name of felicity, and the admiration of the world?

After that Josiah had drawn tears from the eyes of all the Kingdome, the people honouring his memory, set his son Jehoahaz upon the Throne, who reigned but three moneths, because that Nechoh puft up with his victory, that would not suffer them to think of making a King without his consent, came and fell upon Jerusalem, and carried him away prisoner into Egypt where he died of displeasure and bad usage. He took his brother Eliakim or Jehoiakim to put him in his place, and to make him reign under his authority. But Nebuchadonozor who esteemed himself the God of Kings could not endure that the Egyptian should intermeddle with giving Crowns, came to besiege Jerusalem with great forces, and having won it, carried away the miserable Jehoiakim captive into Babylon with the flower of the city, and the sacred vessels of the Temple when he reckoned yet but the third year of his reign.

It was a pitifull thing to see this infortunate King in chains after a dignity so short and so unhappy; but this so lamentable a change moved his adversary to compassion, who released him upon condition of a great annuall tribute. He discharged it for the space of three years by constraint, his heart and inclinations leaning alwayes towards Egypt, and never ceasing tacitely to contrive new plots. Besides, he so forlook the service of God, and abandon'd himself to the impiety of the Idolaters, that the admonitions and menaces of the Prophet Jeremy that had foretold him of a most tragicall issue had no power upon his spirit.

And therefore Nebuchadonozor returned the eleventh year of the reign of this unhappy King, and having conquered him again, caused him to be assassinated, and his body to be cast on the dunghill for a punishment of his rebellion. He permitted his son Jehoiachin, otherwise Jechonias to succeed him; but scarce had this disastrous Prince reigned three moneths before this terrible Conquerour transported him, with his mother, his wives, and servants, and made him feel in Babylon the rigours of Captivity after he had robbed him of all his treasures, and drawn out of Jerusalem ten thousand prisoners of the principall men of all Judea; so that this deplorable Realm was then between Egypt and Babylon as a straw between two impetuous winds incessantly tossed hither and thither without finding any place of consistence.

Nebuchadonozor made a King after his own fancy, and chose Zedekiah the uncle of Jehoiachin who was at last the most miserable of all the rest. Here it it that Jeremy received a good share of the sufferings of his dear countrey, and found himself intangled in very thorny businesses, in which he gave most excellent counsels that were little followed, so resolute were the King and Nobles to their own calamity. He had been very much troubled under the Reign of Jehoiakim: for as he was prophecying one day aloud of the ruine of the city of Jerusalem, and the entire desolation of the Temple, the Priests seized upon his person, and caused the people to mutiny against him out of a design to make him be torn in pieces. But it chanced by good hap that some Lords of the Court ran to appease that tumult, before whom Jeremy justified himself, and protested that it was the Spirit of God that moved to fore-tell those sad disastres, for the correction of the sins of Jerusalem, and that the onely means to shelter themselves from the wrath of heaven, was seriously to embrace repentance; and told them that it was in their hands to do him Justice, and that if they used him otherwise, they would shed innocent bloud that would rebound against them and the whole city. These Courtiers judged that there was nothing in him worthy of death, and delivered him from the hands of those wicked Priests that were ready to assassinate him; there being no persecution in the world like to that which comes from sacred persons when they abuse their dignity to the execution of their revenge.

After this shaking, command is given him again to hold his peace, and to remain shut up in a certain place without preaching or speaking in publick: which was the cause that he dictated from his mouth his thoughts and conceptions to Baruch his Secretary commanding him to read them in a full assembly of the people, which he did, without sparing the great and principall men to whom he communicated them, so that this passed even to the ears of King Jehojakim, who would needs see the book, and when he had read three or four pages of it, he cut it with a penknife, and cast it into the fire, commanding that Jeremy and his Secretary Baruch should be apprehended. But God made them escape, ordaining that that deplorable King that had despised his Word and the admonitions of his Prophet should fall into that gulf of miseries that had been fore-told him.

The same abominations ceased not under the Reign of Zedekiah, and Jeremy resumed also new forces to fight against them, and to publish the desolations that should suddenly bury that miserable Nation; then Pashur one of the principall and of the most violent Priests caused the Prophet to be brought before him to reprehend him, for that he ceased not to fore-tell evils, and to torment all the world by his predictions. Whereupon he entred into so great a wrath against the innocent, that without having any regard to the decency of his dignity, he stroke him, and not content with that, caused him to be clapt in prison, and chains to be put upon him.

This Divine personage seeing himself reduced to that captivity for having brought the Word of God, and being left (as it were) to himself to do and suffer according to nature and humane passions, was seized with a great melancholy, and made complaints to God which parted not but from the abundance of love that he bare to him.

Ha! what! (said he) my God, have you then deceived me? And who doubts but that you are stronger then I? Who am I to resist you? You have made me carry your word, and to speak boldly your adorable truths to Kings and Peoples, and for this I am handled as an Imposture, and as the dreg of nature, and the reproach of the world. Behold what I have gained by serving you with so much obedience and fidelity. Often have I said by my self, I will obey the Magistrates, I will hold my peace, and remember no more the thoughts that God reveals to me, nor ſpeak any more in his name: but then I felt a fire boiling in my heart that was ſhut up in the marrow of my bones, and I fell into a ſwoon, and could not endure the violence of my thoughts without unloading my ſelf by the tongue, and publiſhing that which you inſpired into me. And for this, behold me reduced to irons. And have I not good cauſe to ſay that which miſerable men uſe to ſay, That the day of my nativity, in regard of originall ſin, and ſo many calamities that ſpring from that ſource, is lamentable and curſed, and that it were to be wiſhed that the womb of my mother that bare me had been my ſepulchre? Wherefore did I come out of the bowels of a woman to be a ſpectatour of ſo many ſorrows and ſo much confuſion?

more

The Saints ſpeak ſometimes like men, according to the ſenſe of the inferiour part of the ſoul, eſpecially when they ſee themſelves overwhelmed with great evils; but God raiſes them up immediately, and makes them reſume the tongue of heaven.

As the Prophet was deploring his miſeries in that dark priſon, God gave lights and remorſes to his perſecutour that came the next day to deliver him, either through ſome compaſſion, or becauſe he had attempted that beyond the limits of his authority. The priſoner inſtead of expreſſing ſome kind of weakneſſe ſpake more boldly then before, fore-telling even to Paſhur that he ſhould be led captive into Babylon, and that he ſhould die there, the other not daring to enterpriſe any thing againſt him.

After that very time, Jeremy betook himſelf to the Palace to ſpeak with the King and with the Queen his wife, to advertiſe them of the utmoſt miſery that menaced their Crown, if they did not make an entire converſion to God to give an example to their Subjects. Beſides this, he gave ſome State-counſel, and told the King, that ſince God had permitted that he ſhould be ſubdued by the Arms of the King of Babylon that had put him on the Throne, and to whom he had promiſed Faith, Homage, and Tribute, he ſhould do well to keep his promiſes inviolable, rather then to adhere to the King of Egypt, and expect the aſſiſtance of his Arms. This was the moſt important point of State, that concerned the ſafety of all the kingdome.

Nevertheleſſe, King Zedekiah, whoſe ſpirit was a little ſoft, hearkned to the advice, and took ſometimes fire, but it was but for a little time, he being no way conſtant in his good reſolves. When he ſaw himſelf menaced with a ſiege by the King of the Babylonians, he was affrighted, and inclined a little to his ſide; but aſſoon as he perceived that he diverted his arms another way, he brake his promiſed faith, being weary of the rigour of the Tributes that the other exacted of him. Thereupon, Jeremy ceaſed not to publiſh, that it was an errour to expect that the army of Pharaoh King of Egypt which was reported to be upon its march to help Jeruſalem ſhould do any good, that it ſhould return upon its own ſteps without enterpriſing any thing: that Nebuchadonozor was not ſo farre off, but that in a ſmall time he would render himſelf before the city to beſiege and win it: That it was a decree of God, and although the Army of the Chaldeans ſhould be defeated, yet thoſe that remained (though wounded and ſick) ſhould be ſufficient to take Jeruſalem abandoned of the Divine protection.

When he had ſpoken this publickly, he reſolved to retire himſelf for a time, and to go into the countrey; but he was taken at the gate of the city by Irijah that accuſed him falſly, and ſaid that he was going to render himſelf to the army of the Chaldeans; whereupon, he carried him under a good guard to the Magiſtates; who having beaten and ill uſed him, ſent him to priſon, where he remained many dayes without conſolation.

At laſt, the King having heard of what had happen'd to him, cauſed him to come ſecretly to him, and ſpake to him, to conjure him to tell the truth, whether thoſe Predictions that he ceaſed not to ſow in the ears of all the world were Revelations from God; whereof the Prophet aſſured him again, and gave him ſome good incitement to incline to the moſt wholeſome counſels. Poor Jeremy ſeeing this Prince uſe him kindly, ſaid unto him,

Alas, Sir, what have I done, and in what have I offended your Majeſty to be uſed as a rogue by thoſe that uſurp your authority? What crime have I committed by telling you the truth? Where are your falſe Prophets that ſaid, that there was no need to fear the coming of Nebuchadonozor, and that he had other buſineſſe to diſpatch? is he not at length come to verifie my Propheeies? Since you do me the honour at preſent to hear me, My Lord and my Maſter, hearken to my moſt humble requeſt, and grant me a courteſie that I deſire of you in the Name of God, which is, that I may no more return into the priſon out of which your Majeſty hath cauſed me to be drawn; for, the continuation of the evils that I have ſuffered there is able ſuddenly to tear my ſoul from my body, and it will be but a grief to you to deliver me to death for having given you counſels of life and ſafety.

The King was ſoftned by the words of the Prophet, but he was ſo timorous that he durſt not take the boldneſſe to cauſe a priſoner to be delivered by his abſolute authority, fearing the reproaches and out-cryes of thoſe that would have the upper end in all affairs. He cauſed onely the goaler to be bid to uſe him a little kindlier, taking him out of the black dungeon, to give him a place more reaſonable, and to have a care that in that great famine of the city he ſhould not want bread.

This was executed, and he ſtaid ſome time at the entrance of the priſon with a little more liberty, during which, he ſpake again to thoſe that viſited him, and ſaid freely, That there was no way to eſcape the ſacking of the city, but by rendring themſelves to the Chaldeans. This made Paſhur and his complices incenſed again with a great wrath, and ſpeak inſolently to the King, that Jeremy might be delivered to them, publiſhing that he was worthy of death, that he was a ſeditious fellow that did nothing but make the people mutiny, and ſeparate them from their obedience to him.

The miſerable Zedekiah that had let theſe men take too high an aſcendent upon his perſon had not ſtrength of ſpirit enough to reſiſt them, but againſt his conſcience abandoned his poor Prophet to them, although it was with ſome regret. Theſe wicked men having taken him, let him down with cords into a deep pit of the priſon, which was full of mire and filth, where he expired the remainder of his deplorable life, and had dyed there of miſeries, if God had not raiſed him up a protectour, of whom he never ſo much as dreamed.

There was in the Kings houſe a famous officer, an Ethiopian by Nation, and a man of heart, who hearing of the cruelty that was uſed againſt the Prophet, took pity on him, and ſaid boldly to the King, What (Sir?) can your Majeſty well approve of the rigours that poor Jeremy is made to ſuffer for doing the function of a Prophet? It well appears that his enemies would have his skin, for they have let him down with ropes into a deep dungeon, where it is almoſt impoſſible to breathe. There is danger if this good man dyes by this ill uſage that you are guilty of his death, and that this may draw ſome wrath of God upon your Majeſty. He ſpake this with ſo good an accent, that the King was moved, and gave him charge to take thirty ſouldiers, and to draw him thence, which he did quickly, caſting down to him old linnen raggs to put under him, that he might not be galled by the cords when they ſhould make him aſcend out of the bottome of that hideous priſon.

is

When he was plucked up again the King had another time the curioſity to ſee him, not in his Palace but in ſome ſecret place of the Temple, where Jeremy ſpake to him with much fervency and tenderneſſe telling him that the onely means to ſave his perſon, his houſe, and all the City was to render up himſelf to Nabuchodonoſor, and that if he refuſed to do it, he and all his would be deſtroyed. The King anſwered that he was afraid to commit himſelf to the King of Babylon, leſt he ſhould deliver him to his rebellious ſubjects that had fallen from him to the enemy. Jeremy replyed, That he need not fear any ſuch thing, and affectionately beſeech'd him to have pity on his own ſoul, on his wife and on his children for otherwiſe there would happen a great miſery. This poor Prince feared to attempt this againſt the opinion of thoſe that governed him, and to ſcatter them by this means from his party. Nay he was afraid even to be ſeen with Jeremy, and recommended to him very much to keep ſecret that diſcourſe, and to tell no body that he had ſpoken to him about State affairs. He was ſent back to Priſon that he might not make the ſeditious mutiny, and all that he could obtein, was, not to be plunged again in that pit from whence he had been delivered.

In the mean while Nabuchodonoſor after a long ſiege carryed the city of Jeruſalem which was taken about mid-night, the enemies being entred by a breach that no body perceived. Zedekiah much amazed betakes himſelf to flight with his wife and children, and a few men of war about him, taking his way through night, darkneſſe, affrights, fear, and a thouſand images of death. The Chaldeans had notice of his retreat, and caught him on the plains of Jericho, where he was immediately forſaken of his men, and left with his wives and little children that ſent out pitifull cryes through the apprehenſion of ſervitude and death.

He was carried away from thence to Riblah, where Nabuchodonoſor was expecting the iſſue of that ſiege. This unfortunate Prince was conſtrained to preſent himſelf before the frightfull countenance of a barbarous King puffed up with his victories and proſperities, who loaded him with reproaches and confuſions, upbraiding him with his rebellion, his ingratitude and unfaithfulneſſe: he would willingly have been ten foot under ground before he ſuffered ſuch indignities, thinking himſelf ſufficiently puniſhed, by having loſt his crown and liberty.

But this cruell Conquerour would give other ſatisfactions to his revenge; for after he had a long time digeſted his gall, and thought on the means that he would uſe to puniſh him, he cauſes his children to come before him, and commands the Hangmen to murther them in the fathers ſight. Theſe poor little ones ſeeing the glitteting ſword now ready to be plunged in their bloud cryed out for mercy, and called pitifully upon the ſad name of their father that had no other power but to ſuffer his calamity. The ſword paſſes through the bodies of his children to find his heart who dyed as many deaths as nature had given him gages of his marriage.

He expected that the ſword ſtained with the bloud of his dear progeny ſhould have ended his life and griefs; but this inhumane Tyrant having left him as much light as was needfull to illuminate his miſery, after that he had filled himſelf with this lamentable ſpectacle, cauſed his eyes to be plucked out by an execrable cruelty, and having commanded him to be put in great and heavie chains cauſed him to be carried into Babylon where he ended his miſerable life; and in his Perſon ended the Kingdome of Judea that had ſubſiſted ſince Saul four hundred and fourſcore years.

Nabuchodonoſor having heard the narration that was made of Jeremy and the good counſell that he had given to his King eſteemed him highly, and gave charge to Nebuzaradan the Generall of his Army to give him content, whether he had a mind to go to Babylon, or whether he would ſtay in his own countrey. But to ſhew he ſought not the ſplendour of greatneſſes, he choſe to make his abode amidſt poor Labourers and Vine-dreſſes that were left after the ſacking of the City, the better ſort being tranſported into Babylon.

He was recommended to Gedaliah who was ſettled Governour of thoſe miſerable Reliques of the people by Nebuzaradan; but when this Gedaliah was murthered ſeven moneths after his creation, Johanan that was one of the principall men, counſelled the Jews to quit that miſerable land, and to follow him into Egypt. Jeremy oppoſed it, and foretold miſery to all thoſe that ſhould go thither; but inſtead of believing him they dragged him along by force either to afflict him, or to prevail over his Prophecyes. He failed not to propheſy the deſolation of Egypt that was to bend under the arms of Nabuchodonoſor, whereat his countreymen found themſelves incenſed, and fearing leſt he ſhould draw ſome envy on them, ſtoned him in a ſedition. The Egyptians hearing talk of the life and predictions of this great perſonage made account of him, and ſet him up a Tomb, where God to honour his ſervant did great miracles, chaſing away by his aſhes the Crocodiles and ſerpents. Alexander that flouriſhed two hundred years after him admiring thoſe wonders cauſed his reliques to be tranſported into Alexandria, where he cauſed a magnificent Sepulchre to be erected for him, as the Alexandrian Chronicle reports. Behold how virtue perſecuted in its own houſe finds a prop with ſtrangers, and even veneration amongſt the Infidels; God uſing all ſorts of inſtruments to honour the merits of thoſe that have rendered him proofs of a perfect faithfulneſſe.

JOHN

S. JOHN Baptiſt. S. PAUL.

WHat makes an Hermit at the Court, a Solitary man in a Tumult, a Sacred amongſt Prophane, a Saint in the houſe of Herod? He was far more ſecure amongſt Wolves, amongſt Foxes and Tygers, then amongſt thoſe wicked Courtiers. He was more contented with his littrle dinner of Locuſts and wild Honey, retired in his Cabben, then at the ſight of the pomps and pleaſures of the King of Galilee. But God that is the Maſter of Kings and the Directour of Hermites hath thus diſpoſed of him, and willed that he ſhould dye at Court after he had ſo long a time lived in the wilderneſſe.

It is not certainly known what occaſion drove him to it, whether he went thither by zeal, or whether he was ſent for by deſign, or whether he was forced by violence. Some think that the miſeries of his countrey afflicted under the government of a diſſolute Prince, affecting him with a great Compaſſion, He went out of the deſert, of his own accord to admoniſh the king of his duty, Since that all thoſe that came neer him, and that were obliged to ſpeak to him were mute, partly by a ſervitude fatall to all thoſe that are tyed to the hopes of the world, and partly alſo being ſeized with fear by reaſon of the power and cruelty of a womans ſpirit that poſſeſſed Herod. Others, as Joſephus, have written that the Prince hearing every day of the great concourſe of all ſorts of people that went to the wilderneſſe to ſee Saint John, was afraid leſt under colour of piety this might make ſome change of State. Tyrants love not men endowed with an extraordinary virtue, and that have not learnt the trade of flattering, their voyce is the Cock that frights thoſe cruell Lyons; their life is a flaſh of Lightning that dazles their Eyes; their actions are as many Convictions of their Iniquity. And therefore this Authour ſaith; that without other form of proceſſe, Herod cauſed him to be apprehended, to prevent him and break off thoſe aſſemblies that were made about him.

Yet it is probable and more conſonant to the Scripture (which aſſures us that this Prince bare ſome reſpect to John, and heard him, and did many things according to his advice) that he proceeded not againſt him at firſt with ſo much violence. But the cunning Fox (as he was, according to the judgement that the Eternall Truth made of him,) ſeeing that Saint John was in an high eſteem for holineſſe, and in great credit amongſt the people, ſtrived to winne him, and to draw him to him, to make himſelf be reputed for a good Prince that cheriſhed honeſt men, and to maintain by this means his authority that was already tottering, and little rooted in the true Maximes of a good Government. It was thus that Dionyſius the Tyrant made uſe of the Philoſophers, not for any affection that he bare them, but to appropriate them to the bad intentions that he had in State, and to give them ſome colour by the expreſſe or interpreted approbation of thoſe perſonages that were in reputation for their wiſdome. But Herod did ill chooſe his man; this was not a Court-flatterer, a Tool for all Trades, a Shoe for all Feet, but a ſtiffe and auſtere man, to whom a whole World would not have given the leaſt temptation to do any thing againſt his conſcience.

It would be a ſuperfluous thing to enlarge ones ſelf at length upon the rare qualities of Saint John, who having been many times highly commended by the Creatour of Virtues, and the Diſtributour of true praiſes, who hath preferred him above the greateſt of the world, ſeems to have dryed up by his abundance the Elogies of the moſt eloquent. Let us content our ſelves to ſay that there are abundance of excellencies in him, enough to make all chaires ſpeak, and all pens write even to the end of the world.

He was born of the blood of Aaron the brother of Moſes, the firſt ornament of the Prieſthood, and the great Conductour of the People. He came out of a barren Womb which he rendered fruitfull above all fecundities of the earth. His birth was declared miraculouſly by the voyce of an Archangell. He was ſanctified almoſt as ſoon as conceived, and virtue appropriated him to her ſelf before that nature had brought him to the Light. He was a worshipper of the word when he was yet in the bowels of his mother, and received the first rayes of the everlasting day before that his eye was open to the brightnesse of the Sun. Reason was advanced to him by a wonder altogether extraordinary. He hath had this honour, to know first, after the Virgin Mary, the news of that high mystery of the Incarnation, and of the Redemption of the world. Of all the Nativities of so many children of Adam, the Church celebrates none but that of John, who hath this common with our Saviour and his most holy Mother, who by a speciall priviledge honoured his birth by her actuall presence; So that he saw his first day under the aspect of the Mother of the Universe. His name was given him by an Archangell, a name of grace and favour, that shewed he was placed in the ranke of the deerest delights of Heaven, and the tongue of his dumb Father tyed by an heavenly virtue, was loosed by its power, that it might pronounce that fair name. He was exempted from grievous sins, and (as many Divines hold) even from veniall: He consecrated his retirement in the Desert almost as soon as he entered into the world. Farthermore he was a Prophet, and more then a Prophet, a Virgin, a Doctour, a forerunner of the Son of God, the Trumpet of Repentance, the Authour of a Baptisme (that ushered in that which regenerates us all) whereof Jesus was pleased to receive the sprinckling. In fine, he was the Horizon of the Gospel and the Law, and the first that shewed with the finger the Lamb of God, and the Kingdome of Heaven.

But let us make no reckoning of what I have alleaged, but let us say onely that which the word hath said of him, That he was not a Reed to bow at every wind, nor a man that could be allured by the delicacies of the Court; He spake there, as a Prophet, he conversed there as an Angell, and at last dyed there as a Martyr. The time furnished him with an occasion, about which he could not speak without making much noyse, and he could not hold his peace without betraying his Conscience.

That Herod Antipas, which we are to speak of here, was the sonne of the great Herod the Murtherer of the Innocents and of a Samaritan woman, who after the death of his Father (forasmuch as the Legitimate issue of Mariamne had been unworthily murthered to make way for unjust heirs) had for his part of the Kingdome of Judea Galilee, which he held in quality of a Tetrarch. He was a Prince of a small courage, addicted to his pleasures, lascivious and loose, that endeavoured to preserve himself by poor shifts, having nothing stout nor warlike in his person.

He had a brother named Philip, which held another parcell of that Kingdome of Judea dismembred and little enough consid erable, the Romans having possessed themselves of the best part of it after they had deposed Archelaus that had reigned as Successour of his Father in quality of a King. Philip was married to Herodias the daughter of his brother Aristobulus, and by consequence his Niece; those Marriages being ordinary enough in the Court of Herod. The Husband was a sweet and moderate spirit, that kept his small Government very peaceable, and pleased himself with rendering Justice to his people with so much ardour that he often stayed his Chariot by the way, and heard the differences of the meanest people to reconcile them. But the Wife quite cantrary was an Haughty, Ambitious, Turbulent, Immodest spirit, that was not content with what God had given her, but tryed by all means to become Queen.

It happened that Herod Antipas under colour of a progresse or recreation went to visit his brother Philip who received him in his Palace with all curtesie and sincerity. He amused himself in the abode that he made there, to cajoll that Herodias his sister in Law, that needed not much courting to be brought in Love, so fickle was her disposition and so desirous still of Novelties.

They found that Antipas was not pleased with his Wife, nor Herodias with her Husband; they make an audacious and irregular complot, which was to seperate themselves from their Mates under colour of a divorce, and to marry themselves together. Herod promised her, that he would go to Rome and make her Queen, which she could never hope for of her Husband, who (he told her) was a man without heart, and born onely to converse with inferiour people. He made himself a brave man at his Sword, Rich, Valiant, Happy, Magnificent; and his body was not ill made, so that this false marriage is concluded between the parties, and it is not known whether it began then by a clandestine adultery, Their privacies were but too remarkable: so that Herod's wife that was the daughter of Arethas King of Arabia had an inkling of them; and dissembling her thoughts, wrote to the King her father, that she could no longer live with a dissolute husband, that had no affection to her, and that violating the faith plighted in marriage, had made a promise to an adultereresse to espouse her. Her Father was greatly exasperated at this affront, expressing that he was ready to receive her to his Court, and counselled her to steal away warily from her Husband; which she did prudently enough asking leave of him to take a little journey to the Castle of Macheron which was upon the frontier to recreate her self. This was very freely granted her; and in the mean while she orders her fathers men to carry her away into Arabia. Yet shee needed not to have studied her flight, and to have made a mystery of it, since her husband had no great mind to runne after her, but had given her much annoyance out of a design to weary her, and to make her escape from him of her own accord, to have an excuse to the King her father when he should complain of him.

This departure of the Arabian suddain and meditated, came to the ears of Herod and Herodias, who made Bonfires of joy at it in their hearts, and believed that it was an overture that Heaven had given them, to the accomplishment of their design. The wicked woman quits Philip her Husband and comes iuto Galilee to lodge in the Palace of her brother bringing with her a shameless daughter, whom the deportments of the mother made men believe not to have appertained by good right to her husband. Josephus, out of whom we have in part taken this History doth not tell us whether the good Philip was much troubled for his wife, but her insolent spirit makes us believe that he had no great reason to lament her. This coming was coloured at first with the pretence of a visit that she gave her brother in Law; but at last the businesse came to light, and to cover the scandall of it, a divorce was to be protested, and a marriage feigned. Herod had no want of flatterers and servile spirits at his Court that found out reasons to colour so great a crime.

He would have much desired that Saint John would have approved it, or that staying near him without speaking a word, his silence would have made the people believe that he was not upon tearms of disapproving it. But this was to judge too basely of so high a virtue. The holy man resolutely tells him, that it was not permitted him to marry his brothers wife; that it was an Adultery, and an odious inceſt in the ſight of God, and ſcandalous to all his Subjects. He advertiſed him of the obligations of the Law, whereof he made profeſſion, of the examples of the good Kings that had preceded him, of the chaſtiſements of the wicked that had felt the weight of Divine juſtice. He laid before his eyes how States paſſed from one hand to another by Injuſtice, Iniquity, Impiety and the filthineſſe of thoſe that Governed ill. He put alſo into his admonition the contempt of God, that was dreadfull above all things, the intereſts of his brother, the ill example that he would give his family, the ſpeeches of his people, the judgements even of ſtranger Kings, and as it is credible forgat nothing of all the conſiderations that were worthy to be repreſented to him.

was

The ſpirit of Herod was not altogether bad, nor, as yet forſaken of God; He heard Saint John, and conceived ſometimes a remorſe of his fault. But as ſoon as he had ſeen Herodias he remembred no more any of thoſe advertiſements, and durſt not expreſſe that he had ſo much as any ſcruple of his marriage, So imperiouſly did this cunning woman carry him. She knew at laſt what the man of God had ſpoken, and was tranſported with a fury that ſuffered her not to breathe any other thing but revenge and menaces.

She laid hold of an opportunity to her advantage, and ſeeing this Prince beſotted with her Love, and in a condition to deny nothing to her inticements informed him (as far as one may gueſſe) that John was very dangerous to the welfare of the State, and that that great deluge of people that he drew after him ſpake nothing good; and that if he were a crafty man, as he ſeemed to be, he would be able to raiſe a ſedition for the intereſt of his ambition, and if he were but ſimple, which ſhe did not imagine, there would enough be found with him every day that would abuſe that ſimplicity; that it was a great arrogance in him to find fault with the alliances of his marriage, and to diſallow of that, which ſo many others, as good men as he, had approved of; that ſhe ſaw plainly that this tended to his ruine, and that if Saint John could bring about what he aimed at, ſhe ſhould be good for nothing but to be caſt to Doggs, and that that was not the recompence that ſhe expected of her love and faithfulneſſe towards him after ſhe had deſpiſed every thing for the price and eſteem of his contentment.

She ceaſed not to beat upon the Princes ears with ſuch like words, and to breed a diſtruſt in him of Saint John, in ſuch a manner as that he conſented that he ſhould be apprehended and put in priſon under colour, as Joſephus ſaith, that he went about to change the peoples minds, and to embroil the State. This detaining of a man ſo holy and ſo renowned made a great noyſe through all Judea, but the wicked woman had this maxime, That one ought to take ones pleaſure to content nature, and little to trouble ones ſelf at the opinions of the world below, nor at the complaints of honeſt men, judging that all mouthes ought to be ſtopped by the rigour of puniſhments, and that ſhe ſhould be innocent when no body durſt any more find fault with her actions.

She ſlept not one good ſleep with her Herod as long as Saint John was yet alive, but fearing alwayes either that her pretended husband whom ſhe thought light enough, might be ſoftned with compaſſion to releaſe him, or that the people that held him for a Saint, might break open the priſons to take him thence, ſhe reſolved to ſee the end of him to give all liberty to her unbridled paſſions.

She watches the opportunity of Herods birth-day, on which he was accuſtomed to make feaſts and to intertein the principall Officers of his Kingdome. This crafty woman tampered with all the wills of thoſe that had any power over his ſpirit for this deſign, and ſeeing that her daughter was a powerfull inſtrument to move that effeminate Prince, and that he was extraordinarily pleaſed to ſee her dance, conjured her to employ all her genius and all her induſtry, all the baits, allurements, and gentileſſes that ſhe had in dancing, to gain the Kings heart, and that if ſhe ſaw him very freely merry, and on terms to gratifie her with ſome great advantage, ſhe ſhould take heed of asking any thing but the head of John, and that he was neceſſarily to fall, if ſhe would not ſee her mother periſh and all her fortunes overthrown.

The daughter obeyed, and fits her ſelf even to perfection to pleaſe the Princes eyes; ſhe enters into the banqueting houſe richly deck'd, and makes uſe of a dance not vulgar, whereat he was raviſhed, and all the Gueſts (that were perhaps hired by Herodias to commend her) made a wonderfull recitall of her perfections. There was nothing now remaining but to give her the recompence of her pains. This daughter of iniquity and not of nature, ſayes Chryſologus, ſeeing that every one applauded her, and that the King, that was no longer his own man, would honour her with ſome great preſent which he would remit to her own choyſe, even as far as to give her the moity of his Kingdome, if ſhe would have deſired it, made a bloudy requeſt, following the inſtructions of her wicked mother, and required that inſtantly S. Johns head ſhould be given her in a plate.

Herod felt his heart pricked with a repentance piercing enough, but becauſe he had ſworn in preſence of the Nobles of his Kingdomes to deny nothing that ſhe ſhould ask would not diſcontent her, but gives command to the Maſter of his Houſe to go to the priſon and to cut off S. Johns head, to put it in the hands of this wanton wench. As ſoon as the word was pronounced, her mother was not quiet till ſhe ſaw the execution of it; to Priſon they run; every one thought that it had been for ſome grace, ſince that it was upon the nick of the feaſt of the Nativity of the King; but they quickly ſaw an effect quite contrary to that thought, when S. John was called for and told that he muſt reſolve to dye..

What, think we, did this divine forerunner do at this laſt moment that remained to him of ſo innocent a life! but render thanks to God that made him dye a Martyr for the truth, after he had inlightned his eyes with the viſible preſence of the Incarnate Word which permitted him not to have any thing left in this world to be deſired. He exhorted his diſciples to range themſelves about our Saviour, who was the Way, the Life, and the Truth. He prayed for his perſecutours, and for the eaſing of the miſeries of his poor people; afterward having a reliſh of the firſt contentments of his felicity by the tranquility of his ſpirit, he yielded his neck to the hangman. His body was honourably buried by his diſciples, and his head brought in a plate to that cruell feaſt, put into the hands of that dancereſſe, who preſented it to her mother; and the mother, according to S. Jerome, made a play-game of it, pricking the tongue with the needle of her hair.

All that one can ſpeak is below the horrour of its ſpectacle, ſayes S. Ambroſe, The head of S. John, of the Prime man of the world, that had ſhut up the Law, that had opened the Goſpel, the head of a Prophet, of an Angell, is outrageouſly taken off and delivered for the ſalary of a dancereſſe. The ſobereſt of men is maſſacreed in a feaſt of drunkards, and the chaſteſt, by the artifice of a proſtitute. He is condemned on an occaſion and on a time in which he would not even have been absolved, as abhorring all that proceeded from intemperance. O how dangerous is it then to offend a woman that hath renounced her honour! Herod gave her an homicide for a kisse. The hangmen wash their hands when they are ready to sit down at table, but these unhappy women pollute theirs in the banquet with a Prophets bloud; The righteous slain by adulterers, the innocent by the guilty, the true judge by criminall souls. This banquet that should have been the source of life brings an edict of death. Cruelty is mingled with delights, and pleasure with funerals. This horrible plate is carried through all the table for the satiating of those unhumane eyes, and the bloud that drops yet from his veins falls upon the pavement to be licked up with the ordures of that infamous supper. Look upon it, Herod, look upon a deed that was worthy of none but thy Cruelty; stretch out thine hand, put thy fingers in the wound that thou hast made that they may be again bedewed with a bloud so sacred. Drink, cruell man, drink that river which thou seest glide to quench thy thirst. Look upon those dead eyes that accuse thy wickednesse, and which thou dost wound again with the aspect of thy filthy pleasures. Alas! they are shut not so much by the necessity of death as by the horrour of thy luxury.

The vengeance of God delayed not long to fall upon those perverse souls that had committed so enourmous a crime. Arethas King of the Arabians, resenting the affront that had been given to his daughter by those Adulterers, enters in arms upon the lands of Herod, who bestirrs himself but weakly to resist him. Pleasures held him so fast chained that he had not the boldnesse to go to his frontiers in person to oppose his adversary; but contented himself with sending a Colonell that lost the battell hazarded against the Arabian; and this miserable King was in the way to have been deprived of all his Kingdomes, if the Romans had not intervened, who would not permit Arethas to make himself great in their vicinity. Some while after happened the passion of our Saviour, who as we know, was presented to this Herod; but by reason that there was no Herodias to urge him then to murther, he contented himself with the mockeries and derisions of his person. He thought from that time forward to enjoy a great quietnesse, but the justice of God that punishes exemplarily the violences that are committed against his servants raised him up a strange Catastrophe.

His wife that spurred him incessantly with ambition perswaded him to take a journey to Rome to make himself great by the favour of the Romans, and to bear openly in his Titles the name of King. But he was much amazed that young Agrippa his Kinsman had supplanted him, and found so much favour with the Emperour Claudius that he gave him the Kingdome of Herod Antipas, with the other of Philip that was now deceased, and sent him into Judea with the name of King, and with good Patents to authorize his Election. And forasmuch as concerns this murtherer of the Prophet, having been accused of much insolencie and cowardise, the Edict of the Prince banished him to Lyons, so that he was like the Cammell in the fable, that for having asked for horns of Jupiter lost his ears. The Emperour let Herodias know that he intended not to comprehend her in the Edict, but that he permitted her to stay in the Countrey. Yet she was so constant in a wicked friendship, that she answered, That since she had been a companion of her husband in prosperity, she would by no means abandon him in adversity, and that she had rather be banished with him then have a Kingdome with another man that should not be according to her heart. She was left to do after her own head, and both of them set forth to go to exile, accompanied with that little wanton, which, according to Nicephorus, passing over a frozen River fell in before she was aware, the Ice melting under her feet. She hung a long time in this snare, moving her self up and down as if she would have danced, in such a sort as that her neck was cut off by a razour of Ice, and her life stifled under the waters, to make an honorable revenge to the holy forerunner of Jesus Christ. Herod Antipas and his Herodias were overwhelmed with poverty, with misery, and with ignominy in a strange land, offering up a long sacrifice of their pains to divine vengeance without ever recovering either liberty or safety.

S. PAUL.

Saint PAUL and SENECA In the COURT of NERO.

BEhold here a theatre and a ſpectacle worthy of Saints, of Philoſophers, and of Kings; the meeting of Paul with Seneca in the Court of Ceſar. The Doctour of the Nations with the moſt knowing man in the Univerſe. The wiſdome of the Croſſe with that of Philoſophy. The birth of the Roman Church in the Bloud and in the Flames of Martyrs. The Goſpel preached in a City which was the gulf of corruption; and which is more admirable, the Habitation of Chriſtians in the Palace of Nero. To underſtand aright the greatneſſe of our Chriſtianity, the force of the Goſpel, the combats of Saint Peter and Saint Paul, the Triumphs and the Majeſty of the Church; It is needfull to repreſent unto you an Idæa of the eſtate of this chiefeſt City of the world, and the wicked manners which thoſe two great Apoſtles obſerved in it, to root them out, and to cauſe a people to be born anew, regenerate in the Bloud of their Saviour.

It ſeemeth, that S. Paul in his Epiſtle to the Romans hath undertaken to deſcribe the inordinate life of Nero, and of thoſe in his Court who did conform themſelves to his example to partake of his favours. He ſpeaketh of ſome men who were faln into a reprobate ſenſe, and who had changed the order of nature, and their ſex, by moſt infamous luſts, being filled with all Iniquity with Riot, Covetouſneſſe, Detraction, Envy, Murder, Debate, Deceit, and Malice, Whiſpering, Deſpitefull, Curſing, Proud, Arrogant, Inventers of evil things, Diſobedient to their parents, without Underſtanding, without Order, without Affection, without Fidelity, without Compaſſion: And this moſt clearly is manifeſted in all the deportments of this moſt infamous Emperour, who was the monſter of men. And we of neceſſity muſt affirm, that it is the manifeſt choler of heaven, and a ſcourge, enough to exterminate mankind from the earth, when a wicked and a licentious life is joyned with the heighth of Power, which giveth as much force to wickedneſſe as it takes off from the ſtrength and execution of the Laws. It is not my deſign to ſtretch forth that in words which might be ſpoken of Nero, but to make a ſhort Collection of the manners of his own perſon and his Court, that the Readers might obſerve on what ſtuffe Seneca and S. Paul did work, and what were their proceedings and ſucceſſe.

The eſtate of Rome and the Court of Nero when Paul came to it.

In the ſeven and thirtieth year of our Saviour, this Prince (fatall to the ruine of the Empire) was born on the fifth of December, betwixt ſeven and eight of the clock in the morning; he came into the world with his feet foremoſt, contrary to the order of nature; he took all the vices of his anceſtours, and did partake of none of all their virtues. On the fathers ſide he was deſcended from the Domitians ſirnamed Barbaroſſa, whom the Romans vulgarly called Braſſe-beards; and it was one of his anceſtours unto whom the Oratour in choler did reply, That it was no marvel that he had a Beard of Braſſe, ſince Nature had given him a Mouth of Iron, and a Heart of Lead. His grandfather was a fiery man, cruel, and prodigall, and ſo amorous of Playes, that he cauſed the Ladies of Rome to aſcend the Theatre, and to act the Comedies themſelves. He gave alſo the combate of the Gladiatours, performed with ſo much cruelty, that Auguſtus Ceſar was conſtrained to ſtop it by his Edicts. His father Domitius was deteſtable over all his life, inſolent, furious, who with his own hand did ſtab one of his Free-men to death, becauſe he would not be drunk; and in the pride of heart made his caroach to paſſe over a little child in the ſtreet; and quarrelling with a Knight of Rome, he cauſed one of his eyes to be pulled out. Beſides his cruelty, he was a man without faith, without probity, without honeſty, who deceived all his creditours, mocked all the world, and ſecretly abuſed his own ſiſter. His wife was named Agrippina, ſhe was daughter to Germanicus of the Bloud of the Ceſars, but of an evil ſpirit, and proſtituted to all manner of vices. And it is no marvel, that Domitius father to Nero, (when much joy was wiſhed him on the birth of his ſon) did make anſwer, that there needed not ſuch acclamations, for nothing could be born from him and Agrippina, but what ſhould be pernicious to the Empire. Not long after, this unfortunate man did die, conſumed with diſeaſes that attended his filthy life, and left behind him his ſon three years of age, who ſaw his mother baniſhed, and being deſtitute of means was brought up in the houſe of his Aunt Lepida, under the diſcipline of a dancer and a barber who did corrupt his ſpirit with the firſt impreſſions of vice, which from his birth he was too much diſpoſed to receive. The times changing, his mother returned into favour, and by her charms prevailed upon the ſpirit of the Emperour Claudius the ſucceſſour of Caligula, a ſimple and a ſtupid man, who eſpouſed this dangerous woman, who afterwards poiſoned him by a potion, and ſo placed her own ſon on the Throne of the Ceſars. And although the Aſtrologians had fore-told her that he ſhould be Emperour and withall the murderer of his mother, ſhe made nothing of it, and thought it no hard bargain to buy the Empire with her own bloud, ſaying, Let him reign, and let him kill me.

The birth and education of Nero

The perfidiouſneſſe of his mother.

By the artifice of this wicked woman, Nero was ſaluted Emperour in the ſeventeenth year of his age with a marvellous applauſe, and in the publick acclamations honoured with all great Names and ſpecious Titles, all which he received, ſaving onely that of Father of his Countrey, ſaying, He was too young to have ſo many children. He was very tractable in his youth, upright, gentle, diſcreet, well-ſpoken, and demean'd himſelf for the firſt five years very worthily under the conduct of Seneca. But when he approached to the one and twentieth year of his age, the ingredients of vice, which, with his birth he brought into the world, the baſe education in his infancy, the heat of his youth, the delights of the Court, and (which is the greateſt of all temptations) the Power to do all, did weigh down the Philoſophy and the Inſtructions of Seneca, who proved by experience, That there is nothing more difficult then to perſwade thoſe to virtue whom too much Power had put in the poſſeſſion of all vices. His deboiſtneſſe began by the ill examples which he learned in his infancy, which were altogether unbeſeeming his perſon: he became a Tumbler, a Puppet-player, a Comedian, a Waggoner, a Songſter, and a Minſtrel, not for Recreation but to make a publick Profeſſion of it, to diſpute with the Maſters of thoſe Faculties, and to abandon all the affairs of Peace and Warre to be vacant to thoſe exerciſes, inſomuch, that he made it more to out-act a Comedian on the ſtage, then to gain a Battle in the field. He was alſo a night-walker, and gave,

and

and ſometimes received many ſore blows which did not permit him to paſſe unknown.

From hence he laid himſelf open to moſt extravagant profuſeneſſe, inſomuch, that he gave to Tumblers the patrimonies of Conſuls, and made the funeralls of ſome inconſiderable men to equall the Magnificence of the Obſequies of Kings; he never did wear the moſt gorgeous garments longer then one day. He did build his Palaces with ſo much coſt, as if he would diſpend on them onely all the wealth of Rome. When he travelled, he would be followed with a thouſand caroaches, and his mules were all ſhod with ſilver. He made his halls after the form of the firmament, where the vault being of gold intermingled with azure, and illuminated with counterfeit ſtarres did roul continually over his head, and rained on him ſhowers of flowers, and waters of a moſt exquiſite ſmell. There would he dine from noon till midnight in the riot of execrable ſervices. He had a touch in his tender age of the vices of wantonneſſe, luxury, avarice and cruelty, but being in the beginning it was with ſome ſhame concealed in private.

But in the end he took off that mask by an open and inordinate diſſoluteneſſe, which knew no reſtraint. He was of belief that there was not one chaſte perſon in the world; and took great pleaſures in thoſe who did repeat their filthineſſe to him. There was never man more abandoned to all manner of uncleanneſſe without diſtinction of kindred, ſex, time, place, or man-hood. There was not one part in all his body that was not ſacrificed to diſhoneſty: his polluted ſpirit made him invent thoſe abominations which are not to be indured by chaſte ears, and with which I will not defile my paper.

The exceſſe of his inſolencies did at laſt render him odious to thoſe who were moſt near unto him, and when they gently told him of his extravagancies, he would leap into a fury, and made a crime of their virtue who did beſt adviſe him. He filled up the apprenticeſhip of his enormities with the death of Britannicus, a young Prince the ſonne of the Emperour Claudius, and brother to his wife Octavia, in which he imployed the moſt famous Sorcereſſe of Rome named Locuſta who prepared the poyſon, and made an aſſay of it before him on a ſucking pig who died immediately: now finding it for his turn, cauſed it to be ſerved to his brother as he dined at the table with him. The malignity of the poyſon was ſo piercing, that in an hour after, he fell dead at the feet of his mother and his ſiſter, who were both preſent at this tragick ſpectacle. Nero, to excuſe himſelf, ſaid, That it was the effect of a great ſickneſſe to which he had been ſubject from his cradle, and that they ought to be of comfort. But the Princeſſes concealing their imagination for fear of provoking his rage, did manifeſtly perceive that he ſowed thoſe ſeeds of his murder which he would afterwards continue in his Family.

His cruelty towards Britannicus.

The love to his mother degenerated to miſpriſion

It is almoſt impoſſible to believe the tender affection with which he proſecuted his mother Agrippina. He ſometimes did give to the ſouldiers that did guard his body for their word, The good Mother. He could not live without her. He did put into her hands the moſt delicate intereſts of all his Affairs, and deſired that all things ſhould ſtoop to her Authority. The mother alſo did indeavour by all poſſible artifices to tie her ſelf unto his perſon, even unto the uſing of Charms; for it is moſt certain that ſhe gave him the skin of a ſerpent incloſed in a bracelet of gold, which he carried ordinarily about him, and afterwards in deſpite did lay it by, and did look for it not long before his death but could not find it. The endearments of this Agrippina were too fond, and her kiſſes more hot then belonged to a mother.

Seneca was amazed at the horrour of it, and to avoid a greater evil, he procured a young maiden named Acta, who otherwiſe was a ſlave that came from Aſia, but very beautifull, to ſerve as a Love for Nero, and to divert him from that infamous paſſion towards his mother, in which he demean'd himſelf as Lot, who preſented his daughters to the Sodomites to avoid the greater fury of their brutiſh luſt. This Acta played her part ſo well by the counſel of Seneca, that mingling with her familiarities the conſiderations of State, ſhe gave Nero to underſtand that his great privaces with Agrippina would render him contemptible to the great ones of his Empire, and to all his Subjects, and would alſo give an advantage of power to his mother, which ſhe would abuſe to his own deſtruction.

Seneca by a leſſe evil diverts a greater.

He believed her, and became very amorous of her, and that ſo furiouſly, that he intended to prepare a Genealogy for her, in which, he would make her to be deſcended from the Kings of Aſia, and afterwards would marry her. His mother was as much in rage on the other ſide, that a ſlave was become her rivall, her choler did ſo much boil over, that ſhe made horrible threatnings what ſhe would ſay, and what ſhe would do: She would go to the Army, ſhe would complain to the Senate, ſhe would diſcover the diſaſtres of her infortunate houſe, and the empoyſonings by which ſhe had raviſhed the Diadem which belonged to the ſons of Claudius her husband, to put on the head of ingratefull Nero.

His mother inraged

Nero, whether he would appeaſe her or elſe deride her, did ſend her a gown of the antient Emperours which was very rich, but quite out of faſhion; at which ſhe was much incenſed, and ſaid ſhe was no Comedian to be dreſt in ſuch habiliments as thoſe; and that he ought not but give one part to her from whom he received the whole, ſhe would ſee ſhe ſaid if ſo poor a fellow as Burrus was, or ſuch a pedantick as was Seneca, ſhould govern the world at their pleaſure in the diſgrace of the bloud of the Ceſars. Sometimes again ſhe would diſplay her ſelf ſo weakly, that ſhe would offer her ſelf to be a procurer of Loves for her ſonne, and to hide in her own cabinet, nay, in her own breaſt, whatſoever he would keep ſecret.

Nero's preſent to his mother.

Behold how God doth puniſh all fond affections and wickedneſſes by thoſe themſelves who have received the profit from their poyſons! What ſhall this miſerable mother do? She is no more in a condition to give content, if there came by the by any ſmall re-accommendation in their friendſhips, it was but languiſhing and of a ſhort continuance. Nero deſired nothing more then to eſchew her company, and if he was obliged to ſee her, it was with a Complement as cold as ice; he would kiſſe her indeed, but rather out of ceremonies then out of love, and would immediately forſake her.

The fond love of parents chaſtned by God in their children.

It is recorded, that beholding her ſelf altogether miſpriſed, her fury provoked her to love a young Prince (on his mother ſide of the bloud of Auguſtus) named Plantius, whom ſhe ſerved for the ſatisfaction of her deſires, and to find a ſubject to imbroil the ſeat. This was brought to the ears of the Prince, who began to ſtartle at the apprehenſion of it, and could not be at reſt untill he was rid of them both. He killed Plantius having firſt violated his body, and took a diſmall reſolution to infold his mother in the ſame calamity.

Suet. ca. 35. in Nerone.

After a faint reconcilement which continued for a few dayes, he ſent her a letter full of fine Compliments, inviting her to Bajæ where he then took his pleaſure.

The horrible attempt of Nero upon his mother.

pleasures. Aristotle saith, That women are naturally credulous, especially when they have something sent them to amuse their passion. She immediately prepared to come to him, who was as ready to entertain her, and brought her to Baula where was his house of pleasure. He had a desire to poyson her as he did his brother Britannicus, but he knew she had an eye always open for her own preservation, and had with her antidotes to divert the operation of any poyson.

Therefore he consulted to put her to death on the sea, which is the field of dangers, where there is more of the effect and lesse of the suspicion. To accommodate her on her return, he caused a pompous vessel to be prepared, the deck whereof was to fall down by artifice, and charge was given to disloyall Anicetus, who was to conduct it, to put the device in practise, and to drown the barge. In the mean time he entertained the Queen in his Palace of delight with incomparable chear. He would place her at the table above him; he would comport and comply with her in a gallant and gracefull posture; sometimes he would whisper some soft words in her ear; sometimes he would openly renew the tenderesse of his first love and antient confidence; he served her both with the gentle and with the serious, to give her full satisfaction: she poor woman in long draughts drank deeply of the sweets of those poysonous indearments, and found her heart much inlarged at so unexpected a change. At the hour of her departure he would conduct her to the boat, and entertain her with suger'd words, telling her, that he would not live but onely for her love, and that the greatest and the most acceptable office that she could do him, was to be chearfull, and to have a particular care of her health. He seemed to look upon her with ravishments, whether it were to put the better countenance on his perfidiousnesse, or whether he were touched in mind at the near misfortune of his mother, who being made a lamentable sacrifie was going now insensibly to her death. At parting, he was not onely content to kisse her mouth, but taking her in his arms, he in a lovers complement did embrace her, and omitted nothing to cover his horrible design.

She entred into the barge in the evening: The sea was calm, the winds had faln asleep upon it. The sky was full of stars, as if it had opened all its eyes to behold the spectacle which it ought to revenge upon the Authour. Agrippina had two Gentlemen which sate on each side of her, and a Lady on whom she much relyed, named Acroceraunia, who was placed at her feet, who entertained her with the rehearsall of many of the late passages at Court, and the obligations and the protestations of her sonne, when (behold) the sign being given, the roof of the cabbin in which they were being covered with weights of lead (with which their treason overcharged it) did fall down, and killed one of the Gentlemen, and wounded Agrippina on the shoulder. The Ingineers who undertook the charge that the deck should fall directly down (being troubled in their consciences, or counterchecked by those who knew nothing of the game they were to play) did not perform it with that dexterity as was pretended, but gave leisure to those whom they would destroy to provide for their safety. Acroceraunia beholding her self in that danger, cryed out that she was the mother of the Emperour, and that they should make haste to preserve her which was the occasion of her death, for immediately on those words she was killed with the blows of the poles and oars.

Agrippina beholding this goodly pageant, and being most assured that it was a design of her sonnes, had yet such a command over her passion that she spake not one word, and was saved by the swimming of one of those who were not of the Conspiracy. The Frigots made haste to receive her, and to convey her to her own house which was not farre off. The amazement of the accident did not so abate her spirits, but she sent to Nero to acquaint him, That the Gods and the good Fortune of her Sonne had delivered her from a great danger, but she desired him not to take the pains to visit her, nor to send any of his servants to her, because she desired to take her rest.

The amazement of Nero.

The dismall Prince who every moment attended the issue of this most execrable enterprise, was much amazed to understand that she had escaped the danger, and counterfeited that the messenger whom his mother had sent was an Assassinate imployed to murder him. He awaked Seneca and Burrus to demand their counsel, and did remonstrate to them the danger in which he was, if he should not throughly accomplish what he had so ill begun. These two great personages did look on one another, being unwilling to dissuade him without effect, or to consent unto it by reason of the horrour of it: Seneca, to whom the fluencies of Language were never before wanting, held his eyes fixed on Burrus Captain of the Life-guard, as if without speaking to him he would ask him if he had not souldiers enough of his company to execute that which should be conceived to be expedient: but Burrus did prevent him, and told the Emperour that the men under his command were too much affectionated to the Bloud of the Cesars to undertake so hardy an enterprise. They both had a desire to divert him from so bad a deed for the want of an undertaker.

The death of Agrippina.

But the detestable Anicetas, Admirall of the Fleet, did again present himself to put the last hand unto the massacre. He immediately with some souldiers did transport himself to Agrippina's castle; he broke open the gates, and found her in bed forsaken of all the world. Assoon as she beheld three frightfull faces to enter her chamber, she spake courageously to them, and told them, if they came to give her a complement, that she had no need of it, and if they had any other design, she believed her son was not so wicked as to command her murder. These villains without answering one word, did begin the assassinate; one struck her with a truncheon, another had his sword at her bleeding breast, to whom she cryed out and onely said, The Belly, Souldier, the Belly that did bear the monster: after which she gave up the ghost, her body being hacked with many wounds. Her corps was burned that very night, and one of her servants killed her self before the funerall pile, either for fear of the sonne, or for grief of the mother. Howsoever, Nero caused a Declaration to be published, in which, not without horrour to the Readers he laid all the fault upon his Mother; and after this, he had never any rest, for he dreamed almost every night that he saw his mother calling him down to hell, and beheld unnumbred Furies tormenting him in the flames thereof.

Nero continueth his cruelties.

For all this, he desisted not from the nature of a Tygre, but to the massacre of his mother he added the murder of his wife Octavia, the most innocent Princesse on earth. The cause of it was, one Otho, a companion of his deboistnesse had taken from Crispus, a man of quality, his wife Poppea, and in a fury (such as Nero's himself) had espoused her. He told Nero so many wonders of the pleasures of his marriage, that he gave him a desire to taste them, thinking it would would be a means to raiſe him to a higher dignity; but the event was, that the Lady perceiving her ſelf to be beloved of the Emperour, did totally devote her ſelf unto him, and did adviſe him to ſend her husband into Portugall under the colour of Ambaſſadour.

He falls in love with poppea, and eſtrangeth himſelf from his wife Octavia

This cunning woman had a commanding beauty, a ſweet and pleaſing voyce, and incomparable attractions and allurements. She did leade Nero as a child, and obſerving him ſo violently inamoured of her, ſhe would be his Miſtreſſe without a Paramour, and would not permit his own wife to partake of his bed. For which purpoſe ſhe contrived a deteſtable plot, and cauſed the virtuous Empreſſe to be accuſed for proſtituting her ſelf to a player on the Flute, who by his birth was an Alexandrian; an accuſation which could not be ſpoken without the abſolute diſlike of all good men, nor believed by any but ignorant and depraved perſons.

Nevertheleſſe, Tigillinus the moſt intimate with Nero, who was a great ſtickler in the marriage with Poppea, cauſed the men and maid-ſervants of the Princeſſe to be examined; ſome of whom being torn upon the rack, did in the extremity of the torment let fall ſome untruths to deliver themſelves from the intollerable pain: others continued conſtant, and there was a maid-ſervant of that courage, that being in the midſt of all her torments, ſhe ſaid to infamous Tigellinus; Know, Executioner, that there is not one part in all the body of my Miſtreſſe, but is more chaſte then thy mouth.

There being not proofs ſufficient to deſtroy her, Nero was content to ſend her away into one of his houſes, and to be divorced from her under the pretence of barrenneſſe. Not long after, ſhe was removed thence and kept under guard, and was afterwards called back to Rome to appeaſe the trouble which the abſence of ſo illuſtrious and ſo virtuous a Lady had cauſed. She was received with great applauſe of all the City, which ſo alarm'd the ſpirit of Poppea, that ſhe threw her ſelf at Nero's feet, and did remonſtrate to him, "That he ſhould take no more care for his "loves but for his life, and that this return did "tend to nothing elſe but to ruine him with her "ſelf, and to make them both fall under the fury "of the people. That this was not it which ſhe had "deſerved of his friendſhip; and if he had rather ad-"vance in his palace the child of a player on the "Flute, then to have from her a legitimate heir, that "would give her leave to depart in a good hour, "and that ſhe would look out her husband Otho "in whatſoever place of the world ſhe could find "him.

A horrible calumny.

She uſed ſuch and ſo many attractions, ſo many counterfeit tears, ſuch ſweetneſſes, and ſuch rigours of love, that ſhe prevailed with deteſtable Nero, who (by Anicetus, the ſame man who before killed his mother,) did raiſe a horrible calumny againſt the honour of his wife, and cauſed this inſtrument of the devil to affirm, that he had played with the Empreſſe; on which he cauſed her to be baniſhed, and poor Octavia, as a guilty perſon, did ſuffer under that wicked ſentence, and was baniſhed into the Iſle of Pandaluria: and becauſe Poppea could not ſleep in quiet with Nero as long as Octavia was alive, he filled up his cruelty, and by a moſt unworthy death he ſacrificed her to the appetite of that moſt bold woman, whom afterwards he killed with a ſpurn of his foot on the end of his life and of his Empire.

My pen is weary to deſcribe ſo many horrours, and doth go over them as on ſo many burning coals, but (my Reader) it is to repreſent unto you, that this pernicious caitiffe cauſing the poyſon of his evill actions to diffuſe it ſelf into the veins of all the city of Rome. The world was in its heighth of iniquity, when S. Paul and Seneca (meeting together at one time) did endeavour to cure the maladies of this wicked Court, the one by Philoſophy, the other by the Goſpel. Behold here the manners, learning, abilities, and the ſucceſſe both of the one and of the other.

Johannes Sarisburienſis.

Who hath not Seneca in veneration (a good Authour ſaith) hath not the underſtanding of a reaſonable man. He is known by all knowing men in his Writings, and miſ-known by ſome in his Manners and his Life. Suillius, a Roman Advocate, accuſed for corruption, and baniſhed by the counſell of Seneca at what time he was imployed in the government of Affairs, did write a defaming Book againſt that great perſonage, which two Greek Hiſtorians, but men of ſmall judgement, Dion and Xiphiline have followed, and in many things have blamed him with as much paſſion as impertinence. This Opinion hath infected divers ſpirits, who, either for want of capacity or application, do diſcourſe unto us of Seneca, as of a man quite contrary to his Books, which hath made me diligently to examine his Life, to take away the abuſe, and to give you an Idæa of that puiſſant Genius with as much cleameſſe as ſincerity.

From whence proceeded the calumnies againſt Seneca.

His birth.

Know then that he was a Roman by his Extract and Bloud. He was born at Corduba a city in Spain, which was then under the Empire of Rome, and full of Italians, who being born almoſt in all the parts of the world, were yet born within the Circle of their Empire. His father was of an ordinary family, a Gentleman of no great account, removed from the obſervation of the world, and as farre from command as from ambition, addicted above all things to the ſtudy of Eloquence, reaſonably learned, but of an admirable memory, for having but once heard them, he would readily rehearſe two thouſand names, and two hundred verſes. His mother was named Helvia, one of the moſt beautifull women in the Empire, full of underſtanding and judgement, of a high virtue and a rare modeſty; ſhe had ſome knowledge in letters, and an extraordinary capacity to increaſe that knowledge, if time and cuſtome had given her leave to take an advantage of it. His elder brother was called Novatus or Gallion, and had a great command in the Empire. His younger brother was named Mela, a man farre from ambition, who lived in the houſe, and ſtudied Eloquence with his Father, who in that regard did preferre him in his own judgement above his brothers.

His Education and Spirit.

But Seneca was nouriſhed and advanced in Rome in the time of Auguſtus Ceſar; he received his firſt elements of learning under the Diſcipline of his father, and afterwards ſtudied Philoſophy under Attalus and Socion. In his firſt years he made the vigour of his Spirit, the force of Eloquence, and the abundance of Learning to appear ſo fully in him, that he was admired by the moſt knowing men. But that great ſpirit did by degrees conſume his body which was lean and thin, and troubled with defluxions and the ptiſick, which would have brought him to his grave, if the cruelty of Nero had not prevented it.

The fury of Caligula againſt him.

He was obliged to make an Oration in publick before Caligula the Emperour, concerning which that monſter in nature who could not endure any thing that was great and praiſefull, and by a malignity of manners, envied all profeſſours of Learning, did pronounce aloud that he had too much ſpirit, and that they muſt kill him, which had preſently been put in execution, if one of the Miſtreſſes of the Emperour, who knew Seneca, and favoured him for his Eloquence, had not perſwaded him, that he was not worth killing, a lean poor fellow, and one whom death would ſuddenly of it ſelf take away from the world. Howbeit, he lived many years afterwards, and increaſed in knowledge as in age, and as much in Eloquence as in them both, attending a more favourable time to make a manifeſtation of it.

poor

Claudius ſucceeded the Emperour Caligula, who was not a man for Seneca, and though he was indued with extraordinary qualities for a Courtier, yet the favour of the times did not much ſmile upon them. His clear ſpirit and his brave works made him to be known in the houſe of Germanicus, a Prince of the Bloud, who was poyſoned in the flower of his age, and left behind him children of great conſideration, namely, two Princeſſes, who made themſelves diverſly talked of in Rome; the one was Julia, the other Agrippina, the mother of Nero. This Julia took an affection to Seneca, being much pleaſed with the beauty of his ſpirit, and the grace of his diſcourſe. He daily frequented the houſe of Germanicus, being no leſſe in diſcretion then in favour, and wiſely judged that theſe two high-born Princeſſes might one day contribute to the making of his fortunes.

Dion doth diſtinguiſh them in his 9. Book, and Suetonius chap. 29.

But the Court is an uncertain ſea where ſometime a tempeſt doth ariſe when a calm is expected. The favour of Julia, in the ſtead of advancing Seneca, did ſuppreſſe him, and did almoſt overwhelm him without any hope of riſing again, although in the end it was in effect the cauſe of all his reputation. It came to paſſe that Meſſalina the wife to the Emperour Claudius, the moſt inſatiable woman in her luſts that Nature ever produced, did conceive an enraged hatred againſt the houſe of Germanicus, and eſpecially againſt the Princeſſe Julia, becauſe ſhe was highly eſteemed for her rare beauty; and the high ſpirit of Meſſalina could not endure that any Lady ſhould be praiſed at Court, for her beauty, but her ſelf. Beſides, ſhe perceived that her husband, whom ſhe abſolutely governed, did make very much of that young Princeſſe, ſhe therefore cauſed her to be falſly accuſed for proſtituting her honour, and procured her to be baniſhed the Court. An inquiry was made after thoſe who did frequent her houſe: Seneca was named amongſt the foremoſt, and by calumny invelopped in the ſame accuſation, whether it was ſuſpected that he had treated of love with her, or whether it was thought that he was an accomplice in her exceſſes, and had flattered her in her paſſion without giving her advice.

Calumny againſt Julia and Seneca.

It is true that our Seneca was then in the flower of his age, and was none of thoſe ſullen and ſtern Stoicks that had put the world into a fright: He had a gentle ſpirit, diſcreet, and agreeable to women, but he was too adviſed to let his paſſions flie ſo high as to commit any looſe act in the houſe of the Ceſars. Dion his greateſt enemy doth juſtifie him in this buſineſſe, and doth confeſſe that all this accuſation was moſt unjuſtly grounded, and that Meſſalina was ſo depraved and ſo corrupted with the inordinateneſſe of filthy luſts that no credit was to be given to her.

Nevertheleſſe, ſhe ceaſed not to bear down the innocent with the weight of her power; ſhe condemned the Princeſſe to baniſhment, and afterwards to death, as Dion and Suetonius do affirm: It did much afflict her that Seneca was alive, who by divers ſentences in the Senate was allotted to death: but the good Emperour Claudius was moſt unwilling to extinguiſh in that Spirit, the Glory of Eloquence, and of the Empire, deſired his life of the Senate, and was contented that he ſhould be baniſhed into the Iſle of Corſica, where at the beginning he was touched with a melancholy amazement to find himſelf ſeparated from the pleaſures of the Court to live amongſt the rocks, and people as ungentle as the rocks; but he imployed all his Philoſophy to comfort himſelf, and to temper the eagerneſſe of his fortune with the tranquility of his mind.

Here his ſpirit being delivered from the noiſe and the tumults of Rome, and the ſervitudes of the Court, did altogether reflect upon it ſelf, and found there thoſe Lights and thoſe Treaſures which before lay undiſcovered to him. Tribulation is to men as a ſpurre to incite them to the production of brave works and of generous actions; and this appeared in Seneca, who in this place of baniſhment did write moſt excellent Treatiſes, neither did his converſation with thoſe rude inhabitants alter the graces or the beauty of his language. He treated there with the Intelligences, and dived into the Contemplation of the World: He took off the vail from Nature that ſhe might the better be ſeen in her majeſty. Howſoever in that ſolitary place he had ſometimes his hours of affection, beholding himſelf ſevered from his mother whom he tenderly loved, and whom, in that affliction, he comforted with a letter which might paſs for a good book. He paſſionately deſired the company of his brothers and ſome perſonages of Honour who loved him with as much ſincerity as profeſſion.

Seneca baniſhed to Corſica where he compoſed excellent works.

There was ſome that think it ſtrange in Seneca that he ſhould deſire and endeavour his return, and that in his conſolatory letter to Polybius he did write the praiſes of the Emperour Claudius who did baniſh him. But have not they ſomthing to do who exact more perfection in Seneca, a man at that time of the world, then is required in a Prophet: where is the bird that doth not ſometimes beat his bill againſt the cage to find out the door to his liberty? Jeremy was exceeding patient, and yet he humbly beſought K. Zedekiah to draw him out of priſon where he had ſuffered much, and much feared that he ſhould be committed again unto it. Doth not S. Paul ſay that liberty is better then ſlavery, & that one is to be ſupported by neceſſity, and the other to be procured by reaſon. What fault hath Seneca done, that in his exile he wrote unto Polybius (a great favourite) a letter conſolatory on the death of his brother, and inſerted in it a few good words to appeaſe the Emperour. Should he have ſpared a period or two to deliver himſelf from a baniſhment where he had continued for the ſpace of eight years? I ſhould no way approve him for beſtowing flatteries on a wicked man, which ſhould be an act unworthy of a Philoſopher; for a generous ſpirit had better to endure the extremity of evil then praiſe a tyrant, and give applauſes to his perſon. You may obſerve how carefull he is in that Tract to give not ſo much as one Complement to Meſſalina, who was a very bad woman, although ſhe had the command of all; he onely praiſed an Emperour who in that time wherein he wrote his Conſolation to Polybius, was in good reputation, and made the face of the Empire look farre otherwiſe then it did in the Reign of Caligula his predeceſſour. He is ſo diſcreet, that all the praiſes he doth give him are no more then wiſhes.

Seneca did well to deſire and procure his liberty.

"Let the Powers of Heaven preſerve him long on "earth; Let him ſurmount the years and the acts of "Auguſtus; and as long as he ſhall be mortall, let "there not any die in his houſe. Let him give us a "long ſonne to be Maſter of the Roman Empire, ha-"ving approved him by his long fidelity; And let "him have him rather for his Colleague then for his "Succeſſour. (Afterwards he addreſſeth himſelf to "Fortune, & ſpeaketh unto her,) Take heed, O Fortune "how thou makeſt thy approaches to him. Let not "thy power be ſeen in his perſon but by thy bounties. "Let him redreſſe the calamities of mankind, and re-"eſtabliſh all that which the fury of his Predeceſſour "hath ruined and made deſolate. Let that fair Starre "which is riſen when the world was falling into the

The excellent Complement of Seneca.

" Abyſmes, continue alwayes to illuminate the Uni" verſe. Let him pacifie Germany, and let him open " England. Let him gain and ſurmount the Tri" umphs of his Father. His Clemency, which is the " firſt of his Virtues, doth promiſe that I ſhall not be " a Spectatour onely, and that he hath not caſt me " down, to raiſe me up no more. But why ſay I,
" caſt down? he hath upheld me from the hour that " I fell into my misfortune; when they would have " thrown me headlong down, he interpoſed; and by " the moderation of his divine hands he laid me
" gently on the earth. He hath entreated the Senate " for me, and not content himſelf to give me life, he " hath deſired it of others that I might enjoy the " Grant with more aſſurance. Let him deal with " me as he pleaſeth, I aſſure my ſelf that his Juſtice
" will find my cauſe to be good, or his Clemency
" will make it ſo. It is all one to me whether I am
" judged not guilty by his Equity, or whether I am
" made innocent by his Bounty. In the mean time,
" I rejoyce in my miſeries with a ſenſible conſolation
" to ſee the courſe of his Mercy which goes through " the Univerſe, and which every day doth call forth the " Baniſhed from this little corner of the earth in which " I am buried alive. I have that hope that his Mercy " will not come to me, to go beyond me, and to leave " me to die in this place. He knoweth the time in " which he will relieve thoſe whom he pleaſeth, and " I muſt leave that to his Diſpenſation; onely I ſhall " endeavour not to render my ſelf unworthy of his " Benefits, and I will provide in ſome ſort that his
" Goodneſſe ſhall not bluſh to have made its ap" proaches to me. How happy, O Ceſar, is your " Clemency! under whom the Baniſhed do live
" more contented, then Kings did heretofore under " your Predeceſſour.

Behold here the fineſt Complement that ever proceeded from the mouth of man, and he who well obſerves it, will find nothing of ſordid flattery in it. And that the Reign of Claudius, compared to that of Caligula, doth go ſo farre beyond it, as ſilver ſurpaſſeth lead. Yet for all thoſe fair words, Claudius did nothing for him as long as Meſſalina did manage the heighth of the Affairs, and till after his Polybius, who ſuffered himſelf to ſink into that infamy, as to be numbred in the Liſt of the Adulterers with the Empereſſe, was diſgraced, and condemned to death: not long after which this proſtituted Woman having wearied both heaven and earth with her filthineſſe, did inceniſe her husbands Patience into a Rage, who cauſed her to paſſe under the edge of the ſword.

The revolution at Court, and the return of the baniſhed.

Agrippina, widow to Domitius the father of Nero, returned then to the Court, having abſented her ſelf long from it by reaſon of the misfortune of her ſiſter Julia; ſhe knew ſo well to cajole the Emperour, that he eſpouſed her as I have mentioned before. The firſt action ſhe did, and for which ſhe was praiſed by all the world, was her revoking of Seneca to Rome from the Iſle of Corſica: immediately afterwards, ſhe committed the charge of her ſon Nero into his hands, who was then eleven years of age, and finding him to be a man of a choice ſpirit, ſhe took a reſolution to make one day uſe of his ſervice in the management of the affairs of State.

Seneca returns into high repute.

To ſpeak ſincerely of the manners of Seneca, he had a great and a gallant ſoul, and diſpoſitions to a high virtue; he was neither guileſull, nor wilfull, nor malicious, nor cruel, nor voluptuous, and I do ſtrongly believe, that of a Gentleman he was the beſt man of that Age. Alſo Cornelius Tacitus, who conceaſeth no evil that he knows, and oftentimes doth divine on that of the which he is not throughly informed, doth never ſpeak of Seneca but with honour, as a wiſe and ſober man, and moderate in his paſſions. And Saint Hierome himſelf doth witneſſe, that he was a moſt continent perſon, which may ſuffice to diſabuſe thoſe who ſuffer themſelves to be amazed with the Rapſodies of Dion.

The manners of Seneca.

Without all doubt he had ſomething in his ſoul as religious as it was great, which did not contentent it ſelf with words but did proceed to actions; And this did eaſily appear in his youth, for when ſo many gentlemen of Rome did reſort to the Univerſities of the Philoſophers, ſome for the wantonneſſe of ſporr, others to ſee faſhions, others to carry away ſome fine ſentence in their Table-book, and by that means to get ſome eſteem in converſation, Seneca addreſſed himſelf unto them to learn and to practiſe virtue. When he intended to ſpeak of Riches, of Solitude, of Chaſtity, of Sobriety, he found his heart inflamed, and he would have lived altogether a retired life, if the great qualities wherewith God had indued him had not imbarked him in the Affairs of the Court.

It is a wonder that amongſt ſo great a confluence at the Court, he alwayes obſerved that auſtere life which he practiſed in his infancy. He did never eat of any delicacies which do ſerve onely to flatter the appetite, and did content himſelf with the moſt ſimple viands. He never drank any wine, he uſed altogether cold baths, he did not care for perfumes, he oftentimes would lie on the ground upon a poor matteras, where no print of his body was to be ſeen, ſo hard it was. He alſo ſometimes did abſtain from food, and he found it good for him, and all his life time he had practiſed it, if his father had not expreſly commanded him to the contrary, becauſe in the Reign of Tyberius Epiſt. 108. there was a ſect of ſtrangers condemned at Rome who made a profeſſion of certain Abſtinences. Some are of opinion that he did ſpeak of Chriſtians, but they were neither known nor perſecuted under the Emperour Tyberius. For the reſt, all his Train were carried in one caroach which oftentimes was out of order; and inſtead of lovely Pages and Minions, he was ſerved by men onely, and ſmall was the retinue that attended on him.

He received all things that were given him with facility, and complained not of any thing: He took no offence at the reports and ſlanders of men, and pardoned many other inconveniencies, he had an honeſt heart and full of love to thoſe to whom he profeſſed love; he was tender of compaſſion on the behalf of the poor, and a hater of covetouſneſſe. After he had ſatisfied the Affairs of the Empire, he took no pleaſures at all but in Contemplation and Study, Books being unro him as neceſſary as his bread. His table was moderate, his diſcourſe affable, his life innocent, and his converſation moſt attractive. Amongſt other things, he would be angry with himſelf for not having profeſſed Virtue openly enough, and for reflecting his thoughts on the conſiderations of the world: and in modeſty he would ſay, that he aſpired alwayes to the heighth of Virtue, and nevertheleſſe he ſtill found himſelf to be in the centre of Vices. Thoſe who condemne him without knowing what he was, would think that they themſelves did great penance if they ſhould live after the manner of Seneca. He was with Nero five or ſix years before he was made Emperour, and formed his Infancy with excellent Inſtructions: in the mean time Agrippina did the fatall act, as I have ſpoken, and poiſoned Claudius her husband to devolve the Empire on her ſon, who was elected by the generall conſent of all the States.

It is too true that Seneca found himſelf overcharged with joy at ſo great a change, and at that time a little forgat the ſeverity of a Philoſopher, when he compoſed a railing Book on the death of Claudius which he called Apocolocynthoſis; as if he ſhould have ſaid, Divinity acquired by the means of a Drug, alluding to that he was numbred in the catalogue of the Gods, being preferred to heaven by poyſon. Some believe that he compoſed that Book as well to revenge himſelf for the death of his dear Benefactour Julia, and for the affliction of his long baniſhment, as to tejoyce his Scholar Nero who took great pleaſure in it. But in my opinion, it is unworthy the gravity of ſo great a perſonage; and I know not to what purpoſe it is to revile the Aſhes of the Dead, although it is not forbidden to write a true Hiſtory to leave a horrour to poſterity in recording the lives of the wicked. This, howſoever, may ſerve for inſtruction not to play with waſps or incenſe thoſe who have the pen in their hand, and can eternally proſcribe their Adverſaries.

forgat

Seneca made a Libel againſt Claudius.

After this ſport he was imployed upon the Earneſt, and Agrippina, mother of the young Emperour, deſiring to confirm her ſelf in the Monarchy, and to govern by her ſon, did ſupply him with two creatures, men of great capacity and fidelity, Burrus for Arms, and Seneca for Laws. The firſt was ſevere in his converſation, the other was of a mild and pleaſing diſpoſition. They both agreed even to their deaths in the government of the Affairs of State. Then it was that Seneca did enter into thoſe great imployments, and exerciſed that high wiſdome which he had acquired for the Government of the Empire. He began with his Prince, who was the firſt and the moſt amiable object of all his troubles; and although at the firſt he did expreſſe himſelf very tractable and agreeable to all the world, yet Seneca perceived in his infancy the marks of a cruel and bloudy nature; and told to his intimate friends that he nouriſhed a young lion whom he endeavoured to make tractable, but if he ſhould taſte once of the bloud of men, he would return to his firſt nature. And this was the occaſion that at that time he did write for him the two Divine Books of Clemency, where, with variety of remarkable proofs he doth eſtabliſh, the Excellency, the Beauty, and the Profit of candor of Spirit, and the advantage which redounds unto a Prince to govern his Subjects with Bounty and Love. On the contrary, he remonſtrates the horrour and diſaſtres of Tyrants who would prevail by Cruelty in the management of their Eſtates. All his endeavour tended that way, wiſely foreſeeing that Nero would fall into extreme Cruelties, and for that cauſe he did willingly give way that he ſhould delight himſelf in Comedies, in Muſick and ſuch Exerciſes of ſoftneſſe, hoping that in ſome manner it would make more civil his ſavage nature. He alſo compoſed for him many eloquent Orations, which the young Emperour would pronounce with great grace to the generall admiration both of the Senate and the people.

He is made Miniſter of State.

His judgement on Nero.

He made alſo many excellent Ordinances, ſome whereof, by the report of Dion, were engraved upon a pillar of ſilver, and were read every year at the renewing of the Senate. He hated all the inventions, the deceits, and tricks of State as a trade of iniquity, and did ground himſelf on the eternall principles of Juſtice, by which he kept the Empire in a profound peace, in great abundance, and a ſure felicity. So that in a manner Frontine makes a true narration, he ſaith that Seneca had ſo redreſſed all abuſes, that it ſeems he had brought goodneſſe into the Empire, and called the Gods from heaven to be converſant again with men. In which he made uſe of the Philoſophy of the Stoicks, not that which is ſo rigid and ſo ſullen, but that which he had tryed and ſeaſoned for that deſigne to give to the world a taſte thereof. His opinions for the moſt part are Rationall, Sacred, and Divine.

He put his State in good order.

The Maximes of Seneca.

If he ſpeaks of God it is in the ſame ſenſe as the Saviour of the world did diſcover to the Samaritan. He profeſſeth openly that God is a Spirit, and that the difference betwixt God and us is, that the better part of us is Spirit; but that God is all Spirit, moſt Pure, Eternall, Infinite, the Creatour of the great works of Nature which we behold with our eyes.

Of God.

If he ſpeaketh of true Worſhip and the moſt ſincere Religion which we ought to imploy to honour and adore the ſovereign King of the Univerſe; he doth ſufficiently declare, that the worſhip of God ought to be in Spirit and in Truth, as our Saviour hath preſcribed. When you figure God (ſaith he) repreſent a great Spirit, but peaceable, and reverend by the ſweetneſſe of his Majeſty; a friend to men, and who is alwayes preſent with them, who is not pleaſed with bloudy Sacrifices, for what delight can he take in the butchery of ſo many innocent creatures. The true Sacrifice of the great God, is a pure Spirit, an upright underſtanding of him, and a good Conſcience. We ought not to heap ſtones upon ſtones to raiſe a Temple to him, for what need hath he of it: the moſt agreeable Temple that we can build for God, is to conſecrate him in our hearts. Lactantius hath ſo much eſteemed of this paſſage, that in the ſixth Book of his Inſtitutions he doth oppoſe it to the Gentiles as a buckler of our Chriſtianity.

Of Religion

Lactan. div. Inſtit. lib. 6. cap. 25.

If there be a queſtion about the Preſence of God, which above all things the maſters of ſpirituall life do commend in their Inſtructions, he ſaith, That it is to no purpoſe to conceal ones ſelf from man, and that there is nothing hid from God who is preſent in our hearts and in our moſt ſecret thoughts.

Of the divine preſence Epiſt. 83.

If we reſt in the Contemplation of the Divine Providence, which is the foundation of our life, he believeth a Providence which reacheth over all. And in a Tract which he hath compoſed, he pertinently doth anſwer thoſe who are amazed, why Evil arriveth to good people, ſince ſo great and ſo good a God hath a care of their wayes. He ſaith, That it is the chaſtiſement of a Father, an exerciſe of Virtue, and that what we take to be a great Evil is oftentimes the occaſion of a great Good; that ſuch is the courſe and order of the world according to the Divine diſpenſation, to which we ought to ſubmit our ſelves.

Of Providence.

If we conſider the Immortality of the Soul, which is the foundation of our Faith and of all virtuous actions, it is certain that he had a good opinion of it, and profeſſeth in his 102. Epiſtle, That he delighteth not onely according to Reaſon to ſearch after the Eternity of the Soul, but to believe it; and he complaineth that a letter received from a friend did interrupt him in that Contemplation, which ſeemed to him ſo palpable, that it was rather to him an agreeable Viſion that he had in a Dream then any Diſcourſe in Philoſophy. And in the end of the Epiſtle he ſpeaketh of wonders, of the originall of the Soul, and the return of it to God. And in the Preface of the firſt Book of Naturall Queſtions, which he did write ſome few years before his death (which makes the truth more remarkable) he ſpeaketh clearly, that the Soul returneth to heaven, if it be well purified from its commerce with earth; that heaven is its true Countrey and Element; and that it is a great proof of its Divinity that it delighteth to hear of heavenly things as being the affairs proper to it ſelf.

Of the Immortality of the Soul.

Juvat de æternitate animarum quærere, imò credere, Epiſt. 102.

We muſt take care not here to judge and condemn Seneca on a doubtfull word, as when in his Conſolation to Martia he ſaith, That all end by Death, and by Death it ſelf. He onely there toucheth of Goods and Evils, of Honours, Riches, Pleasures, Troubles, and the Cares of this present life. It is most clear, that there is nothing in that Sentence which derogates from the Immortality of the Soul, because he concludes that Treatise with the joyes which a happy Soul receiveth in the other life. And it is not from our purpose to consider, that Seneca sometimes in disputing speaketh by supposition, according to the Idæa of others and not according to his own. We cannot know better the opinion of an Authour then by his Actions and his Practise; and we observe that Seneca hath not onely professed the Immortality of the Soul by words, but believeth the effect in secret; for he reverenced the Souls of great Personages, and did believe them to be in heaven, which he testified before he received the Christian Faith, when being in a countrey-house of Scipio of Africa, he rendred divine honours to his Spirit, prostrating himself at the Altar of his Sepulchre, and perswading himself (he said) that his Soul was in heaven, not because that he was Generall of the Army, but because he lived an honest man, and having infinitely obliged his ingratefull countrey, he retired himself in a voluntary solitude to his own house to give no fears and jealousies of his greatnesse.

Epist. 86.

His opinion of the sovereign good.

If we demand where he placed the sovereign good and the end of Man, we shall find that he established the felicity of this present life to live according to Reason; and that of the life to come in the re-union of the Soul with its first beginning which is God. From this foundation he hath drawn a rule and propositions which he hath dispersed over all his Books, and these are to despise all the goods of the world, Honours, Empires, Riches, Reputation, Pleasures, gorgeous Habiliments, stately Buildings great Possessions, Gold, Silver, precious Stones Feasts, Theatres, Playes, and to take all things as accessory, and to regard them no more then the moveables of an Inne where we are not but as passengers. And above all things, to esteem of virtue, of the mortification of loose desires, of contemplation of eternall virtues, of Justice, Prudence, Fortitude, Temperance; of Liberality, Benignity; of Friendship; of Constancy in a good course of life; of Patience in Tribulation; of Courage to support injuries; of Sickness, Banishment, Chains, Reproaches; of Punishments, and of Death it self.

We may affirm that never any man spoke more worthily then he of all these subjects. Never Conquerour did subdue Nations with more honour, then this great Spirit with a magnificent glory at his feet hath levelled and spurned down all the Kingdomes of Fortune. All that he speaketh is vigorous, ardent, lively. His heart when he did write did inflame his style to inflame the hearts of all the world. His words followed his thoughts. He did speak in true Philosophy but as a king, and not as a slave to words and periods. His brevity is not without clearnesse. His strength hath beauty, his beauty hath no affectation: he is polished, smooth, full, and entire; never languishing, impetuous without confusion; his discourse is diffused, yet nothing unmasculine; invincible in his reasoning, and agreeable in all things. Howsoever, we ought not to conclude by his Books that he was a Christian, because he wrote them all before he had any knowledge of Christianity, and therefore it is not to be wondred at, if sometimes he hath Sentences which are not conformable unto our Religion.

The answer to the calumniatours of Seneca.

Some one will object that he is admirable in his Writings, but his Works carry no correspondency with his Pen. This indeed is the abuse of some spirits grounded on the calumnies of Dion and Suillius, which those men may easily see confuted, who without passion will open their eyes unto the truth. He reproacheth him for his great Riches, in lands, in gold and silver, and sumptuous moveables, and layeth to his charge that he had five hundred beds of cedar with feet of ivory. It seems that this slanderer was steward of Seneca's house, so curious he was in decyphering his estate. But all this is but a mere invention, for how is it possible that he who according to Cornelius Tacitus did not live but onely on fruit, and bread, and water, and who never had any but his wife to eat with him, or two or three friends at most, should have five hundred beds of cedar and ivory to serve him at his feasts. It is true that he had goods enough, but nothing unjustly gotten; they were the gifts and largesses of the Emperour. And because he had sometimes written that Goods were forbidden to Philosophers, he therefore was content to hold them in servitude and not to be commanded by them. He was overcome by Nero to carry some splendour in his house, as being the chiefest of the Estate, and it was put upon him as a sumptuous habit upon some statue. We cannot find that he had ever any children but his Books, or that he made it his study to enrich his Nephews or his Nieces, or to raise a subsistence for his house from the charges, greatnesse, and riches of the Empire. He had the smallest train and pomp that possibly could be, and when he had the licence to be at liberty from the Court, he lived in an admirable simplicity; and which is more, he besought Nero with much importunity to discharge him from the unprofitable burden of his riches, and to put severall stewards into his houses to receive his revenues: but he made answer to him that he did a wrong unto himself to demand that discharge, for he had nothing too much, and that he had in Rome many slaves enfranchized who were farre more rich then Seneca.

Yet for all this Reproach is proved to be unjust, Dion proceeds further in his slander, and alledgeth, That he indeared Queens and Princes to him, for he wrote their Papers, and professed himself a friend to the richest Favourites. What is this, but to reproach a Courtier with his Trade, his Discretion, his Civility, his Affability which this great personage made very worthily to comply with his Philosophy. He married an illustrious Lady and of invaluable wealth. What! should he being in that high dignity to please Suillus, become suitor to some chamber-maid, or for mortifications sake, court some countrey girle? ought he to bring such a reproach after him to the Court of the Prince, what sinne hath he committed to espouse the most honest Lady in Rome called Paulina, and to have lived with her in the condition of a good husband, and in a perfect intelligence. But he made love to the mother of the Emperour. This slander never came into the thought neither of Tacitus, nor Suetonius, nor any other Historian who was a man of judgement. It was onely the invention of an Impostor infected with poyson that dreamed of any such thing. Agrippina had other manner of gallants and servants then Seneca in her Court: she sought not after bodies made thin with abstinence, and manners quite removed from such commerce. In a Court so clear-sighted there could never be discovered any familiarities which might give the least impression of such a thought, and which would have removed both the one and the other; no, Seneca did rather encline too much unto severity then to give any allurements to Agrippina.

His falling off from Agrippina.

The Glosser yet goes further and saith, That he was ungratefull to her. What ingratitude? he alwayes endeavoured to tie the spirits of the mother to the son in a perfect friendship, and did not cease to redresse all breaches that might give occasion of offence. But when he obſerved that Agrippina did mount upon the Throne of her ſon, did give audience to the Ambaſſadours of the Nations, did viſit the Armies; and when he heard her vaunt that the Empire came unto him by her means, and that ſhe would take it away from him when ſhe thought good, he could not digeſt it. He preſerved himſelf in that fidelity which he had ſworn unto the Emperour, but he never counſelled him either to remove Agrippina or to diſpleaſe her. When Nero very warmly called him and Burrhus together, and in a great fright told them that his mother had conſpired againſt his life, and that he was but a dead man if he did not prevent it. Seneca remained ſo loſt in amazement, that in all his life he was never dumb but at that inſtant. And Cornelius Tacitus makes no mention of the leaſt word he did let fall that might witneſſe his conſent to ſo horrible a deed. It is true that he compoſed the Declaration of Nero after his mothers death, but it was by a rigorous neceſſity. He found himſelf betwixt two deſperate extremities, either to leave the whole Empire at randome, to forſake the Helm and the Veſſel in the tempeſt, and tender his neck to Nero, or to find ſome lenitive to eaſe the calamities ſo full of virulence. Some there are that do thus excuſe him for it, and ſay, It was no marvel that he did deport himſelf in this faſhion, becauſe he was near to Princes, and that thoſe who even make a profeſſion of virtue, do ſtudy their own preſervation, and oftentimes conceal thoſe affairs which they cannot redreſſe.

when

He is excuſable for making the Declaration

For my own part, I am of judgement, that great men being in a place where they are obliged to ſpeak, if they ſhould wilfully or timerouſly hold their peace, do grievouſly offend God by their ſilence, and that Seneca ſhould rather have died then have adhered to Nero polluted with his mothers bloud, and execrable to all the world.

He had before demanded leave to be gone from Court, wiſely foreſeeing the tempeſts that follow, but he could not obtain it, nor reſiſt Nero, without putting himſelf in danger of his life. You ſee there may be a time when an honeſt man ſhould rather venter his life then give a ſcandall unto Virtue. But his diſſimulation could not help him from being made at laſt a ſacrifice to his moſt cruel Scholar, as we anon ſhall declare unto you.

Why Seneca having ſo many gallant qualities did perform ſo little in the reformation of Manners.

But for the preſent let us demand and examine the cauſe, why Seneca with ſo much Power, Authority, Eloquence, Philoſophy, and humane Wiſdome did effect ſo little for the reformation of manners in the Court of Nero, and in the City of Rome? It is without all doubt that the wiſdome of Books was too low for ſo high a deſign. We muſt make uſe of the grace of Redemption, and the Bloud, and the Goſpel of Jeſus to redreſſe ſuch lamentable confuſions. Let us then behold S. Paul, who at the ſame time did come to plant the Faith in Rome, and talked with Seneca, and made him to behold more excellent Light in the purity of his Life and Doctrine.

Serrar. Baran. Cornel.

It is not my intention in this place to write at large the life of S. Paul, which is already ſufficiently known, but particularly to touch on thoſe things which he did at Rome when Seneca was in the government of the Affairs of the Empire. Nevertheleſſe, it is expedient to make a ſhort recapitulation of the Times and the Voyages of this great Apoſtle, to underſtand the occaſion that did bring him to Rome, and what he there did practiſe for the advancement of the Faith.

S. Paul came to Rome.

S. Paul being born in the ſecond or third year of our Saviour, was miraculouſly converted to the Chriſtian Religion in the three and thirtieth year of his age. By his Extraction, he was a Jew born in the city of Tarſus, in the Province of Cilicia, where was a flouriſhing Univerſity, from which came Antipater, Archidemus, Artemidorus, Diogenes, and Diodorus. But S. Paul, although he took his birth in the air of the Philoſophers, and had ſome tincture of their Principles, did not amuſe himſelf on the Philoſophy of the Gentiles, but retiring to Jeruſalem he ſtudied at the feet of Gamaliel a great Doctour of the Moſaick Law. The zeal which he had for his Religion made him furiouſly to perſecute Chriſtianity from his birth unto the time that he was ſubdued by the Spirit of God; and of a ravening wolf was made a lamb of the Fold. Saul fell (ſaith S. Auguſtine) and Paul did riſe, the Interpretation of which name according to Heſychius is admirable, to ſhew unto us, that all things are marvellous in him, even his name it ſelf.

S. Paul falſly accuſed.

After his Converſion, he preached in Arabia and in Damaſcus for the ſpace of three years, and did powerfully convince the Jews on the verities of our Faith, who to divert the courſe of his Miniſtery in the imbroilments which then were raiſed between the King of the Arabians and the Romans, did accuſe him for having moved in the favour of Rome againſt the Arabians and their King Aretas, who at that time held the city of Damaſcus, and had placed in it a Governour of his own faction. This Barbarian made an exact inquiſition, and would have apprehended S. Paul who was then in the ſame city. But his brethren the Chriſtians were very carefull to deliver the Innocent from the hands of the guilty; and ſhewing themſelves neither ſlothful nor fearful in a buſines of that difficulty, (although he who had in his hands the Government of the City did threaten to deſtroy them if they delivered not Paul unto him) they cauſed him to eſcape out of a window, and to come down all along the Ramparts thereof in a panier which had a cord faſtned to it.

Baron. Chriſti. Anno 39 Cornel. in 2. apud Corin. cap. 11.

His converſation with S. Peter.

From thence he tranſported himſelf to Jeruſalem, where he ſaw S. Peter, and continued with him fifteen dayes in one lodging, not without joyes and raviſhments that cannot be expreſſed. We ought to content our ſelves with that which the Doctour of the Nations ſaith in his Epiſtle to to the Galathians, where he aſſureth us, That he did hiſtorize the Prince of the Apoſtles: that is to ſay, He did contemplate on him as an Hiſtorian doth on a Prince whoſe Hiſtory he hath a deſign to write. He regarded not (ſaith S. Hierome) whether he were fat or lean, or whether he were bald or had a Roman noſe, he onely dived into his ſpirit and his heart, and there he diſcovered all the treaſures of wiſdome.

Gal. I. 18. ἱστορῆσαι πέτρον.

After this moſt pleaſing Colloquie he retired himſelf into the city of Ceſarea, from whence he paſſed to Cilicia the place of his nativity, which he made fruitfull with his Inſtructions for the ſpace of four years. From thence S. Barnabas did leade him into Antioch, a famous city, where were a great number of Chriſtians, who in that place were firſt called by that moſt glorious Name, and which hath ever ſince continued with all thoſe who have made Profeſſion of our Faith.

He preacheth the Goſpel.

Having there ſojourned one year, he was deputed with S. Barnabas to carry the Charity of the Faithfull in Antioch unto Jeruſalem, which office he moſt worthily diſcharged, and they both taking John and Mark into their company, did travell into divers cities of Greece, and gave the Light of the Goſpel unto the Nations, which is at large deſcribed in the Acts of the Apoſtles, which ſeems almoſt to be onely written for S. Paul his ſake.

On the end of this long Voyage he came unto Jeruſalem at the firſt Councel held by the Apoſtles for the aboliſhing of Circumciſion, and other Jewiſh Ceremonies, to which certain Jews would oblige the Gentiles who were converted to the Faith, which Saint Paul could not endure, and what in him lay, did endeavour to chase away the shadows of the Old Law to make place for the Light of the Gospel; which was the reason that the Jews stirred up great Persecutions against him, and caused him to be apprehended in the fourth journey he made unto Jerusalem, and were resolved there to put him to death.

A great persecution against him.

As he entred privately into the Temple with Trophimus his Disciple, to discharge himself of some legall Ceremonies, the Jews that were come from Asia did descry him, who could not be ignorant of his conversation with the Gentiles, and began to cry aloud against him, saying, That he was an enemy of the Temple and the Law, which he endeavoured to destroy both by words and deeds, and that it was not fitting he should live. On this cry, a mutiny of enraged people did advance their fury, who did throw themselves upon S. Paul to stone him, and to tear him in pieces. The noise was brought to the Roman garrison in Jerusalem, and the news thereof came to Colonel Lysias, informing that all the City was in a confusion. He presently marched thither with the most resolute of the Souldiery, and plucked the Innocent from their hands to hear his Defence at their leisure. But these insolent Jews ceased not to follow him to the Corps de Guarde, where he was so invironed with them that he was carried by force on the Arms of the Souldiers into a place of safety.

When he saw himself within the power of the Romans he demanded of the Collonel the permission to speak to appease the people, which being obtained, he began to make an Oration to them in Hebrew, to inform them of his life and condition, and of the zeal which he had to the Religion of the Jews, and of his miraculous Conversion from it, as also of his Orders which he received from God to preach the Faith unto the Gentiles. When they heard these words, they believed what was told them of him, and they did deal with him as a friend of the Heathen, and an enemy of their Law. They began to lay down their garments to stone him, and to throw dust in the air, and to make a horrible tumult, whereupon Colonel Lysias who understood not the Hebrew tongue was amazed, and conceived S. Paul had been some felon, and guilty of some hainous crime. He took him to be the Egyptian who a little before had raised a great Sedition, and had drawn after him four thousand men into the wilderness; and to give consent to the wild multitude, he did command that he should be scourged.

S. Paul condemned to the whip, did divert that punishment.

They proceeded to the execution of this Injustice, and now S. Paul was bound by the hands of the executioners, who prepared themselves to put him into bloud, when he advised with himself to acquaint the officer who was to begin the punishment that he was a Citizen of Rome, in regard that those of the city of Tarsus did enjoy the priviledge of being Burgesses of the principall City of the world. The officer made haste unto the Tribune, and informed him with the quality of the prisoner, advertising him, that if they proceeded further on him they might be questioned for it. This was the occasion that the punishment was forborn, and the Tribune (to understand what he could plead for himself, being unwilling to trust unto the people) did assemble the Priests and Scribes with the chief of the Jews to hear his Apology.

His Addres

S. Paul did here use great discretion, and observing that the Assembly were composed of Sadduces and Pharisees who were counterpointed in the question of the Resurrection, he did cast them on it, and publickly acknowledging the Resurrection, he cryed out, that the Dead should rise again, and held it as an inviolable Article of his Faith. On this, the Doctours of the Law did enter into a hot dispute, and there was a great debate amongst them without making any examination at all concerning the fact of the prisoner. Lysias did very well perceive that all the contention was concerning some questions of the Jewish Law, and knowing that Felix Governour of Judea was then at Cesarea, he resolved to send Paul to him with a strong and a safe guard, because there were fourty Jews so obstinate, that they had made a vow neither to eat nor drink untill they had massacred S. Paul.

He is committed into the hands of Felix the President.

Felix, who was a man of a delicate ambition and jealous of his Authority, was well satisfied with what the Tribune had done, and did resolve to examine the Processe himself. The Saint was presented before one of the most corrupt Judges under heaven; he was brother to Pallas (a servant infranchized) who in the Reign of Claudius was the God of the times: and Felix (as Cornelius Tacitus doth affirm) being covered with the great power and favour of his brother, did usurp the Authority of a King, which he managed with a servile spirit, making Cruelty and Lasciviousnesse to reign with equal power in his Government. He was the husband, or rather the adulterer of three Queens, and she who then possessed him was called Drusilla, who was the daughter of that Agrippa who was in chains by Tiberius, of whom I have made mention in the Tome of the Maximi, and descended from the bloud of Mariamna. She was married to one named Azizus King of the Emmessæans, but because that Royalty was of no great extent, she preferred the President above the King, so that Felix courting her for her rare beauty, she did willingly forsake her husband to espouse the brother to the great Favourite Pallas, who lived then under a most high consideration. She conversed with him according to the Law of the Jews, and was almost as nice in the curiosity of Religions as of her beauties, which was the reason that (the more to gratifie her) Felix did cause S. Paul to be brought before him.

S. Paul before the Tribunall of Felix.

He was brought in chains before the President, and the Prince of the Priests failed not to make his appearance at Cesarea, with the Antients of the Jewish Nation, who brought with them an Advocate, named Tertullus, to plead against S. Paul, which he performed coldly enough. But the great Champion of Jesus Christ did defend himself with so great a vivacity of spirit, that the Judge did clearly discover that he was not guilty of any fault, which was the occasion that he used him with the more humanity, and told him, that at leisure he would decide that businesse himself; in the mean time he permitted him to live at more liberty, not hindering any to come unto him and administer things necessary for his life; yet for all this he was still under a guard of Souldiers.

Drusilla comes to hear him.

Not long after Felix called for him, and his wife Drusilla (who was the cause of his more gentle usage) did speak unto him in the presence of her husband, and desired to hear him on his discourses of Faith, which gave a fair occasion to our Apostle to speak, who driving on his Discourse with vigour, did so enlarge himself on the subject of Justice, of Chastity, and of universall Judgement, that Felix was much afraid, and interrupted his Discourse, fearing that he should leave some Scruples on the conscience of his wife concerning their marriage. It is easie to conjecture that this poor Princesse was much shaken at it, although the chains of Love and of Ambition did so link her to the world that we do not reade that she was absolutely converted to the Faith and number of the Christians. Felix stopping his ears to Judgement, did open his eyes to money, and having learned that S. Paul had brought great great ſums of Charity unto Jeruſalem, he oftentimes ſpoke with him, and ſeemed to make much of him, hoping to gain ſomething from him, but when he perceived that there was nothing to be had, and that the time of his Commiſſion was expired, he left Saint Paul to the diſcretion of Feſtus his ſucceſſour, deſiring in that to gratifie the Jews, and to divert the accuſation which they intended at Rome againſt him.

Feſtus renews the Proceſſe: S. Paul appealeth to Rome.

Feſtus being arrived at Jeruſalem was invironed by the chief of the Jews, who with importunity did demand that Paul might be ſent to Rome to be judged there, having a deſign to kill him by the way. But the Preſident did deny them, and did command them to come to Ceſarea, where he would continue in the expectation of them. Thither they did tranſport themſelves violently to follow their Accuſations, which were all effectually anſwered, and confuted by S. Paul, who did demonſtrate that he had offended neither their Law, nor the Temple, nor Ceſar. Feſtus to content the importunity of the Jews, did demand of him if he would go to Jeruſalem to decide the controverſie there, but he refuſed the Juriſdiction of thoſe perverſe people, and ſaid, That he ſtood at the Tribunall of Ceſar, and would have no other Judge, and that he appealed to the Emperour. The Judge had ſome debate thereupon, and it was reſolved that he ſhould be ſent to Rome.

The young Agrippa King of Judea, with his ſiſter Bernice aſſiſt at the judgement of Paul.

In the mean time the young King Agrippa the ſon of that Agrippa before ſpecified, came to Ceſarea with his ſiſter Bernice to complement the new Governour, who received them with great courteſie, and amongſt other things he made a relation to them of his priſoner, which poſſeſſed them both with a great curioſity to ſee him. Feſtus did invite them to the Audience, at which on the next morning they appeared with great pomp. This was a great Theatre which God had prepared for the publiſhing of the Goſpel, where were preſent, a King, a Queen, the Governour of the Romans, the principall of the Nation of the Jews, and an infinit number of people who did attend the ſucceſſe of that action.

S. Paul having received commandment to ſpeak, made a long diſcourſe couched in the Acts of the Apoſtles, where he rendred a reaſon of his Faith, and ſpake moſt worthily of the Reſurrection of the dead, of his Converſion to Chriſtianity, of the Apparition of Jeſus, of the Publication of the Goſpel, and of the Prophecies that did forego it. He declared himſelf with ſo much ardency, that Feſtus the Preſident, who was a Heathen, and found his Pagan conſcience wounded by his truths, was conſtrained to interrupt him, and to tell him, That much learning had made him mad; but S. Paul replyed to him, That he ſpoke the words of Truth and Sobriety; and turning from him to King Agrippa, he took him to witneſſe it, as being one who was not ignorant of the Prophets.

Feſtus touched with the words of S. Paul.

This young King was ſo raviſhed at it, that he profeſſed publickly to the Apoſtle, that he had felt him in his heart, and that he had almoſt perſwaded him to be a Chriſtian; whereupon S. Paul made a great acclamation of joy, wiſhing him that happineſſe to be like him in all things, his Bonds excepted, not judging that this Prince was yet an object capable of the Croſſe. He was of a ſweet condition, but he had then great obſtacles which hindred him from embracing the ſaving Truth. Bernice, who aſſiſted at that Audience, was a moſt lovely Princeſſe, the ſiſter of this Agrippa and Druſilla, but not ſo happy in the reputation of her Honour as of her Beauty. She was married firſt unto her uncle, and it is affirmed that ſhe was taken with the love of this her brother Agrippa, and that moſt paſſionately ſhe did affect him, nevertheleſſe to divert the fame and ſuſpicion of the world, finding her ſelf courted by Polemon King of Cilicia, ſhe conſented to eſpouſe him, on that condition that he ſhould be circumcized, to which the Prince was preſently reſolved, being overcome by the temptation of her Beauties and the exceſſe of Love to which ſhe had enflamed him. She remained a certain time with him, but her high and wanton ſpirit did diſtaſte him, and ſhe returned into her own countrey to the Embraces of her brother, who lived with her, and entertained her in his palace without regarding of the ſcandall.

I leave you to judge, my Readers, how the matter was diſpoſed to receive the fire which proceeded from the mouth of S. Paul. All that he could do was to imprint in the ſoul of the Prince and Princeſſe a good opinion of the Chriſtian Religion, and a good reſpect for his own perſon; for at the riſing of this Seſſion they told the Preſident, that there was nothing in that man, that deſerved either impriſonment or death, but becauſe he had appealed to Ceſar, it was neceſſary that he ſhould be ſent to Rome.

S. Paul imbarked for Rome.

After this, S. Paul was imbarked under the conduct of the Centurion Julius, who did uſe him with great humanity, and in the end, after a laborious voyage and ſhipwrack, they arrived at Rome. He made his coming known to the chiefeſt of his Nation, who then reſided in the capitall City of the world, and did inform them of his good Intentions, proteſting to them that he was not come to accuſe his Nation, but having done nothing againſt their Law or their Religion, they had delivered him over to the Infidels, who having found his cauſe good, were ready to clear him, had not the clamours and the oppoſitions of ſome of the Jews obliged him to that voyage; and as concerning the reſt, he was in chains (he ſaid) for the hope of the ſalvation of Iſrael. They made anſwer to him, that they had underſtood nothing of him in particular, but knew very well that the Sect of the Chriſtians which he had imbraced was contrary to all the world, and that they ſhould be glad to underſtand by what Arguments he could pretend to juſtifie them.

He arriveth there, and treateth with the Jews.

To which S. Paul conſented, and there were great Diſputations amongſt them concerning the myſteries of our Faith. S. Luke doth couclude his Hiſtory on theſe conferences, and ſpeaketh nothing of the Triall of S. Paul before the Magiſtrates of Rome; but we may learn it from the Epiſtle which the Apoſtle did write to his Diſciple Timothy, and from that which he adreſſed to the Philipians, where he declareth, that on the firſt action of that Triall he was forſaken of all the world, but ſingularly aſſiſted by God; and that the carrying on this affair did much improve it ſelf to the advancement of the Goſpel, his chains being known in Jeſus Chriſt to all the Prætoriums in Rome, and to all the world: as alſo, that at laſt he was delivered from the mouth of the lion, by whom he underſtood the Emperour Nero.

2 Tim. 4. Phil. 1.

S. Paul undoubtedly known unto Seneca.

From this, and from that which the holy Fathers and Interpreters have delivered, we may collect that Saint Paul came to Rome in the third year of the Emperour Nero, when as yet he was not depraved, and when Seneca was in the heighth of his reputation, and the management of the publick Affairs. We ought not to doubt that what is reported by the Pope S. Linus, concerning the knowledge which Seneca had with S. Paul, is true, ſeeing that great Miniſter of State who had his eye over all, and who was extremely curious to underſtand the diverſity of Sects and Religions, and to be informed of extraordinary Cauſes to make report thereof unto the Emperour, could no wayes be ignorant of ſo famous a thing which was made known in Rome both to the great and ſmall. Beſides, it is very probable that that Seneca assisted at the Triall, and heard the Reasons of S. Paul. We may also easily conjecture the Discourse which he made before the Priests and the Senatours of Rome by the Apologies and Defences which he used before Felix, Festus, King Agrippa, Bernice, and all the Assembly of the Jews; and by what he spake to the Senate of the city of Athens. He then declared himself to them much after this manner.

S. Pauls Oration to the Senate of Rome.

"I think my self this day happy that God hath "granted me the favour to justifie my self in your pre- "sence on all those Articles with which they of my Na- "tion have accused me, being throughly possessed of the "great sufficiency and the integrity of this Senate to "decide all differences in the Empire. For this, I do "begin to breathe again after my long and heavy voy- "age, and after a thousand troubles, beholding my "self now at the Tribunall of Cesar which I have im- "plored; and I beseech you to attend me with that "Patience and Equity which you never refuse to those "who are oppressed.

"My accusers know very well what hath been my "life from my youth, and how by the pleasure of God "being born at Tarsus a city in Cilicia, which is ho- "noured by the priviledge of Burgesses to this Capital "City of the world, I have followed the Religion of "my Fathers, conversing with a good and an upright "conscience before God and before men, without of- "fending any.

"I do avow, that according to the most perfect Sect "amongst us, I have always conceived assured hopes "of our Immortality, and of the universall Resurre- "ction of men, which is established by the the invio- "lable promise of the living God to whom nothing is "impossible; and that I have been most curious to "observe all the Ceremonies of our Law. The zeal "which did inflame me for it, did make me conceive "that I had reason to persecute the Christians, and ha- "ving received a Commission from the chiefest of the "Priests, I made an exact search to surprize, imprison, "and torment those who made profession of it.

"The fury did so farre transport me, that not con- "tent to prosecute a violent warre against them in Ju- "dea, I passed into strange Cities into which they were "fled to relieve themselves from punishment; it came "to passe, that going to Damascus (a city famous "enough) as I did breathe forth nothing but fire and "threatnings, I saw my self suddenly invironed with "a light so glorious, that it did surpasse the brightest "rayes of the Sun, and from that Splendour there "did proceed the voice of a man, who called me by "my name, and demanded of me wherefore I did per- "secute him. I speak (Sirs) before God and before "you with all sincerity, that I felt my self strongly sur- "prised, and I demanded of him that spake unto me, "who he was? to which he made answer, That he "was called Jesus, and that it was difficult for me to "strike my heels against the sharps of the spurre. And "immediately, as I lay in amazement prostrate on the "ground with those that were with me, he commanded "me to rise, and said unto me, That he would make "choice of me for his people, and for the Nations of the "earth, to give a testimony of him and to draw them "from the power of wicked Spirits to come unto the "Light, that they may obtain remission of sins and the "inheritance of Saints by the means of Faith, which "subsisteth in Jesus Christ.

"Sirs, For this I was not rebellious to the heavenly "Vision, but incontinently I set my self to preach the "Word of God, and to exhort all the world to con- "vert themselves unto him by the works of Peni- "tence. Behold all my fault, having done not any "thing against the Law, the Temple, or against Cesar; "having always counselled all the Subjects that ever "heard me in the Empire, to render unto him perfect "obedience. Nevertheless, certain of the Jews caused "me to be apprehended in the Temple, and excited "the people against me, who had torn me in pieces, if "I had not been succoured by the Armies and the Legi- "ons of the Empire. God hath preserved my life until "this present, to discharge the Ministery and the "Commission that he hath given me, which is, to "deliver to the Nations the news of eternall Sal- "vation.

"Sirs, I do observe you to be great observers of the "Religion of the Gentiles; you have Idols, and Tem- "ples most magnificent, but we ought not to imagine "that God who is a most pure Spirit, the Creatour of "heaven and earth, is inclosed in Temples built by the "hand of men, or that he stands on need of their "works for the accomplishment of his Glory. It is "he that giveth life, breath, wealth, honour, profit, and "all that we can hope for in this world. It is he who "from one man hath derived the vast multitude of the "people, who by a continuall succession do inhabite "the roundnesse of the earth. It is he who giveth "measures unto Times, and bounds unto Empires, and "who inhabiteth a Light unapproachable. It is he "who inspires us all with a generous curiosity to seek "him, and to do our endeavours to find him, and to "touch him with fingers if his condition render him "palpable. But he is not farre from every one of us, "For in him we live, we move, and have our being: "and to speak according to your own Poet, We are of "the generation of God.

"It is not then permitted to vilifie the Divine na- "ture beneath us, and to make it like unto things in- "sensible: as, to gold, silver, precious stones, and other "materials, elabourate by art, and by the invention of "men. And certainly, God from on high hath with "compassion beheld this ignorance of men, and hath "given them his Sonne the substantiall Image of his "Beauties, and the Character of his Glory; true God, "and true Man, who is dead for our sins, to wash us "and regenerate us in his Bloud, whose Words are "Truth, and whose Life a miracle, even to the triumph- "ing over Death by his Resurrection. It is by him "that the eternall Father will judge at the last both "the quick and the dead, and we all shall be represent- "ed before the Throne of his Majesty, to receive the "salary of the Good or Evill which in our bodies we "have done.

"This sovereign Monarch of Angels and of Men "suffers not himself to be taken by the flesh or the "bloud of bullocks, or by the perfumes of incense, but "by the exercise of Justice, and by the purity of our "bodies in all sanctification. Therefore (Sirs) as he "hath advanced you in Dignity above other men, "so he hath more particularly obliged you to acknow- "ledge and serve him, and to adore him in Spirit and "Truth, and to render Justice according to the Com- "mission which you have received from Cesar; which "is, to deliver the innocent from the persecution of the "insolent, that so being true imitatours of his Ju- "stice and Mercy, you may be one day partakers "of his Glory.

The effect of his Oration.

This Discourse was well received by divers of them, and a day was appointed for another Appearance, where he so much explained and enlarged himself, that he was sent back and pronounced guiltlesse; and permitted to preach the Gospel in Rome with all liberty, which gave much encouragemt to all the faithfull, and even those who had before forsaken him, did now re-assemble themselves, preaching in the Name of Jesus, and

Phil. I. 13.

and exhorting all the world to Repentance. Cornelius reports the opinion of ſome men who affirm that Saint Paul was expreſly delivered by the advice and the authority of Seneca, who at that time began miraculouſly to delight in his converſation. And although they could not ſee one another as often as they would by reaſon of the conſiderations of State, yet they mutually did write to one another, which hath given occaſion to ſome weak men who have not their ſpirits to counterfeit their letters ill imitated, and which all knowing men are aſſured, to be not of the ſtrain either of S. Paul or Seneca. Howſoever the fiction of the ſtyle doth no way hinder the truth of the antient Deed, ſeeing that S. Hierome doth cite the true Letters which were in his time, and doth alledge the Texts which are not now to be found in the Libraries of the Fathers. Saint Paul continued at Rome two years after his firſt voyage, where he gained many Chriſtians to the Faith, and ſome of the Court of Nero, as is declared in his Epiſtles. Seneca was amazed at the Authority which he had, and deſired that he might enjoy amongſt his the like opinion of Belief as S. Paul had amongſt the Chriſtians; but there was a difference in their ſpirits, and their proceedings were from divers Methods. Seneca was a man, and S. Paul a demy-God. The one ſtudied with Attalus and Socion, the other had the Word for his Doctour, and the Angels for his Diſciples. The one ſought after Nature, the other found out the God of Nature. The one laboured after Eloquence, the other ſtudied Silence which is the father of Conceptions. The one pleaded the Cauſes of parties, the other pleaded the Cauſe of God. The one governed the Republick of men, the other laid open before us the Hierarchy of Angels. The one was in the porch of Zenon, the other in the ſchool of Jeſus. The one laid the world low at his feet with his golden words, and when he pleaſed did carry it on his head, the other ſubdued it with mortification and the arms of the Croſſe. The one was full of good Deſires, the other of great Effects. The one ſought for himſelf in himſelf, the other found himſelf altogether in God. The one was a Miniſter of State, the other of Heaven. The one promiſed much and performed little, the other promiſed nothing of himſelf and gave all things. The one lived in the Court of Nero, the other in the Courts of Jeſus Chriſt. The one defied Perſecutions in his Diſcourſe, the other did bear them engraven in his Body. The one had a conſiderable eſtate, the other had nothing yet poſſeſſed all things. The life of the one was expoſed to Honours and the Delights of the world, the Life of the other was altogether compoſed of the Croſſe.

The parallel betwixt S. Paul and Seneca.

To conclude all in few words, Seneca had excellent Precepts of Virtue, but he derived them from an evill Principle, which was, to hold faſt to himſelf, and to conceive that by his own power he was ſufficient of himſelf without any need of aſſiſtance from above, inaſmuch that we may imagine that we hear him ſpeak, That a Wiſeman may paſſe by God and take no great notice of him, and live without him as contentedly as himſelf. From this great Illuſion proceeded Arrogance, from Arrogance, Ignorance of the Truth; from Ignorance, Feebleneſſe; from Feebleneſſe, a Confuſion both in the life and in all the wiſdome of the Stoicks.

The evill opinion of the Stoicks to truſt altogether to themſelves, without acknowledging the Grace and the aſſiſtance of God.

From hence it came to paſſe that having braved it on the paper, they found themſelves too ſhort for great actions, and had their pens farre longer then their hands. They made a flight but without one wing to virtue, contenting themſelves to have brought ſome weak lenitives to their malady, and not endeavouring to rout it out.

And although that Seneca did live uprightly according to the Morall Virtues, yet being forcibly tied to the world by his Honours, Dignities, Riches, the Cares of this life, and his indeavours to preſerve himſelf at Court, he could not diſpenſe any ſtrong influence on the body of the Eſtate, by reaſon of the defect both of Example and Practice. The Sun and the Moon may both make a Rain-bowe in the front of heaven, but that of the Moon will be feeble and obſcure in compariſon of that of the Sun, which will be all luminous and immailed with Emerauds and with Rubies. Seneca did make at Rome a Rain-bowe of the Moon which had in it much imperfection, and clouds, and darkneſſe. But S. Paul made the Rain-bowe of the Sun viſibly, producing the brightneſſe and the beauties of the eternall Wiſdome.

Wherefore Seneca prevailed ſo little for the reformation of Manners at the Court.

As the Principles therefore of the Philoſophy of Seneca were to reduce all to himſelf, and to ſtudy his own particular conſent; ſo the Principles of S. Paul were quite contrary to attribute all to the Grace of Jeſus Chriſt, and in the imitation of him, to love, deſire, and ſeek after the Croſſe, and the Perſecutions attending on it. In thoſe two Maximes, he doth eſtabliſh all the Greatneſſe and the Glory of the City of God, which he doth prove, deduce, and preſſe with inſtant importance in all his Epiſtles. As for that which pertains to the Grace of Redemption, never man before him ſpake more clearly or more divinely then he hath done in his Epiſtles to the Romans, to the Galathians, and to the Hebrews. He is the thundering and the lightning Cherubin on the chariot of the God of Hoſts, who ceaſeth not to ſhoot forth his inevitable and his flaming arrows againſt the head of the pompous Wiſdome of this world.

The Grace of Jeſus, and the Croſſe, are the two Principles of S. Paul.

He makes it apparent how all the antient Philoſophers who were thought to be the Gods of Sciences and Letters, do vaniſh away in their proud imaginations, and how they are faln into a Reprobate ſence: blind and ignorant, who have transformed the Divinity into hideous forms of ſerpents and monſters: feeble and caytiffe, who having filled their books with Precepts, have abandoned themſelves to baſe and ſhamefull actions, and have overthrown all the order of Nature. From hence alſo he makes another Battel againſt the Jews, who tied their happineſſe and ſalvation to a dying Law, to feeble Elements, to Shadows flying before the firſt Rayes of the law of the Goſpel. He priſed nothing but the Incarnate Word, he breathed forth nothing but his Jeſus, who is the Deſire of the eternall Mountains, the Splendour of the Glory of the celeſtiall Father, the Character of his Subſtance, who by the virtue of his Word doth ſupport the Univerſe, who is our Wiſdome, our Juſtice, our Sanctification, and our Redemption; there being no Name either in heaven or earth, or on or under the waters by which we may be ſaved, but the Name of Jeſus.

His ſecond Principle is the love of the Croſſe, and he doth publickly and loudly proteſt both to the great and to the ſmall, to the proud and to the humble, that there is no Knowledge but in the crucified Jeſus; and that he is not come to preach him to them with painted Words according to the Wiſdome and the Eloquence of men (fearing by that means to make void the myſtery of the Croſſe) but with the Virtue, and the force of the God of the afflicted. He eſteems of Sceptres, of Empires, of Nobility, of Beauty, of Strength, of Valour, of Wiſdome, of Induſtry, of Eloquence, of all things in this world from Heaven unto the Deeps but as dung, in compariſon of the Croſſe of his beloved Jeſus, on which by love he had aſcended, and there did reſt as on a Throne, from whence he condemned whatſoever this world did honour.

By theſe two Principles, he arrived unto a moſt

S. Paul his Perfection.

great Perfection which did fill him as well in the Intellectuall part as the Affective. As for that which concerns the former, he was enlightned with a moſt high and a moſt excellent Wiſdome, with the knowledge of all Nature, with all the myſteries of our Faith, with whatſoever is in Man, with whatſoever the World locks from him in her Treaſuries, with Grace in all her Virtues, and with Time in all the Turns and the Revolutions of his Being.

His high knowledge.

According to the heighth that the river Nilus riſeth, the other rivers do decreaſe; and accordingly as Saint Paul did increaſe in the Wiſdome of God, all humane Science fell down before him even into the Abyſme. It is he who with all humility can ſpeak Ezek. 28. that which Lucifer did uſurp by pride, I ſit in the Chair of God, I have been in the heart of the Deeps. He was in the Chair of God when he ſpake as if he had been incloſed in the Word, as the Vicar of his Powers; the Diſpenſer of his Myſteries; the Oracle of his Thoughts; and the Interpreter of his Will. He was in the heart of the Deeps when he was abyſmed in the profound knowledge of the Beauties and the Perfections of the Incarnate Word, of whom he never did loſe the ſight.

Dion. de Divin. Nomin. S. Hierom. Epiſt. 6. ad Pammach.

What an Abyſme of Patience was he? what a Trumpet of the Goſpel ſaith S. Dennis? What a roaring of the Lion ſaith S. Hierome? What a Flow of Learning, what a Torrent of Eloquence? who makes us to underſtand the Myſteries unknown in all Ages, and that as much by his Admiration as his Words. He wrote his Epiſtles with his Ear in Heaven, and with a Style in the School of Paradiſe. The feebleneſſe of humane Words could not ſuſtain the force of his Spirit.

His Love.

In the Affective part, he was filled with a Seraphick Love, with a fire drawn from the moſt pure flames of Heaven, which was ſhut up within his heart and within his bones, and did unceſſantly burn him without conſuming him. On his mortified fleſh he did bear the Characters of a ſuffering God, which were his deareſt Delights. He was no more himſelf; he was all and altogether transfigured into that amiable Word by a Deifick tranſanimation. He lived on his Bloud; he breathed not but by his Spirit; he ſpake not but by his Words; he thought not but by his Meditations: yet nevertheleſſe, in ſome manner he did leave God and the delicious School of Paradiſe, to run unto his Neighbour to ſave his Soul; and in this exerciſe of Charity, he defied Tribulation, Anguiſh, Hunger, Nakedneſſe, Dangers, Perſecutions, and bloudy Swords, and burning Fagots, and boiling Caldrons. If Hell it ſelf were portable he would adventure to have carried it on his back for the love of his Neighbour.

He looked upon the world as if every mothers ſon were of his begetting; he carried in his heart Europe, and Aſia, and Africk, and all the Provinces of the Earth, to communicate the Light of the Goſpel either by himſelf, or by his children whom already he had begotten in Jeſus Chriſt. Nothing rebated him, nothing hindred, nothing ſtopped him. He gave no bounds to his Love ſince God had given no limits to his Spirit. With theſe fair and extraordinary qualities, God gave him Succeſſe in the preaching of the Goſpel, which did draw upon him the admiration of all the Apoſtles.

He marched in triumph through all Provinces; and God was on his heart. He was like unto that Ark of Apoc. 11. the Teſtament which is ſpoken of in the Revelations, which at the ſame time that it was perceived did cauſe a Lightning to be ſeen, a Voice to be heard, the Hail to rattle, and the Earthquakes to roar; ſo, whereſoever S. Paul did paſſe, there were the Light of Learning, the Oracles of Wiſdome, the impetuous Tempeſt of words of fire, which made the Philoſopers and Kings to tremble, and even removed Nature it ſelf. Behold here the difference which was between S. Paul and Seneca, which being well conſidered we ſhall forbear to admire, wherefore one was ſo fruitleſſe in the Court of Nero, and the other had ſo great ſucceſſe in Rome, and amongſt ſo many Nations.

Saint Paul leaves Rome. Nero grows worſe and worſe.

After that Paul was for a ſeaſon retired from Rome, leaving unto Seneca a ſtrong tincture of the Chriſtian Faith, Nero did every day grow worſe and worſe, inſomuch, that having killed his brother, his wife, his mother, this ſcourge of mankind in the wicked jollity of his heart had a plot in his head to ſet the City of Rome on fire, which was almoſt wholly conſumed with it, whiles he from a high tower did behold it, and laughing at the calamity, did ſing the burning of Troy the great; which did ſo exaſperate the ſpirits of his Subjects, that on the year following, the chief of the Empire did enter into a conſpiracy againſt him, in which were compriſed, Senatours, Captains, Colonels, Citizens, Ladies, and all the choiceſt perſonages in Rome: but misfortune ſo would have it, that the ſecret being diſperſed amongſt ſo many people, it did not anſwer the event to which it was deſigned, but being diſcovered, it occaſioned a bloudy butchery in Rome, Nero like an enraged Tygre deſiring nothing more then to bathe himſelf in bloud.

Anno Neron. 10. Chriſti 66.

The Conſpiracy againſt him detected.

The conſtant and the famous death of Seneca.

Seneca's name was entred at the laſt in the liſt of the Conſpiratours, whether his Scholar had conceived a jealouſie againſt him, miſtruſting his high Virtue, and fearing leſt he ſhould tear the Diadem from his head, or whether the inſolence of his deportments had put him into that condition as not to indure the very ſhadow of a Tutor. It was now a long time ſince this great perſonage overcome with grief at ſo many tragicall accidents did leade a retired life in his Countrey-houſe not farr from Rome. There was not againſt him any manifeſt conviction to rank him amongſt the Conſpiratours, as Tacitus hath obſerved. It is onely ſaid that one of that number named Natalis did depoſe before Nero that he was ſent to Seneca by Piſo, who was the chief of the Conſpiratours, to complain that he would not ſuffer him to give him a viſit, and to meditate an enterview to which Seneca made anſwer, that ſuch a meeting in ſo dangerous and ſo fatal a time could be profitable neither to the one nor to the other, and as for the reſt, that his life ſubſiſted not but in the ſafety of the life of Piſo.

On this, the Tribune of the Emperours Guard was diſpatched to Seneca, to underſtand what anſwer he could make to the Depoſition of Natalis. On the evening he arrived at Seneca's houſe, which he ſuddenly inviroued with a troop of Souldiers. He was no ſooner entred, but he found him at ſupper with his wife and two friends, he preſently acquainted him what he had in Commiſſion from the Emperour; on which, Seneca confeſſed that Natalis indeed was ſent unto him by Piſo, to intreat him to receive a viſit from him, but he excuſed himſelf by reaſon of indiſpoſition and retirednеſſe, without ſpeaking one word more unto him; adding, that he had never ſo high an eſteem of Piſo, as to judge that the ſafety of his life did depend upon him, that ſuch flattery was not ſuitable to his diſpoſition, and that Nero knew it very well, who by experience had alwayes found in Seneca more of Liberty then of Servitude.

The Tribune made a faithfull report of Seneca's anſwer in the preſence of Poppea that impudent woman, and Tigillinus that execrable villain, who in thoſe cruel deſigns were the onely two that were now of his Ma-

jeſties

jesties sacred Counsel. This barbarous Prince who had promised his Tutor that he would rather die then permit that any offence should be done unto him, did bear that respect unto him as not to question him on that Conspiracy amongst so many other Senators; peradventure he had not a brow of brasse enough to outface the reproaches of so eloquent a mouth. He demanded of the Tribune if he did not prepare himself to a voluntary death, who made answer, That he observed not the least sign of it, either in his countenance or discourse; whereupon he was commanded to return to Seneca, and to signifie unto him that he must die. The Tribune, whether in reverence to the man, or for fear to precipitate the death of such a Minister of the State by too hasty an execution, demanded counsel of Fannius his Captain what in this case he ought to do, who did advise him to execute the command of the Emperour; and this was done by a sloth fatall to all of the Conspiracy, some Ladies onely excepted, who shewed themselves more courageous then the Senatours and the Cavalliers.

Howsoever, he having not the heart to carry these heavy tidings, did deliver his Commission to a Centurion, who informed him with the last of all necessities. Seneca, without troubling himself, desired so much liberty as to make his Will, which was refused him: On which, he turned to his friends and said, That since it was not permitted to him to acknowledge their merit, that he would leave unto them the very best of all he had, which was the Image of his Life; in which, if they would please to call to mind how he had passed it in so many commendable Exercises, they should enjoy for their recompence the reputation of a faithfull and a constant friendship. And this he spake not out of arrogance, but as it were by the authority of a Father when he bids his last Farewell unto his Children, recommending to them to imitate him in what he had done well; and so said S. Paul to his Disciples, Be you imitatours of me as I am of Jesus Christ.

This made their hearts to melt, and they began all to weep, but he did endeavour to wipe away their tears, mingling sweetnesse with reproaches. What do you mean, he said? where are the Precepts of Philosophy? where is that Reason so long prepared against all the chances of humane Life? who is he that can be ignorant of the cruelty of Nero? and who did not see that after the death of his mother and his brother, there nothing remained but to adde unto it the murder of his Master and Governour.

After this Discourse which served for them all, he embraced his wife, gave her his last farewell; and having fortified her against the terrours of the present dangers, he did intreat and conjure her to moderate her grief, and to sweeten the sorrows of her dear husband by the consideration of his life which was without reproach. He loved most tenderly that virtuous Lady, and did not cherish his own life but for her sake; saying sometimes, That he would spare himself a little the more, because in an old man there lived a young woman, who deserved that he should take care for her, and being not able to obtain from his dear Paulina that she should love him more fervently, her love being in the highest degree of perfection, she should obtain from him that he should use himself for her sake with the more indulgence.

This fair Lady observing all that had passed, said, That there was no longer life for her after the death of him whom she loved above all things in the world, and that she would keep him company in the other world. On that word he stood a little in a pause, and would not contradict her, as well for the glory of the action, as for the love which he did bear her, and for the fear he had to leave so dear a person to the affronts of an enemy, he therefore said unto her, My dear Love, I have shewed you the sweetnesse and the allurements of life, but I see you preferre unto it the honour of a generous death. I will not envy the example of your Virtue, and although the constancy in our death shall be equall in us both, yet yours shall be alwayes more glorious then mine, for you contribute unto it a courage which is above your sex. Having said this, they caused their veins to be opened by one hand in the presence one of the other; and because the body of her husband was attenuated by great abstinence, and the bloud did issue but slowly from him, he gave order that there should be a new incision made in the veins of his legs and of his feet. The poor old man did endeavour to put himself all into bloud, and indured cruel dolours, but more in the body of his dear wife then in his own, which was the reason that he caused her to be conveighed into another chamber to mitigate a little the sorrows which one had for the other in beholding themselves to die with so much violence.

It is a wonderfull thing that this great man had so untroubled and so ready a spirit in so fatall an act. He called his Secretary to whom he did dictate his last Thoughts, which were full of a generous constancy. In the mean time, Nero having no particular hatred against Paulina, and considering that the death of so innocent a Lady would but render himself and his cruelty more abhorred, did command that her veins should be stopped, and the bloud stanched, which it appeared, that she suffered to her greater grief, both by the short time that she out-lived her husband, and by the inviolable faith which she did bear unto his ashes; and she looked ever after as she were some prodigy, such abundance of bloud and so much spirits she had lost.

Seneca was yet remaining in the tedious pangs of death, when upon advice he demanded poyson of his Physicians, which had no operation at all, his members being already cold, and his body shut up against all the forces of the poyson. He caused himself therefore to be carried to a Bath, and taking some of the warm water, he sprinkled his servants with it that stood about him, saying (according to Cornelius Tacitus) That he offered that water to Jove the deliverer; after which words he entred into the stove, and was stifled with the vapour that did arise from it.

Many grave Personages have conceived that he died a Christian; and though it is no easie matter to perswade those to this opinion who are possessed with another, and who speak but with little consideration on this subject, yet there are not wanting grounds to prove the truth thereof.

Flavius Dexter a most antient Historian, who hath composed a small Chronicle from the Nativity of our Saviour unto the fourth Age, affirmeth in expresse terms, that in the sixty fourth year, Seneca entertained good thoughts of Christianity, and that he died a Christian, although not a declared one.

S. Hierome in the Book of Ecclesiasticall Authours doth put him in the number of Saints, that is to say, of those who acknowledge and confesse Jesus Christ.

Tertullian, a most grave Authour saith, that he was one although not openly. S. Augustine in the City of God, alledgeth many excellent passages of a Book which Seneca undoubtedly did write against the Superstition of the Pagans, in which, he overthrows all the Heathenish Religion of Rome, although he doth not vigorously perswade them to change it, for fear of troubling the Estate. This Book was afterwards condemned and burned by the Enemies of our Religion. The holy Doctor doth observe, that he never spake ill of the Christians, although he hath violently inveighed against the Jews, which testifieth that he was endued with some good thoughts in the favour of it. His brother Gallio being Proconsul in Achaia, would never judge S. Paul for any fact of Religion, although the Jews did presse him to it with much importunity.

Adde to this, that our Seneca two years before his death did live a retired life, under the colour of indisposition of body, and would no more frequent the Temples of the Heathen; as also that he would not procure his own death before the Emperour expressly had commanded it, as being then of the opinion of the Christians, who did forbid self-murder, and also that at last, that he did forbid the vain pomp and the vain ceremonies at his Funerals.

These Reasons being weighed do draw unto this Conclusion, That it is more beseeming our Religion to conceive well of the Salvation of Seneca, then to condemne him. The strongest Objection which can be made against this Opinion, is, That at his death Cornelius Tacitus doth make him to invoke on Jove the Liberatour. But no esteem ought to be given to this Argument, for Tacitus could not understand that which was altogether out of his knowledge, seeing that Seneca did never make open profession of Christianity, but kept that thought totally concealed from Nero and all the Heathen. And we ought not to be amazed that he was not compriſed in that ſearch which was made for Chriſtians, it being ſufficiently manifeſt, that many illuſtrious Chriſtians have lived in the Courts of the Heathen Emperours, and diſſembled their Religion, they being not bound in conſcience to declare it at all times, to run wilfully into Martyrdome. Moreover, this Hiſtorian above named, hath written divers things very lightly, eſpecially when he maketh mention of the Religion of the Jews and Chriſtians, which he deſcribes rather according to his own Idæa then any wayes according to the truth; inſomuch, that when Seneca at his death implored Jeſus the Deliverer, he did not forbear to tranſlate Jeſus into Jove. As raſhly as this, he leaves recorded to poſterity, that the Jews are deſcended from the hill Ida, the name of which he ſaith the Jews do bear; and that they worſhip the head of an Aſſe; as alſo, that the Chriſtians confeſſed that they were Incendiaries, and that they burned the city of Rome under Nero.

But we find by S. Paul himſelf in his Epiſtle written from Rome unto the Philippians, that he had many Chriſtians in the houſe of Nero; and Linus the ſucceſſour of S. Peter, who was there preſent at that time, doth rank Seneca amongſt them with an high title of commendation: and though his Hiſtory hath been corrupted by the Hereticks and the Ignorant, it is never the leſſe received in thoſe Points which are comformable to the other Fathers of the Church, ſo that Tacitus in this ought not to be conſidered.

This Name then of Redeemer or Deliverer whereof Tacitus maketh mention, and this ſprinkling of the water which the Faithfull were accuſtomed to preſent to God in the manner of Libation, doth imploy ſome ſecret of which he never heard. And as for that Objection, that there are ſome opinions in Seneca's Books which are not conformable to the Chriſtian Religion, it is of no value, ſeeing thoſe Works were compoſed before his Chriſtianity.

And to that which others do alledge, that he himſelf was the authour of his own death, it is moſt manifeſtly falſe, ſeeing he did not ſuffer a vein to be opened before the expreſſe commandment of the Emperour, who had pronounced againſt him the ſentence of Death, as I have ſaid already, which was afterwards executed according to the faſhion of thoſe times; in which, by the permiſſion of Magiſtrates, the houſhold-ſervants of the party condemned performed that office which belonged to the publick executioner of Juſtice. Beſides this, in the beginning of Chriſtianity, Seneca who had but a light tincture of it, could not yet know that it was not allowable for him to aſſiſt his at his death, ſeeing that many Chriſtian Virgins have killed themſelves to divert the violations by their deſigned raviſhers, and yet have not been condemned for it.

S. Paul returning to Rome, according to the Calculation of Baronius, did find that Seneca was dead, and that he was deprived of a great help in the propagation of the Goſpel. Howſoever he deſiſted not with all his endeavour to advance with S. Peter the Chriſtian Religion, which by and by they ſhall both bedew with their bloud.

For Nero to fill up the horrour of his crimes, did begin the firſt Perſecution againſt the Chriſtians. And it is our glory, ſaith Tertullian, that he was in the head of our Perſecutours. The wicked Prince perceiving that he could not wipe away the evill reputation with which he was defamed for the burning of Rome, did cauſe the Chriſtians to be accuſed; and did torment them with outrageous and inhumane puniſhments. Some were nailed to Croſſes, diſtilling their bloud drop by drop in extremity of pain. Others by cruel inventions were covered with the skins of ſavage beaſts and expoſed to bandogs, who would fly upon them with a moſt violent rage and tear them in pieces. Others being faſtned to blocks, were burned by degrees by fire, with Diabolicall art and ſport, inſomuch, that in the Evening, when the Sun made haſte to bed, to be no longer polluted with ſuch horrible ſpectacles, the bodies of the Faithfull being all on fire did ſerve as torches for the reprobate joyes of the Heathen. Nero would be then in his gardens to glut his barbarous eyes with the Torments of thoſe innocent Souls. Happy ye Stars, who in the combats of that laborious night did behold ſo many victorious Souls aſcend from the midſt of the flames to take poſſeſſion of the Temple of eternall Lights. The Infidels themſelves had compaſſion on them, knowing that it was an artifice of Nero's to ſacrifice thoſe poor Victims to his brutiſh cruelty.

Not long after, S. Peter and S. Paul did find themſelves to be involved in the ſame Perſecution; for as they endeavoured themſelves to perſwade Chaſtity to ſome Chriſtian Ladies againſt the allurements and ſurpriſals of the Emperour, he grew enraged at it, and commanded them to be locked up in cloſe priſon, from whence ſome few dayes after they were taken forth to go to their Execution, where S. Peter was crucified with his head downwards, and S. Paul was beheaded, after they had converted many Souls, and even the Executioners themſelves. They kiſſed one another with tears of joy, and with an aſſured pace they marched to their place of torment as to a garden inamelled with the moſt delightfull beauties of Nature. At every minute their ſacred mouths did call upon the name of their moſt beloved Maſter; and the pleaſures they reſented to excommunicate with him in his Sufferings, did not permit them to have the leaſt fear of that which of all fears is the moſt horrible in Nature. The Chriſtians followed them melting into tears, calling them their Fathers and their Paſtours, and beſought them not to abandon their Flock. But they with countenances as clear as are the ſmiles of the faireſt morning, did comfort them, and did promiſe not to forget them in the other life. They did exhort them to ſhew themſelves courageous in Perſecutions, aſſuring them that they were the places of Pleaſure, where even the Thorns ſhould grow into Crowns. They both looked back upon Rome, and beheld it as the field of their deareſt Conqueſt. And God did diſcover to them the effects of their Bloud, how that Infidelity was ſubdued; the Church was eſtabliſhed in the capitall City of the Univerſe; the Croſſe was planted on the root of the Capitoll, where they died as amongſt palms, and the odour of their Sacrifice did aſcend to heaven.

As long as there ſhall be Intelligences and Stars above; as long as there ſhall be Ages and Men below, theſe two Apoſtles ſhall be beheld as the two Eyes of the Chriſtian world. The Fathers and the Doctours of Mankind; the Gates of Heaven, and Triumphers over unbelieving Rome, which they have now converted into Rome the Holy. At their Palmes all the Laurels of the Conquerours ſhall fade, and the inſtruments of their Puniſhments ſhall obſcure their Trophies. The tongues of men can pronounce nothing more pleaſing then their Name. The Church hath nothing more precious, then their Virtues; nor more powerfull, then their Examples; nor more honourable, then the Veneration of them. The deteſtable Nero the year after theſe Martyrs ſuffered, finding himſelf tormented with Furies, inveſted with infernall Shades, torn in his conſcience by Vultures, and wounded with ſharp Razors, being abandoned both by God and men, underſtanding that Vindex from France, and Galba was marching againſt him from Spain, to revenge his Sacriledges, he did fly away, and killed himſelf; it being impoſſible for him to die by a more polluted or a more execrable hand.

MARY STUART.

The most excellent Princesse Mary Queene of Scotland and Dowager of France.

IN the last place, I will produce the History of the incomparable Queen, Mary Stuart, where in the height of its lustre, I will represent unto you Innocence persecuted, as much by the jealousies of love, as State, and that by a general combat of all passions, on which she hath raised a Trophey, by the invincible constancy at her death.

I have taken delight to peruse many Authours on this Subject, and to draw out the truth from a confused Chaos, where the malice of many passionate Historians had extreamly perplexed the Story; and I have done it the more willingly, because it is a service which I render to the first Truth which I adore: To France, which nourished and advanced that great Spirit; To the King of Great Brittain, who is honoured for his Bloud and Royal Virtues; To Scotland, who brought her forth; and to England it self, the founder part whereof have alwayes detested the attempt which was committed on her person.

I must intreat the Reader to believe, that there was never History more disguised by a knot of Hereticks, never wickedness did carry more artifice, nor calumny more fables, or fables more colours, or impiety more strength, to crie down a poor Princess. And this hath made so bold a noise, that some Catholicks, either too ignorant or too negligent, not taking the pains to read and examine the reasons alledged, were betrayed themselves to an indifferent belief of the defaming Libels of the Enemies of our Religion, as if they would believe the History of Jesus Christ, compiled on the reports of the Scribes and Pharisees. A Calvinist of late, the Authour of a Spanish History, hath thrust into his Book many outragious reports against the Memory of Mary, Queen of Scotland, by a Digression stale enough, which doth eclipse the light of the History, and the Day of her passion. If that man had any modesty, he would have acknowledged his small abilities to be seen in print. If he had any reverence, he would have spared the person of a Queen. If his heart had been touched with any pietie, he would have pardoned the Dead. If he had in his soul any sence of honour, being in the service of the King of England, he would never have printed such insolent things, to the disadvantage of his Majesty, he would never have barked at the ashes of so great a Ladie.

Reader, to make you the better to understand with what equity I will proceed in this Narration, I will not alledge unto you either Sanders, or Bosy, or Florimond of Raymen, or Father Hilarius, of the Order of the right reverend Fathers of the Minims, who have all wrote very worthily concerning this Subject. I will derive the principal truths I shall produce from Cambden a Hugenot, Historiographer of the Queen of England, who hath wrote this Story, not in Pamphlets running without authority, but in authentick Memorials. It hath pleased God that this person, having a generous ambition to speak the truth, should search into the Records, and produce papers that had been buried, which sufficiently do make appear the artifices of Elizabeth, & the innocence of the Queen of Scotland. Reader, Behold whither the abundance and the force of Right and Truth doth carry us, that we take even our enemies for our Judges and Witnesses in this cause.

The Birth & Education of this Queen Mary Stuart.

MARY STUART, the onely Daughter of James the Fifth, King of Scotland, and Mary de Lorain, Grand-child to the thrice virtuous Antonietta of Bourbon, was a Queen, who in my judgement, hath equalled the excess of her disasters, with the height of her glory, and it seems her whole life was no other than a Theater, hung round with blacks, and covered with bloud, where the revolution of humane affairs did act unheard-of Tragedies. Never did Nature produce more beauties, nor Grace more wonders in a personage of that high condition. Never did Fortune deal more rigorously with a head, which Heaven had made to support three great Crowns.

She was born in Scotland, she lost her Father eight dayes after her birth, she was brought into France at the age of five yeares, and was nourished in the

In the year 1542. on the 13. of December, on S. Lucies Day.

Court of Henrie the Second, and Katharine de Medicis, who did love her moſt entirely. She was yet but as the Bud of a Roſe, which within her firſt infancy did preſerve her Graces undiſcloſed. But as ſhe began to lay them more open by the increaſe of age, we might then behold a Princeſs, deſcended from the bloud of a hundred Kings, who had a body formed and faſhioned by the hand of Beauty, a fine and a clear ſpirit, a deep and a ſound judgement, a high Virtue, and an incomparable Grace in her expreſſions. All which, made Henrie the Second reſolve to give her in marriage to his ſon Francis, to whom ſhe was eſpouſed about the fifteenth year of her age, being himſelf not much more indebted unto yeares than ſhe was. All things laughed at the beams of this bright Morning, and it ſeemed that Felicity her ſelf had with full hands poured down her favours upon a Marriage which had been made in Heaven, to carry along with it the approbation of all the earth.

Her marriage and widow-hood.

But who can dive into the ſecrets which Providence hath in her own breaſt concealed from us? Or who is he that hath tears enough to deplore the condition of great Fortunes, when they are abandoned to the pillage and plunder of deſtruction? This young French King, having in his way but ſaluted Royalty, after his reign but of ſix moneths, was taken out of the world by an Impoſtume in his ear. All France did groan under this loſs, by reaſon of the excellent inclination of that Prince, but ſhe was more touched with the impreſſions, which in her heart her moſt dear Spouſe received, who deſired to ſacrifice the reſt of her dayes unto the aſhes of her husband. Nevertheleſs, as the tenderneſs of the Kings age who was troubled beſides with divers indiſpoſitions of body, and the ſhort time they were married together, did not permit that any iſſue ſhould be left behind him, there did ariſe upon it a report, that the young Queen ſhould return into her own Countrey, where two Crowns did attend her, the one in England, the other in Scotland, ſhe being the true Inheritreſs of them both, of one of which ſhe took poſſeſſion, and was deprived of her rights in the other, by the injuſtice of Uſurpation.

The inconſtancy of humane affairs.

Her return into Scotland.

3. Elizabeth of England now began to torment her ſelf with a furious jealouſie againſt her, and had already laid the Deſign to ſtop her in her return to Scotland, but God was pleaſed that ſhe was gallantly accompanied with a great part of the moſt generous of the Nobility of France, and did paſs the ſeas very fortunately, and arrived ſo ſuddenly in Scotland, as if ſhe did flie in the Air; there ſhe was received of all the good Catholicks, with wonderfull entertainments of applauſe and joy. Elizabeth, who did ſwell with deſpite, that ſhe failed in her deſign, covering her artifice with the vail of friendſhip, did ſend a ſolemn Embaſſage with Preſents, to congratulate her arrival, and to give her the aſſurances of an eternal Alliance. The good Princeſs, who had a heart as credulous as generous, was paſſionately taken with this friendſhip, and diſputed with her ſelf how ſhe ſhould overcome her in honour and in courteſie. She took from her Treaſurie a Diamond, of which ſhe made a Preſent to her. It was cut in the manner of a heart, and enriched with a verſe of Buchanans, who had not as yet his ſpirit infected with Treaſon. In the mean time Elizabeth, not unlike thoſe Sorcerers, which from the faireſt mornings do produce the fouleſt weather, did not ceaſe under-hand to ſow troubles and diviſions in the Realm of Scotland, endeavouring to deſtroy her Couſin by the fines of policy, whom ſhe durſt not attach by the force of Arms.

The firſt fire of the jealouſie of Eſtate.

On the firſt arrival of Queen Mary into Scotland, ſhe found the Kingdom overſpread with the factions of the Calviniſts, which at that time troubled all the Eſtates in Chriſtendom. And ſeeing that the youth and inexperience of her widow-hood was not compatible with the great undermining, which her Enemies did daily form againſt her State, ſhe began, after the ſpace of five years, to think of a ſecond Marriage. The ſmall ſucceſs in her firſt marriage, made her ſuſpect an alliance with ſtrangers, and thoſe who were moſt near unto her, did diſſwade her from it. She did caſt her eyes on her Couſin Henry Stuart, the young Earl of Lenox, who for the comelineſs of his perſon, was one of the moſt remarkable in the Kingdom of Scotland, and having procured a Diſpenſation from the Pope, ſhe married him. This affection, although moſt innocent in it ſelf, being not managed with all the conſiderations of State, did bring upon her the jealouſie of other Princes, and was in the end attended with great diſaſters.

Her ſecond marriage.

The ſeed of the jealouſie of love.

But to ſpeak the truth, the Earl of Murray, natural brother to the Queen, a pernicious and luxurious man, who under-hand was the Inſtrument of Elizabeth of England, did ſow the firſt ſeeds of all theſe Tragedies. In the beginning of theſe troubles he was called, The Prior of S. Andrew, as being ordained by James the Fifth, to Eccleſiaſtical dignity, but having drunk the air of a turbulent and furious Ambition, which Knox the Patriarch of the Hereticks in Scotland had inſpired in him, he did not ceaſe to affect the Quality of Regent, and of King, nor ſparing any wickedneſſes to arrive to the butt of his deſires.

As he obſerved that the Queen his ſiſter, being yet very young, and very beautifull, was ſought for in marriage by the King of Spain, to be married to his Son, and by the Emperour, to be maraied to his Brother, he uſed the utmoſt of his power to divert that Deſign, politickly fore-ſeeing, that ſuch alliances would tend to the diminution of his power, and he failed not with moſt violent perſwaſions, to repreſent unto her, that ſhe ſhould enjoy neither peace nor honour in her Kingdom, if ſhe were eſpouſed to a forreign Prince; and the better to divert her from it, he ceaſed not to advance the perfections of young Lenox, which he did rather to amuſe her, and to poſſeſs her with thoughts of love, than in earneſt to bring the marriage to accompliſhment.

Ambition the beginning of all evils.

The generous Princeſs, who underſtood not yet what Diſſimulation meant, gave ear unto him, and overcome by his counſel, ſhe proceeded to the effects of the marriage with the Earl of Lenox, who was indeed accompliſhed with all excellent endowments both of body and of mind, but being very young, had not the qualities requiſite to ſerve him to ſecure himſelf. This Murray, who thought he ſhould reign in him, and by him, and that having advanced him to the Royal Dignity, the King ſhould be but as the inſtrument of his will, did find himſelf much deceived, when he obſerved the King to grow cold in his behalf, and to reign with an Authority more abſolute than he intended. His fury did proceed to that height, that he drew into the field to make war againſt the King, but having bad ſucceſs therein, he was conſtrained to retire himſelf into England, where he began his deſigns to deſtroy his Siſter. He had in the Scotch Court the Earl of Morton, who was unto him as his other-ſelf, to whom he gave Commiſſion to throw the apple of Diſcord on this marriage of the King and Queen. This he performed with incredible cunning, and finding ſome diſpoſition by the cooling of his affection, he perſwaded Lenox, That he was a King in Name onely, and that the Queen ſigned firſt in all the Declarations, and did not permit that any Effigies ſhould be ſtamped on the moneys, but her own; That of neceſsity he muſt diſcharge himſelf from the tutelage of that Imperious woman, and teach her to ſubmit to the law of Nature, which allows not that Sex to command their husbands. On the other ſide, this Forger of iniquity heating two furnaces with one fagot, ceaſed not by his complaints

The effects of Envy and Ambition.

The pernicious language of an Incendiary.

to

to set on fire the heart of the Queen, telling her, That she must chastise the rash young Man, and retain the Sovereignty entire on her own side; otherwise his unruly passions attempting to part the Crown betwixt them, would take it away from them both, and put all things into a confusion. This was the occasion that Mary, arming her heart with a manly courage, would enjoy the Rights and Prerogatives of her birth, and did afterwards reign in full authority.

The jealousie of King Henry Stuart Darley.

4. This young Husband, who of a Subject was become a Master, could not with moderation endure his change of fortune but daily endeavoured to hold more of command than of compliance. The Queen also, who desired to be known the sole efficient Cause of his preferment, being unwilling to lose the name of Mistress in taking that of wife, did distast his importunity, deferred his Coronation, and did allow him but a little part in the affairs of the Kingdom. She ordinarily did confer much with David Riccius her Secretary, an old and a discreet man, who with great honour possessed her ear and her good opinion, for she cherished him rather for the necessity of her affairs, than for any attractive qualities that were in him, for he was but of a deformed body as they who have seen him, do affirm. But the calumny of the Puritans, who know of every wood how to make an arrow, did not forbear in their bold discourses, to reflect upon the honour of Queen Mary concerning that subject, although it was the most incredible, and the most ridiculous thing in the world.

The Book of the death of the Queen of Scots, printed in the year 1587.

Cambden also, the most sincere of all Historians of the pretended Religion, and Monsieur de Castelnau, have disdained to speak of it, as being an out-rage, which had no foundation at all of truth, although the Earls of Morton and Lindsey, two execrable Incendiaries, who had undertaken the divorce of the Royal House, following the spirit of Heresie most impudently to breathe forth the greatest lies, did work a great alteration on the King, in the cooling of his affections to his wife.

A spirit tormented with two great devils.

The spirit of Henrie now became furious, and did perceive it self to be possessed on by two fiends: The one, the Jealousie of Love; the other, of Estate, which both at one time did commit a prodigious Ravishment on his heart. They made him believe that he passed for a King in fansie onely, and that his Throne was no more than a meer picture, whilest another was made a Partner in his bed. In effect the excellent Beauties of the Queen which had given him such heats of love, did now raise his jealousie to the height of those flames. He was all on fire perpetually night and day, and being tormented with shadows, suspitions, and rages, with choller, frenzies, and with terrours, he lived as on the wheel, not knowing which way to turn himself.

A tragick remedy by the death of the Secretary of the Queen.

His passion did suggest unto him a bloudy remedy, which was to draw the Secretary from the Cabinet of the Queen at the hour of supper, and under colour of communicating some affair unto him, to stab him with a ponyard in the Presence-Chamber. The body being all bloudy by threescore wounds which it received, fell down just at the door of his Mistress, imploring Heaven and earth against those, who by so black a treason, had ravished his life from him in the flower of his hopes. The Queen being frighted at the noise, did run to the door, and with his bloud, received the last breathings of his soul, some drops of the bloud falling on her outward garment. She startled at the horrour of the sight, and believed, that some sprinklings of the bloud had painted on her face the opprobriousness of the act.

The passion of diveliſh fury.

But as she made her complaint, the Murderers presented a pistol to her, without any regard to the brightness of her Majesty, or the bigness of her womb, desiring nothing more, than at one blow to destroy both the Tree and the fruit. They locked her up in a chamber of the Palace, taking from her all her ordinary servants, and putting a Guard on her of four-score souldiers.

On this the Estates met, and the pestilent Councel were assembled, where, with mouthes full of fire, the Hereticks ceased not to breathe forth Rebellion, Bloud, and Butcheries. They gave it out aloud, That they ought not by halfs to do a work of so great importance, and since the Queen, who was a Pillar of the Papists Religion in Scotland, was already shaken, they ought to lay her low as the earth, and utterly destroy her, in giving allowance to the Libels and the Calumnies which were published against her. They had attempted to have seduced the spirit of the young King, promising him to put the Crown in peace upon his Head, if he would maintain and support their Design, to which, as he shewed an inclination, they began to weave an horrible conspiracy, to take from him all the most eminent persons of the State, and imbarque the innocence of the Queen in the common shipwrack.

The horrible attempt of Heresie.

The Earl of Murray, who fled into Englana for having raised Arms against their Majesties, returned back, and came into Scotland, rather as a Triumpher than a guilty person. They made him an overture of their pernicious counsels, which he entertained with horrour; for as yet he was unwilling that the Affairs should be carried on with such an extremity of violence; wherefore in private he repaired to the Queen, demanding pardon for his offences past, and promising all obedience for the time to come. He counselled her to recollect and rouze up her spirits, and pardon the injuries passed, and to take away from the Conspiratours all the apprehensions of Despair. The Queen bending her spirit to the necessity of the time, and her present affairs, did receive him with all courtesie, and told him, that she was ready to perform all as he pleased. She assured him, that he was not ignorant that her heart was without gall, having always pardoned offences even to her own destruction, by her too much clemency. And though she had been used by him with too much rigour for a Brother, that she would not cease to cherish him, and to gratifie him above all other, to give him the best testimony of full satisfaction.

Love and Piety.

As he departed, the King came in, and then it appeared how Grace and Nature wrought their effects, for the innocent Queen fashioning her countenance and her words to the most sensible pasion, spake thus unto him:

Alas, and wherefore thus, SIR, Is this that I have deserved for loving you above all the men in the world? Must I be forced from your friendship, to adhere to my most cruel Enemies? If I have deserved death for doing you all the good that lay in the possibility of my power, what hath this little Innocent in my Womb commited, whom I do not preserve, but onely to increase your power. The Excess of these violent proceedings will tear away the life both from the Mother and the child, and then I am afraid you will too late discover the violence and rage of those, who perswade you to destroy that, which you should hold most dear, and to bury your self in my ruins.

The King reconciled with the Queen.

As she spake these words, and mixed them with her tears, the Kings heart was softened into compassion; Upon his knees he demanded pardon, breathing forth many sighs, accompanied with groans and tears of love. And having declared to her the conspiracy that was plotted for her ruine, he told her, That he now came either to live or to die with her. This confidence did greatly rejoyce her, and having exhorted him above all things, to appease the anger of God, and particularly to have recourse unto his mercy, she gave him instructions necessary for him, she counselled him to dissemble this their love, and make not the least discovery of it to the Conspiratours, but onely to represent unto them, that he had found the Queen very ill, and that the violence of her malady might be as strong as poison or steel, to take her out of the world; That there was now no more need of keeping any Guard upon her, for in passing affairs according to their advice, he would answer for her, if God should not otherwise dispose of her.

This counsel was followed, and after the King had perswaded the Rebels, to what he had desired, he returned to his dear wife, and about midnight both of them saved themselves, nine or ten thousand armed men being drawn together by the diligence of the Earl of Bothuel, who in one morning made the whole rebellion to vanish with the Rebels.

Choller and Vengeance prejudicial.

Now the Earl of Murray had re-possest himself of the favour and good opinion of the Queen, but the King, who well understood the pernicious counsels, of which he was the Authour, and that he made him serve to be his instrument at the death of the Secretary, could by no means endure him, and though the good Queen, who would have nothing done violently, had expresly charged the contrary, he was resolved to seize upon him. But Murray apprehending the ill intent of the King towards him, did by a most detestable crime prevent it, by drawing to him the Earl of Bothuel, a man bold of spirit and of hand, and prevailing on him to massacre the King, assuring him that he should marry the Queen, if ever he arrived to the end of his fatal Enterprize. This miserable King, whom Jealousie had transported to the cruel murder of the Secretary, was now again fully reconciled to his wife, and loved her most tenderly, and conceived an extream pitie, to see her youth intangled among such pernicious counsels of her enemies. He was then at Glasco sick of the Small-pox, which the Queen understanding, she immediately repaired thither, to bring him unto Edingborough, where were better accommodations for him. At the same time the Conspiratours assembled themselves to accomplish their Design, and moreover they had a desire to involve the Queen and her Son in the same ruin, but they feared that it would be too apparent, and it would be more expedient for them, to bring all the Envy of the death of the husband, upon the head of his wife, whom they conceived to be still highly offended for his ill demeanour towards her. To which purpose they undertook to torment her spirit, and prompt her to thoughts of vengeance, which they never could effect, so strong was the new knot of their reconciled love. They deliberated amongst themselves to put this miserable Prince to death by fire, and because it was inconvenient to perform it in the Palace, they entered into counsel amongst themselves, to remove him into a fair house, which was at the upper end of the Citie, where they had prepared a fatal Myne for his destruction. His sickness being such, the Queen accorded to his removal, and very innocently did take her husband by the hand, and did conduct him to the Entery of his Lodging, where, with a singular prudence, she disposed of every thing which concerned the recovery of his health. And not contented with that, she stayed with him without the apprehension of any danger of infection, which put the Plotters of this delicate conspiracy into fear, but she seemed to be nothing troubled at it, and staying with him until midnight, she entertained him with all the satisfaction that he could expect from so bountifull a Nature.

Horrible inventions of Envy and Vengeance.

The death of Henry Stuart.

As soon as she was retired; behold by the secret artifice of the powder, to which fire was given, under the lodging of the King, the chamber was blown into the Air, and the bed all on fire. He found himself to be desperately inwrapped in this calamity, and the Authours of the Mischief, conspiring with the Elements, did dispatch him outright, having found him half dead in a Garden, into which place the violence of the fire had thrown him. The Queen hearing of it, was possessed with a wonderfull amazement, and lost in the depth of sorrow, she feared every thing, and knew not what to do, or what to hope, every hour attending to see the end of that Tragedy, to be the beginning of another on her own life.

The malicious Earl of Murray, who now had given the blow by the instrument of his wickedness, as he had spoken a little before to those that were nearest to him, that the King should die the same night, did cunningly retire himself. The people murmured, and knew not what to take to, but the clearest sighted amongst them perceived, that it was a work of this pernicious Brother, who had a desire utterly to destroy the Royal Family, to mount himself upon the Throne.

And this is that which Cambden assureth us, in the first part of his History, who, though by Religion he was a Calvinist, and by profession the Historiographer to the Queen of England, yet he hath not dissembled the truth; in confirmation whereof, he produceth proofs as clear as the day, with the attestations of the Earls of Huntley and Argathel, two principal Lords of Scotland, who by a writing signed under their own hands, have authentically protested to the Queen of England, that the Earls of Murray, Morton, and Lidington, were the Counsellers and Authours of the horrible Parricide committed against the King; the good Queen always professing, that she did forbid them to do any thing whatsoever, that might any way reflect upon her honour, or offend her conscience. Also this unfortunate Earl of Morton, who was afterward convicted and executed for this murder, did totally discharge the Queen from having any hand in the Kings death, and named the Conspiratours, who by writing had obliged themselves one to another, to defend the murder of his Royal Majesty. John Hebron, Paris, and Daglis, who prepared the Myne, being put to the Rack, to accuse the Innocent Queen, did absolutely discharge her, protesting before God and his Angels, that she was free from all fault, and that Murray and Morton did give them commandment to perform it. Buchanan, a Pensionar of Murrays, who cried down this Queen by his venemous pen, being touched at last with the remorse of conscience, with tears demanded pardon of her Son, King James. And being sick to death, desired that his life might be prolonged, either to clear the integrity of Queen Mary by the light of Truth, or by his own bloud to wash away the stains of his reproches. Some Protestants being amazed to hear him speak in this manner, in the apprehension he had of Gods judgements to fall upon him, did give forth, that his old age had made him to doat. This which I now write, was afterwards acknowledged, as we shall see anon by a publick and solemn sentence of the principal Nobility of England, who although Lutherans and enemies, being chosen to examine the business, did highly publish the Innocence of this Queen.

Cambden in the first part of his History in the year 1567.

Cambden part 3. pag. 336.

Cambden pag. 128. an. 1567.

Cambden pag. 105.

And now Detractours, what have you to say, Do you not behold wherewith to make your shame to blush, and the despite of so many infamous Historians to increase, who have made black her whiteness. Nay, some of the Catholicks themselves, being but little versed in the discerning of History, having suffered themselves to be surpoized concerning this subject, not considering that all this calumnie is derived from the Book of Buchanan, being corrupted to it by the bastard Murray, who promised to make him Patriarch of Scotland, if ever he should come unto the Crown. And this is it which made this Apostate to write a detestable libel against the honour nour of this, Queen which was condemned afterwards by the Estates of Scotland, and retracted by the Authour himself. But some Hugenots of the Consistory, who are the most pettilent slanderers that ever the earth brought forth, have not ceased to give some countenance to this fable and illusion of mankind, although it was legally condemned of falshood by the most apparent of all their party. It is an unhappiness of most men, that they are wilfully given to believe the worst, whether by an inclination they have unto it, or whether by a difficulty to forsake and to put off that, which first they entertained in their belief. The most virtuous Queen Dido doth pass perpetually through the world for a woman lost in love, although indeed she died in the defence of her chastity, chusing rather to be devoured by the flames of fire, than to be given in marriage, as Tertullian doth affirm.

The rash love of the Earl of Bothuel.

6. But to take into my hand again the thread of my discourse. Some time after the Kings death, Bothuel, who was one of the most powerfull Earls of Scotland, did prevent to court this Queen in the way of marriage, and the rather, because the Earl of Murray had promised her unto him for the recompence of this treason. This motion came directly cross to her heart, although as yet she did not know that this pernicious man had imbrued his hands in her Husbands bloud, having always found him most faithfull in his service. But as the report thereof increased, she grew very angry with all those who offered to renew the motion to her, alledging, that there was no apparance that he should be propounded for a husband to her, who is suspected for so detestable an act, no, although he indeed were innocent. Besides that, she urged that he was already tied in marriage to another woman. But Murray the Bastard and other of the conspiratours, who with an obstinate resolution had undertaken this business, did justifie this Crime by the Judges of their faction, and gave the Queen to understand, that his first wife was not lawfully contracted to him, and therefore she was removed from him.

All this was not able to perswade her, who was wonderfully troubled with the dismalness of these late events, which was the occasion that Bothuel being transported with love, and assured of the high reputation which he had in the Kingdom, did draw forth into the fields with five hundred horse, where corvetting before them, a wild presumption did invade him to take away the Queen as she returned from Sterlin, to which place she was gone to see her Son, and to bring him with her to her Castle at Dunbar, At which place having with strange submissions demanded pardon for his boldness, He represented to her the contract of his marriage signed by the Earl of Murray, and the principal of the Nobility of the Kingdom, who thought very well of it, by that means to remedy the publick calamities of the Kingdom. Moreover he protested to her, that he would never over-value himself for the Honour he should receive from her Majesty, nor for the greatness of his unexpected fortune, with which the greatest Monarch on the earth might proudly content himself, but that he would always continue her most humble and most obedient servant. In this manner did this Philistine adore the Ark in its captivity.

But she moderating her passion, did represent unto him, that to proceed in this nature was to overthrow the whole business before it was established, that she would be absolutely brought to Edinborough, the chiefest Citie of her Kingdom, where she would take a resolution to do that which should seem good unto Her.

On this occasion it came about, that the Earl of Murray, who had removed himself a little, to be the less suspected of the murder, did return to Court, and brought with him the Suite of the Assassinate rewarding him for it with the obtainment of the bravest Lady in the world, as the recompence of his murder. He ceased not to importune her to take Bothuel for her husband, declaring his innocence, publickly avouched the splendour of his house, the exploits of his courage, the proofs of his fidelity, which did render him most worthy of her love. He added, that being alone and without assistance, she was no way capable to appease the troubles, prevent the ambuscadoes, or sustain the great charges of the Realm. Therefore she ought to receive him for her husband, and the Companion of her Fortunes and designs, having both power, will, and courage to defend her in all conditions, and that he would never suffer her to be in quiet, but onely by the consummation of this Marriage. This wicked man by this Counsel did promise to himself, either to reign with him being his familiar friend, or by this action, to crie down the Queen and overthrow her Authority, as afterwards it came to pass.

Cambden part 1. pag. 3. doth shew that this marriage was brought about by the fraud and the pressing solicitations of the Earl of Murray.

The Marriage is now to be accomplished, and the Importunities of the Earl prevailed on Maries heart, who married him in the face of the Church with all the ceremonies requisite to it. Some have written, that this virtuous Lady by reason of her beauties, was strongly persecuted by diverse with daily motions concerning marriage, And that the easiness of her nature (which could not resist the great importunities and continual battels, which love stirred up against her) did bring upon her a deluge of misfortunes; likewise her neighbour Princes, who knew not the Artifice of her enemies, did in the beginning blame her for having so easily adhered to a man, who was so dangerously suspected concerning that she ought to clear her reputation from the least shadows of suspition, wherewith Envy began to cloud it: But who shall well consider a young widow of seventeen years of age, placed in the furthest part of all the world, where Heresie had over-turned all order, and let loose the blackest furies of Hell for the dissolution of the State. Who shall contemplate her alone, as the morning Star in the midst of so many clouds without assistance, without forces, without Counsel, persecuted by her brother, outraged by the Hereticks, betrayed by the Queen of England, under the colour of good will, sought for in marriage by force of Arms by the Princes of her own Realm, he shall find, that she hath done nothing improvidently in chusing those by friendship which necessity did give her by forces, and whether that there are times and revolutions of affairs so dangerous and remedies, in which we have no other power left us but onely to destroy our selves.

The persecution of the Queen of Scots by the Protestants.

7. In the mean time the Lutherans and the Calvinists did not cease to cry out, and to bray against their Princess, and having begun by infamous libels, they prevailed so much by their Trumpets of Sedition, that they kindled a war under the pretence of revenging the Kings death, whom they had caused to be pourtrayed dead in a bloudy Standard, with his little Son at his feet who demanded vengeance. Bothuel, who as yet was drunk with the sweetnesses of affection which he received from his new spouse, was altogether amazed when he saw an Army marching in the field against him. And that the clamour of the people did charge him aloud with the death of the King. The Queen was struck into such a horrour at the report of the Crime, that forthwith she commanded him to withdraw himself, and never to see her more, and although she was ignorant, that his Courage and Valour were able to secure her from the tempest which was falling on her, yet she chose rather to abandon her self as a prey to all the fury of her Enemies, than to keep but one hour that person near her, which she then onely knew to have had some ill designs on the person of the King. He fled from Scotland into Denmark, where after ten years tedious imprisonment, he living and dying did protest that Queen Mary did never know of the conspiracy against her husband, & that those who gave the blow, having demanded some Warrant from the Queen for their discharge, she made answer, that it was sacriledge to think of it, so innocent a Soul she had. This protestation which he made at his death, before the Bishop and other Lords of the Realm, was afterwards sent to diverse Princes of Europe, and to Elizabeth her self who did dissemble it. In the mean time the Rage of the Infidels did seize on Mary, and did constrain her with execrable violence and treasons plotted under hand by the Agents of the Queen of England, to resign the Kingdom to her son, whom these seditious people caused to be Crowned at one year of age, to put all the Authority into the hands of Murray in the quality of Regent. Not content with this, they surprized her in a morning as she was putting on her cloathes, and taking from her all ornaments worthy of her quality, they cloathed her in a sordid habite, and having mounted her upon a horse, which by chance passed through a Meadow, they brought her into a place out of the way, and confined her to a Castle, scituate on the lake of Lenox, under the guard of the Earl of Douglas, Brother by the mothers side to the Vice-Roy, using her as a lost creature, and with horrible boldness accusing her for the death of her husband, and a design to invade his Kingdom.

The fury and infidelity of Ambition.

In this captivity she was charged with contumacies by the Concubine of her Father, a most insolent woman, to whom the keeping of her was committed, and by a disrobed Prior who did visite her, and tendered her some Remonstrances to assist her as her Father Confessor. And at that time some black and butcherly spirits did take a resolution to strangle her, and to publish to the world, that she had done it of her self, being overcome by dispair.

What an indignity was this, and what a confusion in nature and the laws of the world, to behold that excellent Lady, to whom grace and nature had given chains to captivate the hearts of the most barbarous. That great Princess, whom the sun did see almost as soon to be a Queen as a living creature. She that was born to Empires, as all Empires seemed to be made for her; to be deprived of her sweet liberty, to see herself severed from all commerce with mankind, to be banished in a desart, where nothing but rocks were the witnesses of her sufferings. Nay, which is more, she is now become the captive of her own subjects, and a servant to her slaves. The poor Turtle ceased not to groan, and often through the grate would look on the lake, wherein every wave she conceived, she beheld the waving image of her change of fortunes.

Not long after she entered into a deep melancholy, when the evil spirit that fisheth in troubled waters did tempt her into thoughts of despair, representing to her, that since the air, and the earth were shut from her, she should make choice of the water, into the which she should throw her self, and end the languishment of her captivity, by burying her self in a moment with her afflictions.

But as her pious soul was fastened unto GOD by chains not to be dissolved, she fervently besought the Divine bounty, that he would vouchsafe to comfort her, and confirm her spirit, which was descended into the bottom of the Abyss of the miseries of this world. Her prayer being ended, she was inspired with infusions of love towards her Creatour, and armed with a noble confidence, she in this manner did express her self.

She comforteth her self in prison.

Wherefore art thou so sad my soul, if GOD permits this for thy sins, shouldest thou not kiss the Rod that strikes thee, and adore that infinite mercy who doth chastise thee by temporary punishments, not willing to make thee an object of that choler, which is kindled by an eternity of flames, and if this comes unto thee to approve thy virtues, dost thou fear to enter into the furnace, where that great Workman will consume the straw onely that burns thee, and will make thee to shine as gold; wherefore art thou so sad my heart? To be deprived of liberty and the delights of the Court, take unto thee the wings of contemplation and of love, and fly thou beyond these waters, fly thou beyond the seas which inviron these Islands, and understand, that there is no prison for a Soul which GOD doth set at liberty, and that all the world doth belong to him, who knows how to misprise it.

1. Hope against all hope.

In these considerations she took incomparable delight, and as well as she could did charm the afflictions of her imprisonment, when behold a blind felicity which made her to see unexpected events. GOD stirred up a little Daniel to deliver this poor Susanna, a little Infant, the son of the Earl of Douglas did feel his little heart touched with the miseries of this brave Queen, and had the hardiness to speak thus unto her. Madam, if your Majesty will understand a way to your deliverance, I can give it you. We have here below a Gate, at which we sometimes do go forth to delight our selves upon the water, I will bring you the key, and have the Boat ready, in which, fearing my fathers anger, I must save my self with you. The Queen, extreamly amazed at the discourse of the child, made answer. My little friend your counsel is very good, Do as you speak, and acquaint no man with it, otherwise you will ruine us; if you will oblige me for so great a favour, I will make you a great man, and you shall have content all your dayes. In the mean time for want of pen and paper she wrote on her hand-kerchief with a coal, and found a means to advertise the Viscount of Selon touching that design, assigning both the day & the place where he should attend her, to which he disposed himself with so much activity, as if he had rather wings to flie, than paces by foot to measure. The child failed not to put in execution what he promised, The Queen took the key in her hand, opened the Gate, and nimbly leaped into the Boat with this little Companion of her fortune, she took her self the pole into her hand, seeing the young child had not force to steer the boat, she began to guid it and to save her life by the favour of her arms. One of her maids, named Queneda, seing her Mistress in this difficulty, did leap into the water out of a window of the Castle, and abandoned her self to the mercy of the waves, to joyn herself unto the fortunes of her Mistress.

Her departure.

O good GOD, How may the stars in the greater silence of this world, with admiration behold so great a Queen, to sit at the stern of a boat, with oars in her hand, and practising a trade of life, which necessitie doth teach her, and felicity doth govern. The waters stroaked into a calm, did perceive the effects of her fair hand, and gently opened themselves to make a passage for her. At last, she arrived at the bank on the other side, and found there the Viscount, who received her with all reverence and joy. She retired her self into a place of safety, and thought on the means to re-establish her self, to which she found her good subjects well disposed, and in a short time, raised an Army of about seven thousand men. At which the Enemies being inraged, drew up against them in great bodies, and giving them battel, they over-powered them in number, and obtained the victory. The encounter was bloudy, to which one part did contribute courage, and the other fury. Seven and fifty personages of Honour of the House of Hamilton, which is next unto the King, did with their dead bodies cover the field, where the battel Battel was fought. The Queen, who with horrour entertained the apprehenſion of ſo many maſſacres, did prefer an innocent Retreat before an uncertain Victory. Her baſtard Brother the chief of the Rebellion, of an imaginary King, did now make himſelf an abſolute Tyrant, and as much as in him lay, he endeavoured to root out the reſt of the true Religion in Scotland, by the perſwaſion of Knox and Buchanan, he ſtripped the Churches naked to cover himſelf, he oppreſſed all honeſt men, and let himſelf looſe unto all manner of inſolence.

Her Retreat into England, where her enemies accuſed her.

8. The deplorable Queen is conſtrained to depart out of her Kingdom, to fall no more into ſuch cruel hands. She took ſhipping, having a deſire at firſt to ſail into France, where her Memory was ſtill preſerved in ſingular Reputation; but having a lofty heart, though excellently well tempred, ſhe was aſhamed to tranſport her ſelf, & to be ſeen in the condition of a baniſhed woman, in a place where all the graces and virtues had given her ſo many tropheys. She cõceived, that concealed Miſery was the more ſupportable, and that it was more expedient for her to live in an Iſland, which was an out-corner of the world, than in the ſplendour of France. Beſides, ſhe conceived that ſhe ought to continue within the Neighbour-hood of her own Kingdom, the better to facilitate her Return unto it. The Archbiſhop Hamilton, a moſt wiſe old man, did diſſwade her from that reſolution, underſtanding very well the Deportments of Murray with the Queen of England, and becauſe ſhe made apparence to give but little heed unto his counſels, he threw himſelf at her feet with tears in his eyes, and beſought her not to follow the greatneſs of her mind, as to make choice of that place, which would be her certain deſtruction. On the other ſide, Elizabeth did ſollicite her again and again, and did importune her by a thouſand courteſies to repair into England, to which at laſt ſhe condeſcended, as if Neceſſity had prepared links of Diamonds to chain her to her miſfortunes.

A civil ſhame doth hinder good deſigns.

The innocent Dove, in endeavouring to eſchew the nets of the Fowler, did fall into the talons of the Hawk. She came into a Kingdom, from whence Juſtice and Religion were baniſhed, by the horrible factions of the Hereticks. She put her ſelf into her hands, who had uſurped her Scepter, and who made uſe of all Intereſts to procure her death. Inſtead of coming to the Court to be received there according to her birth and merit, ſhe found her ſelf to be confined into a corner of a deſart Iſland, where in a new captivity, ſhe moſt unworthily was detained. Her diſloyal Brother, the Vice-roy, ſeeing her eſcaped from his bloudy hands, did promiſe to himſelf to oppreſs with much eaſe, by the circumventions of the Proteſtant Judges. He laid anew for her the nets of his old Accuſations, and made uſe of all the falſities which had been invented to eclipſe her honour.

Queen Elizabeth, inſtead of ſuppreſſing the unnatural inſolence of her ſubjects, gave them Commiſſions and an Order, that a Proceſs ſhould be made againſt her. The Puritans and the Lutherans, the mortal Enemies of Queen Mary, are now her Accuſers, her Judges, and her Witneſſes. The number of honeſt men was here very few, and the apprehenſion of the danger did ſtop the mouthes of thoſe men, which underſtood the truth, but had not the courage to defend it. Nevertheleſs, amongſt others, there was a Scotch Gentleman, the Viſcount Herrin, worthy of eternal Memory, who preſented himſelf to Elizabeth for the defence of his own Queen, and ſaid unto her:

MADAM,

An generous Compaſſion.

THE Queen my Miſtreſs, who is nothing ſubject to you, but by misfortune, doth deſire you to conſider, that it is a work of an evil Example, and moſt pernicious Conſequence, to give way that her rebellious Subjects ſhould be heard againſt her, who being not able to deſtroy her by arms, do promiſe themſelves to aſſaſsinate her, even in your own breaſt, under the colour of Juſtice. Madam, Conſider the eſtate of worldly affairs, and bear ſome compaſſion to the calamities of your poor Suppliant: After the moſt horrid attempt on the King her huſband, the murder of her ſervants, the cruel Deſigns on her ſacred Perſon: After ſo many priſons and chains, the ſubjects are heard againſt their Queen, the Rebels againſt their lawfull Miſtreſs, the guilty againſt the Innocent, and the felons againſt their Judge. Where are we, or what do we do? Though Nature hath planted us in the further parts, and the extremities of all the earth, yet ſhe hath not taken the ſenſe of humanity from us. Conſider ſhe is your own bloud, your neareſt kinſ-woman, ſhe is one of the beſt Queens in the world, for whom your Majeſtie is preparing bloudy Skaffolds, in a place where ſhe was promiſed and expected greateſt favours. I want words to expreſs ſo barbarous a deed, but I am ready to come to the Effects, and to juſtifie the innocence of my Queen, by witneſſes unreproveable, and by papers written and ſubſcribed by the hands of the Accuſers. If this will not ſuffice, I offer my ſelf (by your Majeſties permiſſion) to fight hand to hand for the honour of my Queen, againſt the moſt hardy and moſt reſolute of thoſe, who are her Accuſers. In thus I do aſſure my ſelf of your Equitie, that you will not deny that favour unto her, who will acknowledge her ſelf obliged to your bounty.

Elizabeth, who found her advantages in the miſfortunes of Mary, made no account of theſe remonſtrances, and commanded the Commiſſioners, who were the Dukes of Norfolk and of Suſſex, to proceed unto the Charge. But there is a God, who rules the Aſſemblies of men, and oftentimes doth turn their Advice againſt their own conſciences. The greateſt part of this Court were ſo tranſported, that they had a Reſolution to deſtroy Queen Mary: Murray, Morton, the infamous Biſhop of Orcades, and the pernicious Buchanan, with divers other Enemies of the Queen, were now come, and brought with them the moſt execrable inventions, and blackeſt calumnies, that ever were fetcht from hell, to charge the Queen with the death of the King her husband; nay Letters of love were produced, which had been invented by ſome Puritans, who with an inſupportable impudence affirmed, that they found them in a ſilver coffer of the Queens.

The inhumane cruelty of ambition.

The Earl of Murray, who in the beginning pretended to wiſh better to no man than to Bothuel, doth now declare himſelf the chief of this Accuſation, outragiouſly purſuing the death of his Siſter, alledging, That ſhe was the occaſion of her husband's death, in revenge of the murder of her Secretary, that ſhe never loved him afterwards, that ſhe never lamented his loſs, nor repented of her own ſin. That ſhe altogether abandoned her ſelf to the love of the Earl of Bothuel, whom afterwards ſhe married, although he was the murderer of her husband. Leſley the Biſhop of Roſſe, Gordon, Gauvin, Baron, and others, who were there on the behalf of the Queen (for ſhe was preſent her ſelf in perſon) knowing the whole truth of the buſineſs, and being incenſed at the heart, to ſee the foul treaſons of this Judas, did handle him according to his deſert, and did anſwer him by a very ſtrong Apologie, which was afterward preſented to the Judges, to conſider of it at their leiſure. I will in this place inſert the ſubſtance of it, having ſome years ſince found it amongſt the Acts of the Queen of Scotland.

MY LORDS,

IT is a great favour of Heaven to us, that the Earl of Murray is an Accuſer in this Cauſe, ſince his name is able to juſtifie the greateſt crimes, much more to accuſe the Innocent, before perſons ſo approved for their juſtice,

and

and their Wisdom. It is sufficiently known, that by the ignominie of his mother, he was the son of a Crime, as soon as a son of Nature, that he hath ever since lived by wickedness, and is grown great by insolence. The Queen his Sister, hath but one fault, which is, that she hath advanced him against the intentions of the King, her father, who designed to him no Crown, but what (when he was to take Religious Orders) the Barber should give him, and now he hath usurped the Crown of the Realm. His desire and endeavours are, that the Diadem should be taken from the head of Mary, in recompence to him, for having cried her down by his calumnies, dishonoured her by his outrages, imprisoned her by his fury, and dispossessed her by his tyranny.

Murray doth accuse the Innocent, for having contrived her husbands death, and he doth accuse her in a Court, where there are Witnesses unreproveable, that will presently be deposed upon Oath, that having plotted this horrible murder, he being in a Boat, did say, That the King should that night be cured of all his maladies. And surely it was easie for him to presage it, when he and his Accomplices had before decreed it, and he had assigned them the place, the time, and the manner of the execution. Murray hath made himself an Accuser, to ravish the Kingdom, and sway the Scepter, imbrued with the blood of the Queen his sister. And we are not so much amazed at this, for he hath sold his soul to work wickedness at a far cheaper rate.

Who had a deeper interest in the death of the King, than a Monk, for so was his condition of life assigned him from his nativity, but by this most detestable murder, he is now become the Regent of a great Kingdom. Who had a more labouring desire to see the King out of the world, than he, who daily expected from the hand of death, the just reward of his disloyalty.

We are here ready to represent unto him a paper signed with his own hand, and the hands of his Adherents, where amongst them all, they are obliged against all, to defend that person, who should attempt upon the person of the King. That execrable writing was intrusted in the hands of Bolfou, Captain of the Castle of Edinborough, whom at the first they had drawn unto their side, and being since incensed against some of the Conspiratours, hath discovered all the business. This is that which we now manifest with reasons, more clear than the day, and with assurances as strong as truth it self.

My Lords, We demand what is that which the Rebels oppose against all these proofs, nothing at all but frivolous conjectures, which are not sufficient to condemn the vilest creature in the world, although they are made use of, to overthrow the person and Majesty of a Queen. Ten thousand tongues such as Murrays are, and his Accomplices, ought not to serve to make half a proof against the honour of Mary, and yet you have the patience to hear them, rather than chastise them.

Her poor servants have bin examined again and again, they have been torn to pieces, and flead alive, to accuse the Queen, and could ever so much as one effectual word be racked from them, to stain her innocence? Have they not in the middle of their torments declared aloud, and before all the people, that she was ignorant of whatsoever was done, and that they never heard the least word proceed from her, which tended to the murder of the King.

All their Reasons are reduced into two Conjectures. The first whereof is, That the Queen committed the said Act, in revenge of the death of her Secretary. The second is, Her Love and Marriage with the Earl of Bothuel, the murderer of her husband, these two are the inevitable charges against her. But to answer to the first: I demand, If the Queen had any desires of revenge, on whom should she exercise that vengeance? Upon her husband, whom she loved with incomparable affection, whom in all companies she defended, as a young man, seduced by evil counsels, to whom she had given a full forgetfulness, and abolition of the murder of David Riccio, for fear that one day he should be called to an account for it, whom she very lately had received into favour, and the strictest friendship, to whom she had given the testimonies of a fervent love unto the last hour of his death. Is it on him that she would discharge her choller, or on those who were the Authours and Executioners of the act. If she hath pardoned the Earls of Murray, and Morton, her sworn Enemies, whom on a thousand occasions she could cut off: here is it to be believed, that a Lady, who had ever a most tender conscience, would destroy a husband so agreeable to her, and whom she knew to have never offended, but through the malice onely of these desperate spirits.

But why then hath she married him, who made this attempt against the King her husband? This is their second Objection, and to speak the truth, the onely one, which they so much cry up. For this it is that they have taken away her Rings and Jewels, and put in the place of them infamous letters, invented by Buchanan, or some like unto him, who treat of love, not as in the person of a Princess, but of a loose licentious woman. And these Letters, when they were produced, did appear to be never made up, or sealed, but exposed to all the World, as if so chaste and so wise a spirit as this Queen, could be so stupid, or so wicked, as to publish her own infamy to the face of all the world.

But in the end, they say, the Marriage was accomplished. And who did do it but these onely, who now do make it a capital Crime. These are they who did give advice to this match by reasons, did sollicit it by pursuits, did constrain it by force, and did sign it by continuance. Behold, we are here ready in your presence, to represent unto you the Contract, which doth bear their names and seals of Arms, which they cannot disprove. The Queen hath protested before God and men, that she had rather die ten thousand deaths, than to have married Bothuel, if she had thought he had been stained but with one drop of her husbands bloud, and if he had not been proclaimed to be innocent.

And now judge (My Lords) with what impudence they dare appear before you, and do believe, that the Queen of England hath sent you hither to serve their passions, and sacrifice so great a Princess to their vengeance. We do hope all the contrary, and do firmly perswade our selves, that the great God, the undoubted Judge of the living and the dead, will inspire you with such counsels, as shall give the Day to Truth, for the glory of your own consciences, and the comfort of the most afflicted of Queens, who desireth not to breathe out the rest of her life that is left her, but under the favour of your Goodness.

This in this manner being spoken, the Agents and Deputies for the Queen having aloud protested, that they here assembled not to acknowledge any power Superiour to the Crown of Scotland, but onely to declare in the behalf of their Queen, being unwilling to lose time in words, they came to the proofs, and did defend them with incredible vigour, making in the first place the falsifications, which were very ordinary with the Earl of Murray, to appear in full Councel. In the second place, representing the Contract of the Marriage with Bothuel, which he condemned, to be signed by him and his Adherents. Moreover, producing the instrument of the Conspiracy against the King, subscribed by their own hands, and signed by their own Seals. And lastly, reporting the Depositions of John Hebron, Paris, and Daglis, who being executed for this Act, did fully discharge the Queen at the instant of their death before all the people.

Her justification.

After that the Commissioners had judged the Queen of Scots to be innocent of all the Cases and Crimes, which falsely had been imposed on her by her traiterous and disloyal Accusers, and that the proceedings which they made, were for no other purpose, purpose, but to exempt themselves from the crimes which they had committed, and to cover the tyranny which they had exercised in the Kingdom of Scotland. The Earl of Murray did flie away, filled with fear and with confusion, seeing that his life was in great danger, if he had not been secretly protected by the Queen of England.

The confusion of her Accusers.

In the pursuit of this Sentence, the most honest of the Councel did propose three Remedies to take away the differences, and to re-establish the true Queen in her Kingdom. The first was, That she should give assurances to the Queen Elizabeth, no ways to disquiet her in the Succession of the Crown of England. The Second was, That she should grant an Act of Pardon and Forgetfulness to her rebellious Subjects, for fear the punishment should otherwise extend to a number that was infinite. The third was, That the Marriage with Bothael being condemned to be unlawfull, she should consent to be espoused to some Illustrious Person in England, who should be answerable in all conditions, and maintain both Kingdoms in a perpetual friendship, to which Queen Mary shewed a singular inclination.

The labyrinths of the hypocrisie of Elizabeth.

9. But the Queen of England was wonderfully amazed at this Sentence and proceedings, and although in publick she seemed to be much contented at the justification of her Cousin, yet in secret she much raged at it, and encouraged the Accusers to prosecute their complaints in full Parliament, telling them, They were both lazy and impertinent to begin their Suit, and not to accomplish it.

The Process upon this, was brought again to the Councel of England, where the bastard Murray, armed with the outragious pen of Buchanan, used all his power, even to the affrighting of the Agents of Queen Mary, by the Authority of Elizabeth. But the best sort of people began to murmure, saying, that it was necessary that the Traitours should be taken off, and the innocent Queen re-established in her Kingdom. On the one side, Elizabeth ceased not to make delays, and on the other, she pretended that she would understand what should be the conditions of her Inlargement, whether it were to appear civil and humane, or whether she would sound the minds of those further, whom she thought did talk with too much liberty, concerning that affair.

Deceitfull hopes.

In the mean time, the Spirits which could not clearly enough discover the labyrinths of her dark heart, conceived that Truth had now prevailed to publish the innocence of the Queen of Scotland, that the Storm was grown into a Calm, and that she now began to arrive at her desired haven, she now was looked on by every one with another eye, and the greatest personages in England, did passionately desire an Alliance with her.

The Earl of Liecester, an intimate favourite of Elizabeths, observing that his Queen had no intention to be married, and that the Scepter of England did look upon this Prisoner, did entertain a delicate Ambition, to court her in the way of Marriage, but the Transalpine humour of his most jealous Mistress did so perplex him, that he durst not tell to his own heart, what his own thoughts were. He most passionately desired, that the Queen would make some overture to him of it, to submit all things to her discretion, and to make her understand, that this would be a happy means to take away all doubts, and misapprehensions that should arise from Scotland. But so it was, that he durst not proceed in it, so well he understood the spirit of Elizabeth, who was as apt to receive an evil impression, as she was cruel to revenge it.

Treason against the Duke of Norfolk, and his ruin.

The Duke of Norfolk, who was President at the Trial of Queen Mary, was advanced above all others in Dignity, and remarkable over all the Realm for his great and gallant qualities. The bastard Murray did flatter him with the hope of his Sisters marriage. The Earl of Liecester began to dive into his heart concerning that suit, and gave him some touches of it, whether it were that by that means he would know the pleasure of Elizabeth, or whether he were resolved to destroy the Duke, who onely was able to cast a shadow on his light. Throgmorton, who was a friend unto them both, did first carry the message, and acquainted Norfolk, that Liecester had a desire to speak with him on a business of high importance, which was concerning his marriage with the Queen of Scotland, he told him, That he spoke this unto him as of himself, but counselled him as a friend, to refer the further proceedings on that marriage to the Earl of Liecester, who, though it was thought did pretend himself to it, yet he desired that his modesty would give way that the Earl might advise him, because there was no great apparence of any thriving in that motion without his direction. He believed this counsel, and as soon as the Earl began to open his mouth concerning it, he did comply unto him with all honour and submission, and did express himself to be indifferent and cold enough concerning that marriage, although, to speak the truth, her Innocence so much persecuted, had kindled already the first fire of love within his heart. Leiceſter, touched with this courtesie, did increase his flame, and did remonstrate to him, that this Marriage would highly conduce to the benefit of the State, because it would prove a happy means to divert all strange Alliances, which might carry the Queen of Scotland to pursue her pretensions to the Crown of England, and serve absolutely to confirm her in the good opinion of Queen Elizabeth. The Duke, who was indued with a natural freedom of disposition, and knew not how to dissemble, beholding himself at one time betwixt two violent fires of Love and Honour, did entertain the heat, which too soon he did evaporate, and besought the Earl, since he pretended no more to that affair, and that he himself would not proceed in it without his assurance, that he would do him a courtesie worthy of the place which he had near the Queen, for which he never would be ingratefull. This the Earl did promise him, and, if men may judge by apparence, very heartily; which did so blow up the heart of the Lover, that in thinking of it, he did adore his own thoughts. It was indeed a strange temptation, to propose unto himself so accomplished a Beauty, and so eminent a Virtue, on whose trayn two Kingdoms did attend. The world is not capable to be governed by two Suns, and the heart of man suffers more than mortal Agonies, when it sustains the shock of two violent passions, who unite their forces and designs, to make a war upon him.

Great passions of Love and Ambition.

The Duke beholding himself flattered with these loves, by divers other Agents, did write unto the Queen of Scotland, with magnifick complements, and offers of unparallel'd service, with the greater pomp & sweetness to enter into the secrets of her thoughts. The Prisoner, who laboured for nothing more than to break her chains asunder, did desire rather to see the end of that affair, than to understand the beginning of it, but the experience which she had of the dissimulation and jealousies of Elizabeth, did make her to go upon these considerations, as on a fire covered with ashes. Wherefore, without being much moved at it, she made answer, That she must commit the whole Negotiation to the Queen, and trust to none to whom she had not spoken, and openly testified her desires.

In the mean time, the Earl of Leiceſter, who had promised to speak unto her, and who onely could give a fair colour to the estate of that Marriage, to perswade Elizabeth to incline unto it, did deferre to speak unto her from day to day, and being importuned to it, by the violent sollicitations of the Duke, he counterfeited himself sick, and continued in a malignant silence.

The fury of Elizabeth.

He knew very well that to ruin a good busines, we must make use of an indiscreet tongue, he therefore permitted that some Ladies, who for the most part with curiosity enough do deliver the secrets of lovers, should report the first news of it unto the Queen.

This was to put her spirit upon the Rack, and to torment her in the most sensible part. She, who was extreamly jealous on any motions that were made unto her concerning the Queen of Scotland, and would grow into a fury upon the least discourse that did reflect upon her right unto the Crown, finding her self assaulted at one time by two strong passions, did enter into a rage that cannot be represented. Her spirit, which naturally was formed for dissimulation, could not now conceal it self, but she did let fall some words unto the Duke of Norfolk, telling him, That although he slept softly upon a cushion, he should take care it was not taken from him, And immediately upon it, leaving off these riddles, she sharply reproved him for presuming on the marriage with the Queen of Scotland without first acquainting her with it. The Duke made answer, That he never attempted any thing of himself, without attending her pleasure and commandement, and that he gave an expres charge to the Earl of Liecester, to acquaint her with it, and to desire her condiscent unto it, but perceiving her Majesty was averse unto it, he would willingly forbear any further suit, having no other aim, but to rule his life and fortunes according unto her intentions. On this promise, she departed from him, and went to look out the Earl of Liecester, who was the Master of the Guard of the chamber, who understanding that she was advertised that the secret of the marriage was deposed in his breast, he was suddenly possessed with a great fear, which made him look pale and tremble in the presence of the Queen, whom he prevented, and with tears in his eyes besought her to excuse him, that he had not acquainted her with it, because, he said, he waited an opportunity to find her in a good humour, to give the less trouble to her mind, which is found before to be too much disquited. His counterfeit sickness, his pale colour, but above all the inordinate affection which Elizabeth did bear unto him, did at that time save him from the thunder of her Choler: But poor Norfolk did presently behold himself abandoned by his friends, discountenanced by the Queen, followed, spied, persecuted, and at last confined to the Tower of London.

The horrible Catastrophe of the Duke of Norfolk.

Not long after, there were scaffolds made in the great Palace, a Tribunal was planted, and seats were made one both sides of it, for the Commissioners to sit, who were to be his Judges. He was brought to the Bar by two Knights, before whom an Ax was carried, the back whereof was turned towards the accused. The Earl of Talbot, was made President of the Court, and sate on the Judgement seat, and on both sides of him there were ranked a considerable number of Judges and Counsellours. After that their Commission was read, the Duke was cited, and accused to have endeavoured to dispossess Queen Elizabeth, and to set the Queen of Scotland on her Throne: To hold great intelligence with the Pope, and forreign Princes, enemies to the Crown of England, and with his possession to have assisted the enemies of the State, with many more particulars. The poor Duke was much amazed to see himself so suddenly invested, with so dangerous an accusation, and charged with so many Articles. He desired that he might be allowed Counsel to draw up his justification, but it was refused, and being demanded to answer readily to the Crimes of which he was accused, he replied very innocently.

„ I commend my self to God and to my Peers. „ The Atrocity of the Crimes do amaze me, but the „ Royal Clemency of her Majesty, which hath con„ ferred favours on me beyond my hope, doth again „ incourage me, I beseech you my Lord President, „ that I may have right done unto me, and that my „ memory may not be too much oppressed with the „ variety of confused complaints. I acknowledge „ my self happy to have you my Peers to be my „ Judges, and most willingly do commit my life „ to the integrity of the greatest part of you, assuring „ you on my innocence, that I will not faulter with „ you, and though I do ingeniously acknowledge, „ that I have not altogether directed my actions ac„ cording to an exact rule of Justice, yet so it is, that „ I have not offended her Majesty.

At that time there was one Barret, Advocate General to the Queen, a violent man, bold against those who were fearfull, and fearfull of those who were bold, who to shew his abilities, and the zeal which he did bear to the service of his Mistress, did vigorously proceed against the Duke, and did perplex him with multitudes of words: The good Duke, who knew better how to handle his sword than his tongue, and had withall but an uncertain memory, did defend his honour and his life as well as he could, but his party was no way equal, so much Authority, perfidiousnes, and malice did pour down upon him, that he was not able to wade through it. At the last, he was commanded to withdraw, that they might advise upon his sentence, and on his return they shewed the edge of the Ax towards him, to carry him before hand the sad news of the sentence of his death, which condemned him to be drawn upon a sledge unto the Gibbet, to be there hanged, drawn, and quartered. This sentence did startle him at the horrour of it, and produced from him these expressions. „ Sentence is here pronounced against me as a Trai„ tour, but I do trust in God & the Queen, & I hope, „ though I am deprived of your company, I shall re„ joyce in that which is in Heaven, in that assurance „ I will prepare my self for death. I desire nothing „ of the Queen but onely that she will be favourable „ to my Children and my servants, and that there „ may be care taken for the discharge of my debts.

Some moneths afterwards the sentence of death being a little moderated, he was brought to the place of execution, where he died like a Divine rather than a Souldier, preaching to the people, and accusing himself, that he treated on the marriage with the Queen of Scotland, without acquainting his own Queen with it. He also accused himself of having seen letters written from the Pope, to which he said, he never condiscended, and withall that he had maintained servants affectioned to the Religion of the Church of Rome, in which, if he had offended God, the true Church, and the Protestants, he demanded pardon. A new Dean, A Heretick, who had taken a wild possession of his afflicted Soul, being present at his death (according to the Order he had received) did perswade him to speak any thing in the favour of his own party, after which he prostrated himself on the earth, and having pronounced a prayer or two, he laid his head upon the block, which the Executioner with one blow divided from his body.

Gods judgement on wicked Murray.

The Earl of Murray, who was the creature of Queen Elizabeth for the ruining at once of this Commanders life and his sisters hopes, being returned into Scotland, where after so much perfidiousnes, he resolved to triumph in the bloudy spoils of his nearest kinswoman, was killed by a Pistol bullet, shot by the hand of one Hamilton, who was one of the chiefest of the Nobility of that Kingdom, and now at last that uncontrouled Ambition, which did blow up so many storms, is extinguished in its own bloud, he not witnessing at his death any Act of Christianity.

ty. His good ſiſter did much lament his deſpoiled body, but above all his ſoul, which being snatched away by ſudden death, had not the leiſure to repent the actual Crimes of his life, nor the blaſphemies of his mouth.

The Queens languiſhments in priſon.

10. Nevertheleſs, ſhe found her ſelf faſt bound with the chains, which this malicious contriver had linked for her deſtruction, and under the ſhadow of this pretended marriage with the Duke of Norfolk, although ſhe deported her ſelf in it with all diſcretion, yet ſhe was perſecuted again, ſo abſolutely reſolved were miſchief and misfortune to purſue her to her grave, and at the ſame time, when ſhe thought to have ſeen the beams of her dear liberty, ſhe had double guards ſet upon her, to afflict her with all the rigour that was poſſible.

Of the four and fourty years of her life, which God had diſpenced to her, ſhe ſuffered almoſt the half of them under the cruelty of a tedious impriſonment, where ſhe had a thouſand times been overcome with melancholy, were it not for the conſolations which ſhe did draw from the fountain of true piety. Pope Pius the fifth, underſtanding that ſhe was denied the aſſiſtance of Prieſts, did permit her to communicate her ſelf unto him, which oftentimes ſhe did, and oftentimes the conſecrated Hoſt was privately ſent unto her by thoſe whom he intruſted. Beſides this, ſhe being a moſt knowing Princeſs, who had her education in France from five years of age, and always loved good letters, and underſtood and ſpoke ſix languages, did improve her underſtanding and her time, by the aſſiduity of reading, which did much ſweeten the afflictions of her captivity.

During the time of thoſe perſecutions, ſhe received the comfort of benediction from divers Popes, who ſecreetly did ſend ſome Fathers to her, who being as induſtrious as couragious did find out a way to ſee her, and to fortifie her in the true Religion, and to diſcourſe with her on heavenly things, which was the ſweeteſt Manna which ſhe taſted in that wilderneſs. She always proteſted, in the ſingular confidence which ſhe had in God, that no violence ſhould ſeparate her from the ancient religion, and that it ſhould be unto her a peculiar gift from heaven, to ſeal her confeſſion with her bloud.

Henry the third of France, honouring her dignity and alliance, forgot not to ſend divers Ambaſſadours to comfort her, although for certain reaſons of State he did never act effectually for her deliverance. We have yet living in Paris, a venerable man of four-ſcore years of age, full of Virtue, Honour and Merit, who did viſite her in her captivity by the commandment of the ſaid Henry, and who oftentimes hath aſſured me, that no man could ſee that excellent Queen without raptures of celeſtial joy. She loved the French naturally, and was magnificent in her gifts, and finding her ſelf at that time unprovided of thoſe things, which ſhe deſired not to enjoy, but onely to diſtribute amongſt her friends, ſhe did take a Ring of Diamonds, which was left her, and her own Table-book, which ſhe gave to this good Gentleman, who ſhewed them to me for the rareneſs of the work. It is true indeed, the book was very rich, being covered with crimſon Velvet, and garniſhed with clapſes, and on the corners with plates of Gold, but ſhe did guild it far more with her royal words, telling him, that it was one of the misfortunes of her impriſonment, that ſhe was not able to preſent a gift unto him, that was worthy of his merit: Howſoever ſhe would tender to him that ſmall gift, which would be the more obſervable for the profit it ſhould bring him, having written in it ſome few, but remarkable obſervations, which ſhould conduce much to his advantage, and, but little to her own.

In the mean time this great ſoul paſſed many years weeping on the banks of this cruel Babylon, where ſhe heard nothing ſpoken, but what carried the ſounds with it of chains and priſons, and the maſſacres of Catholicks. She was perpetually ſick in body, and overwhelmed with the bitterneſs of mind, but amongſt all the cares of her cruel and tedious impriſonment, nothing came more near her heart, than the danger of her ſon, a young Prince in the hands of Hereticks, and abandoned to their Doctrine, receiving his firſt principles from their errours, and expoſed as a prey to their conſpiracies. This was the occaſion that ſome years before her death, ſhe wrote a long letter to the Queen of England, in which behold ſome notable expreſſions.

MADAM,

A pithy and couragious letter to the Queen of England.

COncerning what is brought to my knowledge, touching the late conſpiracies executed in Scotland againſt my poor Son, finding by my own example, that I have a juſt occaſion to fear the ſad conſequence, it is moſt neceſſary, that before I depart this world, I ſhould imploy all the ſtrength and life that is left me, to diſcharge my heart plainly to you, by my complaints, which are as juſt as they are lamentable.

I deſire that after my death, this letter may ſerve you as a perpetual rememberance, which in the deepeſt characters I would imprint in your conſcience, as well for my diſcharge unto poſterity, as to the ſhame and confuſion of all thoſe, who under your Warrant have ſo unworthily, and ſo cruelly uſed me: And becauſe their deſigns, their practiſes and proceedings (though never ſo deteſtable) have always prevailed on your ſide, againſt my moſt juſt Remonſtrances, and all the ſincerity of my deportment; and the force which you have in your hands warp and byaſs the common capacities of men, I will therefore have my recourſe to the living God, our onely Judge, who under him hath equally and immediately eſtabliſhed us, for the Government of his people; I will invoke him in this extremity of my afflictions, to render both to you and my ſelf what is due, either to our Merits or Demerits. Remember, Madam, that he is the onely Judge, a Judge whom the painting and policie of this world can no way diſguiſe, although men for a time may obſcure the truth, by the ſubtility of their inventions.

In his name, and being, as it were, both of us before him, I muſt remember you of the ſecret practiſes you have uſed to trouble my Kingdom, to corrupt my Subjects, to forſake their allegiance, and to attempt my perſon. I ſhall repreſent unto you the unjuſt diſmiſſion, which by your Counſel I was overcome to ſign, when my enemies held their ponyards at my throat, in the priſon of Locklevin, you aſſured me that the Diſmiſſion ſhould be of no force, although ſince, you have made it as effectual and powerfull as you could, aſſiſting thoſe by your forces, who were the firſt Authors of it. You have transmitted my Authority to my Son, when he was but in his Cradle, and was not able to help himſelf, and ſince I have by law confirmed the Crown on him, you have intruſted him in the hands of my moſt capital enemies, who having forced from him the effect, will alſo take away the title of a King, if God doth not preſerve him.

I will profeſs unto you, before the moſt impartial Judge, that beholding my ſelf purſued to death by my Rebels, I ſent unto you expreſly by a Gentleman the Diamond Ring which I received from you, with an aſſurance to be protected by your Authority, ſuccoured by your Arms, and received into your Realm with all courteſie. This promiſe, ſo often repeated by your mouth, did oblige me to come to throw my ſelf into your Arms, if I could be ſo happy to approch them. But indeavouring where to find you, behold I was ſtopped in the way, environed with Guards, detained in ſtrong holds, confined to a lamentable captivity, in which I do at this day die, without numbering a thousand deaths, which already I have suffered.

After that the Truth hath laid open all the impostures which were contrived against me, that the chiefest of the Nobilitie of your Kingdom have acknowledged in publick, and declared my innocence. After that it hath been made apparent, that what passed betwixt the late Duke of Norfolk and my self, was treated, approved, and signed by those, who held the first place in your Councels. After so long a time, that I have always submitted to the Orders which were prescribed for my captivitie, I do behold my self to be daily persecuted in my own person, and in the persons of my servants, and totally hinders, not onely from relieving the pressing necessities of my Son, but from receiving the least knowledge of his condition.

This is that, MADAM, which makes me once more to beseech you, by the dolorous Passion of our Saviour and Redeemer Jesus Christ, that I may have permission to depart your Kingdom, to assist my dear Son, and to find some comfort for my poor bodie, travelled with continual sorrows; and, with all libertie of conscience, to prepare my soul for God, who hourly doth call for it.

Your Prisons have destroyed my bodie, there is no more left for my Enemies to satiate their vengeance. My soul is still entire, which you neither can, nor ought to captivate. Allow it some place to breathe more freely after its own safety, which a thousand times I do more desire, than all the greatness in the world. What Honour can you receive to see me stifled in your presence, and to fall at the feet of my Enemies? Do you not consider, that in this extreamity, if by your means (although late) I shall be rescued from their hands, that you shall oblige me, and all mine, and especially my Son, whom most of all you may assure your own.

I must beseech you, that I may understand your intentions concerning this, and that you will not remit me to the discretion of any other, but your own. In the mean time, I shall demand two things; the one, That being readie to depart this world, I may be suffered to have with me some man of honour of the Church, to instruct and perfect me in my Religion, in which I am resolved to live and die. The other, That I may have two maids in my Chamber, to attend me in my sickness, protesting before God, they are most necessary for me, to keep me from the shame of the simple people. Grant me then these Petitions, for the honour of God, and let it appear that my Enemies have not so much credit with you, as to exercise their vengeance and crueltie in a thing of so small a consequence.

Reassume the marks of your ancient good nature, Oblige your own to your self. Grant me that contentment before I die, as to see all things remitted betwixt you and my self, to the end that my soul, being inlarged from my bodie, it be not constrained to lay open her groans before God, for the injuries which you have suffered to be done unto me upon earth; But on the contrary, that departing from this captivity in peace and concord, it may with all content repair to him, whom I most humbly beseech to inspire You, to condescend to my most just Requests.

Sheffeild: November 28. 1581.

Your most desolate, most near, and most affectionate Kinswoman,
QUEEN MARY.

II. May we not affirm that these Remonstrances, and that these words were of power to soften the heart of a Tyger, and yet they made no impression on her barbarous soul, who being born by a crime, could not afterwards live but by iniquity.

A parallel on both Queens.

Dear Reader, it is true, that we are possessed with an amazement on the consideration of the particulars of this History; And it may be you have the curiosity to draw open the curtain of the Sanctuary, and enter into the secrets of the Divine Providence, and in the travers of so much shade and darkness, to discover, why two Queens of so different qualities, were so indifferently handled, as it were, by the blind conduct of Chance. How came it about, that nothing but calamity did follow the good Queen, and all good fortune seemed not to be, but onely for the bad one? I will parallel the one with the other, and although Queen Elizabeth be dead, out of the communion of the true Church, and in many considerations had extreamly undervalued and offended France, yet I will not so rudely speak of her, as she hath been charactered by the eloquent pens of Monsieur, the Cardinal of Peron, and Monsieur du Vair, but content my self to speak of that onely, which may be collected from the History written by Cambden, her own Historiographer.

Queen Mary was high and glorious in her birth, both by the Father and the Mother. Queen Elizabeth did come into the world by a crime and a scandal, who made all Christendom to groan. It is true indeed, she was the daughter of a King, but of a licentious King, and of a wanton mother, whose head the King did cause to be cut off, for her unchastness. The one from five years of age was brought up in France, with so much piety, gravity and honour, that nothing more could be added or desired. The other had a licentious Education under the bad Example of her licentious parents. The one had an excellent, an active, and a clear spirit, resembling the quality of the Sun. The other was of a crafty, malignant, and a sullen Nature, resembling the condition of a Corner. The one was experienced in the knowledge of tongues and sciences, as much as was necessary for an honest Lady, who ought not to appear too learned. The other gave her self to such a vanity of study, that oftentimes she committed some extravagances; as when she undertook to translate the five books of the Consolation of Boëtius, to comfort her self on the Conversion of Henrie the Fourth. The one did speak and write with an extraordinary clearness, and an accurate smoothness. The other in her expressions was harsh, and did much perplex her thoughts, as may appear in a subscription of a Letter, written with her own hand, and directed to Henrie the Fourth, after his Conversion. Vostre sœur, ſice soit a la virille, avec novelle, Je n'ay que faire, Elizabeth R. which is in English, Your Sister, if it be after the old fashion, with the new, I have nothing but to do, Elizabeth R: I leave to the most liberal Interpreter, to divine what she meaneth by it. The one had a generous, free, and a credulous heart. The other was malicious, obstinate, and deceitfull. The one loved honour, to which her condition had obliged her. The other had a furious and bloudy Ambition, and spared none, to improve the interest of her Greatness. The one retained an admirable constancy in her ancient Religion, by reason whereof, though she was outragiously persecuted, yet she omitted nothing in her devotion. The other did put on Religion as she did her mask, making her self a Heretick amongst Hereticks, and a Catholick amongst Catholicks, for when in the reign of her sister Mary, she made a high and solemn profession of the Roman Faith, she afterwards counterfeited her belief, and betrayed that character to authorize heresie and rebellion against the Church. The one feared God, and finding her self the Relict of Francis the Second, at seventeen years of age, she had rather stoop to the marriage yoke, to give life unto a King, than to live inordinately, and under the veil of widow-hood, to conceal her secret wantonness. The other, who had not so strict a conscience, did find a way to reconcile Ambition and Love, and lived not married, and not a maid, and though I am unwilling willing to believe, that ſhe lived ſo falſe and melting a life, as ſome have affirmed, yet I cannot deny but that ſhe had her Favourites and her Minyons, which Cambden her own Hiſtoriographer doth not conceal. The one ſtudied for the advancement of Virtue. The other for the advancement onely of vain Reputation. The one held forth a generous liberty in all her actions. The other painted her life, and covered her vices, with great pretences, ſhe extreamly feared the cenſure of Poſterity, which made her with ſo much artifice to indeer unto her the ableſt men of forreign Countreys, and entertained mercenary quills, to increaſe her glory, thinking by that means to conceal her Defects, and blind the eyes of mankind. Wherefore we ought not to give too much belief to ſome Hiſtorians, though otherwiſe men of eſteem, who deliver many and great praiſes, having received many and great Preſents. Men of that quality are always credulous enough, and are not accuſtomed to bark at thoſe who do feed them with bread. The one was very religious in her promiſes, the other was captious and inconſtant, and this moſt viſibly ſhe made apparent to the Duke of Alencon, Brother to Henrie the Third of France, who was come into England to eſpouſe her and though the Contract of the Marriage was confirmed, both on the one ſide, and the other, and though the Marriage-Ring was given, yet ſhe broke all, for the Caprichiouſneſs of one night, and to obey the cries of ſome Maids of Honour, who beſought her that ſhe would not marry. The one was full of bounty to her poor Subjects, to whom ſhe could not do all the good ſhe deſired, by reaſon of the Rebellions that were ſtirred up in her Kingdom. The other was carefull enough, not to tax her Subjects with Impoſts or with Subſidies, which cauſed her to be beloved of her people, who in all the virtues of a Prince, do cheriſh nothing more than a moderation in their Subſidies: The one was indued with an extream ſweetneſs of diſpoſition, which ſometimes did ſeem to lie too open and defenceleſs, as when without ſeeing juſtice done, ſhe pardoned great Crimes, which tended to the diminution of her Authority. The other was naturally cruel, a lover of bloud, and one who horribly tormented the Catholicks, and too eaſily would bring the Heads of her Great-ones upon the Scaffold, to obtain the honour and title of being juſt, among popular Spirits. To conclude, one reigned like a Dove, and the other like a Bird of prey. It is a horrible thing to read the Hiſtory of her Reign, written by her Admirers, where in ſtead of the Contemplation of Virtues, and of Beauties, you ſhall obſerve in every page the Rages of Accuſers, bloudy Judgements, Proſcriptions, Maſſacres, which I alledge not in any diſparagement to the Nation, which I love with a true Chriſtian charity, but to the ignominie and the ſhame of Hereſie. It ſeems to me when I read the Life of Elizabeth, that I enter into the Countrey of the Anthropophagi, where I behold nothing but men drawn upon Sledges, Hang-men tearing out of bowels, and dividing carkaſes into quarters, which are ſtill dropping bloud, and hanging in the moſt remarkable places of the Citie, as the tapeſtry of the ancient cruelty of the Puritans. I aſſure my ſelf, that thoſe who are now in authority under ſo gracious a Prince, do reflect upon it with as much horrour as my ſelf, and by their moderation will endeavour to wipe away the ſtains of ſo bloudy a Time.

Who is he then that is not amazed to ſee Virtue ſo forſaken, and the beſt Queen in the world to lead ſo tempeſtuous a life, perſecuted in her eſtate, in her body, in her honour, in her own perſon, in the perſon of her friends, deſpoiled, outraged, diſhonoured, torn by bloudy calumnies, drawn to unjuſt Tribunals, locked up in ſo many priſons, abandoned by thoſe moſt near unto her, and ſacrificed by her kinred, to the vengeance of her enemies, and that in ſo tragical a manner, and by ſo barbarous a hand? And how comes it to paſs, that the other, being laden with crimes, did mount on the Throne by ways unexpected, and did continue there by uncontrouled power, and reigned, as if ſhe had all good Fortune at her own commandment? Wealth and Honour were always on her ſide. Delight and Joy ſeemed onely to be ordained for her. Whatſoever ſhe undertook, did thrive, all her thoughts were proſperous, the earth and the ſea did obey her, the winds and the tempeſts did follow her Standards. Some would affirm, that this is no marvel at all, but onely the effect of a cunning and politick Councel, compoſed of the ſons of darkneſs, who are more proper to inherit the felicities of this world, than the children of the light; But we muſt conſider, that this is the common condition both of the good and the evil; to find out the cauſe in which the Underſtanding of man doth loſe it ſelf. David curiouſly endeavouring to diſcover the reaſon, in the beginning did conceive himſelf to be a Philoſopher; but in the end acknowledged, that the conſideration thereof did make him to become a Beaſt. The Aſtrologers do affirm, that Elizabeth came into the world under the Sign of Virgo, which doth promiſe Empires and Honours; and that the Queen of Scotland was born under Sagitarius, which doth threaten women with affliction, and a bloudy Death. The Machivilians do maintain, that ſhe ſhould accommodate her ſelf to the Religion of her Countrey, and that in the oppoſing of that torrent, ſhe ruined her affairs. The Politicians do impute it to the eaſineſs of her gentle Nature. Others do blame the counſel which ſhe entertained, to marry her own Subjects. And ſome have looked upon her, as Jobs falſe friends did look on him, and reported him to lye on the dung-hill for his ſins. But having thoroughly conſidered on it, I do obſerve that in theſe two Queens God would repreſent the two Cities of Sion and Babylon, the two wayes of the juſt, and the unjuſt, and the eſtate of this preſent world, and of the world to come. He hath given to Elizabeth the bread of dogs, to reſerve for Mary the Manna of Angels. In one he hath recompenſed ſome moral virtues with temporal bleſſings, to make the other to enter into the poſſeſſion of eternal happineſs. Elizabeth did reign, why ſo did Athalia. Elizabeth did perſecute the Prophets, why ſo did Jezabel. Elizabeth hath obtained Victories, why ſo did Thomyris the Queen of the Scythians. She hath lived in honour and delight, and ſo did Semiramis. She died a natural death, being full of years, ſo died the Herods and Tyberius, but following the track that ſhe did walk in; what ſhall we collect of her end, but as of that which Job ſpeaketh, concerning the Tomb of the wicked? They paſs away their life in delights, and deſcend in a moment unto hell.

Now God being pleaſed to raiſe Marie above all the greatneſs of this earth, and to renew in her the fruits of his Croſs, did permit that in the Age wherein ſhe lived, there ſhould be the moſt outragious and bloudy perſecution, that was ever raiſed againſt the Church. He was pleaſed by the ſecret counſel of his Providence, that there ſhould be perſons of all ſorts which ſhould extol the Effects of his Paſſion. And there being already entered ſo many Prelates, Doctours, Confeſſours, Judges, Merchants, Labourers, and Artiſans, he would now have Kings and Queens to enter alſo. Her Husband, Francis the Second, although a moſt juſt and innocent Prince, had already took part in this conflict of ſuffering Souls. His life being ſhortened (as it is thought) by the fury of the Hugonots, who did not ceaſe to perſecute him. It was now requiſite that his dear Spouſe ſhould undertake the myſtery of the Croſs alſo. And as ſhe had a moſt couragious ſoul, ſo God did put her in the front of the moſt violent perſecutions, to ſuffer the greateſt torments and to obtain the richeſt Crowns.

The great ſecret of the Divine Providence.

Elizabeth's hatred to the Queen of Scotland.

The Prophet ſaith, That man is made as a piece of Imbroidery, which doth not manifeſt it ſelf in the lives of the juſt: for God doth uſe them as the Imbroiderer doth his ſtuffs of Velvet and of Satin, he takes them in pieces to make habilements for the beautifiing of his Temple.

12. Elizabeth being now tranſported into Vengeance, and carried away by violent Counſels, is reſolved to put Mary to death. It is moſt certain that ſhe paſſionately deſired the death of this Queen, well underſtanding, that her life was moſt appolite to her moſt delicate intereſts. She could not be ignorant that Mary Stuart had right to the Crown of England, and that ſhe uſurped it, ſhe could not be ignorant, that in a General Aſſembly of the States of England, ſhe was declared to be a Baſtard, as being derived from a marriage made & conſummated againſt all laws, both Divine and humane. She obſerved that her Throne did not ſubſiſt but by the Faction of Hereſie, and as her Crown was firſt eſtabliſhed by diſorder, ſo according to her policie it muſt be cemented by bloud. She could not deny, but that the Queen of Scotland had a Title to the Crown, which inſenſibly might fall on the head of the Priſoner, and then that in a moment ſhe might change the whole face of the State. She obſerved her to be a Queen of a vaſt ſpirit, of an unſhaken faith, and of an excellent virtue, who had received the Unction of the Realm of Scotland, and who was Queen Dowager of the Kingdom of France, ſupported by the Pope, reverenced throughout all Chriſtendom, and regarded by the Catholicks as a ſacred ſtock, from which new branches of Religion ſhould ſpring, which no Ax of perſecution could cut down.

The Hereticks in England, who feared her as one that would puniſh their offences, and deſtroy their Fortunes, which they had builded on the ruins of Religion, had not a more earneſt deſire than to ſee her out of the world. All things conſpired to overthrow this poor Princeſs, and nothing remained but to give a colour to ſo bold a murder.

It ſo fell out, that in the laſt years of her afflicting impriſonment, a conſpiracy was plotted againſt the Eſtate, and the life of Elizabeth, as Cambden doth recite it.

Ballard, an Engliſh Prieſt, who had more zeal to his Religion, than diſcretion to mannage his enterprize, conſidered with himſelf how this woman had uſurped a Scepter, which did not appertain unto her. How ſhe had overthrown all the principles of the ancient Religion, How ſhe had kept in priſon an innocent Queen, for the ſpace of twenty years, uſing her with all manner of indignity, how ſhe continually practiſed new butcheries by the effuſion of the bloud of the Catholicks, he conceived it would be a work of Juſtice, to procure her death who held our purſes in her hand, and our liberty in a chain. But I will not approve of thoſe bloudy Counſels, which do provide a Remedy far worſe than the diſeaſe, and infinitely do trouble the Eſtate of Chriſtendom.

Nevertheleſs, he drew unto him many that were of his opinion, who did offer and devote themſelves to give this fatal blow. The chiefeſt amongſt them, was one Babington, who was deſcended of an Honourable family, of a great ſpirit, and of a knowledge above his age, and very zealous on the Catholick Religion. His example made many others to imbark themſelves in that ſame dangerous deſign. Some propounded to themſelves the hopes of a great reward, others were carried on by glory, and ſome were tranſported to it by a hate to evil doers. It is no way to be believed (as I ſhall make it appear) that the Queen of Scotland, had any hand in the deſign. For, beſides the tendernes of her conſcience, ſhe had a wiſdom exerciſed by long experience, which made her eaſily to apprehend the weakneſs of that party, who were young men, heady, and inconſiderable, who had not learned to conceal a ſecret, which is the firſt knot that confirmeth great affairs. They carried their hearts on their lips, and being not content to make a noiſe of their deſign in Taverns, they cauſed it to be painted in a Table, with deviſes to it, as the Authours of liberty, and in fooliſh vanity did ſhow it to one another. Babington could not contain himſelf from writing to the Queen in priſon. And the letter being brought to the hands of her Secretaries, Nau and Curles, they did not communicate it to their Miſtreſs, well knowing, that the witneſs of her unblemiſhed ſpirit, would never ſympathize with ſuch violent Counſels. But when they perceived that Babington in the ſaid letter had given information of the conference he had with Ballard, and that ſix Gentlemen were choſen to put the Tragical deſign in Execution, and that one hundred more were to releaſe the Queen from her impriſonment, they thought they would not neglect the occaſion, and therefore they wrote an anſwer to the letter, making uſe of the Queens name, ſhe having no knowledge of it: In this letter they praiſed Babington for his zeal to the Catholick religion, and to the ſacred perſon of their Lady, who was the ſupportreſs of it. They did advertiſe him to take conſideration with him in this enterpriſe, and to make a ſtrong aſſociation amongſt them, who were to be the Actours and the Authours, and to attempt nothing before they had aſſurance of aid from forreign parts, and withall to ſtir up ſome new troubles in Ireland, before they gave this blow in England. They adviſed him to draw unto his party the Earl of Arundel, and his Brothers, and others named in the letter, they did alſo preſcribe a means for the deliverance of the Queen, either by overturning one of her Caroaches at the gate, or by ſetting on fire ſome Rooms belonging to her Querries in the Caſtle, or to take her away, when ſhe took horſe to refreſh her ſelf, in the concluſion, they did exhort him to promiſe great rewards to the ſix Gentlemen, and to all the reſt.

Babington, preſuming it was the Queen, who by this letter treated with him, became moſt vainly glorious, he incouraged his Companions, ſhewing the letter to the moſt apparent of them, and was inflamed with a deſire to execute the deſign. They were ſo tranſported with the vanity of it, that though they did ſhut their eyes againſt the danger, yet they did open their mouths to diſcover the ſecret, which was communicated to ſo many of their accomplices, that the multitude of the conſpiratours did make abortive the conſpiracy. They declared it to one Gifford, a pernicious and a luxurious man, who being charged with a Commiſſion to keep ſafe their letters, did carry them all to Walſingham, the Secretary to the Queen of England, who opened them, and ſounding the whole progreſs of their deſigns, did with much dexterity make them faſt again. The laſt written by Babington, with the anſwer of the Secretaries, in the name of Queen Mary, was carried to Elizabeth, and to her Counſel who ſhewed an exceeding joy for the diſcovery. She cauſed the conſpiratours to be apprehended, and Babington amongſt the foremoſt, who being demanded the Queſtion, did immediatly confeſs that he had treated with the Queen of Scotland on that ſubject, in which he ſpoke truly as he thought, though he did not ſpeak the truth.

After they were all examined and condemned, they were executed with moſt cruel puniſhments, the extremity whereof did ſtrike a horrour into thoſe who did condemn them.

The Proceſs againſt the Queen of Scotland.

13. It was ſo decreed, that a paſſage muſt be made through the entrails of many bodies, to come unto Queen

Queen Maries bloud. She that knew of nothing what was done, did continue very quiet in the languishment of her captivity, when behold, she suddenly found her self confined to a close imprisonment, her Guards doubled, her Secretaries apprehended, her papers taken away, and her Coyn confiscated, with a labouring expectation she did attend to know the reason of it, when behold a letter from the Queen of England, which imparted that she had given a Commission to her Counsellers of Estate, to hear her in judgement upon Fact, with which she was accused. Having read it, with a Majestick countenance, and a spirit full of the height of understanding, she spake to those that gave it her.

I Am much afflicted that my most dear Sister the Queen, hath been so ill informed of me, and that having been so many years most strictly guarded, and withall nummed in my limbs, the many fair conditions which I have offered for my liberty, have been always neglected, and my self abandoned. I have sufficiently advertised her of diverse dangers, and yet she never would believe me, but hath always undervalued me, although I am most near unto her in bloud. I have too truly foreseen that any accident that did arrive, either within or without this Kingdom, would be interpreted to proceed from me, and that I should be made guilty enough, because I am so miserable. As for his letter, I do look upon it as a strange thing, that any Queen should command me, as her Subject, to appear in judgement. I am of my self an absolute Queen, and will do nothing to the prejudice of Royal Majesty, my courage is not yet abated, nor will I ever stoop unworthily under my calamity.

Her answer was drawn up in writing, which in these terms she had pronounced, and the same day the Chancellour, and the Treasurer came to her, and declared what power they had given them in their Commission, and desired her gently to hear the Facts with which she was charged, otherwise they both could, and would proceed against her for contempt. To which she made answer, That she was no Subject, and that she had rather die a thousand times, than by such an acknowledgement to bring a prejudice to Royal Majesty. She admonished them, if after having condemned her before hand, they came now unto her to make a semblance of observing some formality in Justice, to consult with their own consciences, and to remember, that the Theater of the world is of a larger extent than England. The Commissioners did not cease to insist, and represent unto her the Tenour of their Commission, with their own Names. On which she demanded by what Law they would proceed against her, the Canon Law or the civil Law, and because she knew very well that they were no great Lawyers, she conceived it would be requisite that some should be sent for from the Universities in Europe. They replied, That she should be tried by the civil Law of England, in which they were sufficiently experienced. But she, who well observed, that they would intangle her with a new Law on purpose against her, made answer; you are gallant Gentlemen, and can make what Laws you please, but I am not bound to submit unto them since you your selves in another case refuse to be subjected to the Salick Law of France. Your Law hath no more of Example, than your proceeding hath of Justice.

On this, Hatton, Vice-Chamberlain to the Queen of England, advanced himself, and said unto her: you are accused for conspiring the ruin of our Mistress, who is an anointed Queen. Your degree is not exempted to answer for such a Crime, neither by the Law of Nations nor of nature. If you are innocent, you are unjust to your Reputation to indeavour to evade the judgement. The Queen will be very glad that you can justifie your self, for she hath assured me, that she never in the world received more discontent, than to find you charged with this accusation. Forbear this vain consideration of Royalty, which at this present serves for nothing. Cause the suspitions to cease, and wipe away the stain, which otherwise will cleave for ever to your reputation. She replied, I refuse not to answer before the States of the Realm being lawfully called, because I have been acknowledged to be a presumed Heir of the Kingdom. Then will I speak, not as a subject, but in another nature, without submitting my self to the new Ordinance of your Commission, which is known to be nothing else but a Malicious net, made to inwrap my innocence. The Treasurer on this, did interrupt her, and said: we will then proceed to the contempt, to which she made answer: Examine your own consciences and provide for your Honours, and so God render to you, and your children, as you shall do in the judgement.

The next morning she called one of the Commissioners, and demanded if her Protestation were committed to writing, And if it were, she would justify her self without any prejudice to the Royal dignity. Whereupon the Commissioners did presently assemble themselves in the Chamber of presence, where they prepared a Scaffold, on the upper end whereof, was the seat Royal under a Cloath of State, to represent the Majesty of Queen Elizabeth, and on the one side of it a Chair of Crimson Velvet prepared for her. The courageous Queen did enter with a modest and an assured countenance amongst the stern Lords, thirsting after her bloud, and took her place. Bromley the Chancellour, turning towards her, did speak in these words.

The most Illustrius Queen of England, being assured, not without an extream Anguish of spirit that you have conspired the destruction of her, of the Realm of England, and of Religion, to quit herself of her duty, and not to be found wanting to God, herself, and her people, hath without any malice of heart established those Commissioners to hear the things, of which you are accused, how you will resolve them, and shew your innocency.

This Man who had spoken ill enough, had the discretion to speak but little, And immediately as he had given the signal, the perverse Officers, who were more than fourty in number, did throw themselves upon her like so many mastives on a prey, propounding a thousand captious questions to surprize her, but the generous AMAZA did shake them off with an incredible vivacity. In the end, all things were reduced to the letter of Babington, in which he gave her notice of the conspiracy, and to the answer which she made to it, exhorting him to pursue his design, but most of all to the depositions of her own Secretaries, who gave assurances that she did dictate the said letter, as also other letters to forreign Princes, to invade England with arms. They did press her on these falsities, which seemed to carrie some probability with them, but she did answer invincibly to them, as most clearly may appear by those terms, which I have drawn from her several answers, and tied them together to give more light to her Apology, wherein the clearnes of her understanding and her judgement is most remarkable.

The invincible Apology of the Queen.

IF the Queen, my Sister, hath given you a Commission to see Justice done, it is reasonable that you should begin it, rather by the easing of my sufferings, than by the oppressing of my innocence. I came into England, to implore succour against the Rebellion of my Subjects. My bloud, alliance, Sex, Neighbourhood, and the Title which I bear of a Queen, did promise me all satisfaction, and here I have met with my my greatest affliction. This is the twentieth year that I have been detained Prisoner, without cause, without reason, without mercy, and (which is more) without hope. I am no Subject of your Mistresses, but a free and an absolute Queen, and ought not to make answer but to God alone, the Sovereign Judge of my Actions, or bring any prejudice to the Character of Royal Majesty, either in my Son, the King of Scotland, or his Successours, nor other Sovereign Princes of the earth. This is the Protestation which I have made, and which I repeat again in your presence, before I make any answer to the Crimes which are imposed on me.

The blackest of all the Calumnies, do charge me for having conspired the Death of my most dear Cousin, and after many circumventions, all the proofs are reduced to the Letter of Babington, the Deposition of my Secretaries, and my sollicitations made to forreign Princes to invade England with Arms. I will answer effectually to all these Articles, and make the justice of my Cause most clearly appear to those, who shall without passion look upon it. And in the first place, I swear and protest, that I never saw this Babington, who is made the principal in this Charge, I never received any letter from him, neither had he any letter from me. I have always abhorred these violent and black counsels, which tended to the ruin of Queen Elizabeth, and I am ready to produce letters from those, who having had some evil enterprize, have excused themselves, that they have discovered nothing to me, because they were assured, that my spirit was opposite to such Designs. I could not know what Babington or his accomplices have done, being a Prisoner, he might write what he pleased, but I am certain that I never saw nor heard of any letter to me. And if there be found any Answer written by me to those things, which never so much as came into my imagination, it is an abominable forgery. We live not in an Age, nor a Realm, that is to learn the trade to deceive. I am informed that Walsingham, one amongst you, who hath conspired my death, and the death of my Son, doth make use of such artifices, and hath counterfeited a letter from me, in answer to that of Babington's, which he intercepted. The other innocently believed it, and took his oath that it came from me, but all this is no more than one simple conjecture. There should be a million of witnesses, more clear than the rays of the Sun, to impeach a Sovereign Queen, who comprehends within her Authority so many millions of lives. And a man unknown, a man half dead, is believed against me, who spake all that he knew, and that he knew not, to deliver himself from the horrible cruelties of his Examiners. Let them produce but one letter of my hand, one shadow of the crime, and I will yield my self convinced. I speak it in the sincerity of my heart, and of the tears of my eyes, I would not conquer a Kingdom with the bloud of the vilest person, picked out of the scum of the people, much less with the bloud of a Queen. I will never make a shipwrack of my soul, in conspiring the ruin of a person, to whom I have vowed so much honour and friendship.

For my Secretaries, I did alwayes take them for honest men; if they do charge me, and accuse me in their Depositions, to have dictated an Answer to Babington's letter, they have committed two great faults, the first in violating the Oath which they have made to be secret and faithfull to their Mistress: the second, in inventing so detestable a Calumny against her, to whom they ow all Reverence and Fidelity. In a manner all the belief that you draw from them, doth amount to more, than that it comes from perfidious men. O good God, In what a desperate condition is the Majesty and the safety of Princes, if they depend upon the writings and the witnesses of their Secretaries, in affairs of so high a consequence. How many are of them, who prostitute themselves to the uncertainty of riches? How many of them for fear onely, do comply with the menaces of the great ones. They are men of Fortune, who follow the ebb and flow of Inconstancy. If those poor men have taken their Oaths, as you say, it was onely to deliver themselves from the horrour of your torments, and put all upon the crowned head of a Queen, which they thought was inaccessible to your Commissions.

But what Lawyers are you, to put Babington to death without bringing him before me face to face? To open his mouth by torments to tell a lie, and then to shut it up for ever against the Truth? If my Secretaries are yet alive, let them come into my presence, and I assure my self that they will not persist in that Deposition, which you object against me. Doth it not easily appear, that you proceed here on a bad belief, and that you borrow these poor Formalities, to give some slight tincture to your prejudgings?

I never did dictate any thing to my servants, but what Nature did suggest unto me, for the recovering of my liberty. This is the third Objection of your Proces. And I demand of you, if I have not committed a great crime, to desire a benefit which every common voice doth teach us, which the laws do approve, which all men do practise, which Nature prompts the Nightingales, and every little Bird unto, that are imprisoned in their Cages: what can he do less that sees himself in irons, but implore the assistance of his friends, and desire, that some strong hand of mercy might open the prison for him. I confess I have had the desire of liberty, but I deny that I sought the effect thereof by that means which you alledge. It is a strange thing that a Prisoner, all whose actions are spied into, and every step she treads is counted, should do the affair which great Sovereigns, though of a free and most absolute power, could not remove. So many years are now passed, since I have been, as it were, in the chains of miserable captivity, yet neither the offers which I have made, nor the assurances which I have given, nor the increase of my sickness, nor the declining of my age, could move my Sister to my inlargement. Have I not offered to contract a strict Friendship with her, to cherish her, to respect her above all the Princes in Christendom, to forget all offences, to acknowledge her the true and legitimate Queen of England, submitting all my Rights to the benefit of her peace, neither to pretend to, nor take any part of the Crown during her life, and to remove both the Title and the Arms of the Kingdom of England, which I did attribute to my self by the commandment of Henrie the Second, King of France. And yet all these submissions have prevailed nothing for my Deliverance. Am I so much to be blamed, if I have desired forreign Princes, my Friends, and my Allies, to draw me out from the depth of these miseries? And yet I neither have, nor was ever willing to confirm into the hands of the King of Spain, the Right which he pretended to the Crown of England, although he hath been angry with me concerning it, but I have given respect unto my Sister so far, that I have neglected both my life and liberty, to satisfie her interests, and have delighted my self with the prayers of Esther, and not with the sword of Judith. But I now speak and declare, that since England is inequitable and so unkind unto me, that I neither ought, nor will mispriſe the aid of other Kings.

I have here sincerely declared my thoughts and my counsels to you on this Accusation, and if Right and Equity must give way to Power, and Force must oppress the Truth amongst men, I do appeal to the living God, who hath an absolute Empire of command over Elizabeth and my self. I swear unto you by God, and protest unto you on my honour, that for this long time, I have had my thoughts on no Kingdom, but onely that of Heaven, which I look on as the haven after my long sufferings. I believe I have now satisfied all your Objections; And you know indeed in your own conscience, that nothing doth charge me, but my birth, nor render me guilty but my Religion. But I will not deny, that to which by Gods goodness I am born, nor remove the character which I received in the day of my Baptism. I have lived, and I will die a Catholick. It is the crime alone, for which I need no Advocate to defend me, in which I desire all the world to be my witness, and fear not the severest Judges.

for

The poor Princess did mingle these words with her tears, fore-seeing the persecution of her friends, and considering how barbarously her Royal Dignity was exposed to the Advocates of the Palace, who did all seem to have sworn her death. Howsoever in their consciences they were touched to the quick, because that what she represented, was most true, even by the report of the Heretieks themselves, as it appeareth in the Book of Cambden, who hath wrote the Life of Elizabeth, and who doth not deny, but that Walsingham did open and make up the letters again, which Gifford brought him, counterfeiting in them what he thought good. And he himself confesseth, that it was the judgement of the most rational men, that the Secretaries of the Queen of Scotland, were seduced and corrupted with money. And it is certain, that they demanded a Recompence of Walsingham, who told them, that they ought to content themselves with their lives: And added, that in condemning their Mistress without producing the Witnesses, they had not proceeded according to the Rules of Justice. Observe here the judgement of the Hugenots themselves, her most cruel Enemies: I speak of those who have some sparks of a good conscience, and not of those Incendiaries, who write Rapsodies full of ignorance and folly. All this may serve for an invincible proof of her innocence; but her evil Judges, who had sold themselves to iniquity, did not cease to proceed further, even to the Sentence of Condemnation, which they carried to the Queen of England, and was presented to the Parliament for the publication of it.

Cambden pag. 493.

Amanuensium absentium qui pretio corrupti videbantur, testimonio oppressa est.

The unjust Judgement.

Thither Elizabeth did come in person, with a studied Speech, where she gave thanks to God for the Deliverance from this danger, and thanks to her Subjects for the affection to their Queen. Afterwards, coming to the work in hand, she shewed her self to be extreamly afflicted for the Queen of Scotland, that a Person of her Sex, Estate, and Bloud, should be convicted to have conspired against her: Adding, that she was most willing to pardon her, and to abandon her own life, if it would render the affairs of England more flourishing; but in this effect she would neither prejudice her self, nor the good of her Kingdom.

In this action she came with a heart full of vengeance, however she would put upon it the reputation of Sweetness and of Clemency, imitating the Herods and Tyberius Cæsar, who never did worse than when they spake best, and laughed in their hearts, when they distilled the tears of Crocodiles from their eyes. With joyned hands she desired that her Parliament would but demand that thing of her, which most willingly she would not grant. Sometimes she would flatter them with the Respects and cordial Affections they did bear her, on purpose to incite them to pursue this business: Sometimes she seemed to be weary of their too much zeal: Sometimes she said, she would preserve her self: And sometimes she said, she would abandon her own preservation to exercise her clemency. Her spirit, which was greatly given to dissimulation, made never more leaps, nor daunced more Rounds, than in this business. And to speak the truth, she perplexed her self in her own labyrinth, and endeavouring too much to hide her self, she laid her self more open, saying unto those who demanded the death of the Queen of Scotland:

I pray and conjure you to content your self with an Answer without an Answer, I approve your judgement, and comprehend the reasons, but I pray you excuse the carefull and the doubtfull thought which doth torment me, and take in good part the gratious affection which I bear you; and this Answer, if it be of that worth as you esteem it for an Answer, If I say I will not do what you demand, peradventure I shall say more than I think: If that I will do it, I shall precipitate my self to my ruin, whom you are willing to preserve.

In the end, the Sentence of Death was confirmed by the Authority of Parliament, and Beal was sent to the Queen of Scotland, to carry her the news of her mournfull Condemnation, and to acquaint her, that the Estates demanded the Execution to be dispatched, for Justice, Security, and Necessity.

Her great heart was no way dejected at this so violent a Rigour, and damnable Injustice, but lifting up her eyes and her hands to Heaven, she gave thanks to God, demanding immediately a Priest to administer to her the Sacrament, and to dispose her to die. Paulet, who had the guard of her, did use her after this most barbarously, commanding the Officers of her house to beat down the cloth of State that was in her chamber, but when he observed that no man would touch it, and that they onely answered him by tears and lamentations, which would have softened the heart of any man, he performed the Execution by the Guard, and took from the poor Prisoner all the marks of Royalty, to make her behold her Funeral alive, and to make her heart to bleed with a mortal wound, before the bloud were drawn from the veins of her body by the hands of the Hang-man. But Elizabeth did yet deferre the Execution, whether it were for the fear of forreign Princes, being not able to see clear enough into their power and protection, or whether it were to gain the imaginary Reputation of Mercy, or whether by degrees she would consume this poor sacrifice by a small fire, prolonging the languors of her imprisonment. The other was resolved to write unto her, not in a base and begging stile, to crave her life, but to demand an honest Burial. Behold her letters to that effect.

Execrable indignity.

MADAM,

I Give thanks to God with all my heart, who by the Sentence of Death, hath been pleased to put an end to the tedious pilgrimage of my life. I desire not that it may be prolonged, having had too long a time to trie the bitterness of it, I onely beseech your Majestie, that since I am to expect no favour from some zealous Ministers of State, who hold the first place in your Councels, I may receive from You onely, and from no other, these following favours.

In the first place I desire, that since it is not allowed me to hope for a Burial in England, according to the Solemnities of the Roman Church, practised by the ancient Kings, your Ancestours and mine; and that in Scotland they have forced and violated the Ashes of my Grand-fathers, that my Bodie (when my Adversaries shall be satiated with my innocent bloud) may be carried by my own servants, into some holy Land; and above all, if it may be, into France, to be there interred, where the Bones of the Queen, my most honoured Mother, are lodged, to the end my poor Bodie, which knew no rest, whiles joyned to my soul, might now find rest, being separated from it.

Secondly, I beseech Your Majestie (in the apprehension which I have of the tyrannie of those, to whose power You abandon me) that I may not suffer in any private place, but in the view of my servants and other people, who may give a testimonie of my faith, and of my obedience to the true Church, and defend the remnant of my life, and my last sighs, against the false Reports which my Adversaries may contrive against me.

In the third place, I require that my servants, who have attended on me with great fidelitie, during so many afflictions, may have free leave to retire where they please, and enjoy those small Legacies, which in my last Will my povertie hath bequeathed to them.

I conjure You, Madam, by the Bloud of Jesus Christ, by the nearness of our consanguinitie, by the Memorie of Henrie the Seventh, our common Father, and by the title of a Queen, which I carrie to my Grave, not to denie me these reasonable Demands, but by one word under Your hand, to grant me an assurance of them, and I shall die, as I have lived,

Your most affectionate Sister and Prisoner,
QUEEN MARY.

It is uncertain whether this Letter came to the hands of Elizabeth, because no Answer can be found unto it, whether it were that those next unto her did conceal it from her, or whether through the hardness of her heart she did dissemble it.

The vain endeavour to delay her death.

In the mean time King James employed himself for the Deliverance of his Mother, the Ambassadours from France, Monsieur de la Mote Aigron, and Monsieur del Aubispene, were commanded thither upon that and other occasions, and Monsieur de Belieurs did there also carry himself with great wisdom, courage and fidelity, as may appear by his grave Remonstrance, which is to be read in the History of France. Howsoever, the Arrest of Death was suspended for three moneths, until such time that the clamours of the Lutherans and Puritans, did cause the Thunder to fall down upon that hand, which desired nothing more, than to strike home the blow.

The more advised did remonstrate unto her, That it was without example, to commit a Ladie, the Queen of France and Scotland, and the neerest Kinswoman she had in the world, into the hands of a Hang-man: A Queen, which was not her prisoner of War, but her Guest, whom she had called and invited into her Kingdom, and sent unto her assurances of her fidelitie. That she ought to consider, that what was done, proceeded from her Secretaries, and not from her. And if that after twenty years imprisonment, she should have consented to be taken from it by force, it did not deserve to be punished with Death. That if she should cause her to die, it would open a wound, from whence there would issue such abundance of bloud, that many Ages could not stanch it. That Italie, France and Spain, and all the Christian Kingdoms of the world would be offended at it, and that she should bring upon her Kingdom the Arms of Christendom, who would be glad of that pretence, to invade her Kingdom. That it would be a most remarkable affront to her Son James, and all his Race, who could not but be mindfull of it. That it would incense the Spirits of her Kingdom, and render them unreconcileable to her. And in the end, that it was to be feared that Heaven would arm it self against so bloudy a Design. That she should use the miserable (and especially a Queen who came into her Countrey for protection) with more Reverence. That she should hazard much in her death, but could lose nothing by her life, seeing she had so many Guards, Prisons, Bars, and Walls to secure her, if she had an intent to enterprize against the State.

But the insolent Ministers did incessantly crie out, That she must put an end to her Imprisonment, by putting an end unto her Life. That the Queen ought to remember, that she had usurped her Titles and her Name, and sometimes caused her self to be proclaimed Queen of England, and of Scotland, and that Sovereigns never pardoned those, who did so far intrench upon their Authority. That the life of Elizabeth and Mary were incompatible. That the onely means to take away all pretences from the Catholicks, was to cut off this Root, which would make all their hopes to perish. That King James was instructed in their Religion, and would rather look after the advancement of his own State, than take vengeance for the Death of his Mother. That forreign Princes were too much perplexed with the difficulties of their own Affairs, and took care, rather to defend their own, than to invade her Kingdom. That her Cousin, the Duke of Guise, was in a bad condition in France, and that Henrie the Third would be very carefull how he did espouse her quarrels. And if other Princes were so hardy to undertake it, they were to understand, that England had a deep ditch about it. That Queen Elizabeth was mortal, and if she should die, there was not that calamitie to be conceived, which both Religion and the State would not suffer under the reign of Marie, in the revenge of her Imprisonment, and other injuries she had received. That she could not but remember, that great personages did write things well done on the sand, but did engrave their Discontents in brass. The Preachers made it to be a work of Religion, with their absurd Allegations out of the Bible, which they did corrupt to their bloudy meaning. And the Lawyers, as ignorant as the Ministers, were absurd, did produce some Histories for the punishment of Kings, which were altogether impertinent.

But there needed not so much labour to perswade a Woman, who had in her so much vanity, as once in her life, to make a Princes head to fly upon a Scaffold, and who did not remember, that in the Reign of Queen Mary, being her self accused of offending the Estate, and expecting her sentence of death, she did so much fear the Axes of the Hang-men in England, that she was resolved to petition to her Sister to send for an Executioner to France, to cut off her head. Now was the Commandment given for her death, and it was signified to the poor Victim, who for a long time, was prepared for this Sacrifice.

Some passionate writers, do indeavour to divert this Crime from the reputation of Elizabeth, taking their ground on a Letter which she wrote to the Queen of Scotland, in which by a shamefull perfidiousnes, she doth write, That her spirit was tormented with an incomparable Sorrow, by reason of the lamentable Event, which was arrived against her will, and that she had not a soul so base, as either by terrour to fear to do what was just, or by cowardice to denie it, after it was done.

Elizabeth entirely culpable of the death of Queen Mary.

But who doth not see that this is to mock, and to traduce the Story, and the belief of mankind: Davison, her Secretary, who mannaged this sad affair, as the true instrument of her malice, doth express in his Attestation, reported in the most faithfull Memorials of England, by Cambden, that after the departure of the French Ambassadour, sent to prevent the Execution, she commanded him to shew the Instrument for putting the Queen of Scotland to death, which being done, she most readily signed it with her own hand, and commanded him to see it sealed with the Great Seal; and smiling, she added some few words, that she blamed Paulet and Drury, who guarded the Prisoner, for not delivering her from that pain.

It is true, that in the morning she sent one named Killigrew, to Davison, to forbid to put that command in Execution, whether it were that her Remorse of Conscience had put her into some frights, her sleeps being ordinarily disturbed with horrible Dreams, which which did represent unto her the images of her Crimes, or whether it were an artifice to procure her the reputation of being merciſull, in killing with ſo much treachery. The Secretary came to her in the field, and declared to her, that the Order for the Queen of Scotland's death, was now finiſhed and ſealed, on which ſhe put on the countenance of diſpleaſure, and told him, that by the Counſel of wiſe men, one might find out other expedients, by which it is believed, that ſhe intended poiſon. Nevertheleſs, ſhe now was commanded that the Execution ſhould be delayed, And as Davilon preſented himſelf to her three dayes afterward, demanding of her, if her Majeſty had changed her advice, ſhe anſwered, No, and was angry with Paulet for not enterpriſing boldly enough the laſt of the Crimes; And ſaid moreover, That ſhe would find others who would do it for the love they did bear unto her. On which the other did remonſtrate, that ſhe muſt think well of him, for otherwiſe ſhe would ruin Men of great Merit with their poſterity. She ſtill perſiſted and on the very ſame day of the Execution, ſhe did chide the Secretary for being ſo ſlow in advancing her Commands, who as ſoon as he had diſcovered the affair, the evil Counſellours did purſue the expedition with incredible heat, for they ſent Beal, a Capital Enemy of the Catholicks, with letters directed to certain Lords, in which power was given them to proceed unto the Maſſacre; who immediately repairing to the Caſtle of Fotheringhey, where the Queen was priſoner, they cauſed her to riſe from her bed, where the Indiſpoſition of her body had laid her, and having read unto her their Commiſſion, they did advertiſe her, that ſhe muſt die on the morning following.

16. She received this without changing of her countenance, and ſaid:

Her death and miraculous conſtancy.

That ſhe did not think that the Queen, her Siſter, would have brought it to that extremity; But ſince ſuch was her pleaſure, death was moſt agreeable to her, and that a Soul was not worthy of celeſtial and eternal joys, whoſe body could not endure the ſtroke of the Hang-man. For the reſt, ſhe appealed to Heaven and Earth, who were the witneſſes of her Innocence; adding, that the onely Conſolation which ſhe received in a ſpectacle ſo ignominious, was, that ſhe died for the Religion of her Fathers, ſhe beſeeched God to increaſe her conſtancy to the meaſure of her afflictions, and to welcome the death ſhe was to ſuffer, for the expiation of her ſins.

After ſhe ſpake theſe words, ſhe beſought the Commiſſioners to permit her to confer with her Confeſſor, which by a barbarous cruelty was refuſed, a cruelty which is not exerciſed on the worſt of all offendours, and in the place, for a Director of her conſcience, they gave her for her comforters the Biſhop and the Dean of Peterborough, whom with horrour ſhe rejected, ſaying; That God ſhould be her Comforter. The Earl of Kent, who was one of the Commiſſioners, and moſt hot in the perſecution of her, told her: Your life will be the death, and your death will be the life of our Religion. Declaring in that ſufficiently the cauſe of her death, whereupon ſhe gave thanks to God, that ſhe was judged by her Enemies themſelves, to be judged an inſtrument capable to reſtore the ancient Religion in England. In this particular ſhe deſired, that the Proteſtants had rather blamed her effects, than her deſigns.

After the Lords were retired, ſhe began to provide for her laſt day, as if ſhe had deliberated on ſome voyage, and this ſhe did with ſo much devotion, prudence, and courage, that a Religious man, who hath had all his Meditations on death for thirty years together, could not have performed it with greater Juſtice; And in the firſt place, ſhe commanded that ſupper ſhould be diſpatched, to adviſe of her affairs, and according to her cuſtom, ſupping very ſoberly, ſhe entertained her ſelf on a good diſcourſe, with a marvellous tranquillity of mind. And amongſt other things, turning her ſelf to Burgon, her Phyſitian, ſhe demanded of him, if he did not obſerve how great was the power of the Truth, ſeeing the ſentence of her death did import, that ſhe was condemned for having conſpired againſt Elizabeth, and the Earl of Kent did ſignifie, that ſhe died for the apprehenſion which they had, that ſhe ſhould be the death of the falſe Religion, which would be rather her glory, than a puniſhment.

At the end of ſupper, ſhe drank to all her Servants with a grave and modeſt chearfulneſs, on which they all kneeled down, and mingled ſo many tears with their wine, that it was lamentable to behold. As ſoon as their ſobs had given liberty to their words, they asked her pardon for not performing thoſe ſervices which her Majeſty did merit, and ſhe (although ſhe was the beſt Miſtreſs that ever was under heaven) deſired all the world to pardon her defects. She comforted them with an invincible courage, and commanded them to wipe away their tears, and to rejoyce, becauſe ſhe ſhould now depart from an abyſs of miſery; and aſſured them, that ſhe never would forget them, neither before God, nor men.

After ſupper, ſhe wrote three letters, one to the King of France, one to the Duke of Guiſe, and the third, unto her Confeſſor. Behold, the letter in its own terms which ſhe wrote unto King Henry the Third.

A Letter unto Henry the Third.

SIR,

GOD, as with all humility I am bound to believe, having permitted, that for the expiation of my ſins, I ſhould caſt my ſelf into the Arms of this Queen, my Couſin, having endured for above twenty years the afflictions of impriſonment, I am in the end, by her, and her Eſtates, condemned unto death. I have demanded that they ſhould reſtore the papers which they have taken from me, the better to perfect my laſt Will and Teſtament, and that according to my deſire, my body ſhould be tranſported into your Kingdom, where I have had the Honour to be a Queen, your Siſter, and ancient Allie: but as my ſufferings are without comfort, ſo my requeſts are without anſwer. This day after dinner they ſignified unto me the ſentence to be executed on the next day about ſeven of the clock in the morning, as the moſt guilty offendor in the world. I cannot give you the diſcourſe at large of what is paſſed, It ſhall pleaſe your Majeſty to believe my Phyſitian, and my ſervants, whom I conceive to be worthy of credence. I am wholly diſpoſed unto death, which in this Innocence I ſhall receive with as much miſpriſion, as I have attended it with patience. The Right, which my Birth doth give me to the Realm of England, and the Catholick Religion, are the cauſes of my condemnation, although they diſguiſe them, as much as they are able, by their calumnies. They have taken from me my Almoner, and deprived me of the conſolation of the Sacrament, which I intended at my death, preſſing me with all violence of importunity, to receive the aſſiſtance and the Doctrine of their Miniſters, but I will never do any thing that ſhall be unworthy of my Birth, or my Religion. Theſe, who ſhall conveigh unto you the laſt ſighs of my life, ſhall aſſure you of my conſtancy. It remains that I beſeech you (ſince you have always proteſted to have loved me) to render to me the proofs of your charity, to pray to God for a moſt Chriſtian Queen, who dieth a Catholick, as ſhe hath lived, and to command that ſome reward may be given to my dear Servants, for I depart this world, deprived of all worldly goods. As for my Son, I recommend him to you as far as he ſhall deſerve, for I can not anſwer for him. I have aſſumed the boldneſs to ſend you two ſtones, which are very rare for health, which I wiſh you may find perfect and happy in a long life, you ſhall receive them from your moſt affectionate Siſter in Law, who dieth in giving you the laſt teſti- testimonies of her heart. I recommend again my desolate Servants to you, and if your Majesty shall bestow on me, wherewith to found a little Covent, and Alms requisite to it for some who shall pray for me, you shall send my Soul unto God, enriched with more merits. Thus I beseech you for the honour of Jesus Christ, whom neer unto my death I pray unto for you in the quality

SIR,

Of your most affectionate

Sister in Law

QUEEN MARY.

I am of opinion, that the letter, which made its address to the Duke of Guise, was of the same substance. The letter to her Confessor did import the Combats she had suffered for Religion, and the zeal, which did transport her to die in the Catholick faith, and that most cruelly she had been denied to make her last will, or to have her body transported, or to have permission to confess her self. In defect whereof she doth confess her sins in General, as she had intended to rehearse them to him in particular. She desired him to pray and to watch that night in spirit with her, and to send her his absolution, and to prescribe unto her the prayers which he thought most proper for her for that night, and for the morning following, adding, that if she could see him at the hour of her suffering, she would kneel down and take her leave of him, with a desire of his Benediction. This being done, she took a Review of her Testament, and caused the Inventory of her goods to be read, and wrote down the Names of those, to whom she had bestowed her wardrope; she also distributed money to some with her own hand, afterwards being retired, she spent the rest of the night in watching and prayer. Others affirm, that having said her prayers, she threw her self upon the bed, and slept some hours very quietly, to make her self more strong for the next days conflict. Afterwards awaking, she began to enter into an agony, and her naked knees being humbled on the ground, she did read the Passion, to incourage her self to her last combat, mingling almost already her tears and her bloud, with the tears and the bloud of her best beloved: she passed many hours in meditations, untill she had wearied two of her servants, whom she commanded to take their rest.

Her last day, which was on the twenty eighth of February, in the year 1587, and on the eighteenth of February according to the English account, the sun beginning to rise, she did put on those habiliments, which she did usually wear on Festival dayes, and having again assembled her Servants, she caused her Testament to be read unto them, and desired them to take in good part the small Legacies which she had given them, because the condition of her Estate did not permit her to bequeath them greater. She gave them all her last Farewell, exhorting them to the fear and love of their Creatour, to the preservation of their Religion, and of concords amongst themselves, and desired them to pray for the safety of her poor Soul. In the end, she kissed all the women, and permitted the men to kiss her hand. The Hall was filled with cries, and lamentations, and sighs, and sobs, and followed almost with an inundation of tears, which they could not wipe away. But as she had all her thoughts advanced to Heaven, she retired her self again into her Oratory, where she continued a long time, imploring the Grace of God with sighs, and with the groanings of a Dove, until that Thomas Andrews Lieutenant of that County, did signify unto her that it was time to come forth.

She suddenly obeyed him, and came forth in a posture full of Majesty, and with a joyfull Countenance. Her habit was most modest, her head was covered with a veyl, which hung down beneath her shoulders; She had a Chaplet at her Girdle, and an Ivory Crucifix in her hand. The Commissioners received her in the Gallery, where they did attend her: And Melvin her Steward did present himself before her, and weeping, fell on his knees to understand her last commands.

Weep not, she said, but rather rejoyce, for this day you shall see Mary Stuart delivered from all her sorrows. I conjure you to acquaint my Son, that I have always lived, and do die in the Catholick Religion, and that I do exhort him with all my heart, to preserve the faith of his Ancestors, to love Justice, and to maintain his people in peace, and to enterprize nothing against the Queen of England. I have committed nothing against the Realm of Scotland, and I have always loved the Kingdom of France. God pardon those who do thirst after my bloud, as the Hart panteth after the fountain of waters. Thou, O Lord, who art truth it self, and soundest the deepest secrets of my heart, thou dost know how much I have desired peace, and the Union of the two Realms of England and Scotland.

Her Royal heart growing tender, on her Son, on the consideration of the cruelties, and the persecutions of the Catholick Church, and on the Indignities which most innocently she suffered, her eyes poured down some tears of compassion, which she suddenly wiped away. Then turning to the Lords, she desired that her poor Servants might, after her death, be used with humanity, that they might be suffered to enjoy those poor Legacies which she had given them in her Testament, that they might be suffered to assist her at her death, and afterwards be sent safe into their Countreys upon the publick faith. The Inhumanity of the Earl of Kent would not permit that her own Servants should assist her, and said, They would but serve to increase Superstition, but she replied; Fear it not, these poor miserable creatures desire nothing more than to give me my last Farewel, and I am confident my Sister Elizabeth would not have refused me so small a courtesie, seeing the Honour of my Sex demandeth that my Servants should be present. I am her neat kinswoman, Grandchild to Henry the eight, and Queen Dowager of France, besides I have received the Unction of Queen of Scotland, if you will not grant this courtesie to one of my quality, let me have it at least for the tenderness of the heart of men. On this consideration five or six of her ordinary Servants, were permitted to accompany her to the place of Execution, to which she now was going.

This Divine Queen, whom France had seen to walk in such state and Triumph at the pomp of her marriage, when she was followed with all the glory of that Kingdom, doth now alas go with this poor train to render her neck unto the Hangman. She came into the Hall hung round about with blacks, and ascended the Scaffold, which was covered with the same livery, to accomplish this last Act of her long Tragedy. What eyes of furies were not struck blind at the aspect of this face, in which, the dying Graces did shoot for the last light of their shining Glories.

As soon as she was sate in a chair prepared for that purpose, one Beal did read the Command, and the outragious Sentence of her death, which she heard very peaceably, suppressing all the strugglings of Nature, to abandon her self to Grace in the imitation of her Saviour. At last Fletcher, the Dean of Peterborough, one of her evil Counsellours did present himself before her, and made a Pedantical Discourse, on the condition of the life passed, the life present, and the life to come, undertaking, according to his power, to pervert her in this her last conflict. This was the most sensible to her of all her afflictions, at the last minute of her life to hear the studied speech of an impertinent and audacious Minister, wherefore she oftentimes interrupted him, and besought him not to importune her, assuring him, that she was confirmed in the faith of the ancient Catholick and Roman Church, and was ready to shed her last bloud for it. Nevertheless, this infamous Doctour did not cease to persecute her with his Remonstrances, unto the shades of Death.

fore

She looked round about the Hall, if she could discover her Confessor, to demand of him the absolution of her sins, but he was so busie that he could not be found. A poor Maid belonging to her, having thrust her self with all her force into the Croud, as soon as she was got through them, and beheld her Mistress between two Hang-men, did break forth into a loud crie, which troubled those who were about the Queen to assist her. But the Queen, who had a spirit present on all occasions, made a sign unto her with her hand, that she should hold her peace, if she had not a mind to be forced thence. The Lords then made a semblance as if they would pray for her, but she thanked them heartily for their good will, saying, that it would be taken as a crime to communicate in prayers with them. Then turning to the multitude, who were about three hundred persons, she thus expressed her self:

It is a new spectacle, to behold a Queen brought to die upon a Scaffold. I have not learned to undress, to unveil my self, and to put off the Royal Ornaments in so great a Companie, and to have two Hang-men in the place of the Grooms of my Chamber. But we must submit to what Heaven is pleased to have done, and obey the Decrees of the Divine Providence.

I protest before the face of the living God, that I never attempted against the Life or Estate of my Cousin, neither have I committed any thing worthie of this usage. If it be imputed to my Religion, I esteem my self most happie to shed even the last drop of my life for it. I put all my confidence in him, whom I see represented in this Cross, which I hold in my hand, and I promise and assure my self, that this temporal Death suffered for his Name, shall be a beginning to me of eternal Life, with the Angels and most happie Souls, who shall receive my bloud, and represent it before the face of God, in the Remission of all my Offences.

There was now a floud in every eye, and amongst all her Enemies, there were not above four who were able to contain their tears. The Hang-man, clothed in black velvet, fell down on his knees, and did demand her pardon, which she most willingly granted, and not to him onely, but to all her persecutours.

After these words, she kneeled down her self, praying aloud in Latin, and invoked the most holy Mother of God, and the triumphant Company of Saints to assist her. She repeated her most fervent prayers for the Church, for her Kingdom, for France, for her Son, for her cruel murtherers, for England, for her Judges, and for her Executioner, recommending into the hands of the Saviour of the world, her spirit, purified as well by love, as by affliction. The last words of her Prayers were these, As thy arms, Lord Jesus, were stretched forth on the Cross, so receive me into the stretched forth arms of thy mercie.

She uncessantly kissed a Crucifix which she had in her hand, whereat, one that stood by, being offended at the honour which she gave unto the Cross, told her, That she should carry it in her heart, to whom she suddenly made answer; Both in my heart, and in my hand. After this she disposed her self to the Block. The Executioner would have taken off her Gown, but she repelled him, and desired, that that office might be performed for her by her own maids, who approched to her, to prepare her for the stroke of Death. And she her self did accommodate them in it, as diligently as she could, and laid open her neck and throat, more white than Alabaster, and too much alas discovered for so lamentable a Subject. This being done, she signed her own Attendants with the sign of the Cross, kissing them, and with a short smile, did bid them farewel, to shew, that she died as comfortably as constantly, making no more resistance, than the flower doth against the hand that doth gather it.

Those poor creatures did weep most bitterly, and with their sighs and sobs could have cleaved the rocks, when the Queen reproved them, saying: Nay, What do you mean? Have I answered for your constancie, and that your grief should not be importunate, and do you suffer your selves to be thus transported with lamentation, when I am going to exchange a temporal Kingdom, full of miserie, for an everlasting Empire, filled with felicitie?

It was discovered that she had a Cross about her of great value, which she intended to have bestowed on one of her neerest friends, promising the Executioner to recompence him some other way; but this enemy of the Cross did force it from her, to satisfie his avarice. And as she had her eyes blinded, and was applying her self to the Block, she began the Psalm In te, Domine, speravi. In thee, Lord, have I hoped: and amongst those sacred words, In manus tuas, into thy hands, which she again and again, and divers times repeated: the Executioner trembling and indisposed, made one stroke with his Ax, and in stead of her neck, the Ax fell higher, and cutting off some part of her Coyf, it made a grievous wound on the hinder part of her head, whereupon readily dispatching two strokes more, the Executioner took up the head from the body, and shewed it openly, all pale and bloudy, as it was, yet still carrying in her eclipsed eyes the attractives of that brave Soul, which now did cease to animate her body, and with a horrible voice he pronounced, Long live Queen Elizabeth, and so let the Enemies of the Gospel perish, which word the Dean repeated, and the Earl of Kent applauded, when all the world besides them were in tears.

The bloud was collected in silver Basons, and the Corps was laid forth on the Scaffold. Her poor Maids drew near unto her, desiring that they might be permitted to divest her, and to bury her with their own hands. But the furious Earl did drive them out of the hall, and caused the sacred body to be carried into a Chamber of the Castle, where it was locked up. He also ordered, that the Cloath and boards should be burnt, that were purpled with the bloud of this Martyr, as if there were any Element in the world that was able to take away so celestial a tincture. These two Virgins did not cease to follow with their eyes the body of their Mistress, looking upon her as well as they could, through the clefts of the door, as she still lay bloudy, and but half covered. They waited there like two Magdalens at the Sepulcher, until such time as she was interred in the Cathedral Church of Peterborough, where all the best sort of men, as long as it was allowed, did repair to let fall their tears, and lay forth their sighs upon her Tomb. The news being brought to London, all the Bells did ring for joy, to convey the tidings of it to cruel Elizabeth, who did conceal her self, rather for shame than grief, although she counterfeited to be extreamly touched for the Death of her Kinswoman. And in effects she often felt the Remorse of Conscience, and had horrible Dreams, which did make her to cry out in the night, and to wake her Maids of Honour with her affrights.

17. As long as Truth, or Virtue, or Men shall continue upon the earth, that wound shall bleed, as long as there shall be Eyes or Tears in this Vale of misery, there shall be tears distilled on these Royal Ashes, and the piety of the living, shall never cease with full hands to strew Lilies and Violets, and Roses on her Tomb. Marie, whom Heaven absolves, doth now commence an eternal Proceſs againſt Elizabeth, ſhe ſhall be brought before as many Tribunals, as there are reaſonable Spirits, and ſhall daily be condemned, without ending of her miſery, becauſe ſhe put no end to her injuſtice.

It ſeemeth that God did expreſly give her a long life, as to Cain, to Herod, to Tyberius, and other Tyrants, to fill up the meaſure of her iniquity, to poſſeſs a bloudy Scepter amongſt Jealouſies, Affrights, and Defiances, and to ſee her hell alive, whom at laſt, ſtooping unto the impotency of age, and ſlighted by her own creatures, ſhe would often complain, that all the world did abandon her, and that ſhe had not one left, in whom ſhe might repoſe her confidence.

God hath dried up her root on Earth, and made her die childleſs: He hath placed on her Throne the bloud of Mary, who at this day doth hold the Crown of England and of Scotland.

Great God, if it be permitted to enter into the cloud of thy great Myſteries, and the Secrets which thou haſt concealed from our Eyes, Is it not from this bloud we ſhall one day ſee a flower to ariſe, the moſt illuſtrious of the Poſterity, who between his hands ſhall bring forth the Golden Age, who ſhall make the Ancient Piety to triumph, and on his Royal ſhoulders ſhall carry it even into the Throne of Glory, who ſhall render divine honours to the aſhes of his Mother, and about her Tomb ſhall make the Cypreſs trees to grow, that ſhall advance unto the Stars her honoured Name, which they ſhall wear engraved on their leaves?

Elizabeth ſhall then be but a Spector of horrour, and her pernicious Councellers ſhall appear round about her, as the pale ſhades in the center of Darkneſs.

England ſhall awake from her long Lethargie, and with veneration ſhall look on her whom ſhe hath diſhonoured with ſo much fury.

Incomparable Marie, we ſay no more that Providence hath been a Step-mother, and that ſhe hath uſed you with too much rigour and violence. She hath cauſed you to enter in a garden, covered with palms and laurels, which you have bedewed with your tears, manured with your afflictions, enobled with your combats, and honoured with your bloud. She hath mounted you on a Scaffold, where you have acted the laſt and moſt glorious Tragedie, that was ever repreſented in the world by your Sex, or in your condition. The Angels (O Divine Princeſs) from the portals of Heaven did with admiration contemplate your Combat, they encouraged your Conſtancy, they ſang your Praiſes, and with emulation they prepared for you your everlaſting Crowns.

The heart of a woman againſt a hundred leopards: The heart of a Diamond againſt a thouſand hammers, which never turned for all their violence, which never could be tempted with the glitterings of honour, which always did temper with gall the moſt delicious contentments of this life, to follow he JESUS, her wounded JESUS, her JESUS crucified for her.

The moſt Catholick Queen in the world, who honoured nothing more than Churches, and Prieſts, and Altars, to live twenty years, as it were, without a Church, without a Prieſt, and without an Altar; to make in her ſelf a Temple of her body, an Altar of her heart, and a Sacrifice of her bloud; nay, what ſhall I ſay in a Death ſo abandoned, to be her ſelf the Altar, to be her ſelf the Prieſt, and her ſelf the Sacrifice? What Virgin hath ſeen the twentieth year of her captivity? What Martyr hath ſanctified ſo many priſons? Who hath ever made experience of ſo many Deaths in one? Who hath ever ſeen Death to come with a more willing foot? And who hath indeer'd it with a greater joy? who hath mannaged it with wiſdom? and who hath accompliſhed it with greater glory? Your fair Name, O Marie, borne on the Wings of Triumph and Renown, doth paſs through Sea and Land, is an object of Veneration to the people, and of Ornament unto Heaven, where your Soul with advantage doth rejoyce in the pleaſures of eternal happineſs.

Look down, fair Soul, and behold your Iſlands and your Realms, with thoſe eyes enlightened with the Beams of the face of God. Conſider the waves of the Ocean, which ceaſe not to carry the Memory of your Deeds unto the ends of the earth, pardon your Subjects, and waſh away the ſtain, which the effuſion of that generous bloud hath made, ſince you had rather be a Meſſenger of Reconciliation, than to be the Bearer of Vengeance.

O great and illuſtrious Brittanie, Is it poſſible that this bloud hath yet wrought nothing on the hardneſs of thy heart, and that thou doſt ſtill delight, by force of Arms, to fight againſt Heaven, to oppoſe thy own ſafety, and to ſhut the gate againſt thy own happineſs? Where is that glory of thy Chriſtianiſm, which heretofore did make thee to be lookt upon, as on a land of Benediction, which opened her liberal breaſts, to give ſo many Doctours to Europe, ſo many Lights of learning to the Church, ſo many Examples of piety to all Chriſtendom, and ſo many Confeſſors unto Paradiſe? Thy Kings, by a pious violence, have forced their way to Heaven, and their people have followed their foot-ſteps. There was nothing ſpoken of thee, but obedience to the Church of Rome, of Saints, of Reliques, of Piety, of Combats, of Virtue, and of Crowns. And ſince the devil of luſt and rebellion, raiſed from the moſt black Abyſs, hath ſeized on the ſoul of a miſerable King, thou haſt ſullied thy perfection, thou haſt deſtroyed thy Sanctuary, the lamentable Reliques whereof, are now ſpread over all the world, and the ſacred ſtones of thy Temples, groaning amongſt the Nations, do attend the day of the Juſtice of God, and the Reunion of the hearts of thy people, in the performance of his ſervice. What haſt thou done with the cradle of Conſtantine, and of S. Helena, who were born with thee, to give Laws unto all Chriſtendom? What haſt thou done with thoſe precious ſtones which compoſed that Diadem, the beams whereof did ſparkle with admiration in the eyes of all the people in the world? Return, O Sbunamite, return: Return, fair Iſland, to thy firſt beginning, the hand of God is not ſhortned, his arms all day are ſtretched forth to receive thee. If the inſolent hands of Hereſie have made them bars, which have been planted for ſo many years, do not think but the hands of true piety will tear away the diſorders, which protect themſelves in the night of ſo corrupted an Age. Feign not to thy ſelf imaginary horrours, and overthrowings of Eſtates by the Inquiſitions and Thunders of Rome. The beams of the Sun will make the Manna to melt, which no Power can deſtroy. The bloud of this immortal Queen, ſhall break the Diamond in pieces, and one day work thoſe great effects, which we our ſelves cannot believe, nor our Poſterity ſufficiently admire.

It is in your veins, moſt mighty Monarch of Great Brittain, where ſtill her bloud doth run. That cruel Axe which made three Crowns to fall with one head, hath not yet poured it all out, it doth preſerve it ſelf in your body, and in the body of your Poſterity, animated with the Spirit of Marie, and imprinted with the image of her goodneſs. It is ſhe who hath given you ſo temperate a ſpirit, ſuch attractive inclinations, ſuch royal Virtues, and ſo triumphant a Majeſty. It is ſhe who uniteth you with the Queen, your dear Spouſe, with a will ſo cordial, and with a love ſo perfect, and makes your marriage as a continual Sacrifice of the Ancients, whoſe offerings that were preſented, had no gall at all in them. The Queen of Scotland, your Grand-mother, was given unto France, and France hath rendered you a Princess according to the heart of God, and according to your own heart, a Blossom of our Lilies, the Daughter of a King, the Sister of a King, the Wife of a King, Royal in her bloud, Royal in her Religion, Royal in her Piety, in her Prudence, and Royal in her Courage. She enters into your cares, she partakes of your troubles. She conspires with your Designs, her spirit turneth unto yours, and yours continually is ready to meet with hers. They are two clocks excellently ordered, which at every hour of the Day do answer one another.

unto

Great Majesties of Britannie, carry the same yoke in the service of God, and the piety of your Ancestours, and as you have but one heart, maintain also but one Religion. Establish that which your Grand-mother of everlasting memory, hath practised by her Virtues, demonstrated by her Examples, honoured by her Constancy, and sealed with her Bloud.

CARDINAL POOL.

NExt unto Boëtius, I will insert Cardinal Pool, one of the most excellent Men of the Age before us, who being chief of the Councel in the Realm of England, under Queen Marie, did know so well to marry the Interests of the State, to the Interests of God, that rendering himself the Restorer of Religion, he repaired the Ruins of the Kingdom, which were fallen into a horrible desolation.

His birth and Education.

His Birth most high and illustrious, made him a near Kinsman to the King of Great Brittain, as well by the Fathers side, as by the Mothers. His spirit did equal his Nobility, but his Virtue did exceed them both, and proved him to be the wisest and the most moderate person in all the Clergy. The care of his good Mother, did with great advantage improve his more innocent and tender years, and omitted nothing that might either enlighten his understanding in the knowledge of learning, or inflame his heart with a generous heat after gallant actions.

His love of solitude.

In his most tender age, he testified a Divine Attraction, which made him to eschew all commerce of company, and secretly did inspire him with the love of Solitude. He did delight in the Countrey life, where the pureness of the Air, the aspect of the Stars, the enammel of the Meadows, the covert of the Woods, the veins of the Waters, and other objects, did prepare him as many Degrees to mount up to God, as he did there behold Beauties in the discovered breasts of Nature.

It was for this, that he made his first studies near unto the House of the reverend Fathers of the Charters, whose conversation he loved more than all the pleasures in the world, which occasioned a certain tincture of Devotion, and of probitie to pass into his manners, which continued with him all his life. From thence he removed to the Universities in England, where he gave most admirable proofs of his Capacity.

His Travels.

On the approach of the twentieth year of his age, he travelled into Italie, where he beheld the wonders of Rome, and had a tast of the rarest spirits in that Age, some whereof did afterwards live with him, and did much conduce to fill his spirit with the height of learning, which made him to be admired by all, and the rather, because it no way diminished the holy heats of his Devotion.

Having travelled into forreign Countreys, for the space of five years, he returned into England, where he was lookt upon as a man slid down from Heaven, whose excellent Qualities did promise him the fullness of glory.

His return to England.

But he suddenly observed the Affairs of the Kingdom to be greatly perplexed, by reason of the horrible Divorce, divorce, which Henry the Eight resolved on, who indeavoured at once to separate himself from his wife, and from the Church of God. He much desired that Pool, who was Famous for knowledge and integrity, should approve his intention, to the end that finding no assistance from Truth, he might beg some apparence from the opinions of men.

The Combat in his spirit.

This was no small temptation to this young Prelate, who was not altogether so austere as to distast all honour of preferment, nor so little versed in Court, as not to look on the King, as the Original from whence it flowed. He a long time consulted with himself to find a mean, which might make his conscience to accord with the will of the King. His integrity which was to him as another Birth, did dispute in his heart with the Interest of his Fortune, and he sought after the means to temper them into one. One day he thought he had found it, and addressed himself to the Court, to expose his advise unto the King, which was an advise more pleasing than just, and he had then a care that the liberty of his words, should not hinder the pretences to his dignity.

O who is he that is able to Counsel a King in his passion: If you alledge unto him too much of Justice, you hazard your Fortune. If you comply unto him with too much Gentleness, you do betray your heart. The words of a Prince are the fumace which doth prove you, where you may behold some to burn and consume away like straw, and others to come forth purified like Gold.

The spirit of God did seize on the heart and the tongue of this wise Councellour, he forgot all the worldly and flattering reasons he had prepared, to open onely his eyes unto the Truth.

He took part with God.

How Sir, (said he unto the King) to labour a divorce from Queen Katharine, after so many years of your marriage, who hath brought you issue to succeed you in the Crown. It is true, that she was given a spouse to your elder Brother, but he died in his youth before his marriage was consummated. And you have espoused the Queen in the face of the Church, with a dispensation as authentical as the Pope could give, and which he granted, with your consent, at the request of the King your Father of glorious memory; And since your Majesty hath had a secret Repugnance, caused by a respect to him, to whom you ow your Birth, that can bring no prejudice to the publick Faith, nor to the consummation of a marriage followed by such fruits and Benedictions, as ordinarily do attend that mutual commerce.

Alas Sir, your Majesty hath consecrated its Reign by so many Royal virtues, and excellent Examples, which have acquired you the love and admiration of Christendom, will it now eclipse so pure a life, and so Triumphant a reputation, by a stain which cannot be washed away, but by the effusion of the bloud of all your Realm. Your Majesty hath sacrificed both its Scepter, and its pen, by the obedience which it hath rendered to the holy Sea, and by the book which it hath made in the defence of the Church. Cannot it honestly cast off those Laws, which it hath authorized by a publick Testimony? What will your people say, who have so just an apprehension of Religion? What will forreign Princes say, who have conceived so high an opinion of your Merit? Those who do Counsel you to that divorce, are the most capital Enemies of your glorie, who do draw upon you the indignation of God, the censure of the Sovereign Priest, the arms of a great estate, who being offended at this affront, will censure your ruin.

That which hath droven you to it, is onely a passion of youth, which ought to be moderated, it is bad Counsel, from which you should retire your self, it is a mischief, which you should labour to avoid. In this case, the advice which doth least please you, will be the best. The precipitation of so hazardous an Act, can bring nothing but repentance. This I speak unto your Majesty, being driven to it by the fervent zeal which I have unto the safety of its Soul, and by the tender respect which I have always born to your Royal Person. I must beseech it that I may not be surprized in so important an affair, as this marriage is, which had his Ordinance in heaven, and its happiness on earth.

This was boldly spoken by a Man, who saw that in accommodating his humour to the King, he incontinently entered into the possession of the richest benefits of the Kingdom, and that crossing his design, he exposed his liberty, his Estate, his life to most apparent danger. Nevertheless, he had the constancy to make him this grave Remonstrance, without following the Example of those, which flatter all evil actions, and make Divinity to speak that, which the interest of their Fortunes doth suggest unto them.

Henry the Eighth grown more hardened.

Henry the Eighth was no way softened at this so grave an Oration; but on the contrary, he had a most earnest desire to arrest his Cosin Pool, and to put him to death, which had been put in Execution, if the hand of God had not withheld the blow.

He very well observed, that the heart of the King was impoysoned with lust and choler, even to the despair of all remedy. Wherefore not long after, finding his opportunity, he asked leave of the King under some pretence to go out of the Kingdom, and did abandon himself to a willing banishment, because he would not offend his conscience. He came into France, and stayed sometime in Avignon, from thence he traveled to Padua, and from Padua to Venice, where he was acknowledged and esteemed for one of the chiefest men of Christendom, and renowned for excellent quallities.

Pool banished himself.

Pool made Cardinal.

In the end, God being pleased to demonstrate that there is nothing lost in serving him, and that honours are not onely for them who by a politick suppleness do accommodate themselves unto the Times, and the lusts of great men, he stirred up the spirit of Paul the third a great lover of learned men, who made him Cardinal, with approbation of all the world. So that forsaking a Bishoprick in England, for the satisfying of his conscience, and the defence of the truth, he obtained by his merit so high a place of Eminence in the Church, which all the Crimes of a conscience prostituted to evil, could never procure unto them.

Henry, who had already declared war against God and all his Saints by his divorce, was inflamed with choler by reason of the retreat, and the promotion of this holy man, causing him to be proscribed over all England, and promising fifty thousand Crowns to him who should bring him to him, and having understood that the Pope had made him his delegate into France and Flanders, he did importune the French King, by all manner of Sollicitation to deliver him into his hands. But the brave Prince, although it was directly against his Interest, would do nothing that was against his generous mind, and received the Cardinal with all courtesie and fidelity, because he would not offend the Pope, howsoever he would not suffer him to continue long in France, because he would not exasperate the King of England, for he had great use of his assistance in the war which he made against the Emperour.

Pool was then constrained to repair to Flanders, where he was charitably received by Cardinal Everard, Bishop of Cambray, and he continued there sometimes, attending the disposition of the Pope. But Henry understanding that he was retired into that Province, did again kndle his choler, and that in so violent a heat, that he promised the Flemmings to entertain four thousand men in pay for ten Moneths in favour of the Emperour against the French, if they would abandon the Cardinal to his discretion. Howsoever, he found none that would favour his violence, which did so incense him, that he caused the Countess of Salisburie to be arrested. She was mother to the Cardinal, and daughter to the

Duke

Duke of Clarence, brother to Edward the fourth. She was accuſed for having received a letter from her Son, and for having worn about her neck the figure of the five wounds of our Saviour, on which he commanded that a Proceſs ſhould proceed againſt her, which was performed accordingly, and the perverſe and abominable Judges, who made all their proceedings to comply with the mercileſs fury of their Prince, did condemn her to death, and cauſed her head to be cut off upon a Scaffold, where ſhe gave incomparable demonſtrations of her piety and conſtancy. Her dear Son, who did love and reſpect her with all the tenderneſs of affection, was extreamly afflicted at it, and could find no comfort but in the order of Gods providence, and in the glory of her death, which was pretious before God.

After this the Legate was called back to Rome, and after he had informed Paul the third of the miſery of the people of Chriſtendom, who inceſſantly groaned under the calamity of war, kindled betwixt the two principal Crowns, he did contribute the uttermoſt of his indeavour to provide a remedy for it.

This good Pope was courteous, liberal, magnificent, well verſed in letters, and above all, a great lover of Aſtrology. It ſeemeth that the Harmony of celeſtial bodies, with which his ſpirit was ſo delicately tranſported, did touch his Soul with a deſire to make a like harmony on earth. He was paſſionate for the Peace of Chriſtian Princes, and as he well underſtood the great capacity of Cardinal Pool joyned with the Royal bloud, which gave him a more full Authority, he did not delay to ſend him with a moſt Authenticall Commiſſion to mediate an accord betwixt the two Kings.

The holy Prelate undertook this buſines with great courage, being carried to it as well by his own inclination, as by election. He failed not to repreſent unto their puiſſances all reaſons both Divine and humane, which might move them to an accord for the glorie of God, for the glory of their own Monarchies, and for the ſafety of their people. But as he found in the ear of Henry the Eighth a Devil of luſt, which obſtructed all the force of reaſon which was preſented to him to divert his paſſion, ſo he found in the ſpirit of theſe two Monarchs a horrible jealouſie of Eſtate, which ſtopped all enterance to his ſaving Counſels. The time was not yet come, and it was to row againſt the wind and tide, to preſs that buſineſs any further. He was conſtrained to return to Rome, where the Pope gave him Commiſſion to go to Wittimbergh, where he continued certain years, delighting in the fruits of a ſweet tranquillity.

In the end, the Councel of Trent being already aſſembled to extirpate Hereſies, and remedy the diſorders, with which its venemous Contagion had infected the breſt of Chriſtendom, he was choſen to be preſident thereof, which place for ſome time he executed, to the admiration of his knowledge, and the univerſal approbation of his zeal.

He is conſidered on to be Pope.

But when Paul the third, having exceeded the age of four-ſcore years, did pay the Tribute common to the condition of the living, he was obliged to return to Rome, where all the world did caſt their eyes on him to make him the head of the Church. All things ſeemed to conſpire to his Election, his age, his bloud, his virtue, his knowledge, his great experience in affairs, the general affection of all, which did paſs almoſt to veneration. It was onely himſelf that reſiſted his own Fortune, becauſe he would not aſſiſt himſelf, and permitted nothing of a ſubmiſs ſoftneſs, to over-act his generoſity, neither in that nature would he be a ſuppliant, although it were for the chiefeſt Miter in the world. The Nephews of Paul the third, who as yet poſſeſſed the moſt high Authority of affairs, conſidering the faithfulneſs of the great ſervices which he had rendered their uncle, did perſwade him with importunity to this chief Biſhoprick of the world. And as the Conclave was aſſembled, and the Deciſion of the great buſineſs did approch unto maturity, they came at night into his Chamber to ſpeak with him concerning his promotion, and to offer themſelves to his ſervice to prefer unto him that Sovereign dignity: But he ſhewed ſo little complacence to their diſcourſe, that in ſtead of making indearments and ſubmiſſions, of which they who pretend to honour, are always exceſſively prodigal, he made anſwer to them. That God was the God of light, and that the affair which they came about, ought not to be treated on in darkneſs.

That one word did rebate the edge of their ſpirits, and on the morning following, the good Fortune, which for two moneths together did look directly on Cardinal Pool, did ſlack its foot at the diſmiſſion of the Nephew Cardinals, and Julius the Third was choſen Pope, a perſon of much renown, and a great Lawyer.

He retireth again into ſolitude.

Pool his Competitor, well underſtanding that it was not expedient to reſide under the eyes of a Potentate, to whom the power over Chriſtendom was ſecretly preferred, retired to Mentz, into a monaſtery of Saint Benets, where he enjoyed the delights of reſt, to which his inclinations carried him, exerciſing his devotion to the height, and recreating himſelf with good letters, which he always loved.

But God, who by his means was pleaſed to bring about the greateſt revolution of Eſtate, as Europe ever ſaw, did cauſe occaſions to ariſe to draw him from that ſolitude to return again to his great imployments.

It is neceſſary in this place, to make mention of the condition of the affairs in England, to behold virtue in the day of its own brightneſs, & to conſider how Providence, guarding her dear Pool, as the apple of her eye, did reſerve him for a time, which made him the true Peace-maker of that nation.

The Eſtate of England.

For this effect it came to paſs, that Henry the Eighth having reigned eighteen years in ſchiſm, leading a life profuſe in luxury, ravenous in avarice, impious in Sacriledge, cruel in maſſacres, covered over with ordures, bloud, and Infamy, did fall ſick of a languiſhing diſeaſe, which gave him the leiſure to have ſome thoughts on the other world.

The death of Henry the Eighth.

It is true, that the affrighting images of his Crimes, and the ſhades of the dead, which ſeemed to beſiege his bed, and perpetually to trouble his repoſe, did bring many pangs and remorſes to him. Inſomuch, that having called ſome Biſhops to his aſſiſtance, he teſtified a deſire to reconcile himſelf unto the Church, and ſought after the means thereof. But they, who before were terrified with the fury of his actions, which were more than barbarous, fearing that he ſpoke not that, but onely to ſound them, and that he would not ſeal to their Counſels, which they ſhould ſuggeſt unto him, peradventure with the effuſion of their bloud, did gently adviſe him, without ſhewing him the indeavours, and the effects of true repentance, and without declaring to him the ſatisfactions which he ought to God, and to his Neighbours for the enormities of ſo many Crimes. He was content to erect the Church of the Cardeleirs, and commanded that Maſs ſhould there be publickly celebrated, which was performed to the great joy of the Catholicks, which yet remained in that horrible Havock. To this Church he annexed an Hoſpital and ſome other appurtenances, and left for all a thouſand Crowns of yearly Revenue.

As he perceived that his life began to abandon him, he demanded the Communion, which he received, making a ſhow as if he would riſe himſelf, but the Biſhop told him that his weakneſs did excuſe him from that Ceremony, he made anſwer, That if he ſhould proſtrate himſelf on the Earth, to receive ſo

Divine a Majesty, he should not humble himself according to his duty. He by his Will ordained that his Son Edward, who was born of Jane Seimer, should succeed him, and in the case of death, that Marie, the Daughter of Queen Katharine, should be the inheritress of the Crown, and if that she should fail, that his Daughter Elizabeth (although a Bastard) should fill her place, and possess the Kingdom. On the approches of death he called for wine, and those who were next unto his bed, did conceive that he oftentimes did repeat the word Monks, and that he said, as in despair, I have lost all.

This is that which most truly can be affirmed of him, for it is a very bad sign to behold a man to die in the honour of his Royal dignity, and by a peaceable death, who had torn in pieces JESUS CHRIST, who had divided the Church into schisms, who of the six Queens that he espoused, had killed four of them, who had massacred two Cardinals, three Archbishops, eighteen Bishops, twelve great Earls, Priests, and Religious Men without number, and of his people without end; who had robbed all the Churches of his Kingdom, destroyed the Divine worship, oppressed a million of innocents, and in one word, who had assasinated mercy it self.

Howsoever he wanted not flatterers, who presumed to say and write, that his wisdom had given a good order to his affairs, and that he happily departed this world, not considering what S. Austine doth affirm, That all the penitencies of those who have lived in great disorders, and who onely do convert themselves at the end of their life, being pressed to it by the extreamity of their disease, ought to be extreamly suspected, because they do not forsake their sins, but their sins do forsake them.

It was observed indeed, that at his death this King did testifie a repentance of his savage and inordinate life, but we cannot observe the great and exemplary satisfactions which were due to the expiation of so many abominable sins. King Antiochus made submissions of another nature, and ordered notable restitutions, to recompense the dammages which he had caused to the people of the Jews, nevertheless he was rejected of God, by reason of his bloudy life, and the Gates of the Temple of mercy were shut against him for all eternity. The foundation of a small Hospital which Henry caused at his death, was not sufficient to recompense the injuries, of so many Churches which he had pillaged, nor of so much goods of his Subjects as he had forced from them, seeing we know by the words of the wise man. That to make a benefit of the substance of the poor, is to sacrifice a Son before the eyes of his Father. Eccles. 34.

The Reign of Edward. His Uncle Seimer spoileth all.

He had by his Testament ordained many tutors to his Son, who were able to have made as many Tyrants, but Seimer, Uncle by the mothers side to the deceased King, gaining the favour of the principal of the Lords of the realm, whom he had corrupted with mony and great presents, did cause himself to be proclaimed Protector and Regent. He took a great possession on little Edward, the Son of Henry, heir to the Crown, whom he brought up in schism and Heresie, against the intentions of his Father. This furious man immediately began his Regency with so much insolence, that he almost made the reign of Henry the Eight to be forgotten, he fomented the poison, which he had conceived under him, he did use the Catholicks most unworthily, and did cut off the head of his own Brother, by a jealousy of women. But as he had made himself insupportable, so it came to pass, that the affairs of war, which he had enterprized against the French, did fall out unfortunately for him. Dudley, one of the chiefest of the Lords, drawing a party to him, did accuse him of Treason, and caused his head to be cut off on the same Scaffold, where before he had taken off the head of his own Brother. This death was followed with great fears, and horrible commotions for the Regency, which presently after was extinguished by the death of the young King Edward.

The Qualities and death of King Edward.

This poor Prince was rather plucked with pincers from his mothers womb, than born, and he could not come into the world without giving death to her, who conceived him. He was said to have none of the comeliest bodies; He spake seven languages at fifteen years of age, and in his discourse did testifie a rare knowledge of all those sciences, which were most worthy of a King. It seemeth that death did advance it self to ravish his spirit from his body, which did awake too early, and was too foreward for his age, for he died in his sixteen year, having not had the time throughly to understand himself, and to see by what course he should sway his Scepter or his life.

Cardan, who was imployed no less than one hundred hours to make his Horoscope, did easily observe in the stars, the incommodities of his body, and disasters of his person; but he could no way attain to the period of his life, which is of the secrets reserved in the knowledge and in the method of God.

All England was extreamly corrupted in her faith under the Regency of this Seimer, and the Ladies of the Court were enveloped in the errours of the time. He found none but the Lady Marie, daughter to Henry the Eight, and Katharine, which continued in the Religion of their Grand-Fathers, and though she was tempted and sollicited on all sides, yet she would not suffer her self to be surprized with a new Faith, but with a vigorous force, did roar against all the torrents of Opinions, and the overflowing disorders which reigned in that age.

It was for this, that God did cause her to mount on the Throne of his own Tower, and gave her the grace to be both the restorer of Religion, and the State, by the assistance of this Cardinal.

Mary the lawfull heir is troubled, and Jane is chosen Queen by Faction.

As soon as Edward was dead, not without suspition of poison, Dudley, Duke of Northumberland, who was then most mighty in power, and had newly married his Son to the Lady Jane, issued from the bloud Royall, conceived himself strong enough to begin the Regency of England, the better afterwards to usurp the Crown. He caused his Daughter-in-Law to be proclaimed Queen of England, and seized on the Tower of London, and gave order for the apprehending of Queen Mary. But the generous Princess, being advertised of the attempt, did take horse in the time of night, and secured her self in a place of strength, and conjured all her good Servants to assemble themselves, to defend her person and her right.

It is to be admired, that persevering in the true Religion, contrary to that of the great ones of the Kingdom, at the same time when she conceived her self abandonned, and her cause most deplorable, that she should behold the principal of the Nobility, and Gentry, and Commonalty, to fall down before her, and to offer her their obedience and their Arms, to take the possession of the Crown.

She marched immediately to London, in the middle of her Army apparelled in a Gown of Velvet of a violet colour, and mounted on a white horse. She entered into the Citie with great applauses of her Subjects, and surprized the Duke, and caused him to deliver his Daughter in Law into her hands.

It was a spectacle worthy observation, to consider the Inconstancy of these worldly affairs, and to look on that person, who but yesterday promised to himself to force the whole Kingdom under the power of his Laws, to tremble now at the fear of death pronounced by his Judges, who condemned him to be drawn upon a Hurdle, to be hanged, drawn, and quartered. The Queen sent him Catholick Divines to convert him, to whom he gave ear, and abjuring Heresie, he imbraced the Catholick Religion, which was the occasion, that the Queen did moderate the Sentence of the Execution, and was contented, that his head onely should be cut off with his sons, who was the husband of Jane. This miserable Lady from a high Tower, where she was prisoner, beheld the body of her dear husband without a head, at the sight whereof, she fell down into a swoun, and being a little recovered, she melted into tears, and did fetch from her heart so many, and so deep sighs, that they seemed to be able, not onely to mollifie the hearts of men, but to cleave the Rocks asunder.

The Execution of the Lady Jane.

There was a long Deliberation concerning her Fact, because the Queen had an inclination to pardon her, observing her to be both young, fair, knowing, and of a delicate temper, and one who had not offended, but by the violent suggestions of her Father-in-law, and of her Husband, who had put the Crown upon her head. But the Judges did remonstrate, that it was of a most dangerous consequence, to suffer that person to continue alive, who had carried the Title of a Sovereign, and that one day it might give a new fire to the enterprizes of the Remainder of her Faction. On these Considerations the Sentence of Death was pronounced, which she received with a Constancy admirable in her Sex and age. A Doctour was sent unto her, to reduce her to the Catholick Religion, which at the first she refused, alledging, That she had too little time to think on an Affair of that importance. Which being reported to the Queen, she deferred the Execution for certain dayes, to instruct her at more leisure, so that she was gained to God, and continued to the the last hour of her life in such tranquility of mind, that a little before she came out of prison, to go to her Execution, she wrote divers Sentences in Greek, Latine, and English, on the contempt of Death, and when on the Scaffold it was represented to her, that she should die by the sword, which (according to the custom of that Countrey) is accounted a nobler kind of Execution, than to die by the Axe: she said, That she would die by that Axe which was yet discoloured with her husbands bloud, and couragiously she tendered her neck to the Hang-man, drawing tears from her self, and the hearts from all those that did behold her. O most unfortunate Ambition, that hast made so young a Princess a sacrifice of Death, who for the excellency of her spirit, might have been another Minerva, or at least the tenth of the Muses.

Behold the strange Revolutions, which did prepare the way to Cardinal Pool, for the performance of those high Designs, which God had committed to his Conduct. Queen Marie did incontinently make void all the Sentences which had been pronounced against him, and called him back into England, to which place in a short time he came, as if he had been carried on the shoulders of all honest men. The Pope made him his Legate and gave him full power to ordain and execute all things, which he should conceive necessary for the glory of God, and the establishment of the true Religion.

Pool travels to the Reducement of England to the ancient Faith.

He travelled to this Work with incomparable wisdom, and with a zeal invincible. He well perceived, that to restore Religion by arms, was to undertake a most laborious, if not an infinite work, which would open all the veins in England, and draw drie as well their purses, as their bloud, and cover the Kingdom with the calamities of civil wars, which would continue for many Ages. He resolved to put his good Counsels in execution with gentleness, which others propounded to perform with all violence.

The course he held.

And in the first place, he had recourse to Prayers, to Mortifications, to Vows, and to Devotions, which he performed in secret, and which he particularly recommended to all holy minds, who breathed after the restoring of the ancient Religion.

In the second place, he entered into the heart, and possessed himself with the inclinations of Queen Marie, whom he found throughly disposed, and animated by a generous spur, for the glory of God, and the felicity of her Kingdom, which kept her alwayes exercised on that high thought, and comprehended in it the safety of all that Nation.

In the last, he more and more encouraged all the Catholicks, by the desires of their repose of conscience, and by the liberty of their functions, in the exercise of spiritual things.

In the third place, he treated with those who were in an errour, with the Spirit of Compassion, of Sweetness and of Bounty, complying with them in what he could in civil affairs, and endeavouring to take from them the apprehension which they had conceived to themselves, that the Change of Religion would ruin their fortunes, and the establishment of their houses. He caused a report to be spread by many remarkeable and grave Personages, that he came not to take away their temporal goods, but to give them spiritual blessings; And as concerning the Goods of the Church, which many Great men had usurped in that general Confusion of Affairs, he said, he would compose it in the best way that Love and Candor could prescribe him.

Fourthly, He did wisely fore-see, that with sweetness he should also bring in Authority, which might ruin the resistences of those men, if any should appear to oppose so saving a work. On which he had recourse to the greatest Potentates in Europe, whom he secretly affected to this Enterprize. He had been before employed on the Peace between Francis the First, and Charls the Fifth. He did apprehend, and attract the spirits of them both with wonderfull dexterity, for having dived into the heart of the Emperour, and finding the seeds of the Design, which afterwards did discover themselves, having been dismissed of the Empire, and embraced a solitary life, he wrought upon him with the recital of his great actions, and the Conquests he had obtained, and told him, That all those strong agitations of his spirit, were but as so many lines which ought to tend to the center of Rest, that he ought not to weary and torment his good fortune. That it was a great gift of God, to confine his thoughts on true glory, without attending the tide of the Affairs of the world. That it was the duty of an Emperour, to endeavour the Peace of Christendom, and an incomparable honour to accomplish it. He touched his heart so directly with these Demonstrations, that he opened it, and the Emperour declared to him, That he had a great desire to that divine Peace, and would embrace all reasonable Conditions that should conduce unto it.

After that he had effected this, he made no delay to address himself to the Most Christian King, and knowing that he was puissantly generous, he wrought upon him by the glory of the great Wars he had sustained, and the immortal actions of valour, which he produced, that by his invincible courage he had at the last wearied the most puissant Potentate in Europe, who had him in admiration, and desired nothing more than to hold a fair correspondence with him. That a fair Peace should be an inestimable benefit to them both, which should give rest unto their Consciences, and pull down a blessing from on high upon their persons, and be a great comfort to their Subjects, who were overcharged with the continuation of the war. In the end, he did demonstrate to him how extraordinarily he was beloved of his people, who did attend this Effect of his goodness, by which he should crown his Valour with all happiness and abundance in his Kingdom. The King took fire at this Discourse, and the Cardinal most vigorously did blow it up; and did remonstrate, That two so great Monarchs, who were made for Heaven, ought not so greedily to hold unto their interests on earth, and that they had nothing now to wish, but to part their affairs, and to save their honour. And this indeed they afterwards performed, restoring willingly on both sides, all that they had conquered since the ordinance of Reconciliation made by Paul the third, who some years before did transport himself to Marseilles (although he was of a very great age) to pacifie the Affairs of Christendom.

This Accord being so happily atchieved by Cardinal Pool, he gained by it the approbation and applause of all Princes, who favoured the Catholick cause. He observed that the Emperour had his son Philip to marry, and that there was nothing more expedient for the advancement of Religion, than to allie him to Queen Marie. He carried this affair with such secrecie and dexterity, that the King of Spain was in England, and the Marriage published, before the plot was discovered. By the counsel of Charls, Cardinal Pool did deferre his entery into the Realm, until the Marriage was concluded, and then he entered with all assurances. The King himself came to meet him, and Queen Marie with all her people, received him with extasies of joy.

He incontinently did draw unto him the affection of all the principal Lords, and not long after, he counselled the King and Queen, to call an Assembly of the most remarkable persons in the Kingdom, to whom he spake thus in presence of their Majesties.

MADAM,

His speech to the States.

SInce it hath pleased God, after the Confusions of the late times, to shine upon us with his eyes of Mercie, and at last to place upon the Throne, the true and faithfull Inheritress of the Crown, who is so worthily espoused to one of the greatest Princes in all Christendom, we have a great subject to satisfie our Discontents, and advance our hopes.

This Realm at this day doth imitate the Creation of the world, coming forth from its Chaos, and dark Abyss, to receive the favourable influences of the light. The day which by all good men hath been so passionately desired, so suspected by the wicked, so unlookt for by the incredulous, and so attended by the afflicted, is at length arrived to destroy our death, and to make us new born in the life of the children of God.

Behold the true Religion, which entereth with triumph into all the Cities of this Kingdom, from which Impietie and Furie had dispossessed her, she holds out her arms unto you, adorned with the Palms and the Crowns, with which your Ancestours have honoured her, she demands again the place, which from the first conversion, until the furie of these later times, she held with so much honour and satisfaction.

Will you yet banish her? Will you yet continue to persecute her? Can you endure that she should present before God her torn and her bloudie Robe, and complain again of the outrages of her children?

My Brethren, There is neither life nor salvation, but in this Faith, which shineth and speaketh in S. Peters Chair; It is that which God hath given us by our glorious Father, S. Gregory the Great; it is that which our Fathers have embraced; it is that which they have defended by their Words, their Arms, and their Bloud, which they have shed for the Honour of it. Nothing is left for those to hope for, who are separated from it, but the tempests of darkness, and the everlasting chains of hell.

It is well known, that the change of Faith proceeds from an infectious passion, which having possessed the heart of a poor Prince, hath caused these reprocheable furies, and the inundations of bloud, which hath covered the face of England. He hath at his death condemned that which before he approved. He by his last Testament destroyed that which before he had chosen, wherefore those who have followed him in his Errour, may also follow him in his Repentance. The Peace, the Safety, the Abundance, the Felicity of the Kingdom, are ready to re-enter with the true Faith; which if you refuse, I see the choller of God, and a thousand calamities, that do threaten you. Return therefore, O Shunamite: Return, O fair Island, to thy first beginning; feign not to thy self imaginary penalties, terrours, and punishments, which are not prepared but for the obstinate. The Sovereign Father of Christendom, doth continually stretch forth his arms to thy obedience, and hath delegated me, as the Dove out of the Ark, to bring unto thee the Olive Bough, to pronounce Peace and Reconciliation to thee. This is the acceptable Hour, this is the Day of thy salvation. The Night, which hitherto hath covered thee, is at the end of her Course, and the Sun of Justice is risen, to bring light unto thee. It is time to lay down the works of darkness, and to take up the Armour of Light, to the end that all the earth inhabited may take notice, that thou abhorrest what is past, embracest what is present, and dost totally put thy self into the hands of God, for the time to come.

This Oration was attended with a wonderful approbation of all the assembly, and the Cardinal being departed from the Councel, the King and Queen commanded that they should debate on this Proposition, which was presently taken into consideration, and it was resolved, That the ancient religion should be established. The Chancellour made this resolution known unto the people, and did powerfully exhort them to follow the examples, which were conformable to the advice of the King and Queen, and the most eminent personages in the Kingdom. This discourse was revived with a general applause for the advancement of the Catholick faith. In the end, he demanded that they would testifie their resolution in a Petition to the King and Queen, and mediate for a reconciliation to the Cardinal, Legate of the holy See, which incontenently was done, the paper was presented, and openly read, their Majesties did confirm it, both by their authorities, and their prayers, and humbled themselves on their knees with their Grandees, and all the people, demanding mercy; whereupon an authentick absolution was given by the Legate, the bels did ring in all the Churches, Te Deum was sung. All places were filled with the cries of joyes, as people infranchised, and coming out of the gates of hell. After this, King Philip was obliged to go into Flanders, by reason of the retreat of the Emperour his father. Pool was left chief of the Councellours with Queen Mary, who did wonders for the good of Religion, & of the State. It is true that Cranmer, and other turbulent and seditious spirits, were punished; but so great a moderation was used, that the Benefices, and the Reveneues of the Church, did continue in the hands of those who did hold them of the King, without disturbing them on that innovation: all things were continued that might any way be suffered, not so much as changing any thing in marriages, because they would not ensnare their spirits. The heart of the Queen, and of her ministers, did think on nothing more, than to establish Religion, to entertain the holy See, to render justice, to comfort the people, to procure peace and rest, to multiply the abundance of the Kingdom.

They did begin again the golden age, when after the reign of five years and odde moneths, they were both in one day taken out of the world by sickness, which did oppress with grief all honest men, and did bury with them in one Tomb, the happiness and safety of that Kingdom.

O providence! not to be dived into by humane reason, what vail hast thou cast on our Councels, and our works?

works? What might we have not hoped from ſuch beginnings? What wiſdom would not have concluded, That felicity had crowned for ever the enterprizes of this Cardinal? An affair ſo well conducted, a negotiation ſo happy, a buſineſs of State, and the greateſt that was ever in any Kingdom whatſoever, ought it not to carry his progreſs unto eternity? Where are the fine plots of policy? Where are the Arms that in ſo ſmall a time have ever wrought ſo great an effect? The Chariots of the Romans, which covered with Lawrels, did march on the heads of Kings, did not make their wayes remarkable, but by ſtornings of Towns, by Flames and Maſſacres. But behold here many millions of men ſtruck down, and raiſed again, with one onely ſpeech, ſo many legions of ſouls converted with a ſoft ſweetneſs, the face of a kingdom totally changed in one Moment, and made the happieſt that any Ages have ſeen. And after all this, to find the inexoarble Trenchant of Death, to ſap in one day the two great pillars of Eſtate, and ruinate the houſe of God, which ſhould have reached to the imperial heaven.

O how true is it, that there are the ſtrokes of Fate! that is to ſay, an order of the ſecret purpoſe of God, which is as concealed as inevitable, nothing can divert, nothing can delay it. The counſels of the wiſe are here blinded, their addreſſes are loſt, their activity troubled, their patience tried, and all their reaſons confounded.

Poor Brittain, God gave thee theſe two Great Lights, not to enjoy them, but as they paſſed by, to behold them. Thou art ſoiled with ſacriledges and impieties, thou art red with the bloud of the Martyrs. The ſins of Henrie are not yet expiated, and the ignominious paſſions of his life, are puniſhed by the permiſſion of the Errour. The Powers of darkneſs have their times determined by God, they will abate nothing of their periods, if the invincible hand of the Sovereign Judge doth not ſtop their courſes by his abſolute Authority. It pertaineth to God onely, to know and appoint the times of puniſhment, and Mercy; and there is nothing more expedient for man, than to ſubmit to his Laws, to obey his Decrees, to reverence his Chaſtiſements, and to adore the Hand that ſtrikes him.

FINIS.

THE ANGEL OF PEACE TO ALL CHRISTIAN PRINCES.

Written in French by N. Caussin, S. J.
And now translated into English.

Printed in the Year of our Lord, MDCL.

The Angel of Peace to all Christian Princes.

IF it be lawfull (greatest Princes) to interrupt your Highnesses, I will appear for the Cause of God, the Angel of Peace, the Minister of Concord and Union, the Interpreter of Truth, the Mean and Solicitour of Salvation. I am not that terrible and dreadfull messenger who injected terrours and scourges into David, astonished with Divine Prodigies. I am not lifted in that number which utterly overwhelmed the City of Pentapolis, almost drowned before in the inundation of their impieties. I rain not sulphur, I do not brandish flames, I dart no thunderbolts; but with a mild, temperate, and gentle amenity, I exhibit those olive-branches which the direfull contagion of Warres hath not yet blasted. I come from the conversation of those who at the Nativity of our Jesus sang Anthems of Peace to Good-willing men. Despise not the Augur of Glad-tydings, contemne not the Hyperaspist of Truth, who speaketh unto you before God in Christ.

It is the concernment of the whole Christian world, most pious Princes, which I addresse unto you; it is your interest which I urge and inculcate both by wishes and writings; it is the Profession of God which I require; and indeed of great importance, as having diverse times summoned, yea enforced the Priests from the Altars, the Virgins from the Monasteries, and the Anachoretes from the Woods, that of the mute it might make Oratours and Agitatours of the retired. God the Arbitratour and Accomplisher of all things, who calleth those things which are not as if they were; he formeth and prepareth the mouths of infants, giveth wisdome to the impudent; to yield to him is victory, to contest with him is succesless opposition. Appetite infuseth Eloquence, and necessity not seldome makes a souldier. To be silent amidst the articulated movings of the oppressed is unlawfull, and to sit still amidst the wounds of Military men as unconcerned, is highly and justly reproveable. That hand that is not officious to the suffering world deserves an amputation.

I shall not disoblige the supplicated engagement of your patience (excellent Princes) with unimporting reasons. I shall not abuse your senses with unappertaining figments, but by a pleasant prospect I shall shew you that Glory which you aim at thorow fields flowing with bloud, thorow the flames of collucent Cities, and thorow many doubtfull circulations and diverticles. Condescend therefore to give me an allowance of discourse concerning the nature of Warre and Peace, and of the Right of Christian Princes in each of them. For upon this foundation I conceive I can build firm and satisfactory Arguments whereby to secure your Dignity, and to settle the Peoples safety.

It was a speech well becoming the wisdome of the Ancients, that this world, in whose circumference all things are contained, is as it were a great volumn of the Deity, wherein life and death are as the beginning and the end: but the middle Pages are perpetually turned over backwards and forwards. That which Life and Death bring to passe in the nature of things, the same doth Peace and Warre in the Nation of all Kingdomes and Empires. And indeed Life is a certain portion of the Divine Eternity, which being first diffused in the Divine Nature, and afterwards streaming into the sea, and penetrating into the earth and our world, doth contemperate by an espousall and connexion of bodies and souls wonderfull and almost Divine Agreements. But when there is a solution of this undervalued continuity, when this harmony is disturbed and broken, it suddenly vanisheth by the irresistible necessity of death, greedily depopulating all things under his dominion.

In like manner Peace, the greatest and most excellent gift of the Divine indulgence, reconciles and apportions a kind of temperature in the wills of men, from whence floweth the most active vigour of all functions in the Body Politick; as, the alacrity of minds, the rewarded sedulity of Provinces, the faithfull plenty of the Countrey, the security of travelling, the opulency of Kingdomes, and the accumulation of all temporall blessings. But when Concord is dissipated, and the alarms of Warre besiege mens ears, presently there insueth a convulsion and direfull decay of all the members, and Audacity finding it self disingaged from the mulcts and penalties of the Laws, runneth headlong into all variety of mischief; the most Sacred things are violenced, and the most Profane are licenced, the nocent and the innocent are involved in the expectation of a sad and promiscuous catastrophe, and bonefires are made of cities not to be quenched but with the bloud of miserable Christians.

He that will tax his own leisure but with the cheap expence of considering our mortality, will so much scruple these effects to be the actions of men, that he may be easily seduced to believe that Hell hath lost some prisoners, or that some troops of Furies have broken the chains of darkness, and in a humane shape deluded men with such enormous villanies.

My highest obedience (most excellent Princes) is due to truth, and that obligation prompts me to proclaim this judgement, That Contentions and Warre have not had any ingresse into the Church of God, but by clandestine and undermining Policies, Discipline resisting, and Conscience standing agast at the monstrous object. And indeed Paul exclaimeth against contentions; Brother (saith he) goeth to law with brother, and that under Infidels: Now therefore there is altogether an infirmity in you, in that you go to Law one with another. Why rather suffer you not wrong? Why rather sustain you not fraud? But ye your selves do wrong and exercise fraud and that to your brethren.

What do we hear? an Edict published by an Apostle invested with thunder and lightning. I beseech the revisitation of your thoughts; what would he imagine were he lent again unto the world by providence, that then wanted patience to see a controversie about a field perhaps, or a house, and should now behold, among those that claim the title of the Faithful, Ensigne against Ensigne, Nation against Nation, and not a House, not a city, not a Province, but the whole Christian world precipitated into slaughters, rapes, and priviledged plunders; would he countenance such an inhumane spectacle with a Declaration of allowance? or would he perswade men to the violations of the Law of Nature, and dictate encourgement to ruine and rapine?

But Tertullian also is very strict in this point, and peradventure too rigid, whilst he saith that our Lord, by that injunction to Peter to sheath his sword, disarmed all Christian Souldiers. This in my judgement deserves a censure of extream severity, if he conclude all warfare to be criminall: this were to destroy the innocent in a detestation of the guilty, should we perpetrate corrupt actions upon the order of the cruel, and the petulancy of luxuriant villains. What would Christianity then be, but a prey to the insatiable, and a laughing-stock to the insolent? if it were not lawfull to revenge unfaithfull injuries with a juſt retaliation? If it were not lawfull to defend Churches from Sacriledge, Widows and Orphans from oppreſſions, and diſintereſſed perſons from ruine? 'Tis a raſh determination that bloweth off the victorious laurels of ſo many Chriſtian Kings with ſuch a blind and precipitate whirlwind of words. Juſtly therefore are the Manichees obnoxious to a ſpirituall Outlawry from the Church, whilſt I know not whether they more impudently aſſert innocence, or more blameably diſarm it.

All Ages concurre in the juſtification of Warre againſt Infidels, but the intermingled contentions of the Faithfull have been alwayes reprehended, and never impartially tolerated. Be pleaſed to take a review of an old inſtrument; There were many and bitter diſcords among the Jews, many tumults, many warres, but ever againſt thoſe that had abandoned the true Religion, and collapſed into foul Idolatry, and the worſhip of the Gentiles. The Iſraelites indeed upon the diviſion of the Tribes fought againſt the Benjamites with a fierce warre, and an infinite deſtruction, but this was rather the fury of grief, ruſhing into arms for the revenge of a woman violated with prodigious luſt, then any deſtinated oppoſition, or juſt controverſie for the enlargement of their territories. The magnanimity of David could ſcarce be induced to a juſt reſiſtance of his ſonne Abſolon, forcing his way unto his Fathers Throne thorow the bloud and carkaſſes of many Citizens, till Joab had obſtinately diſſipated that languidneſſe of his gentle mind, ſo deteſtable an undertaking was it for thoſe who were brethren by the bonds of Nature and Religion to forfeit all civill reſpects to the rage of warre.

If you pleaſe to conſult the firſt times of the Chriſtian Emperours, you ſhall find Conſtantine oppoſing his forces againſt Julian, but not till he became the deſertour of Chriſt, and the Standard-bearer of impiety. You ſhall alſo find Theodoſius the Great levying his utmoſt ſtrength againſt Maximus, Eugenius, and Arbogaſtus: but his quarrel was with moſt perfidious Tyrants, who under the veil of Religion laboured to hide flagitious and damnable exceſſes. You ſhall ſcarce meet with any Prince in the more innocent times, who took up arms to be embrewed in Chriſtian bloud but upon the moſt deliberate and important cauſes. And indeed Baronius doth excellently obſerve, that the Croſſe was firſt oppoſed to the Croſſe in arms in the Warre which Conſtantius raiſed againſt Magnentius. A horrible wickedneſſe (ſaith he) and not to be attempted but by a Chriſtian Tyrant, a diſſembler of Religion, and an Hereticall Emperour.

I am not ignorant that Auguſtine hath handled this ſubject and queſtion againſt Fauſtus, and that he hath eſtabliſhed the equity of Chriſtian arms upon the foundation of the Goſpel, becauſe John in ſo exemplary a rigour of life perſwaded not the ſouldiers, enquiring after the means of their ſalvation, to caſt away their weapons, but to be contented with their pay, and to ſtrike no man. Becauſe alſo the Apoſtle not without cauſe ſaith, That Princes bear not the ſword in vain. But if it be lawfull to yield our aſſent to the approbation of his judgement, we ſhall find that all thoſe darts were ejaculated againſt the mad phrenſies of the Manichees, who would have Chriſtians to abſtain from the ſword, and to bear the moſt cruel injuries of treacherous Infidels unrepelled, unrevenged. He would not therefore either cheriſh the ſeverity, or irritate the power of Chriſtian Princes in an unlawfull Warre againſt their brethren; for in the ſame place he exclaimeth: a deſire of doing violence, a cruel preparation of mind to revenge, an implacable mind, a barbarous luſt to rebel, a ſecret ſpeculation of Lordly dominion, and other ſuch as theſe are the cauſes which are juſtly culpable in the Warres.

Now who are they according to the opinion of S. Auſtin, that conſociate themſelves and their adherents in an unjuſt Warre? Firſt, they that are hurried into Arms by a blind violence of ſpirit, not ſo much for love of Juſtice, as a greedineſſe of revenge. Who being provoked by ſome injury, inhumanely and unmeaſurably rave and rage, abhorring all attonement, and refuſing by the authority of an incenſed reaſon to chide out their Paſſions, thoſe petulant and contentious inmates: In the ſecond place, they who endeavour a Rebellion againſt their lawfull Sovereigne, and caſting off the yoke of their Allegiance, precipitate themſelves into all licencious enormities. Finally, they who out of a ſole deſire of Ruling involve and mingle the Kingdomes of their neighbours in commotions and inteſtine diſcords, and that they may extend their Empire, open a paſſage to their ambitious expectations by all deſignes either violent or fraudulent.

Conſider now (beſt Princes) what a proclivity there is in ſuch to boil with indignation and diſpleaſure, to burn with paroxiſms of envy and exacerbations of revenge; yea, and to be tickled with an apprehenſion of purchaſing or amplifying a Kingdome. How obvious it is the reins being let looſe to tranſcend the juſt limits, how eaſie a matter to counterfeit Juſtice, to pretend neceſſity, and now to trample upon thoſe Laws which before were ſo much outwardly reverenced; you will undoubtedly find it true, that it is more eaſie to take up, then to moderate and temper Arms.

But that I may not detain you long, Aquinas requireth three things to the juſtification or legitimation of a Warre: the Authority of the Prince, a juſt Cauſe, and a right Intention, whereunto other Divines have added warrantable Reaſons to obtain the end; it is abſolutely unlawfull therefore for private men to appear in Arms for the proſecution of their own right though in judgement. This God hath delegated unto Princes, that that might happen ſeldome which muſt needs be violent. To the Lords of the earth we may ſay with Seneca, I am he that God hath choſen out of ſo many men that I might be his Vicegerent upon earth. I am the ſupreme Arbiter of life and death unto the Nations. It is in the hand of my power to diſpoſe the lot of their conditions to all my people. Theſe millions of ſwords that guard my peace, ſhall at the leſt intimation of my pleaſure be all unſheathed. What Cities ſhall periſh, and which ſhall flouriſh, is my juriſdiction.

To be able to put all theſe things in execution is indeed a great matter, but to forbear the purſuance of them, unleſſe neceſſity require it, is farre more divine. It is a lawfull wiſh, that he to whom all things are lawfull, would confine his will to the practice onely of lawfull things. The right of the Sword is not extended, when it devolveth into the Protection of one, but is rather reſtrained. One hand is ſtretched forth, that all may be bound; affairs are managed by the wiſdome of a paucity, leſt the temerity of the whole multitude ſhould precipitate them into a promiſcuous deſtruction. The parſimony even of the meaneſt bloud is to be praiſed. No man is more unjuſtly inveſted with a ſuperiority over others, then he that is prodigall of their lives though in a juſt emergence. Thoſe thunderbolts muſt be ſlowly ſhot, which the wounded perſons can reverence. Let Kings therefore beware leſt they gloriſie themſelves by that faculty wherewith God hath entruſted them, and abuſe it to outward pomp, rather then exerciſe it to the advantage of good men. Let the fear of miſdemeanours and obliquities liquities baniſh all fierceneſſe from them, and let them eſteem it the greateſt impotence to boaſt a Priviledge of Injuſtice, or a Power to hurt.

The cauſe of the Warre muſt firſt be balanced by an accurate examination, leſt the affections obtain precedence over Equity and Reaſon, leſt iniquity be predominant in the better part, and force and fury comply to cheat the world under the ſpecious title of Injuſtice. I am both ſad and aſhamed to conſider with my ſelf what frivolous occaſions have prevailed with many whereon to ground a Warre. The Trojan Warre that common Sepulchre of Aſia and Europe flamed out from the impetuous flagrancies of a noble Whore. By a thouſand ſhips ſhe was re-demanded, and for her that had loſt all modeſty, vaſt numbers of gallant Hero's loſt their neglected lives. So many chaſte lay open to the luſt of the enemies, that an unchaſte might be reſtored. Alexander being yet a child, was reprehended by his Tutour for his profuſion of Frankincenſe in his Sacrifices to the Gods, but being arrived to mans eſtate, that he might waſh away this admonition of his maſter, he invadeth Arabia, and there the ſecond time offereth up Sacrifice for the conqueſt of the Countrey. The Egyptians for a ſlain Cat roſe up in arms againſt the Romans, and fourty deſtroyed many thouſand men. Caligula with a mighty noiſe of armed men, and a great preparation of all Military ornaments haſteneth to the Ocean, there to gather cockles. The Romans being contumeliouſly upbraided with this ridiculous Expedition, conſpired, and almoſt effected the utter ruine of the ſcoffing Tarentians. The people of Alexandria rebelled againſt Galienus becauſe of a ſottiſh contention between the Maſter and the Servant concerning the elegancy and neatneſſe of a pair of ſhoes. And to omit many examples which I could commemorate, William of England ſirnamed the Conquerour, who was victorious over all men but himſelf, revenged a pleaſant conceit of Maximus the Prince with innumerable deſtructions. The Conquerour was of a corpulent habit, and his belly was ſomewhat prominent thorow a plenty of Hydropick humours, wherefore when Philip the King of France heard of the nature of his diſeaſe, We will allow him time (ſaith he) to provide for his lying in, which by the bulk of his belly appeareth to be near at hand. The Conquerour being mad with fury replyed, That he would riſe up after his delivery and kindle five hundred fires in France to adorn his up-ſitting. Nor was he unmindfull of his reſolution, for preſently upon his recovery he entred France with a ſtupendious army, wholly addicting himſelf by fire, famine, and horrible ſlaughters, to the ſatisfaction of his revenge. Shall we ſuppoſe that he playes and trifles with the bloud of men, who upon ſuch ſlight provocations can enterprize ſuch mournfull Tragedies? May we ſuppoſe thoſe people miſerable with whom the ſcoffs of furious men muſt be expiated with ſuch a direfull deſtruction?

No man ought to believe himſelf or another concerning the cauſe of a Warre, but let him weigh it with the exquiſite prudence of the principall men, whoſe advices are the more fruitfull of truth, the leſſe they are eſpouſed to affection. A right intention muſt neceſſarily be coveted to a juſt Cauſe, and all theſe things are eſtimated by a ſober and moderate concluſion, or a juſtifiable end. Be ſuch a thought eternally baniſhed from the head and heart of a Chriſtian Prince, that he ſhould array himſelf in a Military poſture to oblige ſome light affections of a luxuriant mind; that he ſhould run on ſlaughters, command the burning of towns, proſecute and ſeem to rejoyce in devaſtations, that he ſhould deſtroy, he ſhould extinguiſh and bury his own glory in the overthrow of others. This is the indelible ignominy of Centaures and the Lapathæ, who in warring ſeek nothing but Warre. The wiſeſt Kings thorow tumults and inteſtine jarres have made a progreſſe unto Juſtice, Equity, and Concord, and being themſelves in Arms have ſacrificed undeſeigning vows to Peace. They think of an Enemy as a Phyſician ſometimes of his Patient, that he muſt be recovered by corroſives and ſharp remedies. Oh that he would have been cured with a diet, or aſſwaged with fomentations! But when againſt the Law and Right of Nations he hath perſiſted in his obſtinacy, and contemned the reiterated offers of compoſing the preſent differences, then you muſt bind, then you muſt cut, then you muſt burn him, yet all this to reſtore, not to exterminate him.

And all things compoſed, behold like the ſcourge of a deadly and deſtructive Warre, a Northern tempeſt rageth in the miſeries of Germany, there they wallow in bloud, and in their night-marches they are conducted by the hideous light of burning Cities, ſome few making a reſiſtance, and all men being aſtoniſhed at the ferall prodigy. The Altars are polluted with ſacrifice, Virgins with rapes, the chains of Church-men are heard louder and further then the drums of their perſecutours; holy things are profaned, and the abomination of deſolation is conſummated, their very King who had appointed them thither being either ignorant of thoſe outrages, or unconſenting.

Now can any man conceive that this was deviſed by a Chriſtian mind? Can it be imagined that he who hath any reverence unto, or ſenſe of Religion can give ſuch directions? It is not credible: ſuch a monſter could not have been brought forth had not hell conceived, the bottomleſſe-pit exhaling the fuliginous vapours, and the devils themſelves torturing mens minds into ſuch uncouth diverſities. All things cannot properly have a reflected reference unto men. The Privado's and Miniſters of Princes are not at all times to be accuſed, as though they had caſt off all humanity, and covered themſelves with brutiſh cruelty. There are certain vagabond and deceitfull ſpirits deſtinated to revenge, who being themſelves loſt in miſery, ceaſe not to comfort their malice by driving others into a participation of thoſe miſeries, which reaſon (greateſt Princes) ought ſo much the more to invite, yea to admoniſh you to leagues of Peace, becauſe our Omnipotent God in his ſecret counſel hath determined to ſubdue Satan by your hands, and to caſt him under your feet.

The higheſt circumſpection and vigilancy are therefore requiſite, leaſt matter be ſuppeditated to the Devil who altogether watcheth for deſtruction from the affections and vices of men. Jealouſie, that tinder of Kingdomes and Nations eaſily taketh fire, if it be fomented onely with an animal wiſdome, and be not mixed with the prudence of the Saints. They who are addicted to one part, ſay, that the Spaniards do too much expoſe their power to Envy, that it is hatefull unto equalls, terrible to inferiours, and if not prevented, deſtructive unto all. There is amongſt them (ſay they) ſuch an epidemicall itch after domination, ſuch intentive and indefatigable cares of their ambition, ſuch a luxurious wit to enlarge their Empire, ſo vaſt a catalogue of Kingdomes and Titles as provokes the emulous, terrifieth their neighbours, and pricketh even thoſe that are removed from them by intervals of diſtance. They apprehend the Dignity of one to preſage the danger of all. They conjecture that the extent of his juriſdiction bodeth an unattempted ſervitude to all Kingdomes: they fear whatſoever the land provideth, and whatſoever monſters the ſea nouriſheth. Greedy Domination that could never yet overcome it ſelf, when it hath once been cherished by Fortune, it unlearneth nature, and forgetteth moderation. Moreover, the temperature of the Nations, as they report, is fiery, hot and dry, swelling with pride, patient of hunger and well enduring labour, thirsty after glory, prone to admire it self, and apt to continue the virtue and valour of other Nations. I produce not these things as the emanations of my own judgement, which for the present is addicted to no Nation but comprehendeth all in Christ, but I commemorate the vulgar reports, and such things as are openly bruted by many, which if they were suppresst by a removall of their Causes, it could cut off the occasions of many controversies.

The French on the other side, as they write who have had knowledge of them, although they are forward to dart reproaches against others, unable to endure them, and most impatient of contempt, yet they know they are of that Nation whereof it was said,

——— Animóque supersunt
Jam propè post animam.

They boast that they filled the world with the fame of their Arms, before the Spaniards could redeem themselves from the diuturnall servitude of the Goths and Vandals. That they have managed the Empire of the East and West, that they have vanquished Constantinople by assault, restored Jerusalem to Christ, and Rome to the Pope seven times deprived of it by his enemies. They affirm that the Gospel was first preached unto them, that the primigeniall adoption of the Sonnes of God was given to them, that they have advanced Learning in all Christian Kingdomes, the whole world almost becoming Students of our Academy at their Paris; in a word, they think they have nothing to be contemned; they are more apt to desire admirers, then able to dispence with contemners. From hence it comes to passe, that both the Nations being prodigall in the accumulations of their own, and envious of the others glory; such flames have of late been kindled, as will, it may be feared, become unquenchable. Would to God that that Charity which is diffused in us by the spirit, would suffocate these superseminated tares of contentions; Oh that it would cut off the occasions of these inhumane strivings! then should we have fewer anxieties, and more supportable labours of heart, knowing by what remedies we might resist so pestilent an evil.

This is frequently augmented by the servants and favourites of Princes, whilst with a familiar, but a direfull glory to the greatest Empires; they desire to boast the power of their Lords; they display all their offensive strength and ability to hurt; they presse a secret beneficence, and whilst they proceed in these ambitious circulations, nay, whilst they bewray a fear, and discover in themselves a caution, by that very sedulity and caution they provoke things not to be feared, and act things not to be tolerated.

Here I appeal to you great Masters of Policy and Participatours of hidden Councels. I speak more willingly to you then to your Fortunes. Consider how much God hath given you, and how much he requireth of you. You sit as Gods among men the Arbiters of mankind; what shall be each mans lot is the verdict of your Dispensations. What good things Felicity intendeth to each individuall person, she pronounceth by your mouths; what Navies must be prepared, what Warres must be prosecuted, what Cities destroyed, what Nations depopulated, are the ambiguous effects of your opinions. You are judges of the fortunes and bloud of men, and of your behaviours and existimation men are judges. God the discerner of all things judgeth of your head at the terrible and inevitable audit. Every one beholdeth many things by the deception of his own sense, uttereth many things from the dictates of affection. I cannot believe what is reported, that so eminent persons blest with such admirable wits, adorned with the glorious gift of prudence, and conscious of this frailty of humane affairs, can think themselves seated in that heighth, to measure all things by the circle of their own advantage, that publick plenty should quit the preheminence to their private profit, that all things should be serviceable to their amplitude, that they should dispose their trust according to the level coyl of love, hatred, and ambition, and that they should sacrifice the bloud of the people to their Fortunes: that they therefore love Warres, and are affected with Divisions and Confusion, hoping thereby to purchase to themselves more beneficiall or honourable commands, to close with an opportunity of treasuring up large summes of money, and by the necessity of their Ministration to wed themselves to a more faithfull office, or to leap into an Authority of a more hopefull permanency; but goodnesse forbid that such sordid, earthly, and narrow cares should be the dishonourable employment of such capacious souls.

I rather believe that you are incited by emulous anhelations after your Masters glory, whereof you have ever been most zealous; ever prepared to retaliate his injuries, to assert his Majesty, and to dilate his Empire, but I beseech you by the immortall God, and by so many beloved pledges of your Kingdomes, to take heed and diligently to beware, lest a supervehement appetite of Glory make them averse from the right pursuit of Glory. You follow Glory by a muddy search, but now all mortall men desire it by a clear acquist. Consider where there is the greatest splendour of celestiall virtues, either in the loud cracks of thunder possessing all men with sudden fear, and when fires and thunderbolts are promiscuously hurl'd about; or in a fair day the air being defecated and serene, and the pleasure of the light dispelling sadnesse from mens hearts? hitherto you have made the power of your Lords sufficiently fearfull, now render it sweet and make it amiable, for therein onely it is invincible. This is not the greatnesse of Princes to be alwayes encompassed with the terrours of his armed men, and busied in warlike preparations, with a fiery mouth to be alwayes denouncing the cruelties of torments and tortures, to condemne these men to fetters, those to the sword, perpetually to carry about him fire and darts, to make his progresse thorow smoaking Cities, over the trampled bodies of half dead men, and to exhaust all things lest they should be exhausted. How much more glorious is it like a fortunate Comet to prevent and exceed the hopes of all men with causes of rejoycing? To repair things ruinous and disordered, to conveigh glad tydings of consolation to the pensive soul, to recollect things scattered, and to reunite things divided. By this heavenly solicitude many Kings lending their succour, not sending their terrour unto the labouring world, have attained unto solid and unshaken honour. What forbiddeth you to follow? what retardeth your emulation? There is one rock which is often to be feared, unto which the cares and cogitations of some Politick men, who differ much from your Piety, do cleave. They think if the administrations of the Publick should be regulated by the law of God, and the judgement of pious men, they would become base, low, and unesteemed; they would be exposed to prey and direption, and is he penitent, I insult not; doth he crave audience, I grant accesse; doth he submit his neck, my mercy shall meet his submission. At the destruction of Cannæ, Hannibal was heard to say, Miles parce ferro: Marcellus wished he could quench the flames of burning Syracusa with his tears: Titus with erected hands and eyes to heaven wept over the prostrate carcasses of the Jews. What should be then the most decent and laudable behaviour of a Christian King towards a subdued and almost suppliant Enemy? Should he strut with pride? Should he inebriate himself with passion? Or should he strengthen his fury to an utter desolation? The more generous beasts abhorre this practice. Vast and inexorable wraths should not cohabit with royall mind; many things are to be pardoned to humane frailty, many things to ignorance, something truly to affection, but all things to repentance. It behoves him to preserve many, even to the prejudice of their obstinate or erroneous wit, neither are all those to be heard that are resolved to perish. Errour illaqueates some men, and Opinion sets the complection upon the procedures of most men; others are ensnared by the counsels of a treacherous vigilancy, and some there are who have no fault but their fortune. His pardon he will extend and communicate to many, whosoever can really desire to obtain from God his own pardon.

wept

Further I adde, that those reasons which are produced as subservient to the attainment of a just end, ought themselves also to be legitimate, otherwise the foundations may be firm, yet the superstructures may totter. That is not good which is not well done, the means we use must be as innocent and unreproveable as our meaning. That which knoweth no mediocrity, I know not how to term a virtue. A depraved intention by a kind of contageous force ever infected the most austere and sacred conduct of affairs; subdolous inventions also and crafty artificers shade and eclipse the beauty of sincere intentions. Grosse and scandalous is their errour, who having proposed to themselves some laudable mark, are little sollicitous of the arrows they shoot. They who have trusted to this footing have (many of them) slipt, and dasht themselves against such a rock of absurdities as hath endangered their brains. I shall instance in those who have thought that health might be innocently purchased from the Devils themselves by the virtue of Magicall forms, and that this is the safety which the Divine Oracles pronounce we may acquire from our enemies. But Paul is peremptory in the confutation hereof, saying, That evil must not be done that good may come thereof. No man is mercifull by thefts, nor charitable by surreptitious gains; no innocent person seeketh convalescence by wicked accommodations. To go to War is lawfull, to kill is lawfull when you are backt with the Authority of your Prince, and seconded with a just Cause; but on the contrary, to do injustice is never not unlawfull. We may incline and bow the ears of the Deity to a condescendence, but we may not sollicit hell for Auxiliaries: we may not contemerate things sacred, nor violate the Divine Charters of the Church; we may not subvert Religion, nor contaminate Chastity; we must not attempt facinorous art, nor invade the lives of Princes with poniards or venomous potions; we ought not to destroy Military Discipline by transgressing the Rights of Warfare, nor adventure upon certain villains to promote a desperate ambition. That Warre ceaseth to be just (however pretended to have a just beginning) when the future events are intermixed with palpable injustice, and being well begun if they degenerate into evil progressions, they ought speedily to have an end.

We are faln by degrees (greatest Princes) upon the matter intended, of which it is your part to judge, and from sound deliberations to provide for the felicity of Christians both Temporall and Eternall. Your Authority is, or ought to be unquestioned, and your dispositednesse of mind and intentions, what can they be in good Princes, but unsuspected: but the Cause is perplexed and involved, yet the Reasons that seem to conspire the end are violent. A fierce and cruel Warre is carried on among you, exercised in the besieging of Cities, acquainted with destructions, terrible for its monstrous spreadings: under which the Church laboureth, the wishes of the oppressed evaporate into sighs, and the convulsed world mourneth; it hath not proceeded in an ordinary way, nor is it continued after a humane manner. Sift out (if you please) the causes, and weigh diligently with your selves the occasions of such an amazing tumult.

If at any time we behold things natural acting within the limits of their prescriptions, this doth not elevate our considerations to a wonder: but when we see them irritated by some vehement impetuosity, or the determined confinements of Natures Law to be perverted, we suspect some hidden force within, which suddenly bursteth forth and is circumfused, from whence such various motions do arise. As often as we see the winds to be ordinarily stirred, we either judge it to be some breath or exhalation, or we conjecture that the air hath a naturall faculty to move it self, lest it should become dull and torpid in an inagitable Globe; but as often as we behold boisterous tempests to arise by the sharp and violent conflicts of the winds, which compell vast trees from their roots, and level strong built houses with the ground, which devour whole navies, and shake the foundations of the world, we ascribe these to the aiery Principalities dissipated through the regions of the Earth. In like manner, when Warres are managed among men in their accustomed forms, we attribute these to the ambitious designs of men, to cholerick temperaments, and to the easie impatience of an objected contumely: but if they exceed proportion and example also, we suspect that there is some undiscovered origin of evils transcending our understandings and astonishing our senses.

He that will duly and sadly weigh the matter, will confesse this of such a cruel Warre; for it is not actuated with a civil mind, neither hath it those decencies and Military ornaments which are wont to accompany great minds, but it is tainted with a virulent malignity which devoureth both parts, and creeping as it were with a slow contabescence, it eats up all things; the Countreys are in a mourning estate, the Cities are dejected, the Bloud of gallant men is prodigally wasted, the choicest flowers of the Nobility are destinated to butchery and the shambles of prevailing Rebels, private Gentlemen are despoiled of almost all their goods, complaints are universall and daily multiplied against Taxes and Exactions, which are the aliment that pampers this prodigious pastime. But no force of treasure is comparable to the greedinesse of the exactours themselves, those gluttons of oppression. The riches of a few men causeth a penury amongst all men; the odious rejoycings of the unjust are saginated with the tears of the miserable. Who is the Architect, the Contriver, the Artizan of all these evils? King Lewis (say they) is the Authour of the Warre. But can a Prince so pious, so chaste, so perpetually cloathed with the fear of God, raise such storms, cause such tempests? Whilst he lived, he daily lifted up undefiled hands to Heaven, was frequently conversant in holy Mysteries, and a common Father of such an exemplary and chastised Conscience, that he could not forgive himself the least contamination, till he had craved mercy from his God, and washt away his pollution with the Sacramentall Bloud: he fought by necessity, he overcame by valour; he was magnanimous in Resolution, famous in Warre, and forward in Peace. Who therefore can conceive that horrid and bloudy Councels tending to the destruction of the whole Christian world, could have had either a conception in, or a welcome into that religious sacrary of his heart? Who can imagine that hatred and grudges, that displeasures and revenge could find an entertainment in his breast. But perhaps the Emperour delights in dissentions, and nourisheth his fancy with the turbulency of Christian affairs. Judgement forbid that any man should believe this; for he is a Prince accomplished with the best endowments, and compounded of equity and ingenuity, vivacity of spirit, and solidity of wisdome. What can be more agreeable to him then with the gentle hand of a Pacificatour to quiet his Germany shaken with such a dreadfull inundation of Warres?

What? Is the King of Spain then the disturber? No man can prove that who hath the most intimate acquaintance with the sense and apprehensions of that great King. For (he if any other) hath a Christian mind, a pleasant wit, more prone to love and concord, then disposed to quarrels and controversies. There is nothing of fierceneſſe or immoderation in him, nothing of malevolence and despight; he is carefull to enjoy his own greatneſſe, careleſſe to exercise an unjust domination.

From whence then floweth all this sea of bloud, if no anger lodgeth in celestiall minds? Who seeth not, that it happens not by humane designment, but that it was hatcht in Tophet, and the Mali Genii of the Nations have cherisht it to this formidable growth, that they might blast our flourishing estate, abate our plenty, and undermine our happineſſe. The Affairs of Christendome were too potent, when the Factions of Hereticks were overthrown: it was their machination to turn our swords reaking with the bloud of our enemies into our own bowels. They raised the commotions in Italy at Mantua, and they broached all the Warres in Germany; they have engaged by a malignant enmity, the principall Crowns of Christian Fame in an implacable Warre, raging with ineffable destructions, the Church mourning, Infidels and carnall men rejoycing, and hell it self triumphing.

In the great vicissitudes of things there hath often intervened a bad mind, which vitiateth the counsels, or retardeth the good determinations of Princes, and diverteth them from taking a right aim at Glory. Scarce had they saluted the skirts of his Dominions, but, being exagitated by factious whirlwinds, the good King recrowned with triumphant Laurels is called into Italy; the Alpes must be penetrated in the depth of winter, a journey must be forced thorow rocks, concealed with snow and lined with armed men, the opposite forces must be intermingled, and battels fought upon all disadvantages; which difficulties being conquered by a wonderfull courage, and an equall felicity, and therefore they devise and trust to other arts of gubernation then God hath prescribed, as if he saw not enough or were careleſſe of his people. They excogitate new, subtil, and crafty wayes of procedure, whereby to augment their own, and entangle the estates of others, and if they can to intermingle and endanger all. They conceive it to be the part of a King to mind themselves alone, to guard and watch the safety of themselves alone, to referre all things to themselves, and to make their way to ample and royall profits, if any opposition come in their way, over the carcasses of their subjects. That truth and falshood know no distinction but with reference to our profit, unto which all the lives of all our actions must be concentrick, and that whatsoever is profitable is onely unlawfull among fools, that an humble and timorous conscience is too importunate in the method of high Counsels. That subjects should be taught to exercise Religion with a scrupulous tenderneſſe, that Princes must practise it, or upon it for advantage. That solid virtue is an hinderance if not lawfull, 'tis the shadow and resemblance of it that is commodious; that honesty is praised, yet freezeth; that nothing is unlawfull to Kings, that is magnificent for the Kingdomes.

This is not, that I may use the words of the Apostle, This is not that wisdom which descendeth from above, but earthy, carnall, diabolicall, which imposeth upon minds bewitched, and involveth Kingdomes in a miserable destruction. Farre different (Excellent Princes) is your reiglement, and vastly opposite is your understanding to these infernall notions. For were it committed to your care to manage the Affairs not of a Christian Empire, but to govern the Kingdome of the Sarazens; yet this Doctrine would occurre from the very Books and Institutes of Heathenish Legislatours, that craft is pernicious to those that turn the globe of Government: that this is humble, and base, and alwayes hatefull, seldome, and never long together advantageous. Whereupon Thucydides the most scientificall Politician, saith, That a Common-wealth is better governed and more prosperously by moderate men, and such as have an indifferent wit, then by the acute and such as are superabundantly industrious. But yet should you act the parts of men exiled from God, and lawleſſe in the world, yet according to humane sense and as is believed, no unprofitable craft, excuse were due to them who have the overseeing of many things, which concern all men. But now seeing that you perceive that your Empires are continued to you chiefly by those things by which they began, who seeth not that Christian Kingdomes are established in Faith, Justice, and Lenity, and that they are subverted by Impiety, Injustice, and Cruelty? Who observes not that those men who stray from the Canons of heavenly Wisdome precipitate themselves into devious enormities and caliginous observations?

Consult if you please the whole body of History, and consider what have been the exits of Tiberians and Herodians, you shall find this to be the pedigree of their everlasting reproach; first, a subdolous and wily mind, a life full of thorny cares and dawning jealousies, brittle and fugitive hopes, certain fears, uncertain counsels, deaths full of calamity, long punishments, fleeting pleasures, posterity, either none, or of no continuance. But on the other side if you please to contemplate the Records of Christian Princes, who have governed their Kingdomes with sincerity of mind, with gentleneſſe of hand, with a prudent moderation, and an invincible integrity, thorow so many crosse accidents, temptations, and discouragements of humane affairs, you may behold Hero's beloved of their own, feared by their enemies, to have lived safe in felicity and accumulated glories, and to have left behind them acceptable pledges of their own virtues for many generations. Therefore casting away the counsels of such an impious and execrable Warre, overcoming the charges of ambition with the comforts of a valiant modesty, and repressing irregular desires by charity, let us make our adresses to God the founder of Safety, and the reconciler of Divisions; for when we despair he can repair, our extremity is the crisis of his opportunity.

But what is it that hath disobliged the desires, frustrated the expectations of all men, and almost tired out the oppressive sighs of the mourning Church with such tedious disappointments? Is it Honour? Is it Wealth? Truly if Honour, it is that which hath ministred not the weakest influence unto the vehement inducements of this Warre; an opinion of contempt should now be cashiered, when the fierce oppositions of two potent Kingdomes are engaged. What affluence can out-age the plenty which either of them may justly justly boast? What is more admirable then their Power? What more undaunted then their Valour? Fortitude, in a cause so miserable, is inded rather to be lamented then desired; worthy the compelled praises of an Enemy, or the dolefull experience of a Sarazen; but being exercised in a mutuall discord among Christians, most undervalued when best extolled, a Spaniard hath no reason to contemne a French-man, nor a French-man to despise a Spaniard; yet either of them hath his advantages whereon to build a wish, that their united strength might be exhibited in a more just contestation, and a better fate.

If the question be concerning your Propriety, it is a businesse so perplexed, that Archesilaus hath long agone determined, that it can never be determined; so that if we contend about the Rights of Kingdomes, Cities, and Families, we shall prove his words to be full of truth, who called it the confusion of things and fortunes, necessarily teeming with eternall jarres, and endlesse disagreements about the assertions. And if all things should be transacted according to the rigour of Justice, we should neither have a King, nor a rich man remaining. If any man therefore were possessed of whatsoever the sagacity of his wit could suggest unto his wishes; whatsoever opinion could fancy, or appetite imagine, let him plead that immense and perplexed Charter of Kingdomes from Nembrotus who first imposed the yoke upon free necks, let him derive it downwards thorow the labyrinthed Successions of so many Ages, or let him calculate upwards digging up his grandfather and great-grandfathers great-grandfather, till by the search of so many Sepulchres he hath wearied the tenacious memory of the desirous, and confounded the prudence of the skilfull: what will he meet with at length but a suppeditation of fresh discord, and fuell for new fires of tumult? Who can be the arbitratour, who the judge to compose such great differences as will result from such involved causes?

The Lord would not divide the inheritance between the Brethren: he that appointed measure to the Heavens, set bounds to the sea, and prescribed a proportion to all the Elements, even he refused to divide the Lamb between the kinsmen, being confirmed, that the avarice of men was contentious and implacable. Therefore if Christ himself should now descend from heaven, neither would he judge and determine your wealth, your interest, your propriety, and fortunes; neither if he would, should he by the umpirage of his impartiall equity define all things according to your sense and will.

What remaineth therefore, but that all Ages be worn out and wasted by infamous and degenerate Warre, the parts and factions being not unequally matched, and both sides most desirous of their ends and interests? But is it so glorious and worthy an enterprise for such great Princes, so pious, so majesticall, and such potent Lords of sea and land, to contend about one city, nay perhaps one castle, and that too almost battered down by the thunder-bolts of warre; nay about the very dust and rubbage, and all this with deadly enmity which can be profitable to none, but hurtfull to many?

I understand, O ye wise and intelligent Counsellours to Princes, what answer you will return to this, that your Interest is herein concerned, and your Honour engaged, lest the propriety of your Masters should be diminished by that League which the whole world expecteth. But I now leave that to be discussed by your prudence and equity, whether the whole Christian world should be endangered in their fortunes, lives, bloud, salvation, and destruction of all things, to give a minister of State, a Kings servant an assurance of some fethery and airy fame and perhaps deepest rooted in his own opinion? What should such elevated souls as yours have for the object of their wishes, but that all things should have a sweet and peaceable composure to the advantage both of Kings and Kingdomes? But if you please, ponder this choice, whether it be not farre better for the Princes Honour, and the utility of his State, to remit somewhat of that tenacity of spirit, and indeclinable rigour of mind, then to subject and expose all things to the violence of fire, and to the advantage of plunderers and murthering thieves? But perhaps you imagine that it is better for Kingdomes to suffer direptions and devastations, then ruine: but what else is devastation then a direfull perdition? 'Tis a miserable comfort to destroy, that you may not be destroyed, and to take the burning of Cities to be felicities compared with rapine; as if you should suppose it to be some goodly thing to die, to avoid death. That body is not lost that may be preserved by the sparing of a single nail. In a great and flourishing Kingdome, nothing doth perish if a small town or a castle be surrendred thereby to purchase a generall peace and lasting tranquillity. Ministers of State lose nothing of their fame if they be reputed the fortunate Peace-makers of the world, rather then the Fire-brands of a Kingdome, and State-barrettours. How many of this tenacious obstinacy and destructive circumspection have the unfortunate people blasted with execrations and defamed with reproaches, because by litigious juglings they had deluded the world into an universall equipage of sorrow and complaint, rather conniving at the destruction of all things, then that they, in the most speechlesse calamity, would part with a toy of Honour to revive a perishing State.

But if any among you shall lend an ear of favourable regard to the complaints of the whole Christian world, and shall stretch out a protecting hand, and shall immolate the resignation of a narrow interest to the Divinity of a generall preservation, doubtlesse heaven it self shall be besieged for an accumulation of blessings upon him. The present Age shall pay tributes of Benevolence to his Person, and posterity shall refresh the memory of his virtues with a reverentiall gratitude. The people will celebrate his praises, and look upon him as the saviour of their Countrey, a beneficent Patriot, and will flock to behold him as the salutary and propitious Planet of their felicity.

This glorious burthen (Greatest Princes) lieth upon your shoulders, you must command, act, enact, and perfect; you must use your servants as the instruments of their publick good. Truly, if you are at leisure to hear that, which without an indelible stain of negligence you cannot refuse to hear, I shall make it evident that the substance of my perswasions is but the Eccho of the voyce of God, indeed the Law and Commandment of God; that your preservation and propriety is comprehended in it, and that the edicts of heaven and the conflicts of all good mens hearts do wonderfully conspier & point to it. And first consider, whether you that have so long resisted Christ the Peace-maker, may not seem to warre against God, rather then to contend with men. For he is our Peace, and hath made of both one; in him he was pleased that all the fulnesse of the God-head should inhabit, and that all things should be reconciled to himself by him, and that through the Bloud of his Crosse our peace should be purchased. Upon his ingresse into the world he brought Peace, by his egresse out of the world he bought Peace. His flesh he suffered to be direfully and inhumanely rent and wounded, but his bones which by so many hidden and intricate connexions represent the Church, he would have untouched; intimating his most vehement desires thereby, thereby, that his Elect ſhould be conſociated in an indiſſolluble tie of concord. And indeed in the Old Teſtament the high Prieſt went not into the Sanctum Sanctorum but with pomegranates faſtned to the skirts of his garments, which inſinuateth unto us that ſtrict ſociety and agreement of the Saints one among another.

When Chriſt had triumphed over Death he ſaluteth his Diſciples with that ſweet and amiable name of Peace; with this the Apoſtles beautifie the entrance into their Epiſtles; with this the juſt are delighted; this lapſed men implore, and by this the Angels triumph. For (ſaith S. Auſtin) Peace is the ſerenity of the mind, the tranquillity of the ſoul, the glue of concord, the cement of affection, the fellowſhip of charity: this is it which taketh away contentions, putteth an end to warres, trampleth down the proud, affecteth the humble, reconcileth the litigant, is delightſome unto all, full of benignity to all, cannot be extolled, cannot be puffed up, ſeeketh no unjuſt poſſeſſion, vendicateth no propriety, teacheth to love that which it knoweth not how to heal. And ſaith Nazianzen, Ubi non eſt pax, non eſt mundus: It is not a world without peace. For according to Simeon it conſiſteth in three things, or to ſay better, ſubſiſteth by three things, Verity, Juſtice, and Peace. Bleſſed are the Peacemakers, for they ſhall be called the ſons of God, ſaith the voyce of Truth. Behold the Adoption and the Name of the Sons of God, whereof ſo many Kings and Emperours have been competitours in deſire, is not promiſed to ſubdued Nations, not bequeated to ſtormed and burnt Cities, not legacied to a deſolate world, but to ſuch as reverence Peace and compoſe the variances of Princes by leagues and Treaties.

Are you not ſometimes poſſeſſed (Beſt Princes) with a trembling fear, when you reach out your hands at the Altar, when you appear at and participate thoſe holy Myſteries, leſt if you put not a period to theſe Wars; the Angels of Peace bitterly weeping ſhould divert their eyes from you, leſt the voyce of Chriſt ſhould cry aloud to you from the Temple, and as often as you ask Peace and pardon with the Church, ſo often he ſhould anſwer, What haſt thou to do with Peace? Thou kiſſeſt my Head and kickeſt my Members. You flatter me with Prayers and perſecute me with ſwords. You have the voyce of Jacob, but you have the hands of Eſau. While you kindle bonefires of outward congratulation and thankfulneſſe to me, you make bonefires of Cities, and exhibit ſad emblemes of your enflamed minds to the world. You ſmell of incenſe, and by your means whole towns are turned into ſmoak, and whilſt you preſent your ſelf a ſuppliant before me, you play the warriour before the world. Your weapons reak not with the bloud of Turks but Brethren. So many miſerable men are ſlaughtered by thy command, and the bloud of thoſe is ſhed by thee for whom I ſhed my bloud. Whilſt you cry to me, thouſands of widows and orphans cry to behold thoſe carcaſſes which now can no more anſwer to the names of husband and father. Whilſt you here erect Altars to me, you elſewhere offer your vowes to your own luſts; you do not ſacrifice but ſinne; whilſt theſe things are acted by your command, or tolerated by your connivence. Bend your mind and not your knees, deceive not the world with a laborious hypocriſie, and make no falſe boaſtings of the portion of my ſpirit, but manacle your own paſſions, and tame your own deceitfull ſpirits, and if you will have pardon, pardon.

Many things (Great Princes) at the beginning are to be pardoned to errour, and many things to a mind agitated with a ſhew or a gueſſe of injury. If ſome Warres be juſt, if ſome be neceſſary, yet whilſt they are protracted, they ceaſe to be what they were, they loſe their innocence by the very diuturnity, and whilſt they increaſe in fury, they decreaſe in cauſe and reputation. Take heed leſt our moſt merciful Lord be offended with the long continuance and the laſting malignity of your undertakings. You are not ignorant with what ſecurity our Saviour enjoyned, a removall of all ſcandalls from his Kingdome, dooming the authours of them to have a milſtone tied about their necks and their bodies caſt into the ſea. I ſhall not indeed be a rigid interpreter of Princes actions, or paſſe a ſpeedy condemnation upon them. But yet we muſt beware leſt ſo many calamities and funerals ſpread further by the very contagion of the hatred, leſt the minds of all pious people be offended, and the ſcoffing tongues of the wicked be ſharpened againſt our Religion. The Gentiles in time paſt were amazed at the Charity of the Chriſtians to ſee how they loved one another, to ſee how they had a mutuall contention of deſires to die for one another. They who wanted the advantage of Faith were allured with the admiration of their virtues. They expected not any profane mixtures nor baſe deſignes from him who had devoted himſelf to brotherly kindneſſe. But now ſhould the Heathen behold brother againſt brother, what elſe could be the ſad harmony of their jubilations, but, ſee how they deſtroy one another; ſee how they butcher one another; ſee how they proſecute and perſecute one another with endleſſe hatred. Either they are without Chriſt or Chriſt is without Peace. It is a hard ſaying, yet hath it more of truth then wonder. The Cauſe of God ſuffereth diminution in theſe diſcords; the Church mourneth for many and horrid things, either the Religion we profeſſe accuſeth our errours, or we the Profeſſours accuſe our Religion. By us Infidels inſult over the Elect, the Profane over the godly, the Jews over Chriſt, and Barbarians over the Church. If our honour be cheap in our own valuation, why do we betray the Honour of God? why do we batter his inheritance?

Moreover, to what ſhort conſideration is it not evident that Chriſtian diſſentions have been alwayes the occaſion of Heatheniſh rejoycings? Whilſt our own Armies are conflicting one with the other, the Turks have taken Rhodes from us, and uſurped Conſtantinople. May we not think it a miraculous indulgence of our mercifull God, to divert ſo potent and cruel an enemy from our deſtruction by engaging him in the Perſian Warre? But this is much to be feared, leſt if ſuch whirlwinds of wrath continue among us, he ſhould flie upon the torn and ſcattered remainder of our Kingdomes with fury and violence. It is alſo to be feared leſt the Providence being ſo often provoked by our renewed injuries ſhould caſt us out as a prey to the roaring and the ravenous lion. The greateſt Empires have been often loſt in ruine for the ſame cauſes, and the ſame offences, and the wicked Kings have been ſubjected to a forreign domination, their poſterity hath been cut off, and all their glories have vaniſhed into a reproachfull ſcoffe. What conſtant glories have they poſſeſſed, what dry deaths hath the check of Providence allowed them, by whoſe means it hath come to paſſe, that the Kingdome of Chriſt hath devolved into the hands and power of the Sarazens?

Adde to theſe things (O you Princes!) the unregarded grievances of your Subjects, and the laborious ſervitude of your people. Neceſſity compels you to devour your own members, that you get into your graſp the members of another. Such a numerous people as the omnipotent God hath delegated to your care and piety, that they ſhould be kneaded and compounded into one ſubſtantiall felicity by Peace and concord, by holy laws and religious adoration of the Deity, are either either exposed as unfortunate and succourlesse oblations to the fury of their enemies, or groan under the pressures of taxations, and are tilted in their fortunes by the unappeased and insatiable avarice of exactours. Those who have escaped the Sword, Famine depopulates by lingring deaths, or else they live oppressed under some tyrannous calamity. They are sequestred from light and conversation; they have neither countrey, nor habitation, neither rest, nor food. Fecundity, the most desired blessing of their former hopes, is now both hated and feared, because they cannot leave an inheritance of good things to their children, they would not propagate them to become heirs of misery. That life which they have been carefull to preserve amidst so many dangers, they now detest, as unprofitable to you, uncomfortable to themselves. To be plundred of all things at once is their deliberate wish, lest every day they should be plundred. But in the mean time they are infested with a diversity of evils, the amission of all things, and the capitation of each particular thing: an Excise upon every thing, an undoubted property in nothing. They fall under the cruel command of necessity, where they are neither permitted to live with the honest, nor to die with the quiet: they are made gazing-stocks to others, and are formidable to themselves, whilst their estates perish to themselves, their affections are lessened to you, which formerly adorned and confirmed your Crowns with a loyall valour.

Consider (Greatest Princes) that next to the Honour and Worship of God, the most supreme Law that binds you, is the safety of the People. It was once the speech of a valiant Emperour, Non mihi sed exercitui sitis: You are not so much born for your selves as for your subjects. Their cares if you be wise must be your crosses, their oppressions your burdens, their miseries your infelicities, and their discouragements your complaints. What doth it advantage disconsolate men, to be defended from the expectations of a greedy enemy by being rifled and impoverished by those of his own Nation; He is a miserable Pastour from whom the tutelary Gods of the flock require more things then wolves can devour.

But this is the soul of misfortune, the estate being exhausted, the mind is dejected, and the virtues are disheartned; the Laws are silent among Swords, the Blasphemer and the Hypocrite have the uncontrolled liberty of speaking; Sword-men licenciously swagger, Robbers and Plunderers are the onely Ranters; Murderers are the merry-men, and all variety of lust is predominant; the beauty of Churches is disgraced and sullied with Sacrilegious hands; Altars are overthrown; Justice is vilipended, and Injustice blusheth in scarlet robes; Religion fainteth, Piety languisheth, Charity is counted scandalous; and not onely all things are perverted, but perverse things are neglected, as if it were expedient that things should be so, necessity that fruitfull mother of impieties so commanding.

And if you will reflect upon your own affairs, I beseech you (Princes) among so many funeralls of Warre, what can be pleasant to you? You must stirre the earth, adde disquiet to the sea, and by many dangers you must arrive at greater danger. Death that is obvious to every person must be sought for by hard labours; no erroneous or reproveable course indeed if a happy Peace were unfeignedly pursued. Many things are unfaithfull at home, infested abroad; great Armies are hard to raise, costly to maintain, easie to be destroyed; the fate of Battels is common, and the chance of Warre uncertain. Prosperity doth not satisfie, adversity striketh with a steep wounding dart, and pierceth the very heart. Many times victories themselves are the seeds of new contentions, the brooding of new sorrows. It is not lawfull for them that are up to keep their station, nor for those that were overcome to lie still. Discords increase with a prodigious fertility being once begun, and many times the conquered draw the Conquerours, and an inconcocted excesse of fortune obstructeth all their glories; all things are intermixt with fear that depend upon expectation. Many times fallacious events delude well-grounded hopes, and horrid Catastrophe's befall the desperate. The ingresses of Warre are troublesome, the progresses doubtfull, the egresses commonly deplorable. Many is exhausted to make good the baffles of force by underming fraud; lost Commanders are lamented, to whom nothing was wanting but immortality. Cyprus disappoints the Laurel, and Funerals are distinguished by Palms. The Conquerours stand over the ruines of the oppressed, being themselves wasted by the expence of bloud and strength, and nearer to their Tombs then Triumphs. You would believe that a Kingdome were destroyed, did you not believe that the enemies were destroyed. How much better were it for Peace-makers to make use of the indulgence of Fortune, rather then so often to provoke the departures of the Fates against your selves.

Certainly, if there be any consideration of the value of a Christian Title, if there be any commiseration of humanity, the afflicted condition of all Nations that fight for Christ ought to move you. And it must needs be an object full of bitter anguish to see a Nation worried to ruine by fraternall discords, which Christ hath espoused to himself by a peculiar Election. Germany, that mother of fruitfulnesse, that advancer of Learning, and shop of Warre, is now full of mourning, the countrey being unmanured, many gallant cities being to be sought where the cities themselnes flourished, so many men being slain, so much wealth consumed, so-many Churches demolished, is now the miserable mirth of Fortune dancing in her ashes. Lotharingia overcame Jerusalem with calamities, and brought upon her more then all barbarity could execute, or all misery could undergo. The Low-Countreys are alarm'd with an anniversary contention, and is drawing on among the slow Funerals. A hidden poison hath invaded England, and engaged her in a blind and unexpected Warre. Spain so long victorious, so long free from jarres and tumult, alwayes impatient of slavery, and a stranger to want, is assaulted to the very throat. Fear hath journied over the Alps and possessed Rome. Fury had disordered Italy, and unlesse the Princes by prudent Counsels and sagacity of wit had re-compoled the distractions, it was justly to be feared that when they had made a solitude, they would have called that Peace what is undisturbed? what is not miserable? Si tu victrix provincia ploras: If thou O France mourneſt which hast so often triumphed over thine enemies, and in a deep sense of misery groaneſt to feel the darts pulled out of thine own bowels which must be thrown against others. What do barren Laurels profit such as are sick and languishing among the rapines of their goods and estates? To what purpose is it to hold flowers to the nostrils when the body is wasted and parched with such violent fevers? It is a malignant kind of solace for one man to compute his felicity by the increase of anothers grief. Nothing is safe, nothing pleasant amidst such calamities, where the worst of evils is the rejoycing. The whole head is sick, and the whole heart is heavy, from the sole of the foot unto the crown of the head, there is nothing whole therein, but wounds, and swelling, and sores full of corruption, they have not been wrapped, nor bound up, nor mollified with oil.

On that same man who is powerfull in the conduct of this wotlds affairs, and can dive into the secret of these controversies, could in a clear prolpective behold the Christian world gasping under so many direfull perplexities, doubtlesse it would pierce his soul, and he would condemne himself of cruelty did he not procure her restauration. Hard are those ears that bow not at these considerations; harder are those eyes that can behold them without some moist testimonies of sorrow.

I shall tell you (Best Princes) that which chiefly concerneth your interest, I shall shew you that which comprehendeth both the augmentation and the glory of your Dignity. I wish your Kingdomes seted upon foundations as firm as rocks: I wish your Cities may continue obedient; all your Subjects obsequious; and all things calm and even in your domesticall negotiations. Yet it is well worth a serious fear, left those people who are apprehensive of their hard condition under Kings, and see the neighbouring Common-wealths enjoy so much lenity and freedome, do begin to hate Monarchy, and (which is absolutely unlawfull) conspire to withdraw their Obedience, that they may acquire a redemption from their evils by the temptation of Liberty.

The se things were writtenlong since, which of late have been verified by many sad events.

Certainly it is very unequall and unjust that at this day Common-wealths alone should inherit peace and plenty, and Christian Kingdomes should labour under generall convulsions, and be wasted with unheard of lacerations. The rigorous strictnesse of Empire, the tuning of the strings too high in Government doth sometimes crack them and dissolve great Empires, a hard servitude hath not seldome instructed a Nation into Liberty. When the inquinated times of the Hebrew Kings were past, and the Jews were now returned from a long Captivity, there arose in them an aversation to Kingly Government; and almost for five hundred years no man durst think of a Diadem before Aristobulus, who rather usurped then received it; neither was it established upon a firm basis, for his unfortunate posterity did not long enjoy it.

Cecrops reigned in Athens in the dayes of Moses, whom seventeen Kings succeeded; some grew insolent, some negligent, and these perpetuall Governours were dethroned: for when it was observed that the djuturnity of Regall Power flattered them into a security of their excesses, the Government was reduced to ten years continuance.

These were Magistrates in office like unto the Tribunes among the Romans, and the Spartans and Lacedemonians used to appeal from the King to them, as did the Romans from the Consuls to the Tribunes. At the first they were chosen like our Parliament men to be advisers about affairs and assistants to the King, but in a short time their authority overtopped the Kings power.

The Kings of Sparta also luxuriating in their glories, and made wanton by felicity, were soon dismantled of them both. Lycurgus tempered the Scepter by a wise institution of twenty eight men called Senatours. Afterwards to this number of the Senatours there was added the Ephori with too much priviledge against Kings, and hatefull to all men.

Rome from the beginning was governed by Kings, the last whereof (which were the two Tarquins) ruling that warlike Nation with pride and petulancy, by great force and perpetuall disgrace they were expelled from their Magistracy, leaving almost an everlasting odium against the Regiment of Kings.

It would be too impertinent to reckon up the Antient times, we our selves have seen in our dayes how many a rigid domination hath sacrificed to the Peoples fury, who having endured all things, have learned from thence to dare to attempt all things, and those Kingdomes which for a long time they suffered under, they have at length usurped by cruel and lasting Warres. Farre be it from your Subjects to entertain any such perversity of thought, and farre from you also be contempt and rigour, left the Divine hand bring to passe that which few fear, none dare attempt, and all abhor. Transmit therefore (O ye Princes!) comfort to the wearisome, and Peace to the troubled, upon which all wishes are bent, in which all people are blessed.

Behold at length there is given unto us by the singular gift of God a good Pope, a man of blamelesse life, of consummated understanding, of a great mind, and extremely zealous, he is as the Wise-man said as the rain-bowe that is bright in the fair clouds. This is he, whom after so many storms, so many tempests, and such a deluge of Christian bloud, God seems to exhibit as a restorer of things, a Peace-maker to the world, an avenger of evils, and a bestower of blessings. And indeed this is not done by humane counsel, but by the gubernative reason of God which is his Providence, that he might demonstrate to the world by no vain auguries, that to this man as to the Patriarch Noah the tops of the mountains should appear, the waters of strife and the flouds of contention being dried up. This I suppose is that dove with silver wings, and whose hinder parts glittered as the purest gold, whereof the Prophet spake.

Innocentius hath ever shined brighter then silver by the candour and uprightnesse of his mind, but now the latter parts of his life promise a golden Age unto the world. He doth not sit idle amidst the complaints and mournings of the Church, he doth not revel in an uncircumspect and lazy greatnesse, but with unwearied pains and a mind alwayes vigilant, he is intent upon illustrious cares for Christ and aimeth at the consolation of mankind, The amiable name of Pamphilius is delightfull unto all men, and delightfull is the name of Innocentius so often consecrated to the salvation of men.

Innocentius the first extinguished Alaricus boasting himself in the prey of the Roman Empire with his prayers, and by his splendour re-beautified the face of the eternall City when it was infuscated with the sooty vapours of a brutish Warre.

Innocentius the second dissipated the Schism of the counterfeit Anacletus, and with the co-assistance of S. Bernard, composed the Christian world when it was disunited with great discords.

A pure white dove fore-shewed the inauguration of Innocent the third by flying to his side; without doubt designing the solicitous endeavours whereby he laboured to consociate all Christian Princes by firm Leagues one with another, and to exasperate them against the common enemy of Religion.

Innocentius the fourth came to Lyons, that he might reconcile the irregular tumults in the Church, and that by his authority he might remove Frederick the Emperour that fomented many things and disturbed all things.

Innocentius the fifth was no sooner crowned, but presently he addicteth his mind to pacifie the Cities of Italy, and being by such pious determinations immortall in glory, he spent his short Pontificate in a fatherly care of his people.

Innocentius the sixth when the flame of a destructive warre devoured France and England, stood stoutly for the House of God, and with a great spirit laboured for Peace with John and Edward at that time the Kings of the Nations.

Innocentius the seventh mounted not otherwise to this pitch of supreme Dignity, but by a faithfull endeavour constantly transacted to reconcile the Princes and appease the cities of Italy, which a malignant force of discord had precipitated into imminent destruction.

Innocentius the eighth was most desirous of Peace among Christian Princes, and could not without some motions of impatience see any go to warre but upon the most important and importunate causes.

Innocentius the ninth when before his Pontificate he was the Apostlicall Nuntio of Gregory the fourteenth, staying six years among the Venetians, conjoyned them both in Arms and Armies with the Pope, and Philip the second King of Spain, and irritated them against the Turk; whereupon that most famous victory of Naupactus broke the boldnesse of the Sarazens, and after a wonderfull manner improved the conduct of Christian Affairs.

them

Oh how is the name of the Innocents born and consecrated unto Peace! Oh joyful appellation unto Christians! The Tenth will accomplish what the nine have attempted, so much the greater, as this number is the more noble.

Go on thou dove of Innocence, display thy silver wings, flie over both earth and sea, view the world, shew forth in all places the celestiall olive, give Peace so ambitiously desired, and by such constant expectations wished, give Peace I say so often called for, and to be implored of thee the Anointed of the Lord, or else at this time it must be despaired of.

What remaineth (Greatest Princes) but that you grant that to our Petitions which you have hitherto denied to our Reasons: Whatsoever restraineth passion, whatsoever can appease an armed man in fury, doth now run towards you in one troop, that so it may be honourable for you to be thus intreated, and shamefull for you not to yield to these intreaties.

Behold the Pope the Pastour and Parent of the whole Church stretcheth out friendly hands unto you, and when he might command, intreats you; almost forgetting that he is the Pope, he becomes an humble suppliant: A man dear to heaven, and born for great enterprises: Worthy in all places to bear the felicities of the world about him, amidst all his exalted prosperities is your Petitioner, that Divine wit equall to his heighth, feels a colluctation with these burdens, and in a vigorous and circumspect old age is grieved by you. The bowels of a Father are urged, who is as often fruitfull in the generation of children, as he desires those children to be reconciled to Peace. Be ashamed not to hear him, whose predecessour Attila would hear. He is full of dayes, honour his grey hairs; he is a Father, acknowledge his Charity; he is the Pope, be observant of his Dignity. God forbid that he like meek Jacob should be compelled to say, Simeon and Levi are brethren in iniquity; Let not my soul participate of their counsels, and in their company let not my glory come: Cursed be their fury because it is obstinate, and their indignation because it is cruel.

The whole Church lamenteth with her Pope, in times past triumphing, now deformed, full of filth, now bedewed and almost drowned in tears, and tired under cares and sorrows. He beseecheth you, that you would not suffer the Ammorites and the Moabites to insult in your destructions. Prevent the petulancy of such an objection, that even Barbarians did reverence him, and yet he had Parricides to his sonne. How often have we seen the Priests at Jubilees prostrate in the Sanctuary with ejulations? How often have we beheld Religious persons wearying the Altars with unwearied prayers? How often have we seen the well-disposed Virgins imploring the aid of heaven by frequent sighs? How often have we gladly beheld the Devout multitude crouding the Church to pour forth their wishes? Of what quality and complexion is that rigour, that, which God avert, will not hear the whole world? How is the metall of their souls compounded, that would make heaven iron unto us, and almost noxious, whilst it either seemeth not to hear, or what it heareth to contemne.

To be never free from Warres they think is either for the publick profit or for their own: if for the publick, let them hear S. Augustine crying out, That felicity acquired by Martiall exploits is alwayes a brittle perishable beauty, and whether it receive the tincture and complexion from Civil or Hostil bloud, yet it is the bloud of man, which is alwayes mixt with a benighting paleneſſe, or darksome fear, and a cruel desire. And again, that all humane Affairs are then seated in the best station of felicity, when small Kingdomes are joyfull in Concord, Piety, and Unity of Religion. And in a third place he hath this excellent saying, Without doubt it is better to have the friendship of a good neighbour, then to subdue a contentious bad neighbour. They are evil wishes to desire to have whom you hate, or whom you fear, as he may prove whom you overcome. If they judge it profitable for themselves to prolong the Warre, truly they are most unjust, who place the tears of a torn and ragged world amongst their felicities; most miserable of all men are they, who cannot be happy but by the miseries of other men.

He must needs be (saith Homer) without friend, without affinity, without law, and without God who is a lover of Warre rather by choice then chance, rather by will then necessity. He is the most poor also who is rich by the calamity of all men. How many who have alwayes been of a froward, contentious, and fighting wit, have themselves been tortured with those pains and furies which they raised against others? Achitophel, that busie contriver of the Jewish warre between the Father and the Sonne, paid himself the just wages of his traiterous counsels with an infamous halter. The revenging hand of God fell upon Alcimus that traitour and fire-brand, and counterfeit Priest among the Jews. Alexander of Macedon whilst he makes the end of one Warre the beginning of another, being impatient of rest, and ever greedy after new bloud, whilst he thrusts his Souldiers into battels beyond the progresse of the sunne and the limits of the sea, he perished by poison given by his domesticks, to whom he began to grow odious for his excessive appetite to Warre. He was taken away (as they say) a green God, lest he should further vex the world with arms, who should have obliged it by benefits. Hannibal whilst he weaveth inextricable webs of Warre, a dishonourable old age surpriseth him, solitude rejected him, society shunn'd him, therefore to shorten the date of these contempts, he ends his dayes by voluntary poison. The Romans that were Conquerours of the world, alwayes full, yet alwayes covetous, whilst they remove the Temple of Peace without their gates, they felt the hands of all men conspiring against them, and seven times was this Mistresse of Cities taken whereof Sybil had said, ἔσσεται ῥώμη ῥώμη, Rome shall be made a Village.

Cardinall Baronius cites a little Book witten by Carolus Crassus the Emperour, of a Vision presented unto him three years before he reigned, wherein he declareth that he beheld in the infernall places many souls of Princes and Bishops, who had fomented controversies and fed the rage of Warres, to be tormented with most dreadfull pains. At the same time, as this most learned Cardinall writeth, Italy and France were agitated and afflicted with direfull factions, but what was worse, and indeed monstrous, the Bishops and Abbats went forth armed to the battels, which execrable custome when it long prevailed in France, from thence it came to passe that the most flourishing Provinces were all laid waste with externall and Civil Warres. But what was most detestable of all, these Churches warriours are commended by the Writers of those times for this Ecclesiasticall gallantry and Spirituall valour, when indeed they were rather to be abhorred as the violatours of the ſacred Canons, deſpiſers of their Order, and deſertours of their Paſtorall duty: thus Baronius.

Likewiſe Julian a Clergy-man was the authour and promotour of that Varvenſian ſlaughter, which of all other was the moſt to be lamented by the Chriſtian world, who when he had contributed his perſwaſions for a countenance of the Warre againſt the League, he expoſed infinite companies of our ſide to the inſulting fury of the Turks, he himſelf being alſo ſlain with the young King of the Sarazens. Thus Nemeſis purſueth bloud-thirſty and contentious ſouls, not ſuffering thoſe to be at reſt, who ſollicited others into diſorder who would have been at reſt. A watchfull eye abides in heaven, ever active, never weary, who perpetually contemplates the deeds of men, and equally diſpenſeth to every one his deſervings. They that were long happy receive their portion, and they who ſeem to be diſmiſſed are onely dilated. Theſe things being put in ſo illuſtrious an example will they nothing move? will they effect nothing?

Will brethren ſuffer themſelves again to ruſh upon one anothers weapons? Or will you O Princes! and ye O Clergy-men! encourage brethren to pull down tottering Kingdomes with more deſtructions? Wo and alas! Will brethren forgetfull of their covenant, forgetfull of their name, and unmindfull of their relations thus rage beyond the world, and kill thoſe they cannot hate? But ſome will ſay, this reaſon of bloud and alliance is inconſiderable, and very unapt to procure a Peace: for Kings have Subjects, but kinſmen and conſanguinity they have none. O cruel ſpeech! O enemy of mankind! O parricide of nature! there muſt needs be a heap of groſſe impieties, where there is an oblivion of the greateſt Charities. Where Chriſt is baniſhed, and love finds no habitation, there is either no Government, or ſuch as borders upon ruine. The Turkiſh Empire that is eſtabliſhed upon wickedneſſe and cemented with bloud, may for a time ſubſiſt with wickedneſſe. God appointing them to be the rods of his fury for our chaſtiſement: Chriſtian Empires which were rooted in Faith and Piety, and wanting the ſap of Religion and Juſtice to nouriſh them, have abandoned themſelves to the infamous counſels of Machiavilians, muſt unavoidably periſh, ſo prepoſterous a mind lodgeth not in pious Princes; the voyce of nature ſometime or other will be heard, Chriſt will have a reſurrection in the minds of all men, Charity will revive, and at length ſome Peace-maker will ariſe and atone the labouring world.

Now there hath ſhined round about us a moſt fortunate King and a moſt ſweet Infant born for the Peace of Kingdomes, and the worlds advantage. By how many Prayers was he obtained? and with what vehemence of ſoul was he ſollicited? how often hath he provoked our deſires? how often hath he raiſed our hopes, and waſted them with delay when they were raiſed, and renewed them when they were waſted? Great things move ſlowly: He had done leſſe, had he made more haſte. He lay concealed from the inhabitants of the earth in the ſecret Majeſty of the Fates, but now by the Dictates of heaven he is known unto us. He was fore-ſhewed unto us long before he was, and not being yet conceived, he filled the world with Prophecies, and deſigned his approaches by a prevolant fame. At length the deſired Infant came forth in that moneth which they call the moneth of the Valiant, by the prerogative of a great mind. He was born when the Sun obtained the middle part of Virgo, or Aſtræa, for he was to govern the world with the moderation of Laws. He aſcended with Lyra, being to make a harmony and conſort of publick tranquillity. And if Scorpio did at the ſame time ſhew forth his ſting, he threatned the Sarazens, and promiſed the Idumean Palms to him that ſhould be born, ſo often dignified by the Valour of his Anceſtours. The heavenly habitations rejoyced at his birth, and the whole world welcomed the new-born Babe with joy. Now no man thought himſelf miſerable at this happy birth; now no man thought himſelf happy whom that birth did not make ſo. Upon that day France wiped away all the ſoot of Warre, and ſhined clearly with refulgent enſignes of Peace. We had that day as many proſperities as bone-fires, and as many bone-fires as there are ſtarres.

O Lewis, beloved of God, whom he ſeemeth to have regenerated in his ſonne that very moneth wherein he was born! O Anne! late indeed the mother of a ſonne, yet alwayes a fortunate mother, in bringing forth a ſonne not onely to her ſelf, nor ſo much to her ſelf as to all France. He hath much of his Father, and much of his Mother, and by this very confuſion he maketh the image of them both more grateſull and more amiable.

This new Iſaac will make thee laugh O France! and whom thou canſt ſcarce hear ſpeaking, hereafter thou ſhalt ſee comforting. How many chains will thoſe tender hands burſt aſunder? How many priſons will they open? How many obſcurities will thoſe little eyes enlighten? How many monſters will the feet of this Infant ſubdue and trample on? Be ſilent ye waves, be ſilent ye tempeſts and rages of the ſea at the beck of ſuch a gentle Prince, and reſtore unto the world that ſerenrty whereof you have deprived it. Ye heavenly Powers lend him long unto the earth, and whom you have made ſo healthfull to the Nation, make him alſo laſting. Ye Fates keep off your hands, and touch not this child but to aſſiſt him. Let him tranſcend the years and actions of his Anceſtours, and being born mortall may he apprehend nothing but what is immortall. May he love, and deſire to be beloved, ever fearing to be feared. Let the oppreſſed find him a deliverer; may the unjuſt feel him an avenger; may his enemies know him to be of a warlike ſpirit, and may his Subjects atteſt him to be of a peaceable mind. This Nativity raviſheth all my ſenſes which I foretell ſhall be the beginning of an eternall Peace unto us. Look down from above, O Lewis upon ſuch a ſonne! Look upon him all ye Chriſtian Kings as your little Nephew; give reſt to wearied things, let arms be ſilent at the command of ſo great a Prince, ſo potent an Oratour, nor let the tumults of Warre rock this royall cradle.

To you again, (Great Princes) I wholly turn my ſelf, by whatſoever is dear, I ask, by whatſoever is holy, I beſeech you, give peace to them that beg it, or muſt beg without it; give tranquillity to the world ſighing under ſo many feveriſh miſeries. Make it appear unto us that you choſe rather to be the Pacificatours of the world, then the Subverters of your own Kingdomes. There is a ſtory how in that fatall War between the Engliſh and the French, continued with laſting contentions and horrible ſlaughters, a pious Anachoret inſtigated thereunto by God, came unto the Courts of the two Princes, that he might compoſe theſe ferall diſcords between them. But being ſlighted in the Engliſh Court and negligently repulſed, this deſpiſed but not deſpicable Augur, pronounced many direfull accidents that ſhould befall that Nation. But travelling to Charles of France, and finding him to be a prince of a gentle wit, and inclined to conditions of Peace, he foretold, that the Kingdome being recovered he ſhould have the Dolphin to be his ſucceſſour, who, as he was the child of many hearty deſires, ſo he ſhould prove the instrument of many joyfull enterprises. The prophecy is inpartpart fulfilled with a prosperous event, so tenderly God loves the sons of Peace accumulated with a fluence of all good things.

prove

Whoe're he be, let him beware that shall resist and strive against the peaceable wishes of all men: some grievous hand will fall upon him and his from heaven: he shall meet with unhappy events in all his undertakings, his life shall be certainly troublesome, his death doubtfull. Best and greatest Princes, consider and think with your selves that what losse soever can be pretended to happen by this league of Peace, whatsoever can detract from your Honour or your Empire, is recompenced unto you in the most fortunate advantages of the whole Christian world. This is rich indeed, this is magnificent, this truly Royal and to be propagated to the memory of all Ages.

Remember that you are Christians and govern Christians: be you propitious like Gods unto men, if you desire that God should be propitious unto you. Whatsoever you enjoy of life is slippery and uncertain, and your Dignities are full of frailty; it is your Justice that hath reference to your Felicity, and it is your Virtue that links you to Eternity. There is a great and conspicuous Tribunall that expects you, there sits a Judge cloathed with purest light to summon you, unto whom the most secret things are revealed, whom the most involved and disguised actions cannot deceive, nocan he be overcome by perversities. Before him must appear the souls of Kings devested of body, fortunes, Empires, and be they just or unjust they must be examinedby a most clear light. There you shall hear the Edicts of the supreme Deity, and the King of kings thundering in your ears: the groans of the oppressed shall cry against you; the tears of the poor shall speak against you; the tutelary Gods will plead for their Altars which you have broken down, and all the heavenly Militia will rise together against the contumacious. Endeavour ye pious, and alwayes invincible Princes. that those things which have been committed in prejudice of your willsby the uncontroulable licence of War, may be corrected by your Equity, that they may leave no aspersion upon your Reignes, no stain upon Reputations, no blot upon your Persons. Bring to passe that Justice and Peace may meet in mutuall embracements, let them be carried with triumphall pomp thorow your Kingdomes, and thorow your Cities, let them be born upon the shoulders of the whole world unto fixed and etemall seat, that it perpetually may be lawfull for us to worship and reverence them at the monuments of your goodnesse, and the pledges of our felicity.

Pax super Israel Dei.

FINIS.

AN ALPHABETICALL TABLE

Setting down the moſt obſervable Matters contained in the two laſt TOMES of the HOLY COURT.

Abiathar the high Prieſt deprived of his dignities by a violent action. 152
The wiſdome of Abigail. 142
The inſolence of Abner. 144
He treateth with David. 145
His death. ibid.
Abſolon out of favour. 147
His reconciliation by means of Joab. ibid.
Abſolons revolt. ibid.
His deſigns, ibid.
His Ambition. 148
He cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed King. ibid.
He giveth battell to his Father, wherein he is overthrown and killed. 149
We muſt not condemn him that by lawfull means ſeeks his own Accommodations. 46
Achior his oration. 182
It is pleaſing to Holophernes and his ſouldiers. ibid.
The pernicious counſell of Achitophel. 148
Adonijah competitour of the Crown and his faction. 151
The fault of Adonijah in his Councell of State. ibid.
Adonijah deſired the Shunamite which did complete his misfortune. 152
Adonis an admirable fiſh. 38
A good deed done to a great one in Afflictions is of much value 142
what are the ſubjects of Afflictions. 57
The diſpoſitions of Ages. 19
The death of Agrippina. 273
Ahab goeth to meet Elijah in perſon. 249
He deſireth Nabaths Vineyard, 251
His death. 253
Ahaſhuerus his banquet, which continued for the ſpace of one hundred and fourſcore dayes. 188
Alcimus the falſe high Prieſt. 199
Amantius plotteth againſt Juſtinian. 58
A notable obſervation of Clemens Alexandrinus. 83
The courage we may derive from the Sacrament of the Altar. 80
Shallow and fantaſtick Ambition. 13
The Ambition of Eccleſiaſticks and Religious men much more ſubtle then others. ibid.
Crodield daughter of king Caribert, a religious woman raiſeth great troubles by her Ambition. ibid.
Ambition which buddeth in hearts of baſe extraction is moſt inſolent, which is inſtanced in a Chirurgion of S. Lewis, is wiſely repreſſed and chaſtiſed by the prudence and juſtice of King Philip the third of France. 115
The French revengers of Ambition. ibid.
The furious Ambition of Alexius the Tyrant of Greece, puniſhed by the valour and juſtice of the French. 116
Ambition the beginning of all evils. 292
The effects of Ambition and envie. ibid.
The fury and infidelity of Ambition. 296
The inhumane cruelty of Ambition. 297
What Amity is. 5
Three ſorts of Amity. ibid.
Naturall Amity and its foundation. ib.
Amity of demy-gods. 6
Amity grounded upon honeſty. ib.
Men too endearing uncapable of Amity. ib.
Men baniſhed from the Temple of Amity. ib.
Reaſons for which women do ſeem uncapable of Amity. 7
Degeneration, Amity. 8
There may be ſpirituall Amities between perſons of different ſexes, endowed with great virtue and rare prudence. 9
Amity in S. John Chryſoſtome. 10
The right ſtains of Amity are forgetfulneſſe of friends, negligence, contempt, deſſention, ſuſpition, diſtruſt, inequality, impatience and infidelity. 11,12
Six perfections which preſerve Amity. ib.
Bounty a true note of Amity. 13
The benefits of Amity. ib.
Patience moſt neceſſary in Amity. 14
There may be a celeſtiall Amity by the commerce of man with God. 22
What Anger is. 86
Divers degrees of Anger. ib.
Three Regions of Anger, the firſt of ſharp choler, the ſecond of bitter choler, the third of fury. 87
Remedies againſt theſe three ſorts of Anger. ib.
The propertie of the Yew-Tree like unto Anger. ib.
Anger is very prejudiciall in military art in a Generall. 118
Philip of Valois a great and generous King looſeth a battell out of a pieviſh humour of Anger. ib.
The barbarous Anger of Bajazet. ib.
Lewis the younger admoniſhed by Bernard chaſtiſeth himſelf for his Anger by ſadneſſe and penance. ib.
Anger of women. ib.
Anger out of ſimplicity many times cauſeth hurt for a word too free, witneſſe that of Enguerrand. ib.
The humility and wiſdome of Queen Anne to overcome the paſſion of Anger. 120
Addreſſe of Bavalon to appeaſe the Anger of the Duke of Brittaign. 121
Anaſtatius dying, Amantius his high Chamberlain aimed at the Empire. 158
Antonina wife of Belizarius proſtituted herſelf to Theodoſius whom ſhe and her husband had made their adopted ſon. 164
Antiochus his horrible cruelty. 197
The death of Antiochus. 01
How we ought to govern our Antipathies. 246
A notable ſentence of the Areopagite. 2
The notable practiſe of S. Athanaſius. 10
The Eſſence and nature of Averſion. 45
How Averſion is formed. ib.
The character and true image of a ſpirit ſubject to Averſion. ib.
The conſideration of the love which God bears to his creatures is a powerfull remedy to cure Averſion. ib.
The firſt motions of Averſion for the moſt part are inevitable. ib.
The example of our Saviour ſerveth for a ſtrong remedy to ſweeten our Averſions. 47
It is a ſhame to have an Averſion againſt one for ſome defect of Body, or ſome other deformity of nature, when as we are bound to love him. ib.
A generous act of a Pagan, who teacheth us powerfully to to command our Averſions. ib.
The death of Azael by his raſhneſſe, 144

B

THe Prophets of Baal are murthered. 250
The Baſilisk cannot be enchanted. 10
The love of Batſheba. 145
Bathſheba fitly inſinuates her ſelf, and procures the crown for her ſonne Solomon. ib.
The martiall virtues of Bayard. 214
He is wounded at the taking of Breſſin. 216
Beautie imperious. 16
An excellent ſaying of venerable Bede. 68
Bees bear the ſign of a Bull on their bodies. 60
Belizasius is choſen generall againſt Gilimer who had uſurped the crown from Hilderick. 161
He marcheth to the gates of Carthage. ib.
A triumph after the manner of the Ancients was ordained in honour of Belizarius. 162
The valour of Bellizarius. 163
His rare qualities. 164
The originall of the miſeries of Belizarius. ib.
The cauſe why Belizarius was debaſed, was becauſe he had violated the perſons of the Popes. ib
He is brought into diſgrace, and his offices taken from him. 167.
Belſhaſſar makes a ſumptuous banquet, and the hand-writing upon the wall in unknown characters is diſcovered. 246
He is murthered. ib.
Bethulia is beſieged. 282
The Bethalians murmure againſt the Prieſts. ib.
The picture of Boldneſſe. 76

The

The Essence of Boldnesse. ib.
The notable Boldnesse of Saints who have often defended the truth with the hazard of their lives, against the rage and malice of cruell and bloudy tyrants. 78
Why Boldnesse is not in God. ib.
The rash love of the Earle of Bothuel. 295
Boucicaut is taken prisoner. 211
By his wisdome he endeavoreth the liberty of himself and other Lords, and obtaineth it. 212
His whole course of life (contrary to that of Souldiers) generally was very religious. 213

C

Caligula her fury against Seneca. 274
Calumny against Julian and Seneca. 275
Divers degrees of Calumniatours. 94
From whence the degree of Cardinall cometh.
George Castriot was a souldier as soon as he was born a man. 209
He died of a Feaver in the city of Lyssa. 210
Presages of the generosity of Cesar. 79
An excellent conceit of Charity. 25
The source of Charity. 102
The rare qualities of Charlemaign the Great. 172
His great learning. ib.
His seriousnesse in his study. ib.
Martel and Pepin reproduced in the person of Charlemaign. ib.
His rare virtues. ib.
His brave exploits against the Infidels. 173
His war with the Italians, and his succouring the Church which did groan under the chains of the Lombards. ib.
His entrance into Rome in great pomp. ib.
He warreth against the Saracens. ib.
He was the first King of France. 174
Great troubles at Rome appeased by him. 175
Pope Leo caused him to be crowned Emperour of Rome. 176
The great cunning of men who go about to surprise Chastity. 18
Advise to Ladies and Gentlewomen concerning Chastity. 19
The honour the French bore to the virtue of Chastity. 110
The conjugall Chastity of S. Lewis. 111
Weak spirits are ordinarily Cholerick. 87
Malicious and covert souls are ranked in the second region of anger, which is bitter Choler. ib.
Choler and vengeance are prejudiciall. 294
Chrysostom mentioneth an excellent presage of a wise man. 65
The greatnesse and beauty of Clemency. 143
The generous anger of Clotharius. 117
The Essence of Compassion. 99
Complacence stronger then fire and sword. 18
Miseries of humane Condition. 56
Such as have a clear Conscience are most bold, 79
Contentments are rather in the will, then in the pleasing objects. 48
True contentment is in God. 49
God possessing himself, injoyeth his Contentment. ib.
Our Lord passed all his life in Contentments which were necessarily due to him, to give us an example to wean our selves from them. 50
Conversation and its contentments. 13
Conversation must be moderated. ib.
Courage is not lessened by study. 78
Men of obscure birth raised to great preferments by their courage. 81
Compassion of great Courages. 99
The rare endowments that are required in a Courtier. 219
The Court of Pharaoh is compared to the Helmet-flower. 228
The horrour of cruelty. 100
A man must take heed of being too Curious. 46
The wisdome of Cushi the servant of David in the counsel of Absolon. 149

D

A Witty Fable of John Damascen. 2
Daniel is chosen for one of Nebuchadonozars pages. 247
His noble extraction and rare parts. ib.
He is in great hazard of his life. 241
He consulteth with God. ib.
He is made Vice-Roy of all the Provinces of the Kingdome. 243
He is sought unto to give the interpretation of the hand-writing upon the wall. 246
He refuseth to worship Bell. 247
He killeth the Dragon. ib.
He is cast into the Lions Den. ib.
He is taken from thence and his accusers put into his roome who are immediately devoured. ib.
The question upon the act of David is resolved. 35
The qualities of David. 139
His entrance into the Court. ib.
He is pursued and escapes. ib.
The losse of David in banishment. ib.
His arrivall at Nob causeth great disasters to the Priests. ib
David saves himself in the caves of the desart, whither his father and mother go to seek him. 142
His piety towards them. ib.
Banished men repair unto David. ib.
The visite of Jonathan secret and very profitable for David. ib.
Nabals rudenesse towards David. ib.
The admirable generousnesse of David in pardoning his enemies. ib.
David goeth out of the Kingdome, and retireth himself among strangers. 143
David receives the news of Sauls overthrow. 144
David cannot be excused for the treaty made with Abner. 145
He is absolute King by the death of Ishbosheth the son of Saul. ibid.
The royall qualities of David. ib.
His zeal to religion. ib.
His valour and his warres. ib.
His justice and good husbandry. ib.
His vices. ib.
The blindnesse of David. 146
Davids repentance. ib.
Punishment upon the house of David. ib.
The patience of David towards Shimei. 148
His great humility and his humble words. ib.
Davids mildnesse very great. 149
The last acts of Davids life. 150
God hath made all creatures to have delectation. 48
Four things compose the solid Delectation of man. ib.
The Essence of Delectation. 49
Demetrius his oration. 203
He is engaged in a war against the Macchabees. 204
Whether it be good to have a Desire. 39
An excellent picture of Desire. ib.
The world is replenished with Desiring souls. ib.
The exposition of the picture of Desire. ib.
The passion of curiosity a kind of Desire ib.
Inconstancy followeth the multitude of Desires. 41
Four sources of Desires. 42
A reason against vain Desires drawn from divine tranquility. ib.
Another reason against vain Desires, is the onely desire which Jesus had in seeking the glory of his heavenly Father. 43
Marvellous effects of Desire. 112
The image of Despair. 65
Three sorts of acts in Despair. ib.
Remedies against Despair. 68
The admirable conversion of some who seemed desperate. ib.
The sight of our Saviour teacheth us to persevere in our good hopes, and not to Despair. 69
A great secret of life is to undergo Destiny. 139
Why Devils love not God whom they know to be so amiable. 48
Disorder is fatall to the Court of great ones. 174
Doeg accuseth the high Priest being innocent. 141
Means to use an efficacious remedy in Duels. 36

E

THe reign of Edward. 316
His qualities, and his death. 317
Divers causes of the ruine of Egypt. 219
The children of Israel depart out of Egypt. 231
Eleazer a Jewish Captain died valiantly having first pierced the Elephant whereon he did suppose that Eupator did combat. 202
Queen Eleanor an enemy to France. 118
Elijah includeth the name God, and the Sun in his name. 248
He hideth himself at the brook Carith over against Jordan ib.
He restoreth to life the dead child of the woman of Sarepta 249.
He is known to be the Prophet of God by fire coming down from heaven which consumed his sacrifice. 250
He flies into the Wildernesse and is sustained by an Angel, which furnished him with a cruise of oyl, and a cake baked. ib.
He travelleth fourty dayes in the strength of that sustenance. 251
His vision. ibid.
He foretelleth to Ahab, that the dogs should lick his blood in the same place where Naboth was slain. 252
He is translated, and took a new life, without loosing that he had in the world. 254
The labyrinth of the hypocrisie of Queen Elizabeth. 299
The fury of Elizabeth. 200
Elisha leaveth his Plough and Oxen, and followeth Elijah. 251

He is heir of Elijahs ſpirit. 255
His ſpeech to Joram. ib.
Eliſha beſieged in Dothan, is guarded by an hoſt of heavenly Angels. 256
Eliſha conducteth his enemies ſtricken with blindneſſe to Samaria the chief city of the adverſe partie. ib.
Joram threateneth to take off his head. ib.
He dieth. 259
The eſtate of England. 315
The picture of Envie. 91
The definition of Envie. ibid.
Humane remedies againſt Envie. 94
The bleſſed, though unequall in glory are not envious. 96
The lamentable Envie of Ebroin againſt S. Leger. 121
Envie never ſleepeth. 140
The horrible Envie of Saul. ib.
Envie is eaſily learned at the Court. ib.
The Temple of Epheſus. 154
The courteous meeting of Eraſmus and Oporinus. 72
Evilmeredech ſon of Nebuchadonozar took upon him the regincie of the Empire, his father leaving his kingdome to graze with the beaſts. 245
The ignorance of our Evils is a ſtratagem of divine Providence 71

F

THe nature of Fear, and the bad effects of it. 70
Two ſorts of Fear, naturall and morall. 71
The cauſes of Fear. ibid.
Fear is a troubleſome paſſion. ibid.
Fear of accidents in the world. 72
Remedies againſt accidentall Fear. ib.
Fear of poverty cauſeth moſt ſtrange boldneſe. 73
The example of our Saviour ought to encourage us againſt Fear. 74
Reſolutions againſt Fear. 75
We muſt Fear nothing in the wotld to the prejudice of our ſouls. 81
Fidelity and its excellency. 14
The mervellous effects of fire. 86
Rebellion of the Fleſh. 16
What true Fortitude is, and the parts thereof. 74
Qualities of a good Friend. 8
Great men are not ordinarily the beſt Friends. ib.
The choiſe of a Friend. ib.
A man muſt not adhere too much to himſelfe to be a good friend. ib.
Friends ought to adviſe and correct. 14
Who loves himſelf too much hath no Friend. 37

G

THe affectionate Letter of the Lord Biſhop of Geneva. 11
The diſaſter of Gilimer, and his captivity. 162
A great induſtry to Give well. 13
There is none but God which is for it ſelf. 1
When we diſtruſt our ſelves, we muſt have recourſe to God. 18
An excellent reaſon of S. Auguſtine to ſhew the inclination we have to God, 23
An objection about the inviſibility of God. ib.
God rendreth himſelf infinitely amiable in totall nature. ib.
The Sun the Image of God. ib.
The commerce of man with God. 24
The means to acquire the love of God. 27
The practiſe of the Love of God. ib.
Howwe may learn to love God above the love of the world. ib.
We muſt learn to love God himſelf, and by the character of his ſubſtance, which is Jeſus. ib.
Onely ſinne hated by God. 34
God in his Eſſence accordeth the diverſitie of all Eſſences. 46
The ſympathies and antipathies which God hath wiſely impreſſed on Eſſences and in union. ibid.
God for the puniſhment of niceneſſe will ſuffer that which man moſt fears, to fall upon him. ibid.
Three conſiderable qualities in the bleſſing of God. 50
God is buſied about this world as his ſtoue of burthen. 59
God is not capable of hope ſince he poſſeſſeth all. 63
God is independent of all creatures, and the ſource of his felicities proceedeth from the infinitie of his perfection. ibid.
God hath no need of our converſion to increaſe his glory. 64
God ſupporteth all good hopes by reaſon of the infinite capacity of his Eſſence. ibid.
We muſt place our hopes in God, by the example of the holy humanity of Jeſus Chriſt. ibid.
God when he pleaſeth taketh away all the obſtacles which oppoſe deſpair. 68
The wonders which God maketh to appear in the old Teſtament by the help of his creatures. ib.
God indifferently treateth elect ſouls, as reprobate during life, without ſhewing that he deſpaireth of their ſalvation. ib.
God never faileth with neceſſary ſuccours, and ſufficient grace to ſave us. ibid.
It is the providence of God which doth preſerve us and inſtruct us to drive away all fear. 73
The picture of the tranquility of God. 88
God to ſpeak properly hath no anger. ib.
Three ſorts of thunderbolts, which figure unto us, how God doth proceed with the chaſtiſements of men. ib.
God doth all by ſeeing and by being ſeen. 95
The differences of our knowledges from thoſe of God. 96
A great example of the weakneſſe of mans ſpirit, when God leaves it. 148
Godfrey Duke of Bovillon a moſt reſolute and fortunate Generall. 207
The excellency of Goodneſſe. 136
Grace by the contemplation of divine things is a remedy for our temptations. 50
The great and magnanimous goodneſſe of Lewis the twelfth. 120
Great things were made for the leſſer. 131
An excellent obſervation of S. Gregory. 80

H

THe direfull example of Haman againſt the inraged, who are at a little offended. 91
Hamans malice againſt Mordecai. 193
Haman is condemned to be hanged and the Jews preſerved. 195
Hatred a hideous Comet. 32
Its nature, properties, and degrees. ibid.
It is called Antipathy. ibid.
Hatred cometh out of Love. 33
Melancholy hatred by Grecians is called Man-hatred. ibid.
Simplicity of divine Eſſence, exempt from Antipathy or hatred. ibid.
Hatred of humour and how it is to be handled. ib.
Reaſonable hatred and its illuſion. 35
Hatred of Intereſts which begets ſuits and Duels. 36
A notable example of appeaſing Hatred. 37
The utility of Hatred. ibid.
How Hatred is to be diverted. 38
Means to eſchew and prevent the Hatred of powerfull men. 39
A compariſon of a ſhip and the heart of man. 42
The ſons of Heli behave themſelves very diſorderly, to the great diſhonour of his gray hairs. 235
His connivence, or at the moſt, gentle reproof, no whit doth better them. ib.
God puniſheth Heli for the ſins of his ſons. ib.
He dieth. ibid.
Henry Eight grown more hardened againſt Cardinall Pool. 314
The death of Henry the Eighth. 315
Herodias ſlept not one good ſleep with Herod ſo long as S. John Baptiſt was alive. 269
Her daughter beggeth the head of S. John Baptiſt, which is granted unto her. ibid.
The hiſtory of Heſter. 187
Heſter the neece of Mordecai. ibid.
She is married to Ahaſuerus King of Perſia, and declared Queen. 188
Her excellent virtues and endowments. 189
She is acquainted with the plot of Haman for the utter deſtruction of the Jews. 191
Her prayer to God. ib.
She preſenteth her ſelf to Ahaſuerus. 192
She inviteth Ahaſuerus and Haman to a Banquet. ib.
She relates to the King the plot of Haman againſt her ſelf and her people. 194
Hierom his great affection to S. Paul. 11
Hieruſalem is beſieged by Lyſias and brought to great extremity, 203
Holophernes angry at the great preparation made by the Jews for their defence. 182
Holophernes raviſhed at the ſpeech of Judith. 184
Holophernes his army deſeated. 186
The Image and Nature of Hope. 61
The good husbanding of Hope. 62
We muſt adapt our ſelves to our Hopes. ibid.
We muſt ground our Hopes well. ibid.
Powerfull friends may ſerve for a ſuport for Hope. ibid.
We muſt not too ſoon reject, nor too late put forward in purſuit of our Hopes. 63
The Hopes of the world are very deceitfull, and have no ſolitude. 64
Three ſorts of Hope. ib.

One

One may reasonably fly that which is in any wise hurtfull. 46
Hypatius his speech. 161

I

IConoclasts or Image-breakers, an heresie sprung up even in Rome it self. 174
Jealousie is a degree of the envious. 91
The seed of Jealousie. 92
Jealousie for honours and dignities. ibid.
Learned men subject to jealousie. ibid.
Jealousie in marriages holdeth the first place in the Envious. ibid.
Jealousie defined according to S. Thomas. ibid.
Out of what Jealousie is framed. ibid.
Description of Jealousie. 93
Jealousie compared to the Abysse. ibid.
Jealousie maketh havock in the heart. ibid.
Advice to women concerning jealousie. ib.
The bloudy effects of the Jealousie of Saul. 141
Joab his Jealousie over Abner. 145
Jeremiah a man of sorrow. 263
His sanctity. ibid.
Jezabel threatneth to take away Elijahs life. 250
Jezabel thrown out of a window dieth miserably. 253
The love of Jesus towards his heavenly Father. 28
For what reasons Jesus prayed on earth. 64
The exceese of the contrition, and dolours of our Lord Jesus. 69
Jesus Christ acquired us boldnesse by his fear. 79
Three powerfull succours of our Saviour Jesus Christ to animate our constancy. 80
The power of the name of Jesus. ibid.
The admirable effects of the Crosse of Jesus. ibid.
To know whether our Lord Jesus was subject to Anger. 88
The eye of Jesus watching, sparkling and weeping. 96
Impatient men of divers qualities. 54
The picture of Impudence. 83
Divers spirits subject to impudencie. ibid.
The miserable end of an unhappy Impudent man. 86
It is a hard thing not to feel some Incommodities, life being so full of them. 46
The kingdome of Inconstancy. 24
Three sorts of Envious Indignation. 93
The plot of Ingobergua to cure her husbands passion of love, succeeded ill out of too much affectation. 107
John Baptist apprehended. 267
His rare qualities. ibid.
He is beheaded. 269
Joab and Abner do strive for the government of Judah. 144
Joab and Abner combat. ib.
Joab in his fault upon necessity is tolerated by David. ib.
Joabs insolency. 149
The death of Joab. 153
The courage and resolution of Joachim, who executed the office both of a Priest and Captain. 181
The good offices of Jonathan. 141
Josiah slain. 263
Joseph the son of a shepheard. 219
His divine qualities. 220
His brethren sell him. ibid.
Mervellous constancy of Joseph amidst those great temptations of the Court, and of his Mistresse. 221
He is accused for attempting to ravish that honour, which he preserved. ib.
He is imprisoned. ib.
He is taken out of the prison, and doth interpret Pharaohs dream. 222
He is promoted to high preferment by Pharaoh. ibid.
Josephs deportment in Court a pattern for all Courtiers. ibid.
His singular piety and modesty. 223
His fidelity to his Prince. ibid.
His demeanour in his government, 224
His brethren came down to Egypt for food, and their intertainment. 225
He meeteth with his aged Father, and apointeth him a place to live in. 226
Josua his education. 196
His familiarity with Moses. ibid.
He is made Generall of the Army of the Israelites. ibid.
His death. 177
Three sorts of Joy. 48
The art of Joy. 51
The Israelites murmure against Moses. 231,232
They have war with the Amalekites, and worst them. 233
The Israelites disrelish Samuel. 236
A great famine in Israel which was caused by a very great drought. 149
Judas Macchabeus the sonne of Mattathias made Generall over the Army of the Hebrews against the tyrannie of Antiochus. 198
His piety for restoring the Temple. ib.
Particular favours which he received from God. ib.
He maketh peace with the Romans. 199
He defeated nine Generals of Antiochus in pitched battell. 200
Isaiah his vision. 260
His eloquence as his birth is elevated. ib.
He is sawed alive. 262
The kingdome of Judah divided by the ambition of favourites. 144
The rare endowments of Judith. 181
Her prayer to God. 183
Her speech to Holophernes being brought before him. 184
Her courteous entertainment. ibid.
Judith being conducted by Vagoa to Holophernes Pavillion, in his sleep cut off his head. 185
She returneth to the Bethulians with the head of Holophernes. ibid.
Her entertainment by the Citizens of Bethulia. ibid.
Her counsell to the people. ibid.
An excellent observation of Julian. 58
Acts of Justice in punishment and reward
Justine who was born a Cow-heard mounted to the throne of the Emperours of Constantinople. 158
The fidelity and goodnesse of Justinian. ibid.
His greatnesse. 159
His nature and manners. ibid.
His manner of life was austere. ib.
Some abuse the belief of men, in reporting that he could neither reade nor write, mistaking Justinian for his uncle Justin. ibid.
His great love to learning, but chiefly Law and Divinity. ibid.
A great conspiracy against him. 160
A speech concerning the mutiny against him. ibid.
Justinian kept prisoner in his palace, and Hypatius is proclaimed Emperour. ibid.
The stoutest men assail Justinian in his Palace. 161
The sedition against Justinian is appeased. ibid.
The reflux of the affairs of Justinian. 164
The defects of Justinian. 168
Justinian in the latter end of his age fell into two great errours. 169

K

THe words of the Wise man directed to the Kings of the times Wisd. 6. 131
Kings ought to professe the outward worship and service of God for the performance of his duty, and the example of his people. 133
Knowledge of ones self. 18
Knowledge ought to be moderate. 153

L

THe prodigious victory which in the end Lotharius gained over himself, after a great storm of the passion of love, in becomming Religious. 113
The cruell handling of Pope Leo. 175
Strange desire of Lewis the eleventh. 113
Generous act of Lewis the eleventh. 120
An excellent observation of Libanius. 81
All happinesse included in Love. 1
God the Father of Unions doth draw all to unitie by Love. ibid.
The sect of Philosophers of the indifferency of Love. ibid.
The first reason against the indifferency of Love, is that thereby he maketh himself as chief end, and the God of himself. ibid.
The second reason is drawn from the communication of creatures. 2
A third reason against the indifferency of Love is drawn from the tenderness of great hearts. ibid.
Wherefore great hearts are most loving. 3
Love is the soul of the universe. ibid.
Love is the superintendent of the great fornace of the world. ibi
The nature of Love. ibid.
The definition of Love with its division. 4
The steps and progression of Love. ibid.
The causes of Love. ibid.
The means to make ones self to be worthily loved. ibid.
Notable effects of Love in three worlds. ibid.
Love includeth all blessings. 5
There are miserable Lovers in the world. ibid.
Who loveth too much loveth too little. 6
A notable comparison of S. Basil touching Love. 9
Love is a strange malady. 14

Disasters of evill Love. 15
Division of Love. ibid
Love of humour. ibid.
Interiour causes of Love. 16
The secret attractives of Love. ibid.
Modification of their opinion, who place Love in transportation. ib.
The senses being well guarded shut up all the gates against Love. 17
The miserable estate of one passionately in Love. ib.
The diversities of Love. ib.
Evill Angels intermeddle in the great tempests of Love. 18
Cruelty of Love on the persons of Lovers. ibid.
Love is sometime the punishment of pride. ib.
Advices and remedies against Love in its full. 19
The medall of Love hath two faces. ib.
An excellent conceit of Solomon concerning Love. ibid.
Disasters of Love in each age and condition. 20
Advice to all sorts of persons concerning Love. ibid.
Diversitie of the maladies of Love, and their cures. 21
Remedies for the affection of Love, which come against our wills. ibid.
Admirable example of the combate of Saints against Love. ib.
Separation the first remedie against Love. 22
The counsell and assiduity of a good directour, is an excellent antidote against Love. ibid.
The conversation of God with man by the mystery of the incarnation, in the consummation of Love. 24
The Eucharist the last degree of Love. ibid.
The Love of Saints towards Jesus. ibid.
The growth of Love like to pearls. 25
The Empire and eminencies of Divine Love. ib
Qualities of Divine Love, by which we may know, whether it inhabiteth a soul. 26
Pliantnesse, Liberality, and Patience, three principall marks of Love. ibid.
Twelve effects of Love. ibid.
Three orders of true Lovers in the world. ib.
Nine degrees of Seraphical Love for the conterplative. ib.
That it is good to be honestly Loved. 38
We most ardently Love the things we most lose. 58
The scandalous of the Emperour Lotharius, and Valdrada. 109
The Love of David and Jonathan. 140
Excellent loyaltie of a Ladie. 8
Lysias his speech before the raising of the siege of Hierusalem. 203
Lysias is taken and slain by the souldiers. ibid.

M

THe gallant resolution of Maccabeus, who with a handfull of men gave battell to a great army, wherein being over powered, he lost not his honour but his life. 204
Some Men are in the world as dislocated bones in the body. 52
Man terrible above all terribles. 72
Man as he is the most miserable of all creatures, so he is the most Mercifull. 98
Man hath no greater evil then himself. ibid.
An observation of Bernardine concerning Marriage. 35
Mattathias the father of Judas Machabeus opposeth the tyranny of Antiochus. 197
He refuseth to offer incense to Idols. ibid.
His courage for Religion. 198
His glorious death. ibid.
Utility of Melancholy. 55
A notable example of Meroven to divert youth from Marriage. 106
The first Mervell in the life of S. Lewis, is, the joyning of the wisdome of State with the Gospell. 177
The second is, of the union of Humility and Greatnesse. 179
The third is, his devotion and courage. ibid.
Incomparable Mildnesse of Lewis the sonne of Charlemaign. 120
Mildnesse of the first men. 99
The beauty and utility of Mildnesse. 100
Sin and Folly the chief evils of the Mind. 58
Remedies for Minds full of scruple. 56
Moderation of the Kings of France. 117
Great Moderation in S. (King) Robert. 119
Mordecai his excellent personage. 187
His entertainment in the Court of Ahasuerus, ib.
He discovereth the treason which was plotted against Ahasuerus. ib.
Moses flooted in the river of Nile in a cradle of bull-rushes. 227
His education. 228
He killeth an Egyptian. 229
He withdraweth into the countrey of Midian. ib
He talketh with God. ibid.
He dyeth, having first seen the land of promise from mount Nebo. 234
Gods judgement on wicked Murray. 300

N

NAaman the Assyrian commanded by Elisha to wash seven times in the river Jordan. 257
His leprosie stayes upon Gehezi. 258
Naboth unjustly condemned and slain. 251
Nathan and Bathsheba's advice. 151
Nature necessarily brings with it its sympathies, and antipathies. 46
Nebuchadonozar his dream. 242
He worshippeth Daniel. 241
He erecteth a statue of gold of sixty cubits high. 243
He commandeth all his nobles to do homage to it. ib.
He commandeth the three children, that disobeyed his command therein, to be cast into the fornace. 244
His second dream and the interpretation by Daniel. ibid.
His misfortune is bewailed by the whole Court. 245
He is again found out, and reinvested in his throne. ib.
The birth and education of Nero. 271
The perfidiousnesse of his mother. ibid.
His cruelty towards Britanicus. 272
The love of his mother did degenerate to mispriſion. ibid.
His present to his mother. ibid.
His horrible attempt upon his mother. ibid.
The amazement of Nero. 273
Nero continueth his cruelties. ibid.
He falls in love with Poppea and doth estrange himself from his wife Octavia. 274
Nero grows worse and worse. 284
The conspiracy against him is detected. ibid.
The image of Nice-ones. 49
Treason against the Duke of Norfolk, and his ruine. 299
The horrible Catastrophe of the Duke of Norfolk. 300

O

FLight from Occasions, is the most assured bulwark for chastity. 18
Octavia calumniated by Poppea. 274
Ozias Prince of the people in the presence of Joachim, appeaseth the people of Bethulia. 182

P

THe over-fond love of Parents to their children, is chastised in them. 272
The exercise of Patience what it is. 37
Necessitie forceth Patience. 58
S. Paul tender in holy affections. 8
He came to Rome. 279
He is falsly accused. ibid.
His conversation with Peter. ib.
He preacheth the Gospel. ib.
He is threatned and persecuted. 280
He is condemned to the whip, but diverted that punishment. ib.
He is committed to the hands of Felix. ibid.
He appears before the Tribunal of Felix. ibid.
Drusilla comes to hear him. ib.
S. Paul appeals to Rome, 281
The young Agrippa, king of Judea with his sister Bernice assist at the judgement of S. Paul. ib.
Festus is touched with his words. ibid.
He is imbarqued for Rome. ibid.
He arrives there, and treateth with the Jews. ibid.
S. Paul is undoubtedly known by Seneca. ibid.
His Oration to the Senate of Rome. 282
The effect of his Oration. ibid.
The paralel betwixt S. Paul and Seneca. 283
The grace of Jesus and the Crosse are the two principles of S. Paul. ibid.
His perfection and high knowledge. 284
He leaveth Rome. ibid.
The politick counsell of Pharaoh. 217
He dreameth. 222
He fails in his purposes. 228
Marks of reprobation in Pharaoh. 230
The plagues of Egypt. ibid.
An excellent conceit of Plato concerning terrestriall love. 222
An excellent conceit of Platonists.

The secrets of the Divine Policy of God. 238
The birth and education of Cardinall Pool. 313
His love of solitude. ibid.
His travels and return to England. ibid.
The combat in his spirit. 314
He took part with God. ibid.
He is made Cardinall. ib.
He is considered on to be made Pope. 315
He retireth again into solitude. ibid.
He travels to the reducement of England to the antient faith. 317
His speech to the States. 318
Princes the workmanship of God. 132
What the wisdome of a Prince should be. 133
Princes should not give too much authority to their subjects. 144
Whether learning be fitting for Princes. 153
That learning is fitting for Princes defended. ibid.
The favour of Princes is very uncertain. 219
Procopius his extravagant fables of Justinian and Theodora disproved. 168
The secrets of Providence. 164
The great Providence of God, in Josephs entring and negotiating in Egypt. 218

R

REason remedieth all humane actions. 57
The love of Reputation is a strong spur. 81
The wicked Revenge of an Abbot and of John Proclytas against the French. 119
Rigour misbecometh persons Ecclesiasticall. 99
The causes of differences of Rigour. ibid.
Elogy of the city of Rome. 79
The estate of Rome and court of Nero when Paul came to it. 271
The Practise of Romulus. 131
The end of Royaltie. 131
Royalty a glorious servitude. 132
Royalty a mervellous profession. ibid.

S

THe Essence and Image of Sadnesse. 54
Four kinds of Sadnesse. 55
The remedies against Sadnesse. 57
The three Sadnesses of our Blessed Saviour. 60
Samuel from his infancy was conversant in the Tabernacle. 235
His zeal and other rare qualities. 236
His speech to the people. ibid.
His wisdome in concluding a peace with the Philistims. ibid.
He dieth. 240
The widow of Sarepta's oyl and meal fails not during the famine. 249
The qualities of the sufferings of our Saviour. 60
Our Saviour hath suffered in all the persons of the just and Martyrs. ibid.
An excellent observation upon the terming our Saviour a Lamb. 88
The prudence of Saul. 63
He found a Kingdome seeking his Fathers Asses. 238
The excellency and defects that were in Saul. 239
The resolute valour of Saul in relieving the men of Jabith. ib.
Saul being in great perplexity, consulteth with the soul of Samuel. 143
Saul cleared for a while, again returns to his evil spirit. 141
Saul marcheth against the Philistims, and is overthrown in battell. ibid.
Sauls end. ib.
The shame of scoffing. 82
The danger of Scoffing. 118
The scoffs of certain rebellious Flemings severely punished by the generosity of Philip de Valois. ib.
Seneca by a lesse evil diverts a greater. 272
From whence proceed the calumnies of Seneca. 274
His birth. ib.
His education and spirit. ib.
He is banished to Corsica, where he composed excellent works 275
His excellent complement. ibid.
He is in great repute. 276
His manners. ibid.
He made a Libel against Claudius. 277
His judgement on Nero. ibid.
He is made minister of State. ibid.
He put the State in good order. ib.
His Maxims. ibid.
His opinion of the Soveraign good. 278
His falling off from Agrippina. ibid.
Why Seneca having so many brave qualities, did perform so little in reformation of manners. 283
His constant and famous death. 284
Sin corrupteth the goodnesse of Essence in intellectuall creatures. 45
A civill shame doth hinder good designs. 297
Shamefac'tnesse a reasonable passion. 81
Its sources honour and conscience. ibid.
Three kinds of Shamefac'tnesse. ib.
The esteem the antients had of Shamefac'tnesse. 83
The Queen of Sheba. 154
Her quality. ibid.
The picture of Slander. 94
There would be no Slander, if it were not made Slander by thinking thereon. ibid.
Solomons entry into the Realm full of trouble. 151
He is declared King. ib.
The bloudy entrance of Solomon after the death of David. 152
Solomons rigour. ibid.
He cannot well be justified for the bloud of his brother. ibid.
The just punishment of God upon Solomon. ibid.
A wonderfull dream of Solomon. 153
His knowledge. ibid.
The judgement of Solomon in the contention of the two women. 154
Solomon his zeal to the building of the Temple. ib.
The fall of Solomon. 155
The beginning of his debauchednesse. ibid.
Solomon is perverted in Religion. 156
The estate of Solomon in the other world. ibid.
The prodigious course of some Stars. 74
The evil opinion of the Stoicks, to trust altogether to themselves without acknowledging the grace and assistance of God. 283
The birth and education of Queen Mary Stuart. 291
Her return into Scotland. ibid.
The death of Henry Stuart. 294
Persecution of the Queen Mary Stuart by the Protestants. 295
She comforts her self in prison, and hopeth against hope. 296
She escaped out of prison. ibid.
Her languishment in her imprisonment in England. 301
Elizabeths hatred to her. 304
The Processe against the Queen of Scotland. ibid.
Her invincible Apology. 305
The unjust judgement given against her. 307
The vain endeavour to delay her death. 308
Queen Elizabeth chiefly to be charged for her death. ibid.
Her death and miraculous constancy. 309
The Sunne is an hundred and fourty times bigger then the earth and in twenty four hours goeth more then twelve millions of leagues. 74

T

TWenty two thousand Bullocks and one hundred and twenty thousand sheep, sacrificed for the dedication of Solomons Temple, 3 Reg. 8. 63
Mervellous Temples wher e Lions are tractable. 46
The generosity of Theodora wife of Justinian. 161
Procopius speaketh shamefully of Theodora but undeservingly. 167
Her death. 169
Theodat honoured by Amalazunta. 162
His perfidiousnesse. ib.
He causeth Amalazunta to be strangled in a Bath. ib.
Theodat is put to death and Vitiges is chosen in his stead. 163
Time stealeth away from us the sense of Evils. 58
Timidity its causes and Symptomes 71
Remedies for Timidity in declaiming. 72
Timidity sometimes turneth into insolency. ibid.
Remedies against accidentall fear or Timidity. 64
Totilas is chosen king of the Goths. 163
The carriage of Truth doth cost dear at Court. 146

V

VAlour of Charles the simple. 117
Vagoa Chamberlain to Holophernes. 185

THE TABLE.

Vashti wife of Ahasuerus doth make a banquet for the women answerable to the King her husband. 188
She is degraded, and divorced, ibid.
The burning of Vesuvius in the year 1631. 73
Vigilius shamefully used. 169
The slights of Vigilius to get the Popedome from Sylverius. 168
He is again received into favour, and afterwards dyed of the stone in Sicily. ibid.
The death of Uriah. 146

W

THe greatnesse of Wisdome. 133
Humane Wisdome overthrown by the power of Heaven. 140
Reasons for the modest love of women. 7
Rare Amities of Women. ibid.
Modest amitie with women should alwayes be handled with much precaution. 8
Observation of Gambilius applyed to the amity of Women. ibid.
The opinion of Fathers concerning the Amity of Women. 9
Shipwracks happening by the love of Women, ibid.
The love of Women dangerous. 16
Hatred of Women. 38
Humour of Women. 45
Women among the Sabeans command over men. 154
The artifice of Women. 156
Its very dangerous to be observant to wicked Womens humours 167
What hindereth the production of admirable works. 68
The attractives of the world are not very urgent. 18

Z

A notable speech of Zalcuchus. 58

FINIS.